[2] Respondents make much of the circumstance that petitioner did not at once attribute her symptoms to the fall, and did not even tell her physicians of it until after she had been at the hospital two days. A failure on the part of the employee to attribute her severe pains to the fall would not conclude her from recovering compensation if the fall was either the origin or accelerating cause of incapacity. She had suffered previous attacks of abdominal pain, although she was unaware that she had a tumor. Her physicians were not absolutely certain of the existence of a tumor until she was operated upon. A recurrence of the abdominal pains may have indicated to her a return of the old complaint rather than a changed pathological condition arising from the fall. An employee is not to be deprived of compensation because he fails to make a correct medical diagnosis. See Singer v. Industrial Accident Commission, 105 Cal. App. 374, 287 P. 567. Nothing appears to impeach the good faith or veracity of petitioner. Respondents do not dispute her having fallen from the stool.

The physicians who made physical examination of the internal abdominal area affected and treated petitioner had before them original evidence which was not before the physicians who gave their opinions based on a statement of facts without opportunity to investigate the original condition attempted to be described. Giving the statute the liberal construction which section 69 (Stats.

1917, p. 877) enjoins upon courts, we are of the view that petitioner is entitled to industrial compensation.

The order denying compensation to petitioner is annulled.

I dissent. On the record presented I cannot avoid the conclusion that the court has invaded the field of the fact-finding body, and, by weighing the evidence, has erroneously concluded that there is no substantial evidence to support the findings of the commission. The question of fact before the board was whether the accident was the causal or contributing agent in bringing about the twisting of the pre-existent tumor. On this issue the evidence before the board was the expert testimony of physicians and surgeons. The conclusions of these experts were divergent; one group of experts testifying that it was and another group testifying that it was not. The credibility of neither group was impeached nor reflected upon, and the conclusions of one group would seem to rest upon as substantial foundation as the other. This is true, at least to such an extent as that the court as matter of law should not compel the acceptance of the conclusions of one as against the other. The commission is the exclusive judge of the weight of the evidence before it, and this exclusive function would apply to expert testimony as well as any other. I think the order should be affirmed.

Creditor's advancement to debtor, who retained trucks but conveyed title for security, held usurious loan (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757, § 3).

Evidence showed that creditor advanced money to pay balance due by debtor to third person for purchase of trucks under conditional sales contract, and that creditor, for security, took assignment of such contract from third person, together with bill of sale from debtor, and then issued inflated conditional sales contracts, which he immediately assigned to others, to whom debtor made payment.

Borrower could not recover statutory usury penalty from lender, who, guaranteeing performance thereof, transferred nonnegotiable conditional sales contracts, representing loan, to assignee, to whom borrower made all payments (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3757, § 3).

PRESTON, J.

This cause is now before us on rehearing. We have carefully re-examined the cause, and find ourselves unable to reach any other conclusion than that heretofore announced. We adopt a portion of our former opinion, as follows:

Action to recover the statutory penalty provided by section 3 of the Usury Act (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii, Act 3757, Deering's General Laws). Defendant had judgment; plaintiff has appealed.

[1] The transaction took the form of an advancement by defendant of the sum of $1,624.31, to discharge the final payments due from plaintiff to General Motors Acceptance Corporation for the purchase of two trucks under a conditional sales contract. Defendant to secure repayment of the sum advanced took from the Acceptance Corporation an assignment of the conditional sales contract; procured registration of the trucks in his own name as owner; then took a bill of sale of the trucks from plaintiff; then issued to plaintiff an inflated conditional sales contract, dated December 16, 1926, naming the sum of $3,531.88, reciting, however, the fictitious payment of $1,000 on account thereof, leaving the true amount claimed by defendant from plaintiff for said advancement as $2,531.88, which was to be paid in monthly installments over a period of approximately one year. Immediately upon the execution of this additional sales contract, defendant assigned it to Commercial Securities Corporation, Cons., with a written guaranty to said purchaser of all the covenants therein to be kept and performed by plaintiff. Plaintiff made all the payments due under this contract except the last one of $931.88, which fell due December 16, 1927. To take care of this payment, the above-described process was repeated; the $931.88 became $1,131.88; a new conditional sales contract to cover another twelve months' period was issued for this item and immediately assigned by defendant to the Merchants' Security Company.

It must be noted that the possession of the trucks never at any time passed from the plaintiff to defendant. Title was conveyed to the latter at all times for the purpose of security. Stripping the transaction of its entanglements, it is too clear for controversy that it was but a thinly disguised loan heavily charged with usury. Rosemead Co. v. Shipley Company, 207 Cal. 414, 278 P. 1038; Blodgett v. Rheinschild, 56 Cal. App. 728, 206 P. 674; San Joaquin Finance Corp. v. Allen, 102 Cal. App. 400, 283 P. 117.

[2] But the foregoing observations do not entitle plaintiff to recover from the defendant, for the evidence shows that, immediately upon execution of said two contracts, the assignments above noted were made. The evidence also shows without conflict that each and every payment called for under said contracts was made to one or the other of the above-mentioned corporations and not to the defendant. This fact prevents the plaintiff from recovering, and such holding follows from the plain construction of the act itself, which provides that the penalties may be collected from the person "who shall have taken or received" the payment. We cannot say that the written guaranty made by the defendant should alter this rule. There was no showing of collusion or relation of any other kind between defendant and either of the assignees.

Appellant urges that only three cases could be found on this subject, and that these cases hold that the penalty may be collected from the party who makes the contract; they are Sanford v. Kane, 133 Ill. 199, 24 N. E. 414, 8 L. R. A. 724, 23 Am. St. Rep. 602; Taulbee v. Hargis, 173 Ky. 433, 191 S. W. 320, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 762; Harbaugh v. Tanner, 163 Ind. 574, 71 N. E. 145. We have examined each of these cases, and, without stopping to discuss them, we would say in passing that they are not parallel to any extent with the situation we have before us. Upon our own volition, however, we have found a number of cases giving to statutes and Constitutions, which read almost identically with our statute, the construction here given. In Anderson v. Tatro, 44 Okl. 219, 144 P. 360, 361, the court construed a provision of the Constitution of that state which allowed the recovery of double the amount of interest paid "from the person, firm, or corporation taking or receiving the same" (Const. Okl., art. 14, § 3), and it was there held that, where payments were made to the assignee, such assignee alone must answer to the penalties and that the maker of the usurious obligation was not a proper party to the action.

This doctrine was followed again by the Oklahoma Court in the case of First Nat. Bank v. Sensebaugh, 58 Okl. 462, 160 P. 455, wherein the court construed section 5198 of the United States Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. Stats. 1913, § 9759 [12 USCA § 86]); the wording of this statute being similar to the Oklahoma constitutional provision above mentioned and to our own statute. It was there again held that, inasmuch as the interest was paid to the assignee, the maker of the contract was not a proper party to the action. To the same effect, see Webb v. Galveston, etc., Co., 32 Tex. Civ. App. 515, 75 S. W. 355, and Western Bank & Trust Co. v. Ogden, 42 Tex. Civ. App. 465, 93 S.W. 1102.

Further search discloses additional authority to the same effect and no authority to the contrary. The rule is stated in 39 Cyc. 1038, as follows: "The proper party defendant is the person who has received the usury. It is not necessary that a third person to whom the notes executed for the usurious loan were made payable should be joined if he received no part of the usury. But when the usurious note has been transferred to a holder in due course, to whom the maker is compelled to make payment, the original payee is the proper party defendant." This authority cites in support of the text Snyder v. Crutcher, 137 Mo. App. 121, 118 S. W. 489.

The only exception found anywhere to the general rule is that in some jurisdictions the payee of a usurious negotiable note may be sued to recover the usury paid where the instrument has been transferred to an innocent purchaser for value and the maker's right to plead usury as a defense to the note has been thereby destroyed. Schlesinger v. Lehmaier, 191 N. Y. 69, 83 N. E. 657, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 626, 123 Am. St. Rep. 591; Culver v. Osborne, 231 Ill. 104, 83 N. E. 110, 121 Am. St. Rep. 302; Harbaugh v. Tanner, supra; and Kock v. Block, 29 Ohio St. 565.

39 Cyc. 1035 notes the exception as follows: "The person who has knowingly exacted the usury is the person compelled by the law to repay it. But when a negotiable note which includes usury comes into the hands of a holder in due course, who, under the statute, may compel payment in full, the maker is generally allowed to recover the usury thus paid to the innocent indorsee from the usurer-payee." Under this text reference is found to a North Dakota statute and also to the Minnesota General Statute 1894, § 2214, which reads in part: "In any case, however, where the original holder of an usurious note sells the same to an innocent purchaser, the maker of said note, or his representatives, shall have the right to recover back from the said original holder the amount of principal and interest paid by him on said note."

In Fredin v. Richards, 61 Minn. 490, 63 N. W. 1031, construing this statute, is found a holding which casts much light upon the question before us here. In that case the decision bears out the statement in the syllabus that, "where a usurious note, payable to the order of a particular party, is transferred by the original holder without indorsement, the transferee, although he takes it for value and without notice, is not an innocent purchaser of the note; and if the maker pays it to him he cannot maintain an action, under the statute, against such original holder, to recover the amount so paid." In other words, in said case the debtor undertook to hold the original payee for usury paid the assignee of the note, and the court held that, inasmuch as the assignee was not an innocent purchaser, the debtor could have pleaded usury in defense to the note, and for that reason should not be allowed to sue the original payee.

It is not pretended that the contract involved in this action was a negotiable instrument. The plaintiff could at any time have set up usury in defense of an action upon said contract. He has simply sued the wrong party. He could have maintained against the assignee the cause of action provided for under said section 3.

The words "directly or indirectly" found in section 2 do not change or qualify the plain meaning of the provisions of section 3 of the act. Section 2 declares void the contract to pay interest to any extent if usury is provided for. It also provides that the nonpayment of interest shall not accelerate the maturity date of the obligation. The act, in a later section, also provides for a criminal prosecution under certain circumstances. But section 3, by its terms, limits the suit for penalties to a debtor who has paid, against the party who is entitled to receive, and does actually receive, the payment from him.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action for declaratory relief by Otto R. Frasch against the London & Lancashire Fire Insurance Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

WASTE, C. J.

This is an appeal from a judgment entered in defendant's favor when the plaintiff refused to amend upon the sustaining of a demurrer to the first amended complaint.

[1] The action is one for declaratory relief. Plaintiff is seeking to have it determined that the defendant company is bound by and liable under the terms and conditions of a certain policy of fire insurance alleged to have been issued by it. It appears from the complaint that the person who solicited the insurance and delivered the policy, collected and receipted for the premium and absconded with the money, whereupon the defendant denied all liability under the policy, unless plaintiff again paid the premium. In addition to its general demurrer challenging the sufficiency of the complaint to state a cause of action, the defendant demurred specially on the threefold ground that it could not be determined what the terms of the policy were, whether or not it was a standard form of policy, and whether or not Booth, the absconding agent, was an agent of the defendant for the collection of the premium. If one of these several grounds of demurrer is well taken, the judgment must be affirmed.

In support of its general demurrer, the respondent insurance company urges that the complaint is fatally defective because it fails to allege that plaintiff had paid the premium to the respondent either directly or through the medium of a duly authorized agent. In substance, the complaint alleges that in May of 1927, Booth solicited plaintiff to purchase fire insurance protection on his home; that on May 23, 1927, Booth delivered to plaintiff a policy of fire insurance duly issued by the defendant company, covering plaintiff's home against loss by fire to the extent of $10,000; that at the time of delivery of the policy Booth presented a bill or statement of premium issued by the defendant company on one of its regular printed bill forms; that plaintiff thereupon paid the amount of the premium ($70) to Booth, who receipted the bill; that at all of these times, and to the defendant's knowledge, though unknown to plaintiff, Booth was negotiating policies of insurance for parties other than himself without having first obtained the necessary license; that Booth subsequently absconded "with a large sum of money, including the premium paid to him by plaintiff, while he, the said Booth, was acting as agent for defendant"; that approximately three months thereafter the defendant denied all liability under the policy unless plaintiff again paid the premium asserted to be due thereon; and that defendant refused to return the premium or to acknowledge any obligation under the policy, wherefore plaintiff prays for a declaration of his rights thereunder.

[2] In our opinion, the complaint is good against general demurrer, for in addition to the direct allegation of the ultimate fact that the premium had been paid to Booth while "he was acting as agent for defendant," the complaint also contains allegations which, if proven upon the trial, would amount to at least a prima facie showing of an ostensible authority in Booth to receive and receipt for the premium.

[3-6] As a general rule, the powers of an agent of an insurance company are governed by the general law of agency. His powers are varied by the character of the functions he is employed to perform. He may be a general agent with general powers, or his powers may be limited by the company; or he may be a special agent with authority limited to a specific transaction. In any event, an insurance agent, whether general or special, possesses such powers as have been conferred by the company, or as third persons have a right to assume that he possesses under the circumstances of the case; and as a general rule his powers, as to those dealing with him, are determined by the nature of the business intrusted to him, and are prima facie coextensive with its requirements. Silverberg v. Phenix Ins. Co., 67 Cal. 41, 7 P. 38; Marderosian v. National Cas. Co., 96 Cal. App. 295, 302, 273 P. 1093; 14 Cal. Jur. 454, §§ 32 and 33; 32 C. J. 1062, § 139. The fact that Booth came to the plaintiff armed with a policy of insurance duly issued by the defendant company, together with a bill or statement of the premium due thereon made out on one of the defendant's regular printed bill forms, immediately gives rise to the inference that Booth was authorized to deliver the policy and to collect and receipt for the premium. In Arthurholt v. Susquehanna Mut. Ins. Co., 159 Pa. 1, 28 A. 197, 200, 39 Am. St. Rep. 659, it is intimated that "by the very fact of issuing a policy which requires, apparently, nothing but delivery and payment of premium to put it in force, the company arms every man, into whose hands it may come, with the power to receive its money." It is concluded in Terry v. Provident Fund Soc., 13 Ind. App. 1, 41 N. E. 18, 55 Am. St. Rep. 217, that if an unauthorized person solicits an application for insurance, and the insurance company recognizes the regularity of the application, it thereby recognizes such person as its agent, at least for that particular transaction, and the payment of the first premium to him is payment to the company and estops it to deny such payment. The case of Lauze v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co., 74 N. H. 334, 68 A. 31, 33, states that "it is not unreasonable to make the company responsible for any payments made by the person on account of the premium due at the inception of the contract to the party who acted in negotiating the contract, whether he so acted by previous arrangement with the company or was a mere volunteer."

[7] The foregoing declarations are cited merely to indicate the trend of the authorities. Without expressing any opinion at this time as to the correctness of the views therein announced, we are satisfied, as already stated, that the complaint in this action contains not only evidentiary facts, which, if proven upon the trial, would authorize the court in finding the ultimate fact of agency, but also contains a direct averment of the ultimate fact that the premium was paid by plaintiff to Booth while the latter "was acting as agent for defendant." As against a general demurrer, it is only necessary that the ultimate facts be alleged. McCaughy v. Schuette, 117 Cal. 223, 46 P. 666, 48 P. 1088, 59 Am. St. Rep. 176. There is no merit in the point that this ultimate fact of agency is alleged merely by way of recital or inference. What we have said sufficiently disposes of the general demurrer and also the special demurrer, in so far as the latter raises the point that the complaint fails to allege that Booth was respondent's agent for the collection of the premium.

[8-10] Any limitation on Booth's authority to act as agent, of which the plaintiff had knowledge or is charged therewith, constitutes matter of defense and is not now before us. That Booth may have been soliciting insurance, without having first obtained the license provided for in section 633 of the Political Code, does not mitigate against plaintiff's case, for the complaint alleges, and for purposes of demurrer it must be taken to be true, that plaintiff was unaware of such fact, though it was within the defendant's knowledge at the time it issued the policy upon the application procured by Booth. It has been held that the Code section was enacted for the protection of the public as well as of the insurance companies, and that an insurance company may not absolve itself from liability for a contract that it has authorized or ratified, although the contract may have been secured by a person not an agent or solicitor in the full meaning of the statute. Goldstone v. Columbia Life, 33 Cal. App. 119, 122, 164 P. 416; Marderosian v. National Cas. Co., supra, 96 Cal. App. 302, 273 P. 1093.

[11] The remaining two grounds of special demurrer are also without merit. As the sole point involved in the action has to do principally with the propriety of the payment of the premium to Booth, it is not necessary that the plaintiff set out the policy at length or attach it as an exhibit to his complaint. The provisions of the policy and whether or not it is a standard form of policy are not pertinent to the inquiry. As already intimated, anything in the policy or in the application filed in connection therewith tending in any way to diminish or destroy plaintiff's cause of action or rights under the policy, is purely a matter of defense.

[12] In conclusion, it may be added that this is a proper case for declaratory relief. The complaint contains all the averments necessary to show that an "actual controversy" exists between the parties hereto with regard to their respective rights and duties under a written instrument or contract, and plaintiff requests that these rights and duties be adjudged by the court. Oldham v. Moodie, 94 Cal. App. 88, 89, 270 P. 688. The fact that the policy may subsequently be found to contain a clause authorizing its cancellation by the defendant company upon five days' written notice to the assured need not destroy plaintiff's right to an adjudication of the question here involved, for should it be found that plaintiff had properly made payment to Booth as agent for the defendant company then, in the event of such suggested cancellation, he would unquestionably be entitled to a pro rata return of the premium. On the other hand, should it be determined upon the trial that Booth was not in fact the agent of the defendant company and that plaintiff had therefore paid the premium to him without warrant, the defendant company would be absolved from all liability under the policy, and need not return any portion of that which it never received.

The judgment is reversed with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

Facts showing that attorney accepted fees in bankruptcy proceedings, and that clients took paupers' oath and filed petition stating that no attorney's fees had been paid, justified attorney's suspension from practice for six months.

Petition by Daniel Barton to review recommendation of the Board of Governors of the State Bar of California that petitioner be disbarred.

Petitioner suspended from practice of law for six months.

Daniel Barton, in propria persona, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Herbert W. Erskine and Keyes & Erskine, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J.

Charges were preferred against petitioner, a member of the State Bar of California, and a citation was duly issued thereon directing him to appear before the local administrative committee of San Francisco, No. 2, the State Bar of California, and show cause why he should not be disbarred, suspended, or reprobated by reason of his conduct, alleged to involve moral turpitude, dishonesty and corruption, and the violation of the rules of professional conduct adopted by the board of governors of said State Bar.

The particular reprehensible conduct recited in the order to show cause, and which will hereafter appear, arose from a bankruptcy proceeding pending in the United States District Court, Southern Division, Northern District of California, which petitioner had engaged himself to institute and conduct to the procurement of the final order of discharge for an agreed fee. His clients, Victor Rose and Hilda Rose, husband and wife, had formerly conducted a copartnership business under the name of Rose Bros., and said copartnership being unable to meet its obligations, it was forced into insolvency by the petition of its creditors. The copartnership in the course of time received a final discharge, but later said Victor and Hilda Rose discovered that the order discharging the copartnership did not inure to their benefit as individuals, and they therefore petitioned to be adjudged bankrupts. It is in this proceeding that the petitioner was employed. The committee found, and the evidence amply sustains the finding, that petitioner agreed to put both individuals through insolvency upon payment to him of the sum of $200, petitioner herein to pay the costs of both proceedings. With the intent of salvaging as much as possible of said sum, which would ordinarily have been paid on account of costs, petitioner herein advised said petitioners in bankruptcy to take the paupers' oath. In such cases the clerk's fee, in the sum of $30 for each proceeding, is not exacted. This fee, however, in the absence of the filing of said oath, is payable upon filing the petition and schedules. A fee in the sum of $12.50 is necessary in each case to take care of the publications and expense of calling the first meeting of creditors, which must be paid in every case. The petitioner, who was to be paid $50 at the time of employment, $50 at the time of the first hearing of creditors, and $100 upon the making of the orders of discharge, paid only the fees which must be paid in all cases, to wit, $12.50 in each case for expenses of calling of the first meeting of creditors, and none other, until it subsequently developed that he had received his second installment of $50 on account of his agreement with his clients. The petitioner in bankruptcy is required to answer under oath in his schedule an interrogatory as to what sum or sums have been paid to counsel, and to whom for services rendered in the bankruptcy proceedings. The answers given to said questions in each schedule was, "None." The value of such information for the just administration of the bankrupt's estate is obvious. Besides, the payment of a fee to an attorney is material to and an important element for consideration in determining whether or not petitioner is entitled to have his petition and schedule filed without the payment of said clerk's filing fees.

At the first meeting of creditors, held April 28, 1930, interrogatories propounded to Victor Rose developed the fact that he had, contrary to the averment contained in his schedule, paid petitioner herein before or at the time the petition in bankruptcy was filed, to wit, April 4, 1930, the sum of $50, and again on or before the time said meeting of creditors was held he was paid an additional sum of $50. Upon the development of these facts petitioner herein, on the same day and after said discoveries were made, paid to John O. England, clerk of the bankruptcy court in which said matters were pending, the sum of $50, $25 of which was applied to the credit of each matter, thus still leaving a balance of $5 due on account of each filing charge.

Petitioner herein made no statement under oath at the hearing of the proceeding taken against him, and argues in his brief that he did not make up the bankrupt's schedules, but that they were prepared by one of said bankrupts, Victor Rose, and his daughter, and he should not be held accountable for their inadvertence. The petitions and schedules were in the possession and care and under the scrutiny of the petitioner herein, and he caused a notary public to affix his jurat and seal to the paupers' oath in the absence of and without obtaining the personal acknowledgment of the alleged affiants, and likewise as to the petitions and schedules filed upon the representation that said oath in forma pauperis had been duly administered. That such a concatenation of significant events could have escaped the attention of counsel in his investigation and preparation appears exceedingly improbable, and it would not be surprising if the examining board in its consideration of the accusations on their merits gave but little, if any, weight to such a defense offered in avoidance of indisputable facts.

Petitioner in his brief intimates that besides the two $12.50 cost items and the $50 payment on account of filing fees other sums were paid out by him for notarial fees and on account of other costs. The notary was a witness in the proceeding, but he was not asked by petitioner whether he had been paid anything on account of notarial fees, and no showing was made at the hearing that any other sums had been paid by him for any purpose whatsoever.

We have read the evidence in the case carefully, and we are of the view that no wholesome purpose would be served by an analysis of the same. Petitioner has not met the issue as squarely in his brief as the importance of the charges seems to merit, but seeks in a somewhat caustic style to minimize its accusatory effect. He seems to be laboring in the belief that the governors of the State Bar of California and those who have anything to do with its machinery are plotting his undoing. As an illustration, he points to the proceeding Barton v. State Bar, 209 Cal. 677, 289 P. 818, wherein said State Bar recommended his suspension for a period of three months for the violation of rule 2, Rules of Professional Conduct of the State Bar, which prohibits the solicitation of employment by advertisement, and this court substituted in lieu of said recommendation a reprimand for his misconduct. We see no evidence from our examination of the record that there exists the slightest grounds for the apparent belief that any one of the fifteen or more of his brethren in the profession who compose the committee has any purpose or intent to oppress petitioner or to deal unjustly with him. It rather appears that petitioner denies the right and resents the effort of the State Bar to regulate the practice of the law on the theory that all laws which purport to confer such powers are invalid for reasons which have been argued over and over to this court with the result that the bar acts have been upheld.

[1, 2] The policy of the acts is something with which we are not concerned, that being a matter which rests largely with the will of the lawyers of the state to remedy if in their judgment there exists any need of change. It is our duty to enforce the law and impose such penalties as will bring about a compliance with the rules as they have been made by competent authority.

The local administrative committee found the accused guilty of the first offense charged and herein set out, and also guilty of a violation of the provisions of sections 278, 282, and 287, Code of Civil Procedure, and recommended as disciplinary action that he be suspended from the practice of the law for a period not less than three months. The matter coming regularly before the governors of the State Bar, that body, on August 14, 1930, adopted the findings of said local administrative committee and recommended to this court that the accused be disbarred from the practice of the law in the state of California.

Upon a full consideration of the matter, this court is of the view that a suspension from the practice of the law as defined by the decisions of the appellate courts of this state for a period of six months would not be disproportionate to the misconduct herein reviewed. It is made the order of this court that he is hereby suspended from the practice of the law in all the courts of this state for said period of six months, said suspension to become effective thirty days from the service of notice of the within order, said service to be made upon him by the clerk of this court by means of the United States registered mail.

PER CURIAM.

This is a petition to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. On February 13, 1930, Manuel Rodgers was killed while blasting trees on a fruit ranch owned by Mrs. Addie Carlson. His wife and daughter applied for a death benefit, and the commission found that they were wholly dependent upon him. The commission also found that Rodgers died from injuries sustained in the course of and arising out of his employment, and made an award in the sum of $5,150. The petition is by Mrs. Carlson and Columbia Casualty Company, her insurance carrier. It is claimed that Rodgers was, at the time of his death, not an employee of Mrs. Carlson, but a tenant under a lease given by her.

A written instrument, executed by Mrs. Carlson and Rodgers, was introduced in evidence. This instrument, it is contended, is in form a lease and conclusively establishes the status of Rodgers as a tenant. There is no question but that it contains language suggestive of a lease. It commences with the statement that "in consideration of the covenants and agreements herein contained * * * the said Mrs. Addie Carlson does hereby lease and farmlet unto the said Manuel Rodgers, for a term of five (5) years * * * her orchard." It further speaks of "the premises leased herewith"; and it contains an agreement by the party of the second part "that he will not let * * * the premises leased hereby, without first getting the written consent of the party of the first part." It also provides that, upon violation of its terms, the party of the first part "may then at her option terminate this lease." However, the use of such terminology is not conclusive. The instrument does not use the term "rent"; it provides that the party of the second part shall "occupy and work the premises" and "employ a sufficient number of good and skillful farm-hands" to do the work; the party of the first part agrees to furnish materials and equipment; one-half the net proceeds of the crop is to be paid by the party of the first part to the party of the second part; and the party of the second part is subject to supervision to an extent which suggests that he was employed as a foreman to manage the ranch. The ambiguity in this document requires careful construction, and the effect of its provisions is of more importance than the manner of their statement.

[1] Examining those provisions, we find several which establish such an extensive control by Mrs. Carlson and her agents over the activities of Rodgers that, were they taken alone, there would be little doubt that the relationship was that of employer and employee. Under these circumstances, it becomes necessary to interpret, and, if possible, to reconcile the provisions. This the commission proceeded to do; and to that end testimony was taken to show the inception of the agreement, the understanding of its purport by the party who drafted it and the various parties concerned with it, and the practical construction thereof by such parties in their subsequent acts. The competency of such evidence cannot be questioned. As the court said in Luckie v. Diamond Coal Co., 41 Cal. App. 468, 478, 183 P. 178, 182: "We do not think that the relation of master and servant, and none other, is conclusively established by the written contract of employment. But even if it were, that would not prevent the parties from changing that contractual relation and establishing another. Where the parties to a written contract of employment, by mutual consent inferred from their subsequent conduct, have modified their contract and have acted upon it as thus modified, it is valid, in the modified form, to the extent and during the period it was so acted upon and carried out. As between a third party and either party to the contract, such change or modification unquestionably could be shown by parol. In an action between a party to a contract and a third party, the rule that parol evidence cannot be received to contradict or vary a written contract does not apply, as the estoppel on which the rule rests must be mutual, and, since the third person is not bound by the contract as written, neither is his adversary in the action. * * * Accordingly, it has been held that, in an action of this character, while, prima facie, the relation of the parties to a written contract of employment is that which is expressed by the terms of their writing, nevertheless, in order to determine their true relation, such contract should be considered in view, not only of the circumstances under which it was made, but of the conduct of the parties while the work is being performed." (Italics ours.) See, also, Tennant v. Wilde, 98 Cal. App. 437, 277 P. 137.

[2] The conclusion of the commission, as we have said, was that Rodgers was an employee engaged to produce a crop and receive his compensation in the form of a share of the profits. Petitioners, in attacking this conclusion, assert that the issue in this case, and the only issue, is whether the instrument in question is a lease. But the real issue, as we have indicated, is whether the relationship of the parties was that of landlord and tenant, or employer and employee. In determining that question, the commission should naturally look first to the agreement; but the language of the agreement was sufficiently uncertain to call for construction, and the acts of the parties were such as to justify the consideration of extrinsic evidence. Hence our inquiry cannot be restricted to the question whether this written instrument was a lease or a contract of employment. The question before us is whether there is any evidence to support the finding of the commission that Rodgers was the employee of Mrs. Carlson. If the record contains evidence which, coupled with reasonable inferences, offers some support for the finding, we have no power to disturb it. Hillen v. Industrial Accident Com- mission, 199 Cal. 577, 250 P. 570; Union Oil Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 295 P. 513; Gale v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 294 P. 391.

[3] The record shows that Mrs. Carlson, who lived in San Francisco, owned a fruit ranch of some forty acres, near Newcastle, Cal. She was a member of the Newcastle Fruit Growers' Association, which acted as her agent in connection with her ranch property. Some time in 1927 she had a conference with Rodgers, C. G. Werner, manager of the association, and George C. Henny, its field man. At this conference an agreement was reached between Mrs. Carlson and Rodgers, and Werner drew up the document, which we have discussed, to embody the terms of that agreement. Neither of the parties thereto was represented by counsel, and Werner was not an attorney. This in itself suggests that the strict legal significance of the terms used in the instrument should not be permitted to prevail over the intention of the parties as disclosed by the evidence.

Of the various elements which tend to show employment, the most significant in all cases is that of control; and there is abundant indication in this case, both in the instrument itself and in the testimony, of an authoritative control contemplated and exercised by Mrs. Carlson and her agent, the association, over the work of Rodgers. The second paragraph of the agreement provides "that all work of every description shall be done under the supervision of the party of the first part, her agent or representative, and in strict accordance with her wishes, ideas, and instructions, and the different lines of work must be carried out in their proper time and season, as directed by the party of the first part." (Italics ours.) Werner, who drew the agreement, testified that the association, as agent of Mrs. Carlson, "had power to go in there and tell him what lines of work to perform at certain times." With respect to the above-quoted provision, Werner stated that Rodgers "had a thorough understanding of that paragraph, and many times he would come in and ask us for advice or instructions on certain things and we would give it to him, and other times if it was something that was rather doubtful we would take it up with Mrs. Carlson, personally, and with our field man." He testified further as follows:

"Q. Did you have the power under the provisions of this agreement to tell Rodgers how to do his work and when to do his work, and whether to do it at all? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You had full power under those provisions? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you have power under that provision to tell Rodgers to quit work altogether? A. Well, of course, I suppose in one way, but I would not do that without first taking it up with Mrs. Carlson. If she told me, I certainly would."

Henny, fieldman for the association, testified that it was his duty to supervise the operation of the ranches of owners who were away, and to see that they were properly managed; that he had such powers in connection with the Carlson ranch; that with respect to Rodgers, he had the right to direct "the work that he had to do, and when to do it in regard to picking, spraying, plowing and all other necessary operations in conducting the ranch and making sure it was carried out." He stated that Rodgers consulted him, and that he instructed him in his work. He further testified as follows:

"Q. Suppose if you had given him an order to respray a ranch, to respray this particular ranch and he had refused to do it, what were your powers? A. I would simply go in there with men and do the work over his head."

Certainly this was evidence of a type of control normally to be exercised only by an employer.

The other factor which we deem of importance is the manner in which Rodgers was to receive the reward for his labors. We find nothing in the instrument or in the rest of the record which indicates that he had title to the crops or any part thereof, without which he could hardly be deemed a lessee. The agreement provides: "All of the fruits produced upon the premises * * * must be picked and packed * * * according to the standardization rules and delivered to the Newcastle Fruit Growers' Association at its shipping house in Newcastle for the account of and in the name of the party of the first part." Any attempt by the party of the second part (Rodgers) to sell any of the fruit without the written consent of the party of the first part is made grounds for termination of the agreement. It is finally provided that the net proceeds from the sale of the fruit shall be equally divided between the parties, "the party of the first part hereby agreeing to account for and pay to the party of the second part his proportion of the net proceeds." (Italics ours.) It is a reasonable inference from these provisions that the ownership of the crop was to remain in Mrs. Carlson, who had previously, by becoming a member of the association, contracted for its sale through the association; and that, upon the sale by her of the crop, she would pay compensation to Rodgers measured by one-half the net proceeds.

Another provision of the contract authorized Mrs. Carlson's agent, the association, to advance to Rodgers "from time to time a reasonable amount for labor." Mrs. Carlson testified that this provision was included so that Rodgers could get money to pay the help which he would have to hire; that she thought she was responsible for such payments; that she had agreed with Rodgers to furnish the money for this purpose, and had guaranteed to pay for his labor in the event of a failure of the crop.

It also appears that various materials and supplies, such as a tractor, powder for blasting, etc., were obtained from the association under the terms of the agreement, and were charged by the association to Mrs. Carlson's account. Henny testified that they were not to be paid for by Rodgers, but were deducted from Mrs. Carlson's share of the proceeds.

The foregoing discussion leads to the inevitable conclusion that there was evidence before the commission upon which it might, with the aid of permissible inferences, find that the relationship of employer and employee existed between Mrs. Carlson and Rodgers. That is all that we are called upon or permitted to decide. It may be conceded that the document signed by the parties contains many provisions characteristic of a lease, and also that a consideration of the document itself, without other evidence, might have led to a contrary result. We do not state these provisions in detail. It is unnecessary to do so because their existence is undisputed and their effect is clear. Admittedly they created a substantial conflict in the evidence. The commission has resolved that conflict in favor of the applicants for the award. The only legal question presented to us is whether the evidence of control, title to crops, and the other factors are sufficient to justify the finding of employment. We think they are, and authority is not lacking for our conclusion. See Hardeman v. Arthurs, 144 Ark. 289, 222 S. W. 20; Chickasha Gas & Electric Co. v. Linn, 80 Okl. 233, 195 P. 769; 1 Tiffany, Landlord and Tenant, 185, § 20; 2 Thompson on Real Property, 95, § 1031.

[4] Petitioners make much of the fact that the instrument contained an agreement on the part of Rodgers to obtain workmen's compensation insurance. They say that to exact such an agreement from an employee would be a misdemeanor under section 30(a) of the act (St. 1929, p. 1167, § 1), and that it is clear that the parties fully understood that the relationship was that of lessor and lessee. Such a provision inserted by laymen is of course no more conclusive than the other language to which we have referred. But in this connection the record contains matter of considerable interest. It appears that some time after the instrument was executed C. W. Smith, district manager of Columbia Casualty Company, petitioner herein, solicited the members of the association to embark upon a plan of group insurance, and represented to the officers and members thereof, and to others, that the proper party to take out the insurance was the owner of the ranch. Many of the ranches were operating under agreements similar to the Carlson-Rodgers contract, and a number of policies were secured in reliance upon Smith's advice. Acting upon it, Rodgers allowed his policy to lapse, and Mrs. Carlson at that time took out coverage for herself. Werner testified that the parties considered the paragraph on insurance to have been stricken out from that time on. We agree with petitioners that the representations by Smith would not change the legal status of the parties, but the subsequent actions of the parties pursuant to their understanding reached at that time causes the insurance provision to lose its significance as an indication of that relationship.

Counsel for petitioners assert that this case presents the question whether a member of a growers' association, bound by contract to produce and deliver fruit in accordance with its requirements, can make a valid lease of a ranch. That is not the question at all. There is nothing to prevent a party in the situation of Mrs. Carlson from leasing a ranch. But she cannot reserve in a so-called lease the rights of an employer without becoming liable as one. It is the nature of the agreement and not its formal appearance which is controlling; and while, in the instant case, the proper characterization of the relationship of the parties is a difficult task, we think the finding and award of the commission is supported by the evidence.

The award is affirmed.

Evidence held to sustain Industrial Accident Commission's finding that compensation claimant was employee of one against whom compensation award was made.

There was evidence that claimant was hired by ranch foreman under agreement requiring him to employ sufficient number of farm hands to do work and paid wages through advances to such foreman by fruit growers' association, of which ranch owner was member, and latter testified that she considered herself responsible for wages of laborers on ranch.

PER CURIAM.

This proceeding arises out of the same facts as Carlson v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 2 P.(2d) 151, this day decided. In that case we upheld the finding of the Industrial Accident Commission that the deceased, Manuel Rodgers, was the employee of Mrs. Carlson, and sustained the award to his dependents. The respondent Manuel Gomez was hired by Rodgers in accordance with his authority and duty under the terms of the agreement with Mrs. Carlson, which required him to "employ a sufficient number of good and skillful farmhands" to do the work. Gomez was the only employee thus hired. In the explosion which killed Rodgers, Gomez was seriously injured. The parties have stipulated that the evidence taken in the Rodgers Case shall be applicable to this proceeding. The review of that evidence, which we have heretofore made, leads to a similar result in this case. The evidence supports the inference that Gomez was employed by Rodgers, who was acting as Mrs. Carlson's foreman. His wages were paid through advances made to Rodgers by Mrs. Carlson's agent, the Newcastle Fruit Growers' Association; and she testified that she considered herself responsible for the wages of laborers hired to work on the ranch.

The award is affirmed.

PRESTON, J.

Upon this appeal an attack is made upon the judgment as a whole; hence our discussion need not deal with any provision thereof in particular. The sole question is the sufficiency of the evidence to show a dedication to plaintiff's lands of a water right. The action is to have such dedication declared, the right, when found to exist, measured and the service theretofore existing restored by writ of mandate. Estoppel on the part of defendants to deny dedication is also pleaded. The answer puts in issue both the question of dedication and estoppel. The court below heard the cause and gave judgment for plaintiffs as prayed. This appeal by defendants on the full record followed.

Plaintiffs are landowners in the southern part of Big Valley in Lassen county, owning in the aggregate tillable acreage, susceptible of irrigation, and actually heretofore irrigated, of some 600 acres. These lands are of a semiarid character, very productive under irrigation, but of small value without it. Defendant Clarke corporation owns in Modoc and Lassen counties about 4,500 acres of swamp land, over and across which Ash creek, rising in the Warner mountains in Modoc county, flows westerly through a natural channel and finds its way in its march toward the sea, into said Big Valley and later into the Pit river. The Clarke lands are all riparian to this stream, but in a state of nature they are too swampy to cut hay crops therefrom, and drainage is necessary if this practice is to be employed instead of using them as grazing areas.

Accordingly, in 1897 or 1898, C. W. Clarke and Fredk. Cox, the immediate predecessors in interest of said corporation, entered upon section 27, township 39 N., R. 8 E., M. D. M., and upstream on said Ash creek, a distance of about three-fourths of a mile from their lands, established headgates, and constructed from that point, on an irregular course, a canal several miles in length, sixteen feet in width at the bottom and three feet in depth, meeting the Pit river several miles below the point where the said stream naturally finds said river. Rights of way by deeds for the canal were secured from the various property owners whose lands were traversed thereby, many of whom were predecessors of some or all of plaintiffs. An outlay of some $7,000 was made, and some several months were consumed in developing these diversion works. At the point of intake to said canal, said Clarke and Cox duly posted a notice of appropriation on July 29, 1898, and recorded it in the manner prescribed by law. This notice is not only the required notice of appropriation then prescribed by law, but it reveals the intention of the appropriators to divert 7,000 inches of the stream and thereafter sell the waters to the public. This notice is in words and figures as follows: "Notice is hereby given, that we, the undersigned, claim seven thousand inches of the waters flowing in Ash Creek measured under a four-inch pressure at the point where this notice is posted, for the uses and purposes hereinafter specified. We intend to divert said water from said creek by means of headgates upon the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 27, Tp. 39 N., R. 8 E. M. D. M., and into a ditch 25 feet wide and 5 feet deep, running from said headgates in a southerly direction to and upon all of the lands between said headgates and the lower end of Big Valley, and to such other places as may hereafter be selected, there to be sold and used for agricultural, domestic, and mechanical purposes. We intend to use said water each year upon lands other than those above described, for irrigation until the season for irrigation thereon shall have passed, and thereafter we intend to divert said water into said ditch as hereinafter specified, and sell and distribute the same as aforesaid. Dated July 29, 1898. Fredk. Cox C. W. Clarke by Fredk. Cox."

Following completion of said canal in November, 1897, the predecessors of said Clarke Corporation diverted 1,000 inches of water measured under a 4-inch pressure, and began in 1898 supplying the lands owned by plaintiffs with the quantities of water necessary for their irrigation in order to make them productive at an annual charge of $1 per acre. The waters were diverted into said canal about the 20th of June of each year and kept therein until early September, after which the headgates were closed and the waters returned to the natural stream bed, with the exception that a small amount of water was allowed to continue down said canal for domestic use and stock watering by said ranch-owners. This practice was continued by defendant Clarke Corporation after it succeeded to said swamp area for more than twenty years, to wit, until the season of 1924. In that year defendant Menzel Company, a corporation, having leased said swamp lands, and not desiring to cut crops of hay therefrom, intentionally omitted to divert the said stream into said canal, and thereupon plaintiffs were deprived of their customary water supply, and this dispute arose, which has apparently continued since said time.

[1] The above facts being undisputed, the question is: Does this showing yield sufficient evidence to sustain the finding of the court below that the defendants are in charge of a public use and a water right has been dedicated by them to the lands of plaintiffs of such strength and character that it entitles them as of right to continue to receive said water service? "The test to be applied is whether or not the petitioner held himself out, expressly or impliedly, as engaged in the business of supplying water to the public as a class, not necessarily to all of the public, but to any limited portion of it, such portion, for example, as could be served by his system, as contradistinguished from his holding himself out as serving or ready to serve only particular individuals, either as a matter of accommodation or for other reasons peculiar and particular to them." Van Hoosear v. Railroad Commission, 184 Cal. 553, 554, 194 P. 1003, 1004.

[2] Examination of this notice of appropriation will disclose that it was not the intention of the appropriators to abandon the water after the same was diverted into said canal, but, on the contrary, it was their purpose to retain dominion over it and supply all that portion of the public, particularly in Big Valley, as were so situated as to avail themselves of the water supply afforded by said canal. The intention is specific that the waters are "to be sold and used for agricultural, domestic and mechanical purposes." The period of the year at which such sale was to be made was specified, and it was specified that, after use on the swamp area, the waters were then to be diverted into said canal and sold and distributed as theretofore announced. This intent, coupled with the actual carrying out thereof for a continuous period of twenty-six years, makes out a clear case of amply sufficient evidence to warrant the conclusion reached by the court below.

[3] There is no basis for the contention that these were waste waters nor for the contention that the charge made to the ranch-owners was merely nominal and for the purpose of preventing plaintiffs from acquiring a vested interest therein. In coming to this conclusion, we are not unmindful of the caution with which we should proceed to declare that a property right has been dedicated to a public use, as enjoined by such language as this: "To hold that property has been dedicated to a public use is "not a trivial thing" (San Francisco v. Grote, 120 Cal. 60, 65 Am. St. Rep. 155, 41 L. R. A. 335, 52 P. 127), and such dedication is never presumed "without evidence of unequivocal intention" (Niles v. City of Los Angeles, 125 Cal. 572, 58 P. 190). * * *" Allen v. Railroad Commission, 179 Cal. 68, 85, 175 P. 466, 473, S A. L. R. 249. See, also, Van Hoosear v. Railroad Commission, supra, and Richardson v. Railroad Commission, 191 Cal. 716, 721, 218 P. 418. We are entirely satisfied, however, that the facts before us here remove this cause from the zone of influence exerted by those cases.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary to discuss the question of estoppel.

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant on his cross-complaint in an action to recover on two promissory notes given to secure payment of the purchase price of two 16-foot cut Hillside combined harvesters delivered to the defendant by the plaintiff. The defendant by answer denied the indebtedness, and by cross-complaint sought to have the notes canceled on the ground of fraud and deception, alleged a cause of action based on breach of warranty, and prayed for a judgment of rescission and damages.

The defendant is the owner of a large acreage of farm land near Helm in Fresno county, on which is raised principally wheat and barley. During March, 1927, the local agents of the plaintiff, which has its factory and principal office at La Porte, Ind., opened negotiations with J. E. O'Neill, the defendant's representative at Helm, for the sale to the defendant of Rumely harvesters. After the plaintiff's agents had looked over the defendant's acreage and after further conferences, on March 28, 1927, the defendant signed a printed order for two harvesters of the type described. In the printed form of order, signed by the defendant, there was inserted the sentence: "These machines are guaranteed to give complete and efficient service under existing conditions in this locality." The order contained the further provisions that the machinery is warranted to be well made and of good material, and, with proper use, capable of doing as good work as any other machine of the same kind, size, and rated capacity, working under like conditions; that the machines are guaranteed against all defects in material or workmanship, and such defects shall be repaired free of charge for the year 1927, and that the vendor will carry adequate supply of repair parts with the dealer. There was also the provision that the "purchaser shall not be entitled to rely upon any breach of above warranty or to rescind this contract or to any claim or setoff against the vendor because of any breach, unless: (a) Notice of the defect or breach, particularly describing the same and specifying the time of discovery thereof, is given by registered letter addressed to vendor at its head office, posted within four days after such discovery; (b) such defect appears within ten (10) days after the first use of the goods; (c) the vendor fails to remedy such defect or breach by substitution of parts or otherwise within a reasonable time after receipt of such notice, which substitution it shall have the right to make. Purchaser shall render necessary and friendly assistance to vendor in and about remedying the defect. If vendor fails to remedy the defect purchaser shall have the right immediately to return the defective goods or parts in as good condition as when received by him to the place from which they were received and shall thereafter give vendor immediate written notice of such return by a registered letter addressed and mailed to vendor at its head office." The contract also contained the provision that there are no representations, warranties, or conditions, express or implied, statutory or otherwise, except those contained in the written agreement.

This order was sent to the plaintiff's principal office, but was rejected by the plaintiff's agents in Indiana because of the inclusion therein of the sentence warranting complete and efficient service under existing conditions in the locality. The evidence is not disputed that the terrain in the locality was extremely rough and uneven, but this fact is not shown to have been known to the plaintiff's agents in Indiana. Although no Rumely harvester had ever been used by any one in the vicinity of Helm and on terrain of the character existing there, nevertheless the plaintiff's local agents at Helm represented that the Rumely harvester, while under the existing conditions would be put to an extreme test, would do the work efficiently.

After further consultation with the plaintiff's local agents, at which the defendant and his agents with the exception of his representative O'Neill were present, and on April 16, 1927, the defendant signed the following certificate which was added to the previously signed offer: "This is to certify that the sentence 'These machines are guaranteed to give complete and efficient service under existing conditions in this locality,' is hereby accepted as null and void and having no part in the contract of March 28th, 1927, between the Rumely Thresher Company and Geo. W. McCoy, Los Angeles, California, for the purchase of two 16 foot Cut Combine Harvesters, Hillside Type. It is understood that this in no way modifies nor changes the rest of the contract as written."

Pursuant to the contract as finally executed, the harvesters were delivered at the railroad station at Helm on May 5, 1927, and on May 6th the defendant executed and delivered the notes in suit. One of the harvesters was immediately taken to Mendota, a distance of about 20 miles, where operations were commenced to cut the grain on 500 acres there owned by the defendant. The harvester developed defects, began immediately to give trouble, breakdowns occurred, and the machine was continuously laid up for repairs. It also appears that parts could not be obtained from the local dealer, that some parts were taken from the harvester standing at Helm, and others had to be procured elsewhere. About May 27, 1927, the defendant by telegram and registered letter notified the plaintiff at its head office in Indiana that the harvesters were not capable of doing the work as represented or warranted nor as agreed by its representatives, and that he elected to rescind the contract and return the machines, to which no reply was made or received. Subsequently the plaintiff's agents made repeated unsuccessful attempts by reconstruction and repairs to put the harvester into satisfactory working condition. On June 9th, C. C. Clark, the plaintiff's local dealer, telegraphed to the plaintiff at La Porte as follows: "McCoy Farms machines apparently not able to work without continual breakdowns during past three weeks stop. Has been necessary keep one machine laid up practically all time in order to furnish parts keep other running stop Sufficient supply parts have not been furnished stop. First service man not satisfactory second man furnished satisfactory but taken away and for more than week no company man on job stop. Parts broken and ordered from San Francisco more than week ago not yet received stop Lost sale of third machine to Holt account lack service stop McCoy willing cooperate if machines can be made do satisfactory work at once willing carry out contract stop Under circumstances failure on part your company fulfill contract will mean loss of sale through no fault mine therefore will expect collect my commission stop Failure on your part acknowledge McCoy telegram or letter and further failure on part San Francisco office give immediate relief very unbusinesslike answer wire Helm C. C. Clark."

In the meantime, both harvesters had been moved to the Helm ranch, and thereafter two days were spent in an attempt to put them into serviceable condition, at the completion of which the plaintiff's agent stated to O'Neill that he was sure the harvesters would now do the work, and requested payment of the first note, then past due, to which O'Neill replied that, as the machines had given so much trouble, he desired first to try them for another week. The evidence is that the machines again immediately continued to break down, and on June 25, 1927, the defendant sent the following telegram to the plaintiff: "Referring to our conversation when in our office last, regret to advise your two combine harvesters continue to give much trouble during past week. Machines laid up for repairs more than half time. Have not harvested more than fifty acres with each machine during past week. Under circumstances we positively cannot accept. Suggest you advise if you desire continue use of machines with view of getting adjusted to do satisfactory work, which we do not now believe possible—or should we discontinue using same. McCoy Farms." No response was received to this telegram. The defendant purchased another harvester of a different make but similar in kind, size, and rated capacity as the Rumely, which was placed in operation in the fields in which the Rumely harvesters were attempted to be kept in operation. It clearly appears from the record that the third harvester gave efficient and satisfactory service under the same conditions under which the Rumely harvesters continued to break down. The Rumely harvesters were kept in the fields until after the commencement of the action, but attempts to operate them were abandoned before the end of the harvesting season, and the third machine was used to complete the harvesting of the crop.

On July 7th, the present action was brought to recover on the promissory notes which represented the purchase price of the two Rumely harvesters. After a trial on the issues framed by the pleadings, the court found the facts in substance as hereinbefore stated, and upon which it concluded that the plaintiff had breached its agreement to furnish all necessary repairs free of charge and keep on hand an adequate supply of repair parts with the local dealer; also its warranty that said machines were capable with proper use of doing as good work as any other machine of the same kind, size, and rated capacity working under like conditions. The court further found that the plaintiff attempted to remedy the defects in said harvesters, but failed to do so within a reasonable time after notice, or at all. The court also found in favor of the defendant on the issues of fraud and deception, and rendered judgment accordingly.

The contentions made on this appeal are that the evidence does not support the findings; that the findings are inconsistent and do not support the judgment. The main portion of the briefs of the plaintiff is devoted to its contention that the evidence does not support the findings of fraud and deception either in the inception of the contract or in inducing the defendant to execute the certificate appended to the original offer. It may be held for the purposes of this case that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings of deception and fraud in respect to both of these phases. But this holding does not require or justify a reversal.

[1] The basis of the claim that the findings are inconsistent on the issue of breach of warranty and do not support the judgment is the contention that the finding that the defendant elected to rescind is directly in conflict with the finding that the plaintiff breached its contract to furnish free repair work and to keep on hand sufficient repair parts. The argument is that the latter finding infers a finding that the defendant elected to keep the harvesters and avail himself of the privilege offered by the agreement to furnish the repair work and parts; therefore that the inconsistent findings that the defendant elected to rescind the contract and that he elected to retain the harvesters and perform the contract cannot support a judgment of rescission and cancellation. The finding that the plaintiff breached its warranty to furnish repairs and to keep on hand an adequate supply of repair parts cannot as a matter of law be said to be equivalent to a finding that the defendant elected to retain the harvesters, in the face of the express finding that the defendant did elect to rescind. The findings are therefore not fatally inconsistent. Both may be true and the defendant be entitled to the rescission, if under the authorities and upon a proper construction of the contract he would be entitled to rescind for breach of warranty.

[2] It is contended that there is not sufficient evidence in the record to support the finding on the only remaining issue of breach of warranty entitling the defendant to a judgment of rescission, because the only conclusion which can reasonably be drawn from the evidence is that the defendant did in fact, by continuous possession of the harvesters to the time of the commencement of the present action, waive his right to rescind for breach of that warranty, and that the only cause of action, if any, left to him was the right to recover for damages for breach of the agreement to furnish repair work and keep on hand an adequate supply of parts. The answer to this contention is that the record clearly shows that the continued attempts, after repeated breakdowns, to place the harvesters in condition to perform the work for which they were designed either were at the instance of the plaintiff's agents or were with the combined efforts of the plaintiff and the co-operation of the defendant, as required by the terms of the contract. It has been held that retention at the instance of the vendor for the purpose of giving the seller or his agent an opportunity to remedy defects does not operate as a waiver of the benefits of the warranty (Williams v. Bullock Tractor Co., 186 Cal. 32, 198 P. 780; Ventura Mfg., etc., Co. v. Warfield, 37 Cal. App. 147, 174 P. 382; Lichtenthaler v. Samson Iron Works, 32 Cal. App. 220, 162 P. 441; Sherman v. Ayers, 20 Cal. App. 733, 130 P. 163; Luitweiler, etc., Co. v. Ukiah, etc., Co., 16 Cal. App. 198, 116 P. 707, 712), and the terms of the contract indicate a recognition of that well-established rule of law, and the same was incorporated in the contract, we may assume, for the plaintiff's own benefit and protection. The record establishes that, each time the defendant gave notice to the plaintiff that he refused to accept the harvesters because of breakdowns and defects, the agents of the seller attempted to reconstruct and repair the machines in an endeavor to put them in a satisfactory condition so as to obtain an acceptance by the defendant. We cannot say on the record that the trial court was not justified under the authorities cited and under the terms of the contract in concluding that the evidence did not disclose such operation of the harvesters by the defendant as would constitute an acceptance.

[3] We are of the opinion that the record supports a finding of a breach of the warranty contained in the written contract, and that the opportunity given by the defendant to the plaintiff or its agents to remedy the defects in the harvesters did not constitute a waiver of the defendant's right to rescind. The findings on that issue are supported by the evidence, and in turn support the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by W. F. Thompson against Emil Price, Murrel Price, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants named appeal.

SHENK, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien for architectural services rendered by the plaintiff in the matter of the construction of a residence pursuant to a contract between the defendant Emil Price, as owner, and one Harry E. Jones, as contractor.

The controversy centers about the question whether the plaintiff was regularly in the employ of the contractor, Harry E. Jones, as draftsman or otherwise, or was an independent contractor and one of the persons described by section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure as entitled to file a mechanic's lien.

The defendants base their appeal upon the contention that the evidence bears only the construction that the owner was not informed that the contractor intended to or did contract for the architectural services on said building; also that the plaintiff was not an independent contractor, but was a draftsman regularly in the employ of the contractor Jones and was not a contractor or architect within the meaning of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which "provides, inter alia, that architects and all persons of every class bestowing skill or other necessary services to be used in the construction of a building are entitled to a lien, whether at the instance of the owner or of any other person acting by his authority or under him as contractor, and further that every architect having charge of the construction, either in whole or in part, of any building, shall be held to be the agent of the owner for the purposes of the lien law. It follows that the employment of plaintiff [who furnished the engineering designs for the building] by the architects is equivalent to his employment by the owner." Hornlein v. Bohlgl, 37 Cal. App. 646, 647, 174 P. 697, 698.

The defendants in support of their contention quote portions of the testimony and point to inferences which, if drawn by the trial court and believed, would seem to uphold the position taken by them. But they do not quote all of the testimony bearing upon the point in controversy, nor have they apparently considered conflicting inferences which may reasonably be drawn from the evidence quoted by them and appearing in the record. On the other hand, the record contains evidence which sufficiently supports a conclusion that the defendant Emil Price knew that the contractor intended to and did let the contract for architectural services to the plaintiff for a consideration of 3 per cent. of the contract price; that the plaintiff contracted to perform such services as an independent contractor and was not an employee or draftsman or otherwise regularly in the employ of the contractor Jones.

The findings are supported by sufficient evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

LINDENBAUM v. BARBOUR.
L. A. 10704.

Supreme Court of California.
July 30, 1931.

1. Appeal and error ⇨930(1).

Verdict being for plaintiff, evidence most favorable to plaintiff must be taken as true upon appeal.

2. Automobiles ⇨171(4).

Statute gives right of way to driver first entering intersection, if traveling at lawful speed (St. 1923, p. 560, § 131, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15).

3. Automobiles ⇨171(4).

General statute regulating right of way does not fix invariable rule to extent of permitting motorist to proceed across intersection with impunity, notwithstanding failure to stop at stop signal (St. 1923, p. 560, § 131, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15; St. 1923, p. 563, § 145, as amended by St. 1925, p. 414, § 17).

4. Highways ⇨165.

Rule that power of local authorities to regulate traffic yields to general state laws is inapplicable, where same general law expressly makes local regulations paramount under certain conditions.

5. Highways ⇨165.

County supervisors held impliedly authorized to regulate right of way of vehicles at intersections of streets designated "boulevards" with streets properly posted with stop signs (St. 1923, p. 560, § 131, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15; St. 1923, p. 563, § 145, as amended by St. 1925, p. 414, § 17).

St. 1923, p. 563, § 145, as amended by St. 1925, p. 414, § 17, authorizes boards of supervisors to designate certain public highways as boulevards, and require that all vehicles shall be stopped before entering or crossing such boulevards, provided boulevards are clearly marked or sign-posted to give notice of such fact.

6. Automobiles ⇨244(36).

Finding that proximate cause of automobile collision was defendant's violation of ordinance requiring him to stop at stop sign before entering boulevard held justified, although defendant entered intersection first (St. 1923, p. 560, § 131, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15; St. 1923, p. 563, § 145, as amended by St. 1925, p. 414, § 17).

7. Automobiles ⇨242(1).

In absence of question at trial as to validity of stop sign at boulevard intersection, plaintiff held not required to prove official authorization for erection of sign (St. 1923, p. 560, § 131, as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15; St. 1923, p. 563, § 145, as amended by St. 1925, p. 414, § 17).

8. Trial ⇨253(4).

Instruction that plaintiff, if establishing case as charged in complaint, would be entitled to damages held erroneous in not considering contributory negligence question.

Court instructed jury that in deciding case they should take into consideration all facts and circumstances proven in case and all reasonable inferences that might be drawn therefrom, and that if, after so doing, they found that plaintiff had established her case as charged in complaint, jury should find damages in favor of plaintiff.

9. Automobiles ⇨246(23).

Instruction that contributory negligence to exonerate defendant must contribute "directly" and proximately to accident held erroneous in not considering that cause of injuries, although proximate, may be indirect.

Reference to negligence of plaintiff rather than plaintiff's driver held cured by other instruction.

This error was corrected by court, inasmuch as in another instruction jury were instructed that if they found that collision was caused by recklessness, carelessness, and negligence of plaintiff's driver, their verdict must be for defendant.

11. Trial ⇨295(1).

Instructions must be considered as whole.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; F. A. Leonard, Judge.

Action by Sarah Lindenbaum against L. P. Barbour. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal, reported in 293 P. 829.

Culver & Nourse, of Los Angeles, and Swing & Wilson and Fred A. Wilson, all of San Bernardino, for appellant.

Duckworth & Harrison, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This action was instituted by plaintiff against defendant to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by her in a collision between an automobile in which she was riding, owned by her husband and operated by her twenty-one year old son, and an automobile owned and operated by the defendant. The jury returned a verdict of $2,500 in favor of plaintiff, and defendant has appealed.

The collision occurred at the intersection of Linden street and Foothill boulevard, in the county of San Bernardino, near the town of Rialto. Foothill boulevard is a public highway running in a general easterly and westerly direction, and intersects Linden street at right angles. According to the map of the intersection at which the accident occurred, Foothill boulevard is 82.5 feet in width with a concrete pavement 18 feet in width in the center thereof, and Linden street is 60 feet in width, and is improved with an oil roadway 12 feet in width in the center. A boulevard stop sign was erected at the northwest corner of the intersection. At the time of the accident, the car in which plaintiff was riding was proceeding across Foothill boulevard in an easterly direction and the defendant, approaching the intersection on Linden street from the north, was attempting to cross Foothill boulevard.

[1] There is a decided conflict in the evidence with reference to several factors of the situation, but the verdict of the jury being in favor of the respondent, the evidence most favorable to respondent must of course, be taken as true upon appeal. Julius Lindenbaum, the twenty-one year old son of respondent, who was driving the car in which respondent was riding, testified that he was driving along Foothill boulevard at about twenty-five or thirty miles an hour; that when he was about 60 feet from the west line of the intersection he first saw the appellant's car on Linden street approaching the intersection; that he reduced the speed of his car as he entered the intersection to fifteen miles an hour; that he expected the appellant to stop at the stop sign before entering the boulevard; that when he entered the intersection the front wheels of appellant's car were upon or just approaching the north edge of the paved portion of Foothill boulevard; that appellant did not stop his car opposite the stop sign; that in order to avoid the collision he slowed up and swerved to the right, but that the front left fender of his car came into collision with the right side of appellant's car just to the rear of the door, damaging both cars considerably, and injuring respondent. The following facts must therefore be taken as true: That both the driver of the respondent's car and the appellant were driving at a lawful rate of speed when they entered the intersection; that appellant was already within the intersection about 32 feet south of the northerly intersection line at the time respondent's car entered the intersection; and that appellant did not stop at the boulevard stop sign.

[2-4] Appellant contends that the judgment should be reversed for the following reasons: (1) The evidence does not establish negligence on the part of the appellant; (2) any negligence of the appellant was not the proximate cause of respondent's injuries; (3) the evidence establishes contributory negligence on the part of respondent's agent; and (4) the court erroneously instructed the jury to the prejudice of the appellant.

The first three grounds are predicated upon the theory that as appellant first entered the intersection, traveling at a lawful rate of speed, he was entitled to the right of way under section 131 of the California Vehicle Act, and that the negligence which was the true proximate cause of the accident was the failure of respondent's driver to yield the right of way to him.

Section 131 of the California Vehicle Act (Stats. 1925, pp. 398, 412, § 15), in force at the time of the accident, reads as follows: "Right of way. (a) When two vehicles approach an intersection of public highways at approximately the same time, the vehicle approaching from the right shall have the right of way, provided such vehicle is traveling at a lawful speed. (b) The driver of a vehicle entering a public highway from a private road or drive shall yield the right of way to all vehicles approaching on said public highway."

This section of the California Vehicle Act has been uniformly interpreted as giving the right of way to the driver who first enters the intersection, providing he is traveling at a lawful speed. Keyes v. Hawley, 100 Cal. App. 53, 279 P. 674; Lipp v. Moon, 100 Cal. App. 618, 280 P. 710; Enz v. Johns (Cal. App.) 296 P. 115; Couchman v. Snelling (Cal. App.) 295 P. 845. Unless, therefore, some other provision of the law changed the rule, the appellant was correct in his assumption that he was entitled to the right of way and that a verdict of the jury predicated upon the theory that he was not entitled to it was erroneous.

It is to be noted, however, that at none of the intersections involved in these cases, was a stop sign maintained. We do not believe that the rule of the right of way as embodied in section 131 of the California Vehicle Act is an invariable rule to the extent that whoever reaches the intersection first thereby automatically secures the right of way and may with impunity proceed across the intersection upon the theory that, irrespective of whether or not he has gained the right of way by failing to stop at a stop signal, he is entitled to the right of way under the general law, and whoever fails to yield to him the right of way is guilty of negligence. We are of the opinion that the Legislature by section 145 of the California Vehicle Act (Stats. 1925, pp. 398, 414, § 17), gave recognition to the fact that, by reason of congested traffic conditions in certain areas, public safety and convenience may demand some additional regulation of the traffic not found in the state law, and, in order to provide for such elasticity in the traffic regulations, left with the local authorities the power to regulate traffic at certain intersections when local conditions justified it.

Said section 145 of the California Vehicle Act, in so far as it is pertinent to this discussion, reads as follows: "Powers of boards of supervisors and legislative bodies of cities. Nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to prevent boards of supervisors in their respective counties and the legislative bodies of incorporated cities from providing by ordinance for the regulation of traffic by means of traffic or crossing officers or semaphores or other signaling devices on any portion of the public highways where the traffic is heavy and continuous, nor from designating certain public highways as boulevards and requiring that all vehicles shall be stopped before entering or crossing such boulevards, provided all such boulevards are clearly marked or signposted to give notice of such fact. * * *

Pursuant to this provision of the California Vehicle Act, the board of supervisors of San Bernardino county passed an ordinance, designated as ordinance No. 261, for the purpose of regulating traffic along and upon certain boulevards in said county. The pertinent parts of said ordinance are as follows:

"Ordinance No. 261. Adopted November 9, 1925; effective December 9, 1925. An Ordinance of the County of San Bernardino regulating motor traffic upon certain highways in the County of San Bernardino and fixing a penalty for the violation thereof.

"Section 1. That * * * all motor vehicles driven upon Foothill boulevard shall have the right of way over vehicles driven on Riverside avenue, Etiwanda avenue, Turner avenue, Archibald avenue and Hellman avenue, * * *

"Section 2. And that all motor vehicles being driven on said * * * Foothill boulevard, * * * shall have the right of way at all intersections of all other roads not herein mentioned when a stop sign is maintained at the side of the roadway near such intersection.

"Section 3. That any and all persons driving and operating motor vehicles and approaching said * * * Foothill boulevard * * * at the intersection hereinabove mentioned in section 1 hereof, and at other intersections upon which a stop sign is maintained shall come to a full stop at a point outside the boundary line of said highways and within 30 feet thereof, and shall not again move until the intersection being approached is clear of traffic and there is sufficient space clear of motor vehicle traffic on either side of said intersection to permit such persons so approaching said intersections to cross same without in any way interfering with the traffic upon said highways so approached as aforesaid."

It is at once apparent that the right of way provisions in this ordinance are in direct conflict with the provisions of section 131 of the California Vehicle Act in force at the time of the accident, in that it gives the right of way to vehicles proceeding along Foothill boulevard at certain specified intersections irrespective of whether or not such vehicles reach the intersection first. And while it is the general rule as stated in Ex parte Daniels, 183 Cal. 636, 192 P. 442, 21 A. L. R. 1172, and reaffirmed in Atlas Mixed Mortar Co. v. City of Burbank, 202 Cal. 660, 262 P. 334, that the power of local authorities over the regulation of traffic upon the streets within their jurisdiction is subordinate to the state Legislature and is subject to the general laws of the state, this rule, of course, has no application where, as here, a provision of the same general law expressly stipulates that the general law shall not govern over local regulations, but that the local regulations shall be paramount under certain conditions.

[5, 6] Appellant, however, contends that the board of supervisors exceed the authorization of said section 145 of the California Vehicle Act when it purported to regulate the right of way upon said Foothill boulevard. According to his theory, section 145, in addition to authorizing the local authorities to regulate traffic at intersections by means of traffic officers and mechanical signal devices, authorized the local authorities to do two things and only two things: To designate certain public highways as boulevards, and to require vehicles to stop before entering or crossing the same, provided such boulevards are properly signposted. In other words, appellant admits that, in so far as the ordinance purports to be a "stop ordinance," it is valid under section 145 of the California Vehicle Act, but insists that in so far as it is a "right of way ordinance" at a boulevard intersection it exceeds the authorization of said section, and is to that extent invalid.

We do not think such position is tenable. The patent purpose of designating certain streets as boulevards and requiring vehicles to stop before entering upon such boulevards is to facilitate travel along and upon such streets. Having in mind this purpose, we do not believe that it was the legislative intent to limit the scope of the power of the boards of supervisors to a bare right to designate certain streets as boulevards and to require vehicles to stop before entering thereon. The power to require vehicles to stop before entering a designated street without the right to designate how long the vehicle shall stop before entering, or the right to designate that after stopping the vehicles must enter the boulevard in such a manner as not to interfere with traffic along the boulevard, would be a futile power. If the driver of a vehicle could stop at a stop signal and then immediately proceed into the intersection without regard to the traffic coming down the boulevard except that already in the intersection, the act of stopping would be an idle act, for those using the boulevard would be in no more advantageous position than if there were no stop signs, as they would have to be constantly yielding the right of way to drivers crossing the intersection. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the power to regulate the right of way at intersections of boulevards with streets properly posted with stop signs is a necessary concomitant of the power to designate certain streets as boulevards, and to require vehicles to stop before entering such boulevards, which power was intended to be reserved to boards of supervisors by section 145 of the California Vehicle Act, hereinbefore quoted.

This being so, it follows that the right of way in the instant case was controlled by ordinance 261 of the county of San Bernardino in obedience to which the appellant was required to stop at the stop sign maintained at the intersection, thereby yielding the right of way to the respondent's car. This being so, it further follows that from the evidence hereinbefore set out the jury was justified in finding that the proximate cause of the collision was the failure of the appellant to stop at the stop sign.

[7] It is suggested that inasmuch as there was not introduced in evidence any official authorization by the board of supervisors of San Bernardino county to any one to erect the stop sign at the intersection in question, that the stop sign was without legal significance and the defendant was under no duty to stop at such stop sign. The only testimony in the record with reference to the erection of the stop sign was the testimony of a witness in answer to the question, "There is one of those stop signs there at that intersection?" "Yes, put up by the Automobile Club." Apparently no question was raised in the trial court as to whether or not the stop sign was properly at the intersection, and neither respondent nor appellant attempted to prove or disprove that an authorization had been given to the automobile club by the board of supervisors to erect stop signs along Foot-hill boulevard. In the absence of any question as to the validity of the stop sign at the trial by the appellant, or any controversy as to whether it was properly at the intersection, we do not think it was incumbent upon the respondent to offer in evidence the official authorization for the erection of the sign, and her failure to do so under such circumstances would not justify us in reversing a verdict in her favor.

We are also unable to agree with appellant's contention that the judgment should be reversed by reason of the fact that the court erroneously instructed the jury to the prejudice of the defendant. Appellant objects to an instruction which states that the defendant was "bound to anticipate that he might meet persons at any point on the highway and he must, in order to avoid a charge of negligence, keep a proper lookout for them. * * *" He argues that the obligation to keep a proper lookout placed a burden upon the defendant which under the facts he was not required to bear, inasmuch as this obligation was inconsistent with the rights flowing from the right of way rule. It is apparent that in complaining of this instruction appellant is presuming that he was entitled to the right of way at the intersection. As we have before indicated, he was not entitled to the right of way, and this is not, therefore, a valid objection to this particular instruction nor to the other instructions complained of, which complaints involve the same assumption.

[8-11] It is true that several of the instructions given are subject to criticism. This is true of the instruction that, "You are instructed that in deciding this case you will take into consideration all facts and circumstances proven in the case and all reasonable inferences that may be drawn therefrom, and, if, after doing so, you find that the plaintiff has established her case as charged in the complaint, then you will find damages in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant." It is also true of the instruction that before the jury could find in favor of the defendant on the issue of contributory negligence it must believe from the preponderance of the evidence that "such contributory negligence, if any, contributed directly and proximately to the happening of the accident. * * *" The former instruction, standing alone, is erroneous for the reason that it does not take into consideration the question of contributory negligence; the latter is erroneous in that it does not take into consideration the fact that the cause of the injuries, although proximate, may be indirect. But considered in conjunction with the other instructions given, we do not feel that they were prejudicial. Appellant also complains that in several instructions the negligence was referred to as the negligence of the plaintiff rather than the negligence of the plaintiff's driver. Inasmuch as in another instruction the jury was instructed that if they found that the collision was caused by the recklessness, carelessness, and negligence of said J. Lindenbaum (plaintiff's driver) that their verdict must be for the defendant, this error was corrected.

It is, of course, well established that the instructions must be read and considered as a whole. After a careful examination of the entire instructions, we are of the opinion that whatever errors are to be found therein did not to any appreciable extent prejudice the rights of the appellant. They were, therefore, not sufficient to justify a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. SILVERSTEIN et al.
S. F. 14171.

Supreme Court of California.
July 30, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 27, 1931.

1. Bills and notes ⇨519.

Evidence held insufficient to sustain finding that signers executed note as joint makers.

2. Bills and notes ⇨539.

Finding to effect that signers on note entered into written agreement with payee to purchase lease on apartment and furniture held without support, where no such issue was before court.

The verified complaint alleged that payee of note entered into contract to sell apartment house and furniture to others, which allegation was admitted in the answer, so that there was no issue before court as to the parties to agreement of sale.

3. Bills and notes ⇨165.

Negotiable instrument may be rendered nonnegotiable, where it is intended to incorporate terms of separate agreement if terms of whole agreement are incompatible with negotiability.

4. Bills and notes ⇨144.

Negotiability of note will not be affected by agreement written upon same paper, evidently not intended to be incorporated within note.

5. Bills and notes ⇨165.

Notes given as partial consideration for transfer of lease and furniture were not rendered nonnegotiable because of escrow agreement not referred to therein.

Considering the notes and escrow agreement as constituting one transaction, nevertheless there was no intent to make payment dependent upon any contingency; the escrow agreement being in no way incompatible with terms of note and not purporting to change, limit, or modify provisions, but rather providing that payment was to be made in accordance with notes.

6. Bills and notes ⇨416.

Notice of dishonor, sent to indorser five or six days after due date, was too late (Civ. Code, §§ 3170, 3184).

7. Evidence ⇨441(11).

Admission of oral evidence of conversations taking place prior to and contemporaneous with execution of note and escrow agreement was erroneous.

8. Evidence ⇨441(11).

General rule respecting proof of contemporaneous parol declarations is applicable to attempt to prove prior or contemporaneous parol agreement affecting terms of unambiguous bill or note.

9. Bills and notes ⇨241.

That note contained words "We promise to pay" had no significance as respected liability of indorsers thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Action by Joseph Williams against Louis Silverstein and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Reversed, with directions.

For opinion of District Court of Appeal herewith adopted, see 293 P. 102.

Edward J. Lynch, of San Francisco, for appellants.

E. B. Mering, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

A hearing was granted herein in order that we might give further consideration to the questions at issue, after decision by the Dis-strict Court of Appeal in and for the First Appellate District, Division One, Jorgensen, Justice pro tem., writing the opinion. Upon such consideration, we are satisfied that the reasoning and conclusions of the appellate tribunal were correct; that the signatures of the appellants on the back of the promissory notes sued upon constituted them indorsers and not original makers or guarantors thereof; that the trial court was in error in the admission of oral evidence for the purpose of varying that relation; and that, if not in error in so doing, the evidence thus permitted to be educed showed clearly and without substantial contradiction that at the time of the execution of the instruments the plaintiff knew and was informed by his own counsel, who drew and attended to the execution thereof, that the appellants were executing the same as indorsers and not as original makers thereof, and that the plaintiff so understood that to be their relation thereto at the time he undertook to give his belated notice of dishonor.

The portion of the opinion of the appellate tribunal, which we hereby approve, reads as follows:

This is an action on a complaint in six counts, based upon two promissory notes given to plaintiff as part of the purchase price of a lease to and furniture in an apartment house in the city of San Francisco. The notes are both negotiable in form, are for $500 each, and are identical, excepting that one was payable June 10, 1926, and the other September 10, 1926.

The first and second counts appeared to charge the defendants as joint makers with one Huber on the two notes. The third and fourth counts appear to charge them as accommodation indorsers for Huber, while the fifth and sixth counts seek to hold them as indorsers. Each of the notes contained a clause "we promise to pay," etc. (the "we" being written in with a typewriter), and were signed at the end by Lee Huber only and underneath his signature are two blank lines. On the back of each note appears the signature of:

"Louis Silverstein

"Louis Sanders."

The first paragraph of each count alleges that on the 10th day of March, 1926, the plaintiff entered into an agreement to sell to one Lee Huber and Isadore Silverstein a certain lease and furniture of an apartment house on Ellis street in San Francisco for $4,850; that, on the day the sale was to be consummated, this contract was modified "by agreeing to accept $1,200.00 in cash and the balance of $1,000.00 to be paid by a promissory note executed by Lee Huber, Louis Sanders and Louis Silverstein."

It appears from the evidence that Isadore

Silverstein and Lee Huber, two taxicab drivers, were desirous of acquiring an apartment house as a side line. The defendant Louis Silverstein, who was a real estate agent and builder, was a brother of Isadore Silverstein. Defendant Sanders was engaged in farming and buying and selling country lands, with headquarters at Sacramento. Defendants, Louis Silverstein and Sanders, negotiated with plaintiff, who was in the real estate business and selling leases and apartment house furniture, and who owned an apartment house lease and furniture on Ellis street in San Francisco, for the sale of said lease and furniture, and agreed to pay the plaintiff a commission for making a sale.

On March 10, 1926, the date of the notes, the plaintiff met in the office of Judge Tyrrell, plaintiff's attorney, with Lee Huber and Isadore Silverstein, the alleged purchasers, together with the defendants, Louis Sanders and Louis Silverstein, who contended that they were acting merely as brokers in the transaction, and the note was signed by Lee Huber. Plaintiff's own testimony as to what transpired in the office of his attorney is highly illuminating, in view of his contention that defendants were makers.

He testified: "Sanders and Silverstein signed on the back of the notes. I said to Judge Tyrrell, 'How about these notes? Shouldn't these be comakers?' He said that they were just as responsible on the back of the note as if they were on the front of it. I took his word for it. He said, 'Whether they are makers or comakers or endorsers, they guarantee the payment of the note and what is on the back of it is the same as the ones on the front of it.' I said, 'He ought to be a comaker.'"

He testified further: "I said, 'Tyrrell, wouldn't it be possible to have a comaker on there—an endorser?' He said, 'It doesn't make any difference one is the same as the other.' He said, 'Don't put my brother on there and I won't go on there, and we will go on the back of it.' That is what he said, 'I don't want my brother to go on the front of it on the face of the note, but let Huber go on the face of it.' That is just exactly the remark he made. I saw the notes signed and endorsed and accepted them under the advice of my attorney. My attorney, Mr. Tyrrell, said, 'The notes or the endorsements on these notes, will hold these men and make them pay if the notes are properly endorsed.' Silverstein said 'We will endorse them on the back.' I said, 'All right,' so he put Huber on the face and he and Sanders went on the back."

The attorney also drew up an escrow agreement under which plaintiff's attorney, John R. Tyrrell, was made an escrow holder, which reads as follows:

"San Francisco, March 10th, 1926.

"John R. Tyrrell, No. 995 Market Street, San Francisco.

"My Dear Sir: Enclosed herewith we hand you agreement for the sale of the rooming house, designated as No. 1622-1624 Ellis Street, San Francisco, which agreement was executed between Theodore Kupper, as the party of the first part, and A. G. Rehnstrom and A. Johansson as party of the second part, and thereafter assigned by the latter to Joseph Williams, and thereafter by the said Joseph Williams assigned to Lee Huber.

"The condition of the agreement calls for a payment of forty-eight hundred and fifty ($4,850) dollars, less an incumbrance of twenty-five hundred ($2,500.00) dollars. Of this amount thirteen hundred and fifty ($1,350.00) dollars has been paid, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and the further sum of one thousand ($1,000) dollars is to be paid as follows: Five hundred ($500) dollars on or before the 10th day of June, 1926, and five hundred ($500.00) dollars on or before the 10th day of September, 1926, according to the terms of the promissory note, covering said sum.

"There is also deposited with you a lease upon the said premises covering a period of five (5) years from April 1st, 1926, running in favor of Lee Huber.

"These documents you are instructed to hold as escrow holder until Lee Huber shall have paid to you the sum of ten hundred ($1,000) dollars and interest, according to the terms of the promissory note, and when such sum has been paid in full with interest you are authorized and directed to deliver to him the said lease and your services as escrow holder will then be terminated.

"Lee Huber,

"Louis Silverstein,

"Jos. Williams."

The taxicab drivers lost money in the apartment house business. The notes were not paid, and plaintiff brought a previous action seeking to hold Huber as maker and these defendants as indorsers, but these defendants were granted a nonsuit in that action because plaintiff had not made proper presentment of the notes and notice of dishonor had not been given to these defendants as indorsers.

The findings in the case were to the effect that defendants executed said note as joint makers and that plaintiff had agreed to sell the apartment house lease and furniture to defendants, Louis Sanders and Louis Silverstein. Neither of these findings are supported by the evidence.

[1] The evidence affirmatively shows that the defendants signed as indorsers and that the plaintiff accepted the notes with that understanding on the advice of his attorney.

Not only his own testimony, but the testimony of the defendants are all to that effect. The plaintiff by his own acts subsequent to the execution of the notes showed that was his understanding by causing a notice of dishonor to be sent on one of the notes to one of the defendants as indorser and by instituting his first suit against them as indorsers, and there is no evidence in the record worthy of the name to show that the defendants ever signed in any other capacity.

[2] The finding to the effect that plaintiff entered into a written agreement with both the defendants, Louis Sanders and Louis Silverstein, to sell this apartment house and furniture cannot be sustained on any theory. The verified complaint alleges that plaintiff entered into a contract to sell this apartment house and furniture to Lee Huber and Isadore Silverstein. The answer admits this allegation. There was, therefore, no issue before the court as to the parties to the agreement of sale. No amendment of the complaint was even suggested. There is no written agreement between the parties in evidence to this effect or even suggesting it. The only thing upon which the court could possibly base such a finding is the escrow agreement set forth above. It certainly cannot be sustained as such an agreement. It was not signed at all by the defendant Sanders, and was signed by Silverstein, as he testified, as a matter of form as the broker in the transaction, or, as plaintiff's attorney testified, he signed more as a guarantor than as a principal. The escrow agreement shows on its face that the sale was made to Huber, and provided that the notes were to be signed by Huber and the lease was to be made out to Huber, and referred to an assignment of sale contract from the plaintiff to Huber.

[3-5] Respondent contends that the notes were nonnegotiable, and therefore defendants became liable as guarantors. At the time the notes were executed, the escrow agreement was also executed, and provided that the lease should be delivered upon the payment of the notes. It is true that a negotiable instrument may be rendered nonnegotiable where it is intended to incorporate the terms of a separate agreement with the instrument itself if the terms of the whole agreement are incompatible with negotiability. 19 Cal. Jur. p. 811. But even though the agreement be written upon the same paper that the note is written on, where it is evident that it was not intended to incorporate the terms of the agreement within the note itself, the transferability and negotiability of the note will not be affected by the agreement. Pitman v. Walker, 187 Cal. at page 671, 203 P. 739. The notes here do not refer to the escrow agreement, but contain an absolute and unconditional promise to pay at a certain time. But, considering together the notes and the escrow agreement as constituting one transaction, we do not discover an intention to make the payment dependent upon any contingency. The escrow agreement is in no way incompatible with the terms of the notes, nor does it purport to change, limit, or modify the provisions of the notes. On the other hand, it provides that the payment is to be made in accordance with the notes.

[6] The evidence in this case clearly shows, and the fact is undisputed, that proper presentment of the notes had not been made and notice of dishonor had not been given so as to hold defendants as indorsers of negotiable paper. It is true that notice of dishonor was sent to the defendant Sanders as indorser of the first note, but was sent five or six days after it became due, and it was therefore too late. Sections 3170 and 3184, Civ. Code.

[7] The court, over the objections of defendants, admitted oral evidence of conversations between certain of the parties which took place prior to and contemporaneous with the execution of these notes and the escrow agreement, and which tended to vary, modify, and change the terms thereof. This was prejudicial error.

[8] The general rule that proof of contemporaneous parol declarations and agreements is inadmissible to contradict, vary, or alter the terms of a written contract is applicable to an attempt to prove a prior or contemporaneous parol agreement or declaration to affect the terms of a bill or note where the bill or note is not uncertain, doubtful, or ambiguous. Uniform Laws, Annotated, vol. 5, p. 22; Citizens' Bank of Los Angeles v. Jones, 121 Cal. 32, 53 P. 354; Quatman v. Superior Court, 64 Cal. App. at page 208, 221 P. 666. If the defendants in this case had signed the note on its face below the signature of Huber, could it be said that they might show by parol evidence they signed as indorsers only? The answer is obvious. Such evidence is not admissible, whether the note be negotiable or nonnegotiable. Lindemann v. Coryell, 59 Cal. App. 788, 212 P. 47. If this were not the rule, it would lead to chaos in all business transactions.

[9] The mere fact that the notes contained the words "we promise to pay" has no significance, even though signed by only one maker, with two blank lines below his signature, in view of the state of the record in this case. The words "we promise to pay" cannot be held to include indorsers or other parties whose names are not signed as makers. Hobson v. Hassett, 76 Cal. 203, 18 P. 320, 9 Am. St. Rep. 193; Bean v. Pioneer Mining Co., 66 Cal. 451, 6 P. 86, 56 Am. Rep. 106; Farmers', etc., Bank v. Colby, 64 Cal. 352, 28 P. 118; Whitmore v. Nickerson et al., 125 Mass. 496, 28 Am. Rep. 257.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the trial court to make and file its findings of fact and conclusions of law in conformity with the views expressed in the foregoing opinion, and thereon to render and enter its judgment in favor of the defendants and appellants herein, with costs.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY FLOOD CONTROL DIST. v. WRIGHT.

S. F. 14218.

July 31, 1931.

1. Levees and flood control ⚡15.

Construction of dam for flood control district held "prohibited by law," within statute, where department of public works justifiably denied permission to construct dam (St. 1915, p. 1508, § 15; St. 1929, p. 1505).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Prohibit," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Levees and flood control ⚡15.

Discovery of unstable and unsafe foundation work for abutment of dam held "change of conditions," within statute authorizing supervisors of flood control district to adopt new plans (St. 1915, p. 1508, § 15).

3. Levees and flood control ⚡34.

Provision of statute authorizing change in plans must be considered part of contract for flood control project and within knowledge of electors who voted for issuance of bonds (St. 1915, pp. 1506, 1508, 1512, §§ 8, 15, 23).

4. Levees and flood control ⚡34.

Contractual rights of landowners in flood control district who voted for improvements held not impaired by issuance of bonds for changed plans adopted under authority of statute (St. 1915, pp. 1506, 1508, 1512, §§ 8, 15, 23).

5. Levees and flood control ⚡34.

Recital in bonds issued by flood control district stating proposition submitted to voters held not rendered erroneous by change of plans for construction of dam (St. 1915, pp. 1506, 1508, 1512, §§ 8, 15, 23).

In Bank.

Proceeding by the Los Angeles County Flood Control District for writ of mandamus to be directed to Henry W. Wright, as Chairman of the Board of Supervisors of Los Angeles County and Ex Officio Chairman of the Board of Supervisors of Los Angeles County Flood Control District.

Writ granted.

Hill, Morgan & Bledsoe, Vincent Morgan, and Kenneth K. Wright, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, Roy W. Dowds, Flood Control Counsel, and Ray C. McAllaster, Deputy County Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J.

This is a proceeding in mandamus to compel the chairman of the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county to execute certain bonds alleged to be authorized by the electors of the Los Angeles county flood control district. The matter is submitted on a general demurrer to the petition and on a stipulation of facts made by agreement a part of the petition. The facts are therefore undisputed.

The Los Angeles county flood control district was created by an act of the Legislature in 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1502), and comprises, territorially, all of Los Angeles county, except those portions thereof generally known as the Antelope Valley and the islands of Santa Catalina and San Clemente. The objects and purposes of the act, as set forth in section 2 thereof, are to provide, by the creation of the district, for the control of the flood and storm waters of the district, and to conserve such waters for beneficial and useful purposes by spreading, storing, retaining, or causing to percolate into the soil within said district, or to save or conserve in any manner, all or any of such waters, and to protect from damage from such flood or storm waters the harbors, waterways, public highways, and property in said district. The district is declared to be a body corporate and politic with perpetual succession, and, among other things, empowered to acquire land and property of every kind, and to construct, maintain, and operate any and all works and improvements within or without the district necessary or proper to carry out the objects and purposes of the act. The board of supervisors of Los Angeles county is constituted, ex officio, the board of supervisors of the district. Section 4 provides that the board shall have power to employ a competent engineer or engineers to investigate the best plan to control and conserve such waters for beneficial and useful purposes and to adopt any plan so formulated. Upon the adoption of such plan the board is authorized by ordinance to call a special election in the district for the issuance of bonds to construct the works and carry on the improvements. If a majority of the electors of the district vote in favor of the bonds, the board is authorized to issue forty-year bonds to cover the cost of the work, etc., salable at par, with interest not to exceed 6 per cent. per annum, and annually to levy and collect a tax on all of the taxable real property in the district to pay interest and principal on said bonds. The tax so to be levied was declared by this court to be a special assessment for benefits. Los Angeles County F. C. Dist. v. Hamilton, 177 Cal. 119, 169 P. 1028.

On March 26, 1924, the board directed J. W. Reagan, who was the then chief engineer of the district, to make the investigation required by the statute and to submit a report which should show (a) a general description of the work to be done; (b) general plans, profiles, cross-sections, and general specifications of the work to be done; (c) a general description of the land and property to be acquired; (d) a map showing the location of the proposed work and improvement, and other information deemed to be necessary or useful; and (e) an estimate of the cost of the work.

On April 1, 1924, the engineer submitted a report which was found by the board to comply with the requirements of the act and the order of the board. This plan was approved, and the estimate of the costs for which bonds were to be voted was fixed at $35,300,000. According to the report of the engineer, the work to be done was divided into four parts: First, the construction of both large and small dams in the mountainous area; second, the protection of the banks of the smaller streams, together with spreading and storing of waters of these streams for beneficial use; third, the straightening and rectification, through river training and bank protection, of the major streams; and, fourth, protection to the harbor and shipping interests. Both flood control and conservation were to be combined by holding back the water in the mountains and releasing it in controllable quantities, and thus remove the flood menace to great property values and augment the water supply in the district. The plan contemplated the construction of dams in San Antonio Canyon, a dam at the mouth of Thompson's creek, north of Claremont, a dam in Big Dalton Canyon, a dam and reservoir at the "Forks Site" in San Gabriel Canyon, dams and reservoirs in Sawpit Canyon, Big Santa Anita Canyon, Eaton Canyon, Big Tujunga Canyon, and Pacoima Canyon, a flood control channel in Altadena, check dams in Little Santa Anita or Sierra Madre Canyon, Dunsmuir Canyon, Pickens Canyon, and Haines Canyon, works for the control of storm waters in the lower San Dimas wash country, in Verdugo wash and Sycamore Canyon, and works for the control of storm waters on the lower or east San Gabriel river and in the vicinity of Long Beach and at the lower end of Ballona Valley.

A special election was called by the board of supervisors and was held on May 6, 1924, for the purpose of submitting to the qualified electors of the district the proposition of incurring a bonded indebtedness in the sum of $35,300,000. The objects and purposes for which the indebtedness was proposed to be incurred were set forth in the title, preamble, and section 2 of the ordinance calling the election, and were as follows: "For the control of the flood and storm waters of said Los Angeles County Flood Control District, for the conservation of such waters for beneficial and useful purposes, by spreading, storing, retaining and causing to percolate into the soil within said district, and for the protection from damage from such flood and storm waters of the harbors, waterways, public highways and property in said district, by the correction of rivers, diversion and care of washes, and building of dikes and dams, and for the other purposes set forth in said act, all of which work is to be done in accordance with the said report of J. W. Reagan, chief engineer of said district, adopted by the board of supervisors of said district on the first day of April, 1924, and in accordance with the provisions of the Los Angeles County Flood Control Act, reference to which said report, which is on file in the office of said board of supervisors, is hereby made for particulars."

The board caused to be printed and furnished to voters who might apply for the same so much of the report of the chief engineer as covered a general description of the work to be done and also a map showing the location of the improvements to be made. The election was held, and the proposed bond issue received a favorable vote. Thereafter bonds were issued and sold to the extent of several millions of dollars, and the acquisition of property and construction work went forward. A dam in Pacoima Canyon was built, the estimated cost of which was $1,720,000. Construction work in connection with the control of the Tujunga river, involving the expenditure of some $1,600,000, is well under its way to completion. Numerous other improvements at different locations in the district have been undertaken and completed under this authorization of bonds. The major item of the proposed improvement was the construction of a dam at the Forks site in the San Gabriel Canyon. As originally proposed this dam was to be constructed to a height of 425 feet, providing thereby a reservoir capacity of 240,000 acre feet of water and estimated in round numbers to cost $25,000,000. The purpose of the improvement was to control the flood waters of the 200 square mile San Gabriel watershed so as to relieve the lands in the San Gabriel Valley, and below as far as Long Beach and the ocean, from their devastating effect; to protect the harbors of Long Beach and Los Angeles, and also to conserve such waters for irrigation and other uses. Preliminary to such work the board sought and obtained reports from numerous engineers of wide reputation, including George W. Goethals, Andrew C. Lawson, D. C. Henny, J. D. Galloway, John

A. Bell, and H. Hawgood, with reference to control and conservation of flood waters, geological formations, and dam construction. Upon being advised to the effect that a safe dam of the size and design of the proposed dam could be constructed at the Forks site, the board proceeded with definite steps to enter upon construction work. It applied to the federal government, through its Department of Interior, for a permit to construct a railroad from the main-line railroad at Azusa, below the mouth of the San Gabriel Canyon, to the Forks site, a distance of about eleven miles. Opposition to the granting of this permit was filed by the city of Pasadena on the ground that the construction of the proposed railroad would interfere with the proposed construction of a dam by that city at a point about seven miles below the Forks site, and upon the further ground that another site existed for the construction of a dam by the district at a place commonly known as the "Granite Dyke Site." The Department of the Interior commissioned three engineers of that department to proceed to Los Angeles, investigate, and conduct hearings with reference to the feasibility of constructing a dam at the Forks site or the Granite Dyke site. The commissioners made a report to the Secretary of the Interior recommending the granting of the permit. An appeal to the Secretary was ineffectual. The permit was issued by the Secretary on November 1, 1926, and a week later contracts were let by the district for the construction of the railroad. It was completed in June, 1927.

In December, 1926, upon the request of certain local organizations, the board, upon the recommendation of the Los Angeles Chapter of the National Engineering Society, employed F. H. Fowler of San Francisco, C. D. Marx of Stanford University, and C. H. Paul of Dayton, Ohio, engineers of wide repute, to investigate all matters connected with the feasibility and necessity of the construction of a dam at the Forks site and also the possibility of the construction of a dam at the Granite Dyke site. In March, 1927, those engineers submitted to the board a report condemning the Granite Dyke site as unsafe and recommending the Forks site for the construction of the dam. On April 1, 1927, J. W. Reagan resigned as chief engineer and E. C. Eaton was appointed in his place, with D. C. Henny, J. B. Lippincott, and J. W. Reagan as members of a consulting board. On May 9, 1927, plans and specifications for a dam 386 feet in height at the Forks site were submitted to and approved by the board of supervisors, and bids for the construction of the dam were called for. On August 2, 1927, all bids were rejected and the chief engineer was instructed to prepare plans and specifications for a dam 425 feet in height as set forth in the original plan. On August 20th the consulting board recommended additional exploration of the east abutment. On November 12 that board recommended that foundation elevations of the dam be lowered ten feet on slope sides. In October, 1927, a taxpayer commenced a proceeding in the superior court to compel the board of supervisors to build the 385-foot dam and to enjoin the construction of the dam according to the original plan. Numerous cities in the San Gabriel Valley also brought suit to compel the board to construct the dam in accordance with the original plan. The causes were consolidated for trial, and on July 26, 1928, the Superior Court rendered its decision granting a writ of mandate compelling the board of supervisors of the district to construct the dam proposed in the original report unless said work shall thereafter be prohibited by law or rendered contrary to the best interests of the district by change of conditions in relation thereto. On September 8, 1928, the board of supervisors again adopted plans and specifications for the dam as originally contemplated and advertised for bids. On December 7, 1928, a contract for the construction of the dam was executed. The contractor thereupon entered upon the execution of the work, which continued until September, 1929, at which time, and after the excavation of some 700,000 cubic feet of sand and rock, it was discovered that there was a possibility that a sufficiently solid foundation could not be had, whereupon the board ordered a temporary discontinuance of the work and appointed a board of engineers and geologists to further explore the foundations and bedrock as disclosed by the excavation work of the contractor. The actual construction of the dam itself had not yet been entered upon. During the years of 1926, 1927, 1928, and 1929, the district was also engaged in purchasing and condemning lands and mining claims for the railroad right of way and for the dam and reservoir site.

In 1929 the Legislature adopted an act entitled, "An act providing for the supervision of dams by the department of public works through the state engineer for the purpose of safeguarding life and property," etc. Stats. 1929, p. 1505. This statute became effective on August 14, 1929, and before the cessation of work under said contract. Section 5 of the act provides that after the effective date of the act the construction of a new dam or the enlargement of any dam shall not be commenced, and dams (as in the present case) not more than 90 per cent. completed on August 14, 1929, shall not be completed until the owner has applied for and obtained from the department written approval of plans and specifications. The application was required to set forth the area of the drainage basin, rainfall and stream flow records, and flood flow records and estimates. The department might require data concerning subsoil and foundation conditions, etc. By section 2 of the act the word "owner" was defined to include the state and any of its agencies or districts. A violation of the statute is a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment or both, and in addition the department is authorized to commence an action in the superior court to compel observance of the terms of the act or to enjoin violations thereof.

On October 26, 1929, the petitioner herein made an application to the state engineer for his approval of the construction of the dam at the Forks site. The state engineer caused an examination of said dam to be made on his own behalf and also called upon a board of engineers for an investigation and report. The board advised the state engineer, and that state official found that a dam of the size and type called for by the contract could not be safely constructed at the Forks site by reason of the existence of certain earthquake faults and insufficiently sound foundation and bedrock at that place, and that the construction of the dam as proposed would be unsafe and a severe menace to life and property. The state engineer, on November 26, 1929, denied the application for his approval. On December 2, 1929, the district canceled and terminated the construction contract and instructed the chief engineer to investigate the San Gabriel Canyon for the purpose of ascertaining whether other dams and flood control and conservation works could be constructed in said canyon to carry out the same purpose and accomplish the same results as were contemplated by the construction of the dam at the Forks site. The investigation was made, and on December 22, 1930, E. C. Eaton, the chief engineer, filed with the board a report setting forth at length plans and projects for the control and conservation of the waters of the San Gabriel river watershed. These plans provide for the construction of small check dams in the upper reaches and laterals of the river and canyon, for three large dams at different places in said canyon, for the acquisition of spreading grounds at the mouth of said canyon, and for the construction of spreading works thereon, whereby the flood waters of said canyon may be placed in the underground water basin of the San Gabriel river and be conserved for beneficial uses. In said report it was estimated that the dam and works could be constructed and the lands therefor be acquired for approximately the sum of $20,000,000, which sum represents the unexpended balance of the originally authorized bonds for the San Gabriel canyon project.

Upon the filing of said report a hearing before the board was had at which testimony was produced to the effect that a change of conditions had occurred since the bond issue was authorized, in relation to the construction of the dam of the size and design and at the site originally proposed, consisting in and showing (1) that fires occurring over a large portion of the San Gabriel watershed which would result in an increased quantity of loose material being brought down by floods and requiring the construction of check dams to aid in retarding the flow and discharge of said material; (2) that the excavation work done by the contractor for the construction of said dam had disclosed large cracks in the rock required as a foundation for the construction of said dam, and that during the course of said construction work a movement had taken place on the west abutment of the proposed dam, evidenced by a large slide which disclosed faulty and unstable foundations; (3) that in the opinion of the chief engineer a dam of the size and design of that originally proposed could not be safely constructed at the Forks site; (4) that since the voting of said bonds there had been a steadily continuing decrease in the water in the basin of the San Gabriel Valley below the canyon, and that the lowering of the water plane had increased the capacity of said basin so that spreading grounds should be acquired for the purpose of constructing therein spreading works whereby the flood waters might be discharged therein and thus be caused to percolate into the basin of the San Gabriel river and valley; (5) that the construction of a dam of the size and design and at the site originally contemplated had been prohibited by law, in that the state engineer had denied the application of the district for the construction at the Forks site and had refused to permit the construction of a dam at said site; (6) that the construction of check dams, three large dams, and the acquisition of spreading grounds at the mouth of the canyon and the construction of spreading works thereon as now contemplated would result in the accomplishment of the same purposes as were planned by the construction of a dam at the Forks site and would result in even greater conservation of flood waters for beneficial uses; and (7) that the work and improvement now planned would all be constructed for approximately the estimated sum.

On December 22, 1930, the board of supervisors adopted a resolution, by a vote of four-fifths of its members, in which it was found and determined that the construction of the dam at the Forks site is now prohibited by law and rendered contrary to the best interests of the flood control district by reason of a change in conditions in relation thereto, which prohibition by law and change of conditions have occurred since the adoption of the original report and the voting of said bonds, and that the original plans should be changed to conform to the new plans, and that the unexpended balance in the bond fund be appropriated for the work and improvement in accordance with the new plan. The chief engineer was instructed to prepare plans and specifications to that end, and the board by a four-fifths vote instructed its chairman to sign bonds in the sum of $5,000,000, the proceeds thereof to be used in the furtherance of said work.

The chairman of said board, respondent herein, alone voted in the negative on the motion to adopt the resolution above referred to, and has declined to sign said bonds on the ground, among others, that, since the modified plan contemplates the expenditure of a large sum of money, the board should be sure that the use of the funds derived from the sale of said bonds would be lawful, and that the doubts which he entertained as to the legality of such use required him to vote against said resolution and to refuse to sign said bonds. He therefore declined to sign said bonds as required by said resolution until the question of the legality of such sale be definitely settled in favor thereof.

The respondent places his refusal to sign the bonds on the premise that the Los Angeles county flood control district is in all of its essential elements a special assessment district, whose course in the proceeding to charge the lands in the district with a special assessment must be strictly construed against the district and in favor of owners of the property assessed; that the work now proposed was not included in the original plan and cannot therefore be made the subject of a special assessment to cover the cost thereof. In support of this contention, the respondent cites the case of Los Angeles County F. C. Dist. v. Hamilton, 177 Cal. 193, 169 P. 1028. That case held that the statute of 1915 was in essence a local improvement act, and that the power of the board to raise funds to discharge the obligations of the district was referable to the field of special assessments, as distinguished from that of the general taxing power. Consequently the respondent contends, under established general doctrines with reference to the levy of special assessments, that the rule of strictissima juris must be applied. This may be conceded. But when the rule is applied, the statute under which the proceeding is taken must be scrutinized to determine whether there has been a departure from the statutory requirements, having in mind that under section 21 the act and every part thereof must be liberally construed to promote its objects and to carry out its intents and purposes.

The petitioner points to the proviso in section 15 of the act as full justification for the steps pursued. If the statute authorizes the proceedings subsequently taken by the board, there is no contention advanced by the respondent that they were not properly taken. The proviso is as follows: "And provided, further, that any improvement for which bonds are voted under the provisions of this act, shall be made in conformity with the report, plans, specifications and map theretofore adopted, as above specified, unless the doing of any of such work described in said report shall be prohibited by law, or be rendered contrary to the best interests of said district by some change of conditions in relation thereto, in which event said board of supervisors may, by a vote of four-fifths of all the members thereof, order necessary changes made in such proposed work or improvements, and may cause new plans and specifications to be made and adopted therefor."

[1] The controversy is then narrowed to the questions (1) whether the doing of the work according to the original plans has been prohibited by law, and if not (2) whether the execution of the work in accordance with the original plans has been rendered contrary to the best interests of the district by some change of conditions in relation thereto. As to the first question the statute of 1929 (Stats. 1929, p. 1505) makes it a penal offense to construct a dam without the written approval of the department of public works. For a violation of its provisions the department of public works is given the right to maintain mandamus and injunction proceedings to prevent any threatened violation thereof. The approval of the department was requested for the construction of the high dam at the Forks site. The application was denied without prejudice to the filing of another application for a dam at this or any other site. No reason has been advanced and none appears why this statute should not be upheld as a valid exercise by the state of its police power. See Union Bridge Co. v. U. S., 204 U. S. 386, 27 S. Ct. 367, 51 L. Ed. 523; Gaylord v. City of Pasadena, 175 Cal. 433, 166 P. 348. By the terms of the act it is made applicable to such an agency as the Los Angeles county flood control district. No claim is made that the department of public works through its state engineer acted arbitrarily or capriciously in denying the application. On the contrary, the admitted facts in this matter show that such action was wisely exercised. The citation of authorities, which are abundant, is unnecessary to support the statement that the construction of the dam at the original site without such approval would be contrary to law and as such is prohibited by law within the meaning of the statute.

[2] There is much discussion by counsel as to whether the discovery of the unstable and unsafe foundation work for the westerly abutment of the dam as originally planned was such a change of conditions as would authorize the board to exercise its discretion in ordering new plans and specifications to accomplish the same purposes and results as contemplated by the original plans. It may be assumed that there was no physical change in the geological formation from the time the investigations as to their character began and until their actual nature was discovered by the removal of many hundred thousand cubic yards of material. But to require that a change in existing geological formation by some cataclysm of nature would be necessary in order to constitute such a change in conditions as would justify a modified plan would be to place an unreasonable and too restricted construction upon the powers of the board. The discovery of the actual formation as distinguished from the formation believed to exist after exhaustive exploration and investigation would seem to be such a change of condition as would authorize the board to modify the plans so as to carry out the main purpose of the proceeding. In other words, a discovery of the actual conditions in place of the hitherto apparent but unknown conditions would seem to satisfy the requirements of this statute. We conclude therefore that the board was authorized to modify the plans and specifications with reference to this improvement, not only because the construction in accordance with the original plan would have been unlawful, but also because the discovery of the actual conditions as distinguished from the apparent conditions constituted such a change in conditions as would justify a modification of the plans and a relocation of the means to be employed for checking and impounding the flood waters. That such a change of plans would be for the best interests of the district is not challenged. Indeed, no other course would seem to have been open to the board.

[3, 4] It is next to be considered whether such change of plans would, as respondent contends, violate any contractual rights of the landowners in the district arising by reason of the submission to the voters of the proposition to construct the improvement in accordance with the original plan. If any such contractual right would thus be violated, it would necessarily follow that further bonds could not be issued without a resubmission of the question of the issuance thereof to the electors in the district.

It may be assumed that by reason of the proposal on the part of the officers of the district and the approval of the electors therein as to the authorization and issuance of said bond issue a status analogous to a contractual relation came into being which is entitled to protection under the Constitution. The case of Peery v. City of Los Angeles, 187 Cal. 753, 203 P. 992, 19 A. L. R. 1044, is authority to that effect. But, in order to determine whether a contract has been violated, it is necessary first to determine what the contract is. In this case it was the proposal to authorize the issuance of the bonds which, in accordance with the statute, set forth the objects and purposes for which the expenditures were to be made and also the assent of the electors of the district to the proposal. In determining the extent and limitations of the contract, the terms of the statute under which the proceedings were taken must be taken into consideration. The provisions of the statute were a part of the contract and must be held to have been personally known to every elector whose approval was sought and registered at the election. Peery v. City of Los Angeles, supra; Inglewood v. County of Los Angeles, 207 Cal. 697, 280 P. 360. Section 8 of the act provides that the fund derived from the sale of said bonds "shall be applied exclusively to the purposes and objects mentioned in the ordinance calling such special bond election as aforesaid, subject to the provisions in this act contained." The ordinance calling the election specified the objects and purposes for which the proceeds of the contemplated bond issue were to be used, and further provided that the indebtedness was proposed to be incurred "in accordance with the provisions of the Los Angeles County Flood Control Act." Section 23 of the act provides that the act may be designated and referred to as "Los Angeles County Flood Control Act," and that such designation and reference shall be deemed sufficient for all purposes. The proposition stated on the ballot did not refer to the statute, but it must be assumed that the ballots were cast by the electors with the terms of the statute in mind which authorized the board of supervisors to change the plans as occasion might require, but in accordance with the terms of the statute. We conclude that there has been no impairment of the contractual rights of the electors of the district by reason of the proceedings taken by the board, and that none will result by the issuance of said bonds.

[5] The respondent's brief sets forth the form of the bonds prescribed by Ordinance No. 14 adopted by the board on June 5, 1924. This form recites that the bonds are issued in conformity with said ordinance adopted June 5, 1924, and "under the authority conferred upon said board by the provisions of an act of the legislature of the State of California designated and referred to as 'The Los Angeles County Flood Control Act', approved June 12, 1915, and after a special election held in said Los Angeles County Flood Control District on the sixth day of May, 1924, at which election there was submitted to the qualified electors of said district the proposition of incurring a bonded debt in the said sum of $35,300,000.00 for the objects and purposes as stated in the ordinance of the said Los Angeles County Flood Control District on the 4th day of April, 1924, and in the report of the chief engineer of said district adopted by the board of supervisors of said district on the 1st day of April, 1924, and at which said election a majority of the votes cast were in favor of said proposition." It is urged that the recital just quoted contains an erroneous statement of fact as to the objects and purposes of the bonded debt, if the funds are to be used in accordance with the changed plans, and that the writ should therefore be denied under the authority of Municipal Improvement Co. v. Thompson, 201 Cal. 629, 258 P. 955. But there is in reality no misstatement of fact in the recital. It correctly recites the proposition submitted to the voters at the bond election which was "for the objects and purposes as stated in the ordinance" calling the election and "in the report of the chief engineer." This recital of the proposition so submitted to the voters would appear to be entirely in conformity with the facts as they have heretofore existed and do now exist.

Let the peremptory writ issue as prayed.

PEOPLE v. HODGES et al.

Cr. 210.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Aug. 6, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 20, 1931.

1. Criminal law ☞728(2,5).

When district attorney is guilty of misconduct, defendant's counsel should call court's attention thereto and assign it as misconduct or request cautionary instruction.

2. Criminal law ☞720(9).

In prosecution for murder committed in bomb explosion, argument of district attorney relative to "planting" of evidence by defendant held warranted under evidence.

The evidence for the prosecution disclosed that defendant had prepared pipe and had secured fuse and powder, and that the pipe corresponded with that found in the barn after the explosion. Defendant had said nothing about dynamite or piece of pipe being in his house when it was searched after the explosion, but shortly before the close of the case defendant requested deputy sheriff to go to defendant's house and get piece of pipe and dynamite from closet in kitchen. While the pipe was produced from defendant's house, no cap to fit the threaded end was produced, though witnesses testified that one had been procured by defendant originally.

3. Criminal law ☞1129(1).

Remarks of district attorney derogatory to defendant or defendant's counsel held not to warrant reversal where remarks were not assigned as misconduct.

4. Criminal law ⇨1171(3).

District attorney's commendatory statements in argument concerning deputy sheriff who was called by defendant as witness held not to require reversal.

5. Criminal law ⇨1171(3).

District attorney's argument that codefendant who took witness stand would be tried by some other jury held not prejudicial error, notwithstanding subsequent dismissal of charge against codefendant.

6. Criminal law ⇨1129(1).

Any error in district attorney's remark that defendant could identify pipe introduced as exhibit must be deemed waived, where remark was not assigned as misconduct.

7. Criminal law ⇨1129(1).

District attorney's argument relative to failure of defendant's wife to testify, where not connected with question of defendant's taking witness stand and where not assigned as misconduct, held not reversible error.

8. Criminal law ⇨1043(2).

Defendant should make plain his objections at time to avoid repeating trial.

9. Criminal law ⇨730(14).

In prosecution for murder by bombing, argument as to number of persons murdered by bomb explosions held not to warrant reversal where court instructed it be disregarded.

10. Homicide ⇨171(3).

In prosecution for murder by bomb explosion, testimony as to result of explosion in wounding another held admissible.

11. Jury ⇨136(6).

Refusal to allow defendant additional peremptory challenges, where codefendant refused to join in such additional challenges, held not error (Pen. Code, § 1098).

12. Criminal law ⇨1171(1).

In prosecution for murder, improper conduct of district attorney in argument held not ground for reversal, in view of overwhelming evidence of guilt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; A. C. Finney, Judge.

A. L. Hodges was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Edward B. Patterson, of El Centro, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BARNARD, P. J.

The defendant Hodges was, jointly with Anthony W. Patton, E. T. McCoy, and G. M. Hunter, charged with the crime of murder in an indictment returned by the grand jury of Imperial county. The defendant Hunter was never apprehended, the defendant Patton was given a separate trial, and the defendants Hodges and McCoy were tried together. The jury found the defendant Hodges guilty of manslaughter, and, under an advisory instruction by the court, found the defendant McCoy not guilty. Defendant Hodges has appealed from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The general facts relating to the offense of which the appellant was convicted may be briefly summarized as follows: For about a week prior to December 8, 1930, between 100 and 140 Filipinos had been living in the loft of an old barn in the city of Imperial. The presence of the Filipinos was resented by many persons in and around Imperial, to the extent that it had become a general topic of conversation on the streets and the resentment had become so pronounced that some of the talk amounted to veiled, if not open, threats against them. At about 8 o'clock on the evening of December 8, 1930, a bomb exploded in this barn, making a large hole in the dirt floor of the barn, particles of the bomb being driven through the floor of the loft and through the roof of the barn. Other particles passed through the side walls of the barn and into dwelling houses on either side thereof. One piece of the bomb was found in a service station a half block away, having passed through the galvanized iron wall of the station. One piece of the bomb was blown through the body of Arriston Lampky, one of the Filipinos occupying the loft of the barn, resulting in his death a few hours later. Other particles of the bomb wounded three other Filipinos who were in the loft. The barn had a large door 10 feet high by 18 feet wide on the front end, and two windows on the sides. One of the Filipinos testified that about 8 o'clock, or a few minutes after that time, he heard something drop on the ground, and that he saw an object there, approximately between 12 and 18 inches long, which was smoking in the middle. Another Filipino testified that he heard something heavy drop, and that later, as he approached it, it exploded. Various witnesses fixed the time elapsing between the thud of the object falling on the ground and the explosion at from three to six minutes.

Aside from the testimony of the codefendant Patton, the record shows the following evidence tending to connect the appellant with the commission of the crime. The appellant had been prominent among those discussing the question of how to get rid of the Filipinos. He had solicited funds from various persons, to some of whom he did not tell what he proposed to do with the funds, while to others he said it was "for the good of the valley." To at least one, he said it was for "explosives or dynamite—I understood him to say he wanted to scare some Filipinos out. Not that he was going to but that some other people were." A few days before the explosion appellant entered the store of C. T. Gibson in Imperial, and asked for dynamite caps. Gibson said that he did not have any, and suggested that he try the Imperial Valley Hardware Company, at El Centro. Another witness testified that several days before the explosion he heard the appellant say something about blowing up the Filipinos. Another witness testified that, some time after 3 o'clock in the afternoon of December 8, the appellant asked the witness if he would buy him a milk shake if he (the appellant) would knock the Filipinos out. One James Heath testified that about noon on December 8, 1930, he had a conversation with the appellant about some dynamite. He asked the appellant what he wanted the dynamite for and the appellant did not tell him. He told the appellant that he did not have any dynamite in his store in Imperial, but that appellant could get it at the store in El Centro. A blacksmith named Ditto testified that about 10 o'clock on the morning of December 8, 1930, the appellant came to his shop alone, looking for a piece of pipe. The witness sent him to a junk pile outside of the shop and later the appellant returned with a piece of 2½-inch pipe, 16 inches long, with threads on one end. Appellant asked the witness if he could cut some threads on the other end of the pipe or if it would be cheaper to have the other end of the pipe welded closed. The witness told him the latter would be cheaper, and that he could furnish a plug, but that he would have to take it to another blacksmith to have it welded. The witness furnished a plug cut from a piece of shafting, the plug having had threads on it and also having a center hole made by reason of its having been set up in a lathe. A plug found at the scene of the explosion, and introduced into evidence, was identified by the witness as similar to the one he had furnished. The appellant left this blacksmith shop with the pipe and plug, and some 20 or 30 minutes later returned with two other men, with the plug welded into the end of the pipe. At the request of the appellant, the witness drilled a hole about the middle of the pipe, returned it to appellant, and the men drove away. The witness asked the appellant what he wanted the pipe for, to which he replied that the witness would never know. Another blacksmith, George Merkle, testified that on December 8, 1930, a man came to his shop with a piece of pipe and a plug; that at the request of this man he welded the plug into one end of the pipe; and that later three men came and took the pipe away with them. He identified the plug found at the scene of the explosion as in all respects similar to the plug he welded into the pipe that day. He first testified that he recognized three men in the courtroom as the three who had come to his shop, then that he was unable to tell which was which, and finally, on being asked if there was any one in the courtroom whom he could identify as being one of the three men, he replied: "I haven't got no knowledge." One Traxler, employed by the Imperial Valley Hardware Company at El Centro, testified that during the afternoon of December 8 the appellant came into the store, showing a piece of pipe for which he wanted to buy a cap. The witness got a cap to fit the pipe and then sold the appellant four pounds of dynamite, and also some blasting caps. The witness testified that the pipe was between 14 and 20 inches long, plugged at one end by a welded plug and threaded on the other, and that he fitted the cap to the threaded end of the pipe. He also testified that the plug in the closed end of the pipe was similar to the one found at the scene of the explosion. This witness was corroborated by another clerk in the same store. It was established by a number of witnesses that about 7:30 o'clock in the evening of December 8, 1930, appellant went to a house about a half-mile away from the barn in question, where a man known as "Red" Hunter was playing cards with some companions. Appellant said to Red, "Are you ready?" Red answered, "No, I won't be for an hour or two." Appellant replied, "That will be too late." A block and a half directly down an alley from the barn occupied by the Filipinos were two pool halls, one on each side of the alley with their back doors opposite each other. One Peters testified that about 7 o'clock on this evening, at Salty's pool room, he played two or three games of pool with appellant, and that appellant then left the pool room. Also, that appellant reappeared at about 8 o'clock and had just started to play a game, having taken not more than two or three shots, when a man named Johnson ran through the pool room. Johnson testified that he was in Port's pool hall, across the alley from Salty's pool hall, when the explosion occurred; that he heard a kind of thud and felt some vibration; that he told Mr. Port that he believed that there had been an explosion where the Filipinos were; and that he immediately ran out the rear door of that pool hall and into the back door of the other pool hall, running on through to the street. He testified that as he ran through Salty's pool hall he bumped into the appellant, who was playing pool at one of the tables, and that this occurred with-

In a few seconds after he heard the explosion, just time for him to run 150 or 200 feet. A witness, Sproule, testified that on the morning of December 8, 1930, he met the codefendant Patton on the street; that Patton asked him for some powder; that they both proceeded to the witness' home; and that he gave Patton some powder and also a quantity of fuse. When asked how much fuse, he replied, "It would run between 2½ and 3½ feet, somewhere along in there." He testified that he had had experience with this particular kind of fuse, and, when asked how long it would take that amount of fuse to burn, he replied, "Well now, I've never timed it up, but I would judge it would run around about a foot to a minute."

In addition to this evidence, Patton, a codefendant, testified as follows: That he first met the appellant on the evening of December 6, 1930; that around 9 o'clock on the morning of December 8, 1930, he met the appellant in front of Salty's pool hall; that they had some general conversation about what ought to be done with the Filipinos; that he and appellant then walked around several blocks, passing near the barn in question; that as they passed the barn appellant remarked that he had picked out the place where he would "throw it if nobody else did"; that the witness advised him not to throw it at that time; that when they returned to the pool hall appellant asked an old man if he still had that fuse and powder, and the old man replied yes and walked away; that the appellant then told the witness he was going to get a piece of pipe and asked the witness to go down to where the old man was standing and tell him that he (Patton) wanted to get a piece of fuse and the powder, and for him to bring the same to appellant; that he did so and went with the old man to his home, secured the fuse and powder, returned to Salty's pool hall, and gave these articles to appellant; that Red Hunter then appeared and appellant then began to solicit donations "for the good of the valley"; that, at the suggestion of appellant that they go and get a pipe which he had at the blacksmith shop, the witness, Red Hunter, and appellant went to the blacksmith shop and appellant got the pipe; that the three took the pipe over to another blacksmith shop where they had a hole drilled about the middle of the pipe; that, at Red's suggestion, they left the pipe at the blacksmith shop; that later, the witness and appellant drove in appellant's car to the blacksmith shop and the witness went in, brought out the pipe, and placed it in the car; that the witness and appellant then drove to El Centro, where the witness remained in the car and the appellant took the pipe and went away; that when appellant returned to the car, he had the pipe with a metal cap screwed on the threaded end thereof, and also had with him a small brown package; that upon their return to Imperial, they stopped at a long red building where the appellant "took the pipe and what I suppose was the dynamite in there and left it"; and that the witness then went home. He further testified that he returned to Salty's pool hall that evening; that a few minutes later he asked the codefendant McCoy to take him to El Centro in his automobile; that, as they went out of the pool hall, the appellant asked if they would take him down to where the defendant Red was playing poker; that they drove to a house on the east side of Imperial where appellant went in while the others remained in the car; that five or ten minutes later appellant returned to the car and stated that Red was loser in the poker game and would not leave; that appellant then said: "Take me home and I will get it" and also, "I will fix the thing, I will fix the bomb while you are gone"; that after they took appellant to his home they proceeded to El Centro; that they returned in a few minutes and again stopped at appellant's house and went in; and that as they entered the appellant remarked, "I have got it fixed." He then testified that appellant "reaches into the door right straight ahead from where I was standing, picks up this pipe and the fuse was doubled up in his hand at that time." The witness then testified that the three of them got into McCoy's car, taking the pipe and fuse with them, and, after driving past the barn where the Filipinos were, parked their car near the two pool halls; that when he left the car, Hodges was still sitting in the car with the bomb in his lap; that the witness went into Salty's pool hall and five or ten minutes later McCoy came in the front door and about the same time Hodges came in at the back door; that they met near the center of the pool hall, talked a minute, both went outside and later came in; that this is "the last I recollect"; and that the witness stayed in the pool hall until Johnson came running through and said he thought the Filipinos had been blown up.

A few other facts are necessary for the consideration of one of the assignments of error made by the appellant. Shortly before the close of the case, the appellant, in the presence of his attorney, requested Rodney Clark, a deputy sheriff, to go to the appellant's house and get from a closet in the kitchen a piece of pipe and some dynamite. Clark testified that he did so and produced the pipe and dynamite in court. He testified that the appellant told him to "go over there and look in the closet in the kitchen and I would find the original pipe and dynamite." He testified that he found the articles on a shelf in this closet; that there was a little dust on the shelf and nothing else in the closet; and, without objection, he testified that it appeared to him, from what he was able to observe, that these articles had been recently placed there. He also testified that he knew of his own knowledge that the place had been searched the next morning after the explosion; that, immediately after the explosion, the appellant had been taken to the same house and questioned by the witness and three others; and that the appellant had then said nothing about any dynamite or piece of pipe being in his house. An investigator from the district attorney's office testified that on December 9, 1930, he, with two others, searched every portion of the appellant's house and found no dynamite or pipe. It also appears that, after the people rested, the attorney for the appellant asked for a recess until that afternoon, stating that one of his witnesses was not present. The court told him he had a number of witnesses and required him to proceed. Thereupon, he asked for a recess of ten minutes, which was granted by the court. After the recess, counsel stated that two additional witnesses had shown up and proceeded with his case.

Appellant first complains of a portion of the district attorney's argument to the jury, as follows: "Now, you remember how fussed Mr. Patterson was the other day when the prosecution quit, and the court said to Mr. Patterson, 'Go on with your case,' and Patterson fumbled around and he hummed and hawed around and it took him half an hour to get started again. Why? Because they were up there planting the evidence at that very time, and he wasn't sure it was there, and he wanted to have a chance to get out of here and find out. It is the most disreputable thing I ever saw two attorneys pull in a courtroom. That is the reason he wanted to stall over 'till after dinner, to go over there and have this disreputable Hodges tell the sheriff they could find it, and after they got them there they found they had left some of it out. Yes. Are you going to believe that kind of stuff? Do you think there is anything to that? They put Rodney Clark on the witness stand one of the finest officers Imperial county ever had, one of the cleanest officers I have ever had anything to do with, one of the finest undoubtedly we ever had in this county and they went over and told Rodney Clark to go and get it. All right, why didn't they have some of Hodges' friends bring it in? I'll tell you why. It wouldn't look as good as to have Rodney Clark bring it in. When he said it looked as if it had been recently put there, did they cross-examine him on that? No, they dropped it. They knew they didn't dare to do it. He testified there wasn't any dust on it."

In this connection, another portion of the district attorney's argument to the jury is objected to, being as follows: "Now, there is another point of this evidence that I want to demonstrate to you. There it is, put that right on that cap. Look, that fits perfectly, absolutely the same circle, the same width, the same kind of threads, the same thickness, the same everything. That came out of that barn up there. And another thing, listen, they didn't produce this cap that they had picked up, that is what they forgot, they forgot this cap, and you have got to disbelieve Traxler and Fuller if you are going to believe this piece of concocted, damnable planted, perjured testimony."

[1, 2] It is first argued that the reference to planted or spurious evidence had nothing in the record to warrant it, and that all statements in connection therewith amount to testimony given by the district attorney. In the first place, when the first of the above statements, being the one mainly objected to, was made, no assignment of misconduct was made by the appellant. In People v. Sieber, 201 Cal. 341, 257 P. 64, 71, the court said: "The rule is that when a district attorney is guilty of misconduct in the trial of a criminal case. It is ordinarily the duty of counsel for the defense promptly to call the attention of the court thereto and assign it as misconduct, or request the court to instruct the jury to disregard it. Such assignments and requests are necessary as a foundation for a complaint to this court."

We are unable to hold that there were no facts sufficient to justify an argument that the pipe found in the appellant's house by the deputy sheriff near the close of the trial, had not been there all of the time. The evident purpose of producing this pipe, with the testimony of where it was found in appellant's kitchen, was to meet the overwhelming evidence that had been produced showing the appellant had prepared such a pipe, and to show that the same had not been used by him. While a pipe was produced, no cap to fit the threaded end was produced, although three witnesses had testified that one had been procured by the appellant originally. While the district attorney is not to be commended for the manner in which this was discussed, the facts in evidence did warrant an argument along that line. These statements by the district attorney were not testimony, but were his own argument or inferences that he drew from the evidence. Nor do we think the jury could have understood them otherwise. In People v. Molina, 126 Cal. 505, 59 P. 34, 35, the court quotes with approval from another case, as follows: "The right of discussing the merits of the cause, both as to the law and facts, is unabridged. The range of discussion is wide. He may be heard in argument upon every question of law. In his addresses to the jury, it is his privilege to descant upon the facts proved or admitted in the pleadings; to arraign the conduct of parties; impugn, excuse, justify, or condemn motives, as far as they are developed in the evidence; assail the credibility of witnesses, when it is impeached by direct evidence, or by the inconsistency or incoherence of their testimony, their manner of testifying, their appearance on the stand, or by circumstances. His illustrations may be as various as the resources of his genius; his argumentation as full and profound as his learning can make it; and he may, if he will, give play to his wit, or wings to his imagination."

[3] In reference to that portion of the district attorney's remarks to the jury above quoted, which reflects upon the attorneys for the defendant, it may again be observed that these remarks were not assigned as misconduct at the time they were made, or, in fact, at any time. Shortly thereafter, when the remarks were made about the cap not being produced, counsel for appellant objected to that statement and assigned it as misconduct, and then said, "I asked the court to instruct the jury to disregard all of the statements as to perjured testimony. That cap is over there, fit that cap there on these * * *," whereupon the court instructed the jury: "The jury will rely upon their own recollection of the evidence and not the assertions of either counsel." It would have been improper to instruct the jury to disregard all of the reference to the finding of the pipe in appellant's house, its completeness, and the conditions under which it was found. While the remarks of the district attorney contained improper language, and some that should not have been used, any assignment of misconduct should have been definitely called to the attention of the court. Under the circumstances shown by this record, we do not feel that these remarks justify a reversal of the judgment. People v. Charlie, 34 Cal. App. 411, 167 P. 703.

[4] In connection with the remarks of the district attorney to the jury, above quoted, appellant also insists that the commendatory statements about Rodney Clark, the deputy sheriff, constituted reversible error. Appellant relies upon People v. Frank, 71 Cal. App. 575, 236 P. 189. In that case, it was held that certain commendatory remarks made by the trial judge and a deputy district attorney concerning certain witnesses, without whose testimony a conviction would have been impossible, was erroneous. In the case before us, if the remarks made be considered as going to the credibility of the witness, it was in favor of the appellant, as the witness had been put on the stand by him, and any inference that could be drawn in favor of the credibility of the witness was therefore favorable to appellant. Moreover, the reference to the officer was more in the nature of a reference to his general standing than a comment upon his credibility, and was a part of the argument made in connection with the line of defense, in support of which this witness had been called. While it had much better been left unsaid, there was an element or argument in it, based, at least in part, upon facts before the jury, and, in our opinion, no sufficient error or prejudice appears to warrant a reversal.

[5] Appellant next complains of the following remark from the argument of the district attorney to the jury: "Well, as I said before Patton will be tried by some other jury, and you don't need to worry about that, you are trying these two men, and not Patton."

The record shows that when the codefendant Patton was on the witness stand an effort was made to get him to admit that he had been promised immunity if he would take the stand as a witness. He maintained throughout that he had been promised nothing by any one. Appellant sets forth in his brief that, subsequently, the case against Patton was dismissed on motion of the district attorney. It is strenuously argued that appellant could not have been convicted without the testimony of Patton; that, if the jury had known the case against Patton would be dismissed, they would not have believed his evidence; and that the district attorney misled the jury in the statement above quoted, thereby committing prejudicial misconduct. At this point we may refer to the fact that, after the briefs were filed in this case, the appellant filed in this court a notice of motion for an order requiring the clerk of the trial court to transmit to this court a certain affidavit filed in that court by counsel for appellant, together with certain records of the trial court. This motion was taken under submission and is being considered in connection with the appeal in this case. By the records sought to be transmitted to this court, it appears that, twelve days after the appellant's motion for a new trial was denied, a motion was made to dismiss the charges against the defendant Patton, which motion was by the court denied. Also, that five days later, in another department of the same court, a motion to dismiss the charge against defendant Patton was granted. In connection with this motion to transmit evidence to this court, and also in connection with appellant's contention that the remarks of the district attorney above quoted constituted prejudicial misconduct, it is argued that, at the time those remarks were made, the district attorney had no intention of trying the codefendant Patton. No evidence of any such fact is presented, and nothing appears to justify such a contention other than the fact that the action was later dismissed as against Patton.

Not only did the dismissal of the action against Patton occur after judgment had been entered in this case, but these subsequent events are by no means so connected up with the remark made by the district attorney as to show prejudicial misconduct. Appellant's application to have this subsequent record transmitted to this court is denied. In addition, it may be said that the evidence is not only sufficient to sustain the judgment against the appellant without reference to Patton's testimony, but his evidence stands uncontradicted and to a large extent corroborated by other evidence, and it would not appear from the record that, as claimed by the appellant, the jury would not have believed Patton even had they known that the case against him was not to be tried.

[6] The next assignment of misconduct on the part of the district attorney is in connection with a remark made when counsel for appellant was attempting to identify the pipe which the deputy sheriff had brought from appellant's house shortly before the close of the trial. The court asked counsel if he had any further identification, to which counsel replied that he knew of none, and the district attorney remarked "the defendant could identify it." The pipe in question was admitted in evidence. This statement of the district attorney is objected to as an indirect reference to the fact that the appellant did not take the witness stand on his own behalf. At that time it did not appear whether or not the defendant would take the witness stand. In any event, the making of the remark was not assigned as misconduct, and any error must be deemed to have been waived.

[7, 8] The next assignment of error relates to the following excerpt from the argument of the district attorney: "And another thing, you women on this jury, if your husbands were sitting over there where that defendant is sitting, and eight pieces of dynamite had been in your cupboard where you kept your dishes and pans and cooking utensils, and there was a piece of pipe as big as that, you women sitting here on this jury now in all fairness, if your husband was sitting where that man is, wouldn't you get on the witness stand and testify that that pipe and dynamite had been there ever since that time? Why, of course you would."

It is argued that this, in effect, was a comment on the fact that the appellant did not take the stand on his own behalf, and was also a comment that he did not call his wife to testify for him. In support of this contention, appellant cites the cases of People v. Tufts, 167 Cal. 266, 139 P. 78, and People v. Terramorse, 30 Cal. App. 267, 157 P. 1134. Both of those cases refer to comment by the district attorney on the fact that the defendant objected to his wife's testifying. In this case, the defendant sought to prove that the pipe he was shown to have prepared was still at his home unused. He had himself begun this proof, and it appears to us that the comment on the fact that he did not complete such proof in an obvious manner is considerably different from commenting on the fact that a defendant has exercised a right given him by law, as was the situation in the cases cited. But the remarks had no connection with or reference to the fact that the appellant did not take the stand. If it be conceded that the remarks were improper, it neither appears that they were sufficiently prejudicial to require a new trial, nor that the objection now made was presented to the court and assigned as misconduct. When asked what he claimed was misconduct, counsel for appellant said it was "about the defendant not putting on any witnesses on his behalf." When his attention was called by the court to the fact that no such statement had been made by the district attorney, but that he had referred to the failure to call appellant's wife, counsel for appellant made no correction and no further assignment of error. In a long drawn-out trial of this nature, where many things are apt to occur in the stress of the moment, it is only reasonable that a defendant should be required to make plain his objections to the court at the time, when they may be corrected, in order to avoid the time and expense in repeating the entire proceeding. We think that no reversible error is shown. People v. Moore (Cal. App.) 295 P. 1039. In this connection, it may be observed that the court instructed the jury that the neglect or refusal of the defendant to be a witness could not in any manner prejudice him, nor be used against him.

[9] Prejudicial misconduct is claimed because in his argument to the jury the district attorney said: "Now I want to say this: Do you know how many persons have been murdered in the United States since the first of January, 1930, by explosions of bombs? Have you any idea? Well, there have just been one hundred and eighty-two, that's what. * * *"

In support thereof appellant cites People v. Wong Loung, 159 Cal. 520, 114 P. 829. Not only does this statement fall within the class referred to in People v. Molina, supra, but the record shows that the statement was objected to and cited as misconduct, and the court instructed the jury to disregard it. In addition, the court gave a general instruction that all statements of counsel, if they were not supported by evidence, should be wholly disregarded by the jury.

[10] The next point raised by appellant is that the court erred in permitting one Norbe to testify that he was in the barn on the night of the explosion, that he was wounded, and that his dog was killed. It was maintained that this constituted evidence of another crime. One of the issues in this case was whether Lampky came to his death because of this explosion, or by some other means. Testimony as to the effect and result of the explosion, and how pieces of the bomb were driven through the walls, flooring, and into other persons, including the deceased, was pertinent to the issue. People v. Cooper, 86 Cal. App. 441, 260 P. 886.

[11] The last point raised is that the court erred in refusing to allow peremptory challenges to the appellant because the codefendant refused to join in said challenges. It appears that each codefendant was allowed five peremptory challenges, and in addition they were allowed twenty peremptory challenges in which they might join. After appellant's five peremptory challenges were exhausted, one juror remained to whom he desired to make a peremptory challenge, in which his codefendant refused to join. The only argument made is that section 1098 of the Penal Code is unconstitutional. However, the particular portions of the Constitution which it is claimed are violated by this section are not pointed out. The precise questions here raised were decided adversely to appellant in the case of People v. Dowell, 204 Cal. 109, 266 P. 807.

[12] The crime with which appellant is charged was a peculiarly atrocious one, endangering the lives of scores of innocent people in addition to the one who was killed. Most of the points raised by the appellant are addressed to misconduct on the part of the district attorney. The fact that the trial lasted eight days, with the bitterness shown by the record, may explain, but does not excuse, some of the matters complained of. The language used by the district attorney in some instances is certainly not to be commended, and some other things said had much better been left unsaid. In some cases a succession of errors might justify a reversal where the individual instances were not sufficiently prejudicial to require that action. However, in the instant case, where the evidence of appellant's guilt was so overwhelming and where it does not seem possible that the improper language used could have changed the result, we are of the opinion that, under all of the circumstances shown, such errors as appear are not sufficient to justify a reversal of the judgment.

For the reasons given the order and judgment appealed from are affirmed.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant after trial before the court.

February 17, 1925, plaintiff delivered to Los Angeles Steamship Company, at San Francisco, four cases containing thirty-four Chinese rugs consigned to plaintiff at Los Angeles. The evidence shows that Cyrus A. Hasty arranged with plaintiff for the shipment, and that the cases were to be put in a warehouse belonging to defendant upon arrival and a warehouse receipt issued to plaintiff. The latter expected they would be so warehoused as to make it possible for Hasty to display the rugs to prospective customers, and, if a sale was made, Hasty was to get a delivery order from plaintiff, it being understood that the rugs would be sold for cash, or, if on credit, it was to be subject to plaintiff's approval of the purchaser. Hasty was to pay the storage charges, under his verbal arrangement with plaintiff. Pursuant to this plan, Hasty conducted the negotiations with defendant under which the warehousing was done. In some way not disclosed by the evidence, but evidently with plaintiff's consent, in view of the fact that the goods were consigned to it and the bill of lading was its own, Hasty warehoused the goods on March 6, 1925, in accordance with his verbal agreement with plaintiff, without notice to defendant that plaintiff was the owner of the shipment. The "in sheet" of defendant shows that the rugs were received from Cyrus A. Hasty & Co., and presumably were stored for such company. The next day, however, a warehouse receipt was issued covering the rugs and delivered to Hasty, showing that they were received in storage by defendant "for the account of Dodwell & Company, Ltd., pledgee, Ex Cyrus A. Hasty & Co." The rugs were stored, so that they could be displayed, in a room designated as No. 533, in which room Hasty had theretofore officed and which was in a part of the warehouse where offices were rented by various parties. In some way unknown to either plaintiff or defendant, except in one instance disclosed by the evidence, the rugs were removed by Hasty from said room prior to January 6, 1926. On the latter date the original warehouse receipt was canceled by Mr. Berbower, who was the office manager of defendant, and who passed away prior to the date of trial. The evidence shows that it was mailed to Los Angeles by plaintiff on January 4, 1926. On January 6 defendant's general manager was told by representatives of plaintiff that the rugs had been stolen from the warehouse and sold by Hasty, and upon investigation defendant found that they had been removed. Hasty was not present at the trial, and apparently was desired as a witness by both parties. Defendant did not know until January 6, 1926, that plaintiff was the owner of the rugs.

The complaint contained two counts, the first for damages for failure to deliver the goods as provided in said warehouse receipt and the second for damages for conversion of the goods stored.

Defendant, in addition to a general denial of the matters alleged in the complaint, alleged as separate defenses that in storing and safeguarding the rugs in question it at all times exercised such care and diligence as a reasonable and careful owner of similar goods would have exercised under the same circumstances, that in employing its servants and agents it made diligent inquiry as to their honesty and integrity, and that to the best of its knowledge during the period such rugs were so stored it had only honest and faithful employees, who carefully and prudently looked after and cared for them.

The court's findings are very voluminous, but among them are the following: "VIII. During all the time said rugs were stored with defendant they were kept in defendant's warehouse in a locked room, access to which could be gained only by unlocking the door thereof with a key securely kept in the possession of the defendant, and it had instructed its employees not to allow said Cyrus A. Hasty, or any person or persons other than employees of defendant, to enter said room unless accompanied by one or more of defendant's employees. That defendant's employees were instructed by defendant not to inspect or handle any goods stored with the defendant, except in the ordinary course of business, and defendant never, at any time, had any knowledge of any violation of any instructions; and in the storing and safeguarding of said goods defendant at all times exercised such care and diligence as a reasonable and careful owner of similar goods would have exercised under the same or similar circumstances. IX. In employing its servants and agents, defendant at all times made diligent inquiry as to the honesty and integrity of such applicants, and, to the best of defendant's knowledge, it had in its employ during said period from March 6, 1925, to January 6, 1926, honest and faithful employees only."

Many points are urged by appellant as error, questioning various findings as not supported by the evidence, among which is finding No. VIII quoted above. In our opinion, if there is evidence supporting such finding, the judgment must be affirmed, even though we might conclude that other findings had no such support or were otherwise improper.

[1] Defendant, both by its answer and in the evidence produced by it, took upon itself the burden of proving that the rugs were not taken from the warehouse by reason of its negligence, and we are of the opinion that it properly had such burden by reason of the production of the warehouse receipt introduced in evidence and the fact that defendant did not have the rugs to deliver when the receipt was surrendered to it. Such proof would seem to make a prima facie case under the first cause of action alleged, as no showing was even attempted that the deliveries were made on the order of plaintiff or upon production of such receipt, which the evidence shows remained at all times in plaintiff's possession from shortly after its issuance until it was mailed to Los Angeles on January 4, 1926.

In placing the rugs in a room where they could be displayed to prospective customers, defendant carried out the arrangement made between Hasty and the plaintiff. Mr. Turner, defendant's general manager, testified that the display room was kept locked and the key to it retained in Mr. Berbower's desk in defendant's main office; that Hasty did not have a key to the room, and that, in order to enter such room, it was necessary for him "to get in touch with Mr. Berbower, who would send a man with him with a key, and they would go to the room and open it up"; that he knew of no instance when Mr. Hasty was not compelled to go through that procedure to obtain access to the room; that their instruction to employees was that no one was to be allowed in any of the buildings without one of the employees being with them; that the only keys that he knew of to the room in question were one "with the night janitor; there would be a key with the superintendent and I carry a pass key, and the original key"; and that the original key was "kept in Mr. Berbower's desk." The witness also testified that there was one window in the room opening on a sheer drop of five stories; that there was no fire escape nor any ladder or other means of gaining access to the room other than through the doors and window; that a day and night watchman were kept on duty at the warehouse; that at the time the rugs were in storage a watchman was maintained so that people could not get onto the fifth floor, where the rugs were, without the knowledge of the watchman; that during such period the first floor of the building was occupied by the Los Angeles Furniture Mart, and no one could get in or out of the building unless they had an office there and were known to the telephone operator or the manager on the first floor, or unless they came through the main office at 315 Commercial street; that the Los Angeles Furniture Mart closed its office about 6 p. m., when the night watchman locked the door, both inside and out; that it was not possible for any one to enter the building through the first floor. Turner further stated that he had no knowledge of any of the employees being dishonest, and that it never came to his attention that any of the goods in question had been stolen from the warehouse or removed until January 6, 1926.

The superintendent of defendant testified that, while that portion of its building in which room 533 is located was used by the public, everyone was required to have an order, whether a tenant or whether it was a storage account, before removing anything from the building; that any one who wanted to see the various tenants, at that time, could not go up the elevator entering from San Pedro street at all; that during the day one or more persons were on duty in the lobby all of the time until 5:30 p. m., when the place was "locked up"; that the Los Angeles Furniture Mart was operated by defendant, and its watchman and clerical employees were in the employ of defendant. The witness also said that he had no personal knowledge of any goods ever having been lost through theft except the rugs in question and in 1926, when the watchman was bound and gagged and some six or seven hundred cases of whiskey were taken.

The finding as to the diligence used by defendant in selecting its servants and agents and as to the employees being honest and faithful is not questioned, and the evidence seems to support it. It is true that one witness, a tenant of the building by the name of Hartog, testified that he went with Hasty to room 533, and that on his first visit he entered through a connecting door from room 531, which was next to it, and that he bought one of the rugs from Hasty and carried it out through the hall door of room 533 and out of the building without being questioned. The witness also testified that he had frequently been in room 531, and that the door opening into room 533 "was open most of the time"; also that he had observed other tenants on the fifth floor going out with bundles, and had not seen them stopped, and that on other occasions he himself had carried "samples or small packages" out of the building. He was asked: "Were you ever stopped?" to which he replied: "No; I was a tenant and everybody knew me." A witness who worked for the occupant of room 531 testified that Mr. Hasty had room 533 for a while, but could not remember whether it was in 1923, 1924, or 1925; that there was a roll of rugs against the wall, but she did not know what kind they were; also some pongee silk; that the door between the rooms was left open on numerous occasions, and she answered Mr. Hasty's telephone calls during his absence; that the latter had a desk in his room; that she never saw him carrying any goods out of the room, although she had seen him in the room alone. No witness testified to removing or seeing any rugs removed except Mr. Hartog.

[2] We have not attempted to refer to all of the evidence which tends to support finding No. VIII, but we cannot say that such finding is unsupported, although there is very persuasive evidence conflicting therewith. It is no part of our duty, however, to weigh the evidence, and, as we cannot say that the trial court could not draw the inference which it did in the finding referred to, from the evidence in the case, there seems to be nothing for us to consider. *Runkle v. Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Martha J. Lane against Walter H. McAlpine and Minnie M. McAlpine. Judgment for plaintiff, and the last-named defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; SEAWELL and SHENK, JJ., dissenting.

Warren Steel and Homer Lingenfelter, both of Marysville, for appellant.

Rich & Weis, of Marysville, for respondent.

W. E. Davies, of Marysville, for defendant Walter H. McAlpine.

PRESTON, P. J.

Plaintiff, Martha J. Lane, brought this action against the defendants Walter H. McAlpine and Minnie M. McAlpine, his wife, to recover rental of a certain house used as a residence by said defendants in the city of Marysville.

The action was tried by the court without a jury, and resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $1,077 against both defendants. The judgment also provided that the separate property of the wife Minnie M. McAlpine was liable in satisfaction of said judgment. From this judgment, Mrs. Minnie M. McAlpine alone appeals.

The court found that the plaintiff rented the house in question "to each and both of said defendants, at their special instance and request, * * * and each of them agreed to and with plaintiff to pay plaintiff the sum of $75.00 per month for the rental of said house. * * *"

The court also found that the agreement to pay said rental was the personal contract of said appellant Minnie M. McAlpine as well as the personal contract of said defendant Walter H. McAlpine. The court further found that the money attached by plaintiff was money acquired by appellant Minnie M. McAlpine after her marriage "by devise or succession from the estate of her deceased mother."

[1, 2] The evidence as to who made the contract of hiring with plaintiff is conflicting. There is, however, substantial evidence in the record, which in and of itself will support the finding of the trial court. We must assume the court resolved the conflict in favor of plaintiff. Therefore, we will simply epitomize enough of the record to show that the findings have substantial support in the evidence given by plaintiff and her witnesses, which the court accepted as the true version of the transaction between the parties.

Mrs. Lauritzen, a daughter of plaintiff, testified that Mr. McAlpine came to see her in Sacramento and inquired if her mother's house in Marysville was going to be vacant. Mrs. Lauritzen replied that the home was vacant and for rent. Thereupon McAlpine stated: "I will tell you, I will have to take it up with my wife because she is the one that is renting the house and she is the one that is going to be in the house most of the time. * * * You know she wears the pants in our house." To this Mrs. Lauritzen said: "It is mother's house and she lives in Oakland, I think it would be best for mother to go over and see Mrs. McAlpine and talk with her, and I will write to my mother and tell her."

Mrs. Lane, the plaintiff and mother of Mrs. Lauritzen, testified that she called upon Mrs. McAlpine, who was at that time living in an apartment on Van Ness avenue in San Francisco, and had a conversation with her about renting the Marysville house, in which Mrs. McAlpine said: "She would rent the house and take good care of it. That the rent would be $75 per month payable in advance." Soon after this conversation, Mr. and Mrs. McAlpine moved from San Francisco to Marysville and took possession of the home in question, and remained there until the commencement of this action.

They both admit the rent was not paid, and that the amount claimed by plaintiff is the correct amount due her.

Appellant contends that the court erred in subjecting her separate property in satisfaction of said judgment. In support of this contention, learned counsel for appellant argue "that the evidence merely shows an ordinary contract for a family necessary in which there was no express agreement on the part of the wife to bind herself individually for the payment of the rent, nor any agreement on her part that her separate property acquired from the estate of her mother should be so bound."

[3,4] The general rule is that upon the husband is imposed the duty to maintain his wife and children, and, where the wife living with her husband obtains on credit shelter or supplies needed in the conduct of this common domestic enterprise, she is his agent and incurs no personal liability.

[5] There is, however, a well-recognized exception to this general rule, and it is this: Where the proof is clear and convincing that the wife, although living with her husband, contracted the debt in her own behalf, or intended to bind her separate property for its payment, she will be held personally liable, even though the debt be for necessities of life for herself and husband while living together. Chaffee v. Browne, 109 Cal. 211, 41 P. 1028.

[6,7] Counsel also insists that the proof in the case at bar falls far short of being of that "clear and convincing character" necessary to show that Mrs. McAlpine agreed to pay the rent. The rule, however, is well settled that in a case of this character, as in others, the question whether the proof is sufficiently strong and convincing is primarily addressed to the trial court, and this court must accept the determination of the trial court thereon as conclusive. Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 334, 27 P. 186; Coutts v. Winston, 153 Cal. 688, 96 P. 357; Wadleigh v. Phelps, 149 Cal. 637, 87 P. 93; Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Ingersoll, 158 Cal. 474, 111 P. 360, 364; Grass v. Rindge Co., 84 Cal. App. 750-771, 258 P. 673; Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 228 P. 45; Steinberger v. Young, 175 Cal. 81, 165 P. 432; De Kahn v. Chase, 177 Cal. 281, 170 P. 608; Estate of Pepper, 158 Cal. 619, 112 P. 62, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092.

In Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Ingersoll, supra, on this question, the court said: "The rule 'does not mean that the evidence in the record must be entirely plain and convincing to an appellate court. * * * It will not disturb the finding of the trial court * * * where there is substantial evidence warranting a clear and satisfactory conviction to that effect.' Wadleigh v. Phelps, 149 Cal. 637, 87 P. 93. We cannot here give a statement of all the evidence upon which the trial court gave its decision. It was doubtless based in part on the demeanor of the defendant as a witness on the trial. It is sufficient to say that we cannot say that the trial court disregarded this rule in making its findings."

[8,9] Appellant apparently admits that the joint and several judgment rendered against herself and husband was proper, but contends said judgment should have been restricted in its application to conform to the limitations of section 171 of the Civil Code.

The difficulty of this position is that under the evidence the trial court has found that Mrs. McAlpine should be charged for the rent upon her own contract, irrespective of her husband's liability, and irrespective of said section 171. Wisnom v. McCarthy, 48 Cal. App. 697, 192 P. 337; Ackley v. Maggi, 86 Cal. App. 631, 261 P. 311.

Under section 158 of the Civil Code, Mrs. McAlpine had power to contract to pay the rent of the house in question, whether it be considered a necessary or not, and, the court having found upon conflicting evidence that she did agree to rent the house and pay the rent therefor, such finding is conclusive on appeal. Therefore, by these findings, the case at bar is removed from the limitations prescribed in section 171 of the Civil Code, as construed in the case of Evans v. Noonan, 20 Cal. App. 288, 128 P. 794.

[10] As above stated, the court found that the defendants and each of them agreed to pay the rent. Therefore, there is no merit in the contention of appellant that there is no finding that "she expressly agreed to pay the rent." Under the finding, the obligation is made several as well as joint, and under a joint and several obligation each of the obligees is individually liable. Plaintiff might have sued only Mrs. McAlpine. This has long been the rule in California. Stearns v. Aguirre, 6 Cal. 176; Callahan v. Danziger, 32 Cal. App. 405, 163 P. 65; Wisnom v. McCarthy, supra; section 414, Code Civ. Proc.

We think the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. CLAPPER.

Cr. 122.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

July 30, 1931.

1. Forgery  $\S$ 44(1/2).

Evidence held to support conviction of forgery by issuing check knowing it to be forged.

2. Criminal law  $\S$ 829(1).

Refusing instruction, pertinent parts of which were covered in court's instruction, held not error.

3. Criminal law  $\S$ 823(6).

In prosecution for forgery, instruction complained of, considered with other instructions, held sufficient to cover question whether signing of checks had been authorized.

The court instructed that, in a crime of the nature involved, certain elements were necessary to be established, and, before jury could convict defendant, they must decide certain questions, one of which was whether defendant knew that he had no authority to sign name of other persons to checks.

4. Criminal law  $\S$ 822(1).

Instruction complained of must be read and considered with all other instructions.

5. Criminal law  $\S$ 763, 764(13).

In prosecution for forgery, court's instruction, including statement that acts constituting crime could be proved by circumstances, held not erroneous as being on weight of evidence.

The court instructed that to warrant conviction the proof need not be the direct evidence of persons who saw the offense committed, but that acts constituting the crime could be proved by circumstances, and that circumstantial evidence was legal and competent in criminal cases, and, if it was of such character as to exclude every reasonable hypothesis other than that the defendant was guilty, it was entitled to same weight as direct testimony.

6. Forgery  $\S$ 34(2).

In prosecution for forgery, no variance existed between information and proofs that defendant had no authority from any persons with similar names to sign checks.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

T. C. Clapper was convicted of forgery, and was also found to have suffered three prior convictions of a felony, and he appeals.

Burns & Watkins, of Fresno, for appellant.

BARNARD, P. J.

The defendant was charged with two separate crimes of forgery, as alleged in two counts of an information filed by the district attorney of Fresno county. The first count charges that on or about October 18, 1930, with the intent to defraud, the defendant falsely uttered, forged, and passed a check, a copy of which is set forth, purporting to be a check on the Fresno Branch of the Bank of America, payable to cash, for $7, and signed "W. B. More," knowing the same to be altered and forged. In the second count it is charged that with intent to defraud, he uttered, forged, and passed a check dated October 24, 1930, a copy of which is set forth, drawn on the Fresno Branch of the Bank of Italy, payable to cash, for $6, and signed "H. H. Haropp," knowing the same to be altered and forged. He is further charged with three prior convictions. By the verdict of a jury, he was found guilty on both counts of the information, and was also found to have suffered three prior convictions of a felony, as set forth in the information. This appeal is from the judgment which followed, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

[1] The first point raised is that the evidence is not sufficient to support the judgment. Appellant maintains that the only evidence upon the subject of his guilt is the following: W. B. Moore, long a resident of Fresno, testified that the signature on the check was not his; that he had never authorized any person to sign his name thereto; that he knew no other person of his name in the county of Fresno; and that he had never known the defendant. R. R. Haropp, an old resident of Fresno, testified that he knew no person in Fresno named H. H. Haropp, and that the only other person by that name in that vicinity was his father, A. R. Haropp. There was evidence that neither of the banks named in the information had a checking account in the name of W. B. More or H. H. Haropp at any time within several years. There was the evidence of a handwriting expert that both checks were written by the defendant, and that the only attempt to disguise the handwriting was one word in the second check, which the expert stated might have been caused by a change in position of the writer. The appellant himself testified as follows:

"I first saw that check, filed as Plaintiff's Exhibit 1 in the room 26 of the Salvation Army Hotel, on the night of the 17th of October, 1930. I wrote the check and signed it. I did it by the instructions of witness Dant and another gentleman. I did not know who that other gentleman was. He said his name was W. B. More. I never saw him before and have not since seen him. I do not know where he is now. It looked suspicious to me on account of the transaction which came up over some liquor, that is what the check was given for. The witness Dant gave him the liquor for the check. The liquor was in two jugs. I have been in jail and never looked for this man More.

"The other check, Exhibit No. 2, I wrote and signed it. There were two men together. The witness Dant brought them into my room. The witness Osburn and Cal Nance and Coon Dog Benson were there. They were all pretty full. This man gave Dant the check for the booze—two jugs. They took the booze and went out. Dant and Osburn said it would be all right. I found out there was something wrong about the checks when I was arrested. I wrote the name of H. H. Haropp to that second check. He said that was his name. I had no way of knowing whether he had an account at the bank—I never saw him before. I did not know there was anything crooked about the matter. If I had known his name was not H. H. Haropp, I would not have written it."

Appellant argues that it thus conclusively appears that he signed the names of W. B. More and H. H. Haropp to the respective checks at the request and in the presence of persons who claim to be those parties respectively, and that this does not constitute forgery in the absence of proof that he knew that the names these persons gave were not their true names, nor unless it appears that he knew that such persons did not have sufficient funds in the respective banks to meet the checks.

We find, however, considerable other evidence in the record. Carl Christensen testified that he ran a cigar store in Fresno and cashed the first check for the appellant on October 18, 1930; that he and Dant came to the store together, and appellant asked him to cash the check for him; that Dant told him appellant roomed at his home, and he told them that, if Dant would indorse the check, he would cash it; and that Dant indorsed the check and he gave the appellant the money, which he put in his pocket. He also testified that later he cashed the other check in about the same manner; that Dant accompanied the appellant to his store; that appellant had the check; and that, at his request, Dant indorsed the check, which he cashed. He further testified that both checks were returned to him, and subsequently another party took up the $7 check, paying him that amount, and Dant took up the $6 check, paying him that amount. Dant testified that the first time he ever saw the first check was in Christensen's store when the appellant was trying to cash it; that he told Christensen appellant was rooming at his house, and Christensen asked him to indorse the check; that he did so; and that Christensen gave the money to appellant, and he put it in his pocket. He further testified that a few days later, the appellant asked him again to "O. K." a check for him, telling him the signer was a business man there and that the check was good; that he indorsed the other check here involved, and Christensen gave the money to appellant; that later, when Christensen told him the checks were no good, he himself took up one and another man took up the other. He testified that he did not see the defendant write either of the checks; that he knew nothing of a man named W. B. Moore being present on the occasion when the appellant testified the first check was signed; that appellant brought the second check there already written; and that the appellant had tried to get him to cash the second check before taking it to Christensen, telling him the check was in payment for whisky which he had sold to the party signing it. He further testified that the defendant left Fresno on October 27, 1930; that the defendant had been staying at his place, and had promised to make the two checks good; that on October 27 the defendant told him that he would leave his outfit there while he went to Visalia to collect some money, and that he would come back and make the checks good; that ten minutes later he saw the defendant come out with his grip and run around the corner; and that he immediately phoned to the district attorney. There is evidence that two men came from the district attorney's office, and with Dant hunted for the defendant. Also that the defendant went to Los Angeles on that day, and later was brought back by an officer from Montebello, Cal. A police officer testified that on November 5, 1930, the defendant told him he did not remember writing the checks. Another officer testified that, while he was returning him from Montebello, the defendant stated that he had issued these checks while intoxicated.

If it is conceded, as argued by appellant, that the mere writing of a check for another at his request is not forgery, such a situation does not conclusively appear from the evidence. The jury may well have refused to believe the story told by appellant. To believe that Dant turned over liquor to a stranger, and accepted, in payment therefor, a check written and signed for the stranger by this helpful individual who had never seen the stranger before, the check not only being written in the presence of Dant, but actually at his suggestion, calls for a high degree of credulity. Perhaps the jury recognized the "mysterious stranger" who is omnipresent in liquor cases. In addition, there is ample evidence that the check was not written under the circumstances testified to by appellant. The evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict, nor more than a conflict appearing, at best.

[2] Error is next claimed in the refusal of the trial court to give certain instructions offered. It is first claimed that the court erred in refusing an instruction, which, after setting forth what was claimed by the prosecution in reference to the first count of the information, and what was claimed by the defendant in reference to that count, concluded as follows: "And the jury are instructed that if the said check for $7 was drawn by defendant, at the request of a person then and there representing himself to be W. B. Moore, and at the request of that person wrote his name, or what that person claimed to be his name, W. B. Moore, to that check, believing him to be named W. B. Moore, and not knowing that W. B. Moore did not have a checking account or credit at that bank, then, and in that event, the making and the signing of the said check would be of the said person so claiming to be W. B. Moore, and would not be the act of defendant, and in such case defendant would not be guilty of forgery."

And also another instruction which, after setting forth what was claimed by the prosecution in reference to the second count of the information, and what was claimed by the defendant in reference to the same count, concluded as follows: "If it be true that the instrument described as the first act of forgery by defendant was written by him at the request of and in the presence or by the direction of a person then representing himself to be named W. B. Moore, and if it be further true that the said person was then a stranger to defendant and the said instrument was written by defendant at the request of said stranger and in his presence, and the name he represented himself to have, W. B. Moore, was written thereto in his presence, and at his request and direction, then the drawing, uttering, signing and delivery of that check would be the act of the person so requesting the same to be written, and defendant in such case would not be guilty of forgery."

It is apparent that the concluding part of this second instruction mistakenly referred to Moore instead of Haropp. We think no error is shown. Aside from the other objections, we should hesitate to approve the proposition that a person is justified in writing and signing a check for a stranger, even at his request, without some excuse or reason therefor, and without knowledge of facts that could justify such procedure. In addition, the pertinent parts of the requested instructions are covered in an instruction given by the court, to the effect that, if they should find that the defendant had authority to sign the check, they should find him not guilty.

[3, 4] Appellant complains of the following instructions, which were given by the court:

"In a crime of this nature, certain elements are necessary to be established, and certain questions must be decided by you as jurors. In this case before you can convict the defendant:

"First, were the checks which are set out in the information executed, created or made by defendant?

"Second, was the defendant authorized by W. B. Moore or H. H. Haropp, to so execute, create or make the checks?

"Third, did defendant know that he had no authority to sign the name of W. B. Moore or H. H. Haropp?

"Fourth, were the checks, as executed, created or made, passed by the defendant knowing the same to have been executed, created or made without authority?

"Fifth, did the defendant have the intent to defraud some person, either at the time he executed, created or made the checks, or at the time he passed the checks, if you find that he either endorsed or passed them, or both?

"If you find that the prosecution has established these elements by proof which convinces you beyond a reasonable doubt, and to a moral certainty, then I instruct you that it is your duty to convict the defendant."

It is claimed that these instructions exclude the idea that any other persons of similar names had authorized the making and signing of the checks. The appellant admitted writing and signing the checks, and the only question raised by his defense was his authority so to do. That issue was submitted to the jury under appropriate instructions. The instruction here complained of must be read with all of the others, and, taken together, they were sufficient to cover the question as to whether the writing and signing of the checks had been authorized by any persons named Moore and Haropp.

[5] It is next claimed that the court erred in giving the following instruction: "The Court further instructs the jury that while they must be convinced of the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt, from the evidence in the case in order to warrant a conviction, still the proof need not be the direct evidence of persons who saw the offense committed. The acts constituting the crime may be proved by circumstances. In other words, there are two classes of evidence recognized and admitted in courts of justice upon either of which jurors may lawfully find an accused guilty of crime. One is direct and positive testimony of any eye witness to the commission of the crime, and the other is proof of a chain of circumstances pointing sufficiently strongly to the commission of the crime by the defendant and which is known as circumstantial evidence. Such evidence may consist of statements by defendant, plans laid for the commission of the crime, in short, any acts, declarations or circumstances admitted in evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime. It is essential that in the chain of evidence relied upon each fact be established to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt.

"You are further instructed that circumstantial evidence is legal and competent in criminal cases, and if it is of such a character as to exclude every reasonable hypothesis other than that the defendant is guilty, it is entitled to the same weight as direct testimony."

It is insisted that this was an erroneous instruction upon the weight of the evidence. Appellant relies upon the case of People v. Vereneseneckockockhoff, 129 Cal. 497, 58 P. 156, 62 P. 111. In that case, an instruction that circumstantial evidence is not likely to be fabricated, taken in connection with the other circumstances shown, was held to be improper. In a number of other cases it has been held that it is not reversible error to instruct the jury that there is nothing in the nature of circumstantial evidence making it less reliable than other classes of testimony, where the instruction, considered with the rest of the charge, merely means that a verdict may be based upon circumstantial evidence, as well as on direct evidence, where the same is sufficiently convincing. People v. Wilson, 23 Cal. App. 513, 138 P. 971; People v. Watts, 198 Cal. 776, 247 P. 884, 892. In the last case cited, in referring to an expression somewhat similar to that used here, the court said: "The court's statement that the facts referred to in the instructions might be established 'as satisfactorily and as conclusively by circumstantial as by direct evidence,' when read in connection with the whole charge, amounted to no more than a statement that circumstantial evidence is legal and competent, and that if the jurors found it to be sufficient to prove defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt they might accept it and act upon it just as if it were direct evidence. So construed, the instructions state the law correctly. People v. Tom Woo, 181 Cal. 331, 184 P. 389."

That language might well have been used in reference to the instruction here complained of. It may also be pointed out that the judgment here does not rest entirely upon circumstantial evidence for its support.

[6] The last point raised is, that there is a fatal variance between the allegations of the information and the proofs. This contention is based upon the claim that the judgment rests entirely upon the testimony of Moore and Haropp that they had never authorized the defendant to sign their names to the respective checks. While testimony to that effect was introduced, that was only a part of the people's case. There is ample other evidence, to the effect that the defendant had no authority from any other persons with similar names, to support the verdict.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to foreclose a mechanic's lien. The trial court made findings in favor of the defendants, and from a judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed.

In his complaint the plaintiff based his cause of action on a written contract employing him as architect. The indenture of employment, set forth as an exhibit, is dated January 22, 1929. In their answer the defendants inserted certain denials, and then they set forth certain affirmative defenses, and among others they pleaded that the written contract was modified and rescinded. The trial court made a finding in favor of the defendants on the issues presented by that affirmative defense. The plaintiff earnestly contends that said finding is not supported by the evidence that was introduced at the trial.

As early as 1927 the defendant L. F. Bollinger commenced the attempt of building a hospital in Richmond in Contra Costa county. At first he tried to organize a stock company and to issue $500,000 in stock. On that line he proceeded until it transpired that the proposition could not be put over, and he stopped all proceedings and refunded moneys received and was about to give up the project.

A little later the plaintiff called on him, and they discussed a modified project and ways and means. Following that conversation, the plaintiff drew up plans and specifications for a building that would cost approximately $140,000. It was a part of their plan that second mortgage notes should be issued to pay for the land on which the hospital was to be located and to pay the architect. On January 22, 1929, the plaintiff prepared, and thereafter he and Mr. Bollinger executed, a written contract by the terms of which Mr. Bollinger, as owner, employed the plaintiff, as architect, to build the hospital. Among other things, that instrument provided: "The Owner agrees to pay the Architect at the rate of six per cent, hereinafter called the basic rate, computed and payable as stated in the said conditions and to make any other payments and reimbursements arising out of the said conditions. Payments to be made as follows: $200.00 upon completion of Blue Prints & specifications including complete engineering plans. 50% of fee when available from receipt of Bank loan. Balance in 2nd Mortgage notes. These to be the first ones issued of the Series." On February 7, 1929, a written application for a loan of $75,000 was made to the Richmond branch of the American Trust Company. The bank denied the application, but offered to make a loan in the sum of $40,000. At about that time the plaintiff had attempted to interest Liebert & Trobeck as contractors. The contractors, the plaintiff, and Mr. Bollinger attended at a meeting at the bank, where they had an interview with Mr. Younce, the cashier. In that interview Mr. Younce stated to all of them that the bank loan would be available to pay for labor and material, but not to pay the fees of an architect, and that no part or portion of the loan could be used for any such purpose. Mr. Bollinger and Mr. Younce both testified that in that conversation the plaintiff stated that he would take stock in the Hospital Richmond in payment of his fees. As we understand the record, down to the time of said conversation, no property had actually been bought on which to build the hospital. But about that time a site was found available. On interviewing the owner of the land, it was found that he would make a conveyance thereof and accept a second mortgage in payment. After making some inquiry, Mr. Bollinger was able to negotiate a loan from his aunt for the additional sum of $10,000. At about this time the plaintiff stated to Mr. Bollinger: "Carry on, I will stick by you and will get through somehow." When the foregoing arrangements had all been made, the plaintiff proceeded to make modified plans and specifications, and thereafter the building was commenced in June, 1929. Soon after the building was commenced, Mr. Bollinger made a supplemental application to the corporation commissioner for permission to issue stock. Before doing so he stated to the plaintiff that the only way in which the plaintiff could be compensated would be for him to take stock in the corporation. The plaintiff stated in reply that before giving his consent he wanted to confer with his attorney. Mr. Bollinger testified that thereupon Mr. Sexton and he called on Mr. Jerome White, an attorney at law, in San Francisco, and stated the facts to Mr. White, and that Mr. White told Mr. Bollinger to proceed and make his application for permission to issue stock to the plaintiff in payment for his services. The application was made and granted. Thereafter, on August 15, 1929, three certificates of stock were issued in the name of the plaintiff. When Mr. Bollinger tendered them to the plaintiff, he hesitated about receiving them, and telephoned to Mr. White. When he hung up the telephone, the plaintiff asked Mr. Bollinger to go with him to Mr. White's office, which they did on September 12, 1929, and on arriving there left the certificates of stock with Mr. White's secretary, who, in the absence of Mr. White, delivered a receipt for the stock. About two weeks later that stock was returned to Mr. Bollinger by registered mail, and no communication accompanied it. On October 4th the plaintiff produced an escrow agreement and asked Mr. Bollinger to accompany him to the American Trust Company and there deposit the stock in escrow. That was done. On November 15, 1929, another certificate was issued to the plaintiff. On November 25th the plaintiff was needing money, and made an appeal to Mr. Bollinger for cash. As a result of that appeal, Mr. Bollinger offered to purchase four shares of the stock then in escrow. The offer was accepted, and the transfer was made. However, the other shares of stock were left in escrow, and, as we understand the record, are still in the possession of the American Trust Company. Thereafter, on January 27, 1930, the plaintiff commenced this action.

It is an admitted fact that the $200 payable to plaintiff "upon completion of blue prints and specifications" has been paid. Scanning the statement of facts hereinabove recited, we think it is clear that there was evidence that the parties modified and abandoned the written contract on which the plaintiff relies, and that the finding under attack is sustained by the evidence.

In their brief the defendants present certain other points. However, in view of what has been said above, it is unnecessary to discuss them.

The judgment is affirmed.

ment of one executrix named held not refusal to acquiesce in provisions of will, precluding their taking thereunder.

Facts disclosed that one of legatees who objected to appointment of additional executrix had already been appointed executrix, that objections to appointment of additional executrix were based on the fact that, because of appointment and qualification of first executrix appointed, court was without jurisdiction to appoint an additional executrix, and that by reason of appointment of first executrix without objection from the other executrix named in will, latter had waived any rights she might have had under will to be appointed coexecutor; that she was resident of state of Texas, and that her appointment would not be for best interests of estate.

In the matter of the estate of Simon Houston Blackburn, also known as S. H. Blackburn, deceased. Petition by George M. CONREY, P. J.

This appeal is from an order, the effect of which was to determine that Irene Blackburn and Lulu B. Spurling had forfeited their right to the legacies provided in the will of Simon Houston Blackburn to be bequeathed to them, by having filed objections to the appointment of one Grace B. Killough as one of the executors of said will.

Irene Blackburn, who had been named in the will as one of the executors, filed a petition for the probate of the will and for the issuance to herself of letters testamentary. In the will the testator appointed Grace B. Killough as the other executor. On December 9, 1929, the petition was duly heard and an order was entered admitting the said will to probate and appointing Irene Blackburn executrix. On the same day, after the making of the order appointing the said Irene Blackburn executor, Grace B. Killough filed a petition praying that she be appointed a joint executrix of the estate of said decedent. On the 20th day of December, 1929, Lulu B.

Legatees' objections to appointment of additional executrix named in will after appoint-

Spurling and Irene Blackburn filed objections in the superior court to the appointment of Grace B. Killough as executrix. These objections were overruled and an order was made appointing Grace B. Killough coexecutor of the estate of said deceased. On June 19, 1930, Irene Blackburn and Grace B. Killough, as executors of the last will of Simon Houston Blackburn, deceased, filed a petition for partial distribution, praying that $22,000 of the funds on hand be distributed to the legatees entitled thereto pursuant to the terms of the will. The court ordered partial distribution to all of the legatees except Irene Blackburn and Lulu B. Spurling, and continued the hearing as to the right of these two last-named persons to share in the distribution. Thereafter George M. Blackburn, one of the legatees, filed a petition to construe provisions of the will with respect to the right of Irene Blackburn and Lulu B. Spurling to receive any legacy or bequest thereunder. Thereupon, after due hearing of the matter, the court determined that Irene Blackburn and Lulu B. Spurling, pursuant to the provisions of the will of said deceased, had lost the right to recover any legacy or bequest under the will of said deceased by reason of having theretofore, in violation of the terms to the appointment of Grace B. Killough as and provisions of said will, filed an objection one of the executors.

The provisions of the will which are relied upon as authority for the court's order are found in articles 5 and 6 thereof. In article 5 the testator said: "By this my Last Will and Testament, I have disposed of my estate after due consideration of the respective needs and rights of all persons, and all benefits herein conferred in any manner whatsoever are conferred upon the express conditions that the legatees thereof acquiesce in this my Last Will and Testament and all provisions thereof, and in any or all codicil or codicils thereto, and any and all provisions in said codicil or codicils contained. * * *" Article 6 reads as follows: "If any beneficiary or legatee under this my Last Will and Testament, or any person who, if I died intestate, would be entitled to any part of my estate, either in his or her name or in the name of another, either directly or indirectly, or by procuring, aiding, or abetting another, contests, controverts, disputes or calls into question the validity of this my Last Will and Testament, or any provision contained therein, or any codicil or codicils thereto, such person or persons shall take nothing by reason of this my Last Will and Testament or any of its provisions, or any codicils thereto, but shall forfeit any right or claim thereunder and any portion of my estate to which any person opposing my Will would in any contingency be entitled and, if in said case any person or persons or such heir or heirs or any other person or persons whomsoever shall be lawfully determined to have a share of my estate, I give, devise and bequeath to such person or persons the sum of One Dollar ($1.00) and no more, in lieu of any other share or interest in my estate."

As before noted, Irene Blackburn of Escondido, Cal., and Grace B. Killough of Stephenville, Tex., were named in the will as executors thereof. On December 9, 1929, Irene Blackburn was appointed executrix in accordance with her petition. At that time Mrs. Killough had filed no application for appointment although she was present in court at the time; and it does not appear that she made any objection to the order. On the same day, however, Mrs. Killough filed a petition for appointment as coexecutor. When this petition came on for hearing, Irene Blackburn and Lulu B. Spurling objected to the appointment of Mrs. Killough upon certain grounds which in substance were: That by reason of the appointment and qualification of Irene Blackburn as executrix the court was without jurisdiction to appoint an additional executrix; that by reason of the appointment of Irene Blackburn as executrix in the manner above noted, and without objection from Mrs. Killough, the latter had waived any rights she might have had under the will to be appointed coexecutor; that Mrs. Killough is a resident of the state of Texas and that her appointment as such executrix would not be for the best interests of the estate, would cause confusion and delay in carrying out the probate of said will and the distribution of the property of the estate, and would materially add to the expense of the probate of the estate; and "that said Grace B. Killough has advised these objectors that she does not intend to give personal supervision to said estate, but intends to return to reside in said state of Texas."

[1-3] The order against which the appeal is directed cannot be sustained unless it be held that, by reason of the objections thus made to the appointment of Mrs. Killough as coexecutor, the said Irene Blackburn and said Lulu B. Spurling either refused to acquiesce in the testator's will and all provisions thereof, or in some manner called into question the validity of the will or of some provision contained therein. We need not enter into a discussion of the authorities which hold that forfeiture provisions relating to contests of wills are valid and permissible; and that in construing wills the court should seek to ascertain the real purpose which the testator sought to effectuate by the words of the will; or that the appointment of an executor is an important part of a will; or that a forfeiture clause should not be given any wider scope than the language used plainly requires. All these propositions may be conceded. It seems to us very clear that in making the objections which they did make, at the time and in the manner shown by the record, appellants Blackburn and Spurling did not in any manner call in question the will or the validity of any provisions thereof. If at the time of the admission of the will to probate and of the appointment of Blackburn as sole executrix, appellants Blackburn and Spurling had contested the right of Mrs. Killough to be appointed executrix, notwithstanding the provisions of the will naming her as such executrix, it may be that the making of such contest would have been such refusal to acquiesce in the terms of the will that the order declaring forfeiture of the contestants' right as legatees would have been sustained. But in fact at that time there was no application by Mrs. Killough, and apparently she was then consenting to the appointment of Blackburn without asking for her own appointment as coexecutor. We are of the opinion that the subsequent objections made by appellants in opposition to the later application of Mrs. Killough, such objections being made at the time and under the circumstances and on the grounds above noted, may not reasonably be held to constitute a refusal to acquiesce in the provisions of the will. It follows that appellants have not lost their right to share as legatees in the property of decedent's estate.

The order is reversed.

Reviewing court must presume that order granting new trial in will contest was not based on insufficiency of testimony, where order did not so indicate (Code Civ. Proc. § 657).

2. Wills ⇨337.

Where contestants argued that will was unnatural because ignoring testator's brother and giving comparatively small legacy to niece, erroneous instruction suggesting that will was not unnatural justified new trial.

It appeared that by will in controversy, testator, with exception of small legacy to niece and life income to widow, left entire estate to charitable institution, and instructions in question stated that under California law, testator could not leave more than one-third of estate to charitable society, and that since every one is presumed to know law, jury must find that testator knew that only one-third of his estate would go to charity, which perhaps caused jury to believe that contestants were amply provided for, and hence induced jury improperly to discredit testimony tending to show that disposition of estate was unnatural and that testator was incompetent, which was issue that contestants were in fact trying.

[1] This is an appeal from an order granting a motion for a new trial in a will contest where the jury found in favor of the proponent on the issue of incompetency. The order does not indicate that it was granted on account of the insufficiency of the testimony, and therefore under the provisions of section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure we must indulge the presumption that the order was not based upon that ground.

The respondents direct our attention to two instructions given by the trial judge which they say were erroneously given and which justify the order appealed from. They read as follows:

⇨For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

"You are instructed that under the laws of this state a testator leaving legal heirs may not leave more than one-third of his estate to any charitable or benevolent society or corporation, and if he attempts to do so, all over the one-third shall go to the residuary legatees, next of kin, or heirs, according to law."

"You are instructed that every person is presumed to know the law and if you find from the evidence that the testator was of sound and disposing mind at the time he made the will or the codicil thereto, you must find that he knew that under the terms of his will as modified by the codicil thereto the Philadelphia Home for Incurables would take but one-third of his estate at the death of his wife, and that his brother, or his heirs would take one-third, and that his niece or her heirs would take one-third, unless by the preponderance of the evidence introduced in the case you are satisfied in your mind that the contrary was true."

[2, 3] There were two instruments, the one dated November 7, 1928, and being the will of decedent, and the other a codicil thereto executed November 13, 1928. They had been admitted to probate prior to the contest. By their provisions the deceased left his entire estate, with the exception of $5,000 given to contestant Miriam Mickley by the codicil, to the Fidelity Philadelphia Trust Company, in trust for the purposes of paying the income therefrom to his widow, Wylma Mickley, for the term of her life, and upon her death the principal, together with accruing rents and profits, to be paid over to the Philadelphia Home for Incurables. The codicil, in addition to the legacy mentioned, changed the executor from the Fidelity-Philadelphia Trust Company to the Citizens' National Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles, and also declared that testator was a resident of California. In this state of affairs it was one of the arguments of the contestants to convince the jury that testator was not of sound mind at the times in question, that these wills were unnatural, i. e., that no provision was made for the natural object of decedent's bounty, his brother, Albert J. Mickley, and only the $5,000 legacy to his niece Miriam Mickley, the daughter of a deceased brother, out of an estate approximating $250,000. On the other hand, appellant introduced a conversation in which one of counsel for appellant and the one who drew the will and codicil for the testator informed Mr. Mickley that under the law of California the Philadelphia Home for Incurables could take only one-third of his estate and that the other two-thirds would go to his brother and niece. In appellant's brief it is said that the instructions quoted were proposed by it "to show that the will and codicil were not unnatural." Herein lies the very vice of the instructions. Appellant was desirous of and for the time being succeeded in securing the judge to assist it in making the argument that the will and codicil were not unnatural. The question of whether the philanthropic institution should take or the contestants should take was not in issue, and evidently in granting the new trial the judge was of the opinion that as a comment upon the fact, they must have had an effect upon the jury, perhaps causing them to believe that contestants were amply provided for, and hence inducing them to improperly discredit testimony tending to support the case of contestants upon the issue they were, in fact, trying. It must be apparent that we are not able to appreciate as thoroughly as could the trial judge the influence these instructions may have had upon the jury. He was familiar with the atmosphere of the trial and unless it be apparent that he was in error we ought not to disturb his ruling.

[4] It is obvious, therefore, that the order should not be reversed unless, as it is argued by appellant, there was not sufficient evidence adduced by the respondents to warrant the case being submitted to the jury. But it is manifest that the evidence in this regard was sufficient. The testator entered the Good Samaritan Hospital on October 28, 1928, and remained there until his death on December 24, 1928. The day nurse testified that during all of the time he was there he was in a stuporous or semicomatose condition, although along toward the latter part of November he was a little better. The night nurse gave virtually the same testimony, saying, however, that his condition improved a bit after the first month. The attending physician, Dr. Gibbs, testified that in his opinion the patient was of unsound mind on November 7th and November 13th. Dr. Fishbaugh also testified that in his opinion the patient was of unsound mind on the 6th and 7th of November, and that his condition remained about stationary for two or three weeks thereafter. There are other details tending to confirm this testimony which it is unnecessary to set down, because it is obvious that the issue of incompetency was properly submitted to the jury. Other questions raised require no discussion.

Order affirmed.

BARNARD, P. J.

The defendant was jointly charged with one Clarence R. Wilson in an indictment returned by the grand jury of San Diego county with the violation of the Corporate Securities Act of the state of California. The indictment contained three counts. The material part of the first count may be thus abbreviated: "That the said Robert L. Stewart and Clarence R. Wilson * * * did wilfully, unlawfully, knowingly and feloniously sell, offer for sale * * * to Hulda C. Holmquist * * * 3050 units * * * of the California Land Buyers Syndicate, a Delaware corporation for a consideration other than cash * * * in nonconformity with and with intent to violate the provisions of the Amended Permit dated April 9, 1928, issued to said corporation by the Commissioner of Corporations of the State of California. * * *

The second count, in about the same language, charged a similar sale of 667 units of the same stock to William B. Gross. The third count similarly charged a sale of 1,000 units to I. W. and Vitulia E. Randall. The two defendants were tried together, the jury finding Wilson not guilty on all counts and Stewart not guilty on the first count and guilty on the second and third counts. The court denied a motion for a new trial, and this appeal is from that order and from the judgment.

It appears from the evidence that the California Land Buyers' Syndicate was organized under the laws of the state of Delaware, and that it filed its articles in the office of the secretary of state in California and also in the office of the county clerk of San Diego county, where its principal place of business was located. The principal purpose of the company was to buy, sell, and deal in real estate. On July 1, 1926, a permit was issued to the company by the commissioner of corporations of the state of California, authorizing it to sell and issue certain of its shares of stock, as follows: "1st—To sell and issue 40,000 shares of its investment shares and 40,000 shares of its common stock, in units of one investment share and one common share, at and for the selling price of $26.00 per unit, cash, lawful money of the United States, for the uses and purposes recited in its application."

On April 9, 1928, an amended permit was issued by the commissioner of corporations, authorizing it to sell certain remaining stock "at and for the price of $30 per unit, cash, lawful money of the United States, for the uses and purposes recited in its application." The defendant was regularly licensed as a security salesman in the state of California. From the organization of this corporation he acted as its fiscal agent and, as such, had direct supervision over the sale of its stock, receiving a commission of 20 per cent. on all sales of stock made by the company. He also had charge of the office of the syndicate, with several employees working under him. The other defendant, Wilson, was a licensed real estate salesman and in charge of the real estate department of the syndicate.

In reference to the Gross transaction, involved in the second count of the indictment, it appears that in July, 1929, Gross was the owner of a certain parcel of real property in San Diego, for which he was asking $25,000. He took the matter up with Wilson, who examined the property and appraised its value at from $18,000 to $20,000. Gross went to the office of the company and discussed the proposed transaction with the appellant, who told him that the syndicate had paid 10 per cent. dividends and had money to pay more, and showed him stacks of dividend checks being made out for delivery to the stockholders. Gross signed a letter addressed to Wilson offering to sell his land to the syndicate for $20,000, or "accept 667 units in California Land Buyers securities both investment and common for the above described property." This letter was handed to appellant and by him presented to the board of directors. The directors adopted a resolution to buy the Gross property at the price of $20,000. The appellant informed Gross that when the deal was completed he would receive the shares of stock in the company. Gross signed a stock subscription agreeing to purchase 667 units of stock in the syndicate for the sum of $20,010. An escrow was opened with a title company, Gross depositing a deed conveying his property to the syndicate, with instructions to record it upon the payment of $20,000. The syndicate deposited in this escrow its check for $20,000, with instructions to deliver the check to Gross upon the receipt of a deed for the property. Upon the closing of the escrow the appellant delivered to Gross 667 units of this stock. At the same time the appellant laid the $20,000 syndicate check before Gross and said: "Now in order to make this legal you will have to sign the back of this check." Thereupon Gross indorsed the $20,000 syndicate check and delivered it to appellant, together with $10 in currency. Appellant deposited this $20,000 check in his own account in the First National Bank, and gave his own check to the syndicate for $20,000 in payment for the stock. It further appears that, at the time of the presentation of the $20,000 check payable to Gross, the syndicate's balance in the bank amounted only to $404.26, aside from the credit afforded by appellant's $20,000 check, which had been deposited to that account. It also appears that, at the time of the presentation of the $20,000 check drawn in favor of the syndicate, Stewart's balance in the bank was insufficient to cover that check without the credit afforded by the $20,000 credit of the syndicate check, which had been deposited to his account.

In the Randall transaction, covered by the third count of the indictment, a similar situation appears. It was agreed that the syndicate would purchase from the Randalls certain real property owned by them in San Diego for $30,500, and the Randalls agreed to purchase 1,000 units of stock in the syndicate at the price of $30 per unit. Randall signed a stock subscription for 1,000 units, and an escrow was opened. The checks were handled in the same manner as in the Gross transaction. At the time the company's check was issued for $30,500, its bank balance was only $87.36. At the time Stewart's check was issued for $30,000, his bank balance was $35.62.

These figures are exclusive of the deposit in each account of the other check.

[1] Appellant first urges that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence. It is earnestly urged that these transactions were, in fact, cash sales, within the meaning of the terms of the permit. Appellant says: "The real question is does the evidence show that they were in truth and fact cash transactions, or does it show that they were exchanges of real property for stock." It is urged that in modern business usage, checks are equivalent to cash, and also that, since each party to the transaction received what he desired, no harm was done. Conceding that in modern business checks are frequently used in lieu of cash, and also that, under many circumstances, they may be considered equivalent to cash when they are covered by sufficient funds actually in the bank upon which they are drawn, a different situation is here shown. It fully appears that there was nothing behind either one of these checks except the other check, which was itself worthless. In fact, four sales are represented in these two transactions for a total of over $100,000, and the only real money or real credit used is the $10 in currency. While it may be said that each party received what he wanted, the entire transaction is a trade, both in fact and effect. As was said in People v. Kuder, 98 Cal. App. 206, 276 P. 578, 580: "All of the respective accounts consist of contemporaneous credits and debits, in spite of which there were no funds ever in the possession of the bank, and it requires no degree of expert bookkeeping to reveal the fact that it received nothing and disbursed nothing through the checking system of the depositors, and the corporation received nothing for the certificate of stock issued to appellant."

In the case before us the corporation received nothing for its stock in each transaction, except a piece of real estate. Nor can it be said that the result and effect are the same, since the corporation was organized for the purpose of dealing in real property. It is well known that almost universally the trading price of real estate is much higher than the price asked in a sale for cash. Not only would that fact make such transactions as these inequitable as to persons who purchased stock in the corporation for cash, but such exchanges as are represented here would further reduce the assets of the corporation, to the detriment of those buying stock for cash, since, the higher the nominal price of the real estate purchased, the higher would be the appellant's commissions, as he was paid 20 per cent. on the stock issued. While appellant argues that the subsequent financial difficulties of this corporation were caused by a general deflation of real estate values, it may well be that a large part of the loss suffered by the stockholders occurred through the inflated values of the real estate taken over through the violations of the permit to sell stock, with which appellant is charged.

[2, 3] Appellant next insists that it does not appear that he knowingly violated the terms of the permit. While it is conceded that, where a person commits an act in violation of a statute, it is presumed both that he intended the natural consequence of his act, and that he knew of the existence of the law violated, it is argued that this presumption does not extend to the violation of such a permit as is here involved. In this case, it appears that the appellant had actual knowledge of the terms of the permit, and that he even consulted other parties in an effort to determine what could be done to evade it, without violating its terms. He attempts to excuse his act by the claim that he was advised by the attorney for the corporation that the method pursued would not be a violation of the statute. Not only do we think this would not be a sufficient excuse, but the attorney for the corporation testified that, when the first of the transactions involved in the indictment came up, he told the appellant that land could be bought from a party and stock sold to the same party, provided the purchase of the stock was handled entirely distinct from the sale of the land; that is, if the purchase of the stock and the purchase of the land were entirely distinct and each stood on its own feet; and that this could be done if the matter was so handled that, if a line were drawn right down to the usual stock deal and the usual land deal, each would be distinct and stand on its own feet. This attorney also testified that he later inquired of the appellant as to one or two of these transactions which had gone through, as to "whether each party had actually a credit that was good and cashable." The appellant replied that "it had been." In People v. McCalla, 63 Cal. App. 783, 220 P. 436, it was held that good faith was not to be considered as a factor in the determination of the defendant's guilt on a charge of violating the provisions of the Corporate Securities Act. Nor do we think the rule should be any different, where, as in this case, the defendant is charged with violating a permit which is issued in accordance with the provisions of that act. Not only must it be presumed that a defendant knows that a permit must be obtained from the commissioner of corporations before certain securities may be sold, as provided for in the statute, but he must also be presumed to know that a failure to conform to the terms of the permit, when issued, is also a violation of law under the statute. Were this not true, not only would the very object and purpose of the statute be frustrated, but, of necessity, the guilt or innocence of an accused would then turn upon his own opinion. Not only is this true, but the evidence here shows that the appellant had actual knowledge of the terms of the permit, and in our opinion it is also sufficient to support the finding of the jury that the appellant knowingly violated the statute in failing to conform to the terms thereof.

[4, 5] At the conclusion of the people's case, counsel for Wilson made a motion for a directed verdict as to him, which motion was by the court denied. It is contended that this was error as to appellant, and that under section 1100 of the Penal Code the court was required to direct a dismissal so that appellant might have had the benefit of his codefendant's testimony. It nowhere appears that the trial court was ever of the opinion that sufficient evidence had not been produced to put Wilson upon his defense. It also appears that no motion to have the defendant discharged under that section was ever made. Nor does it appear that that section was ever called to the attention of the court, or that any desire of the appellant to have the testimony of his codefendant was ever expressed or called to the attention of the court. A motion for a directed verdict is not the same thing as the discharge contemplated by that section. The jury is not bound to follow the advice of the court in directing a verdict, while section 1100 refers to an act within the power of the court to control. Where applicable, it may be made at any time before the evidence is finally closed. No error as to appellant is shown in refusing this request for a directed verdict made at the close of the People's Case. We may also add that no showing of injury is made, as appellant frankly states that, had he been able to call his codefendant as a witness, he does not know what his testimony would have been.

[6] Appellant next claims that section 4 of the Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 676) is unconstitutional, as attempting to vest legislative powers in an administrative officer, it being claimed that legislative functions are here delegated to the commissioner of corporations. It is also contended that the act confers arbitrary powers upon the commissioner of corporations and attempts to give to regulations imposed by him the force and effect of public law, and that this may not be done. Appellant admits that the case of People v. Kuder, 93 Cal. App. 42, 269 P. 198, 202, 630, is somewhat opposed to his contention and quotes the following from that case: "Yet, in all cases where the question has arisen, it has been held that the commissioners of various departments may be invested with and exercise the power to make reasonable rules and regulations, and to determine any fact or state of facts upon which the law makes, or intends to make, its own action depend."

He then argues that in so holding it was not the intention of the court to go so far as to hold that, where the power to make rules and regulations is delegated to an administrative officer, such officer may be guided in so doing only by his own conscience. He then cites a number of cases from other jurisdictions, which it is claimed hold that such rules and regulations have not the force and effect of public law. As was said by the Supreme Court in People v. Kuder, supra, in reference to the same section of the Corporate Securities Act which is here attacked: "We think it unnecessary to look outside our own state for authority upholding the right of the Legislature to empower and direct a commission or board created by it to make reasonable rules and regulations, to investigate into affairs of the business, profession, or occupation over which it is given jurisdiction, and exercise sound discretion as occasion may arise in granting or denying rights which are conditionally conferred. Respondents do not complain that the conditions imposed by the permit issued to them were unreasonable, oppressive, or arbitrary. Since, therefore, these precautionary measures in the interests of public safety may, as we have observed, be delegated to and performed by a board, commission, or officer theretofore duly constituted by the Legislature, respondents manifestly are subject to the regulations and conditions prescribed by the commissioner of corporations in this instance, and are not legally justified in complaining of the source from which they emanated."

In Agnew v. Daugherty, 189 Cal. 446, 209 P. 34, 35, the court said: "The passage in the above quotation from the statute which allows the commissioner to issue a permit authorizing the applicant to sell his securities 'upon such terms and conditions as the commissioner may in said permit provide' must be read in connection with the context, which provides that the commissioner must inquire into the method of doing business, and shall ascertain if the same is fair, just, and equitable, and that the methods used in disposing of them would not work a fraud upon the purchasers thereof. The terms and conditions to be prescribed in the permit must not be such as would make a greater burden than is consistent with safety and security. * * * If the commissioner should refuse to issue a permit, except upon conditions which would be unjust, unfair, or inequitable to the applicant, doubtless he would have the right to have such permit revised and reformed so as to make it equitable and fair, but we cannot assume that he will impose such conditions in advance of his action."

While we agree with appellant that the power of the commissioner of corporations, in the respect upon consideration, has other limitations than the dictates of his own conscience, the fact remains that no showing is here made that the terms of the permit issued in this case were not fair, just, and equitable, nor that they were not reasonable in view of the purpose for which the corporation was organized. We think the point raised is sufficiently answered by the case just cited, and the case of People v. Kuder, supra.

[7, 8] Complaint is made of the giving of the following instruction: "You are instructed that payment for stock by check payable on presentation and drawn against a sufficient fund on deposit to meet it, at the time of presentation, was payment in cash as though the payment had been made in coin, lawful money of the United States, in the absence of fraud."

We are unable to see how this could have prejudiced the defendant. Not only is there no evidence in this case to show that the checks under consideration complied with the rule there laid down, but the last clause of the instruction merely pointed out that, where fraud is shown, the general rule would not apply. A check given for the very purpose of violating the law, though otherwise good, would not comply with the terms of the permit. The following instruction is also assigned as error: "I further instruct you that if you find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the people have shown that the entire transactions as set forth in the indictment and known from the evidence as the Holmquist transaction, the Gross transaction and the Randall transaction, was not a bona fide sale for cash but was a proceeding carried out by the defendants for the purpose of evading the provisions of the permit for the sale of stock in violation of the Corporate Securities Act, then it is your duty to find the defendants guilty as charged in the indictment."

The only argument here made is that it may not be a violation of the statute to evade it. Although this may be true, an act done for the purpose of evading the statute which is also "in violation of" the statute would not come within the evasions which, according to appellant, are permissible.

[9] It is next argued that the evidence of the bank accounts of the syndicate and of the appellant were improperly admitted, since no foundation was laid as to the qualification of the witness to testify. The witness in question testified that for ten years he had been comptroller of the First National Trust & Savings Bank; that as such he had charge of the records of this bank and of the accounts of its depositors; that he had with him these records, and that he was able to determine from the records the condition of the accounts; that the files of the bank were under his supervision; and that a great many people had to do with the making up of the bank records, but that these people were under his general supervision. We think the foundation for the admission of this testimony was sufficiently laid. People v. Woollacott, 80 Cal. App. 278, 251 P. 826; People v. Kuder, supra; People v. Weaver, 96 Cal. App. 1, 274 P. 361.

[10] It is next urged that the court erred in refusing the following instruction: "You are instructed that nothing contained in the books of the California Land Buyers Syndicate or in any records of the California Land Buyers Syndicate nor any testimony based thereon nor any conclusions which you might draw, nor anything contained therein is binding upon these defendants or either of them in the absence of proof, satisfying your minds beyond a reasonable doubt, that they knew of the contents of said books or records or that the said books or records were made or kept under their direction or supervision."

Appellant relies upon the case of People v. Doble, 203 Cal. 510, 265 P. 184, as showing this was reversible error. In connection with this, it is pointed out that the appellant was asked if he knew how much money the syndicate had in their bank account when the $20,000 check involved in the second count of the indictment was drawn. He replied: "No, I did not know the exact amount of money that they had on that particular day." In the Doble Case, one of the particular defenses urged was that the defendant knew nothing of the excess sales of stock in the corporation which had been made by other parties, and that, if any had been made, this had been done against his orders. In the case before us, no issue was made of any lack of knowledge on the part of the defendant, and all of the evidence tends to show that he had such knowledge, except this one answer of the appellant, which is itself very qualified. It appears from the evidence that the appellant was the principal promoter of this company and its fiscal agent; that he had charge of the company's office; that he attended all meetings of the board of directors; that he advised the board as to whether he had sufficient stock subscriptions to take care of the transactions here involved; that he usually furnished the directors with information as to how the bank balance stood; and that, in reference to the transaction involved in the first count of the indictment, appellant had stated that they did not have cash enough in the bank to buy the property at that time. It also appears that the appellant's qualified statement that he did not know the exact amount of money in the bank on a certain day was made only in reference to the transaction involved in the second cause of action, and that no evidence to that effect was given in connection with the third count. While we are inclined to the view that the instruction should have been given, in view of the entire record, we are unable to hold that an issue was sufficiently presented to make the refusal of the instruction prejudicial error. In addition, it may be said that the evidence plainly shows that these transactions were entered into in pursuance of a plan to trade stock in the corporation for real property, instead of selling the stock for cash. Under such circumstances, even the fact that the corporation had not sufficient money in the bank to meet the check, and consequently any knowledge of the appellant upon that subject, were not essential elements of proof. The appellant consulted a number of parties for the purpose of ascertaining how such a trade could be made without directly violating the law. Irrespective of whether the plan suggested to him would have been legal, it clearly appears that he did not follow it. We think the evidence shows that in truth and in fact these were not sales of stock for cash, but that they were exchanges of stock for real property.

Appellant maintains that he is the victim of circumstances, that he was dominated by the board of directors of the corporation, and that he merely carried out instructions given him by the board. There is ample evidence that the domination was the other way, and that the appellant went far beyond any instructions shown to have been given him. Neither may it be said that the offense was a technical one only, and that no harm resulted therefrom.

For the reasons given, the order and judgment are affirmed.

STURTEVANT, J.

[1] The plaintiff sued to recover a judgment for damages for personal injury. At the end of the plaintiff's case the defendant moved for a nonsuit. The motion was granted. The plaintiff made a motion for a new trial. That motion was denied, and the plaintiff has appealed. In his first point the plaintiff contends that the motion for a nonsuit was not sufficiently specific. The motion was based on the ground that it had not been shown by the evidence in the case that the defendant was guilty of any carelessness or negligence in the operation of its truck proximately causing this accident. The plaintiff quotes 9 California Jurisprudence, page 949, as follows: "It is, therefore, settled law that a motion for a nonsuit must point the attention of the court and counsel to the precise grounds upon which it is made." We think that the motion was as specific as the pleadings and the facts called for.

[2, 3] On the 15th of May, 1926, the plaintiff was a passenger on an out-bound McAllister street car. He and his family were seated on a bench which was inside of a movable metallic gate which at that time was closed. The bench was on the south side of the front end of the street car. When the street car reached Buchanan street it stopped to let off some passengers. While it stood there one of the trucks of the defendant came north on Buchanan street attempting to go to a fire for which the fourth call had been put in. It was the intention of the driver of the truck to turn to his right when he reached McAllister street. Just as the truck was in the intersection of Buchanan and McAllister streets and attempting to make the turn, No. 14 engine operated by the fire department of the city and county of San Francisco left the firehouse located in the middle of the block on the south side of McAllister and between Buchanan and Webster streets. As that engine left the firehouse Lieutenant Isbel testified that he sounded the siren and kept sounding it. When he got outside of the firehouse he turned to his right and proceeded east on McAllister. While defendant's truck was in the act of making the above-mentioned turn, engine 14 was driven between the truck and the street car. The truck hit the engine amidship. The engine was forced to rub the side of the street car, and in doing so hit the gate and the plaintiff testified that at the same time he was hit in the back. At this time the plaintiff claims that when the fire engine sounded its siren the defendant's truck should have immediately moved to a position as near as possible and parallel to the right-hand curb, and should have remained there until the fire department apparatus had passed it. He cites and relies on section 133 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 560). Omitting irrelevant parts, that section provides: "Upon the approach of any * * * fire department vehicle, * * * upon the sounding of a signal by such * * * fire department vehicle * * * every other vehicle shall immediately be moved to a position as near as possible and parallel to the right-hand curb, and shall remain there until the * * * fire department apparatus has passed such vehicle." It will hardly be disputed that the statute rests upon the assumption that the driver of the other vehicle shall hear the siren of the fire department apparatus. Such driver was not called and the record does not disclose any direct evidence to the effect that he did or did not hear the siren. However, the record does not show affirmatively that there were any other vehicles in the neighborhood, nor that there was any noise that would in any way prevent the driver of defendant's truck from hearing the siren if the same was sounded. There is no evidence in the record that the siren on the engine does not make a noise sufficiently loud to be heard around the corner of one block. In very short, the case rests on the presumptions or inferences that may be resorted to when a motion for nonsuit is made at the end of plaintiff's case. The courts do not favor the motion when made at that time. In Burr v. United Railroads, 163 Cal. 663, at page 665, 126 P. 873, 874, the court said: "It is elementary that a motion for nonsuit is not to be granted where there is any substantial evidence which, with the aid of all legitimate inferences favorable to the plaintiff, would support a verdict or finding that the material allegations of the complaint are true. Equally well settled is the rule that 'negligence is a question of fact for the jury, even when there is no conflict in the evidence, if different conclusions upon the subject can be drawn from the evidence.' Wahlgren v. Market St. R. Co., 132 Cal. 656, 663, 62 P. 308, 64 P. 993; Kimic v. San Jose-Los Gatos R. Co., 156 Cal. 379, 104 P. 986. It is only where the evidence is such that but one conclusion with respect to negligence could be reached by a reasonable and impartial man that the question becomes one of law for the court." The principle involved in the Burr Case was essentially the same as the principle involved in the instant case. In the Burr Case, if the motorman had looked, he would have seen. In the instant case, if the driver listened, he would have heard. In neither case was there direct evidence. In the Burr Case the court stated the facts which were no more favorable to the plaintiff than the facts in the instant case. Having done so, on page 666 of 163 Cal., 126 P. 873, 874, the court said: "The testimony justified the inference that the motorman saw the plaintiff's automobile upon the track, but that, notwithstanding, he came on without slackening his speed until he was actually upon the automobile." So, in this case, the testimony justified the inference that the driver of the truck heard the siren upon the fire engine, but that, notwithstanding, he went forward, without drawing up to the curb and struck the fire engine. Furthermore, it cannot be said that every reasonable man would be bound to conclude on the facts shown that the collision was not caused by the failure of the truck driver to stop when he first heard the siren.

The order appealed from is reversed.

WILLIAMSON v. FITZGERALD et al.

Civ. 4349.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Aug. 4, 1931.

1. Automobiles ⇨224(5).

Evidence warranted finding that injured owner furnishing automobile for pleasure trip was not contributorily negligent, where, immediately before accident, driver's negligence in kissing companion was unexpected.

Evidence disclosed that plaintiff owned and furnished automobile involved to transport herself and three companions on pleasure trip planned by the others, whom she had frequently accompanied on similar excursions; that plaintiff was not called on to buy gasoline or pay any other expenses of journey; that member of party known to plaintiff to be careful driver operated automobile, and, although previously he had always given close attention to driving, he permitted his attention on this occasion to be temporarily diverted when he kissed his companion in response to her request; that on noticing approaching automobile he became confused and turned suddenly, overturning automobile and injuring plaintiff, who, due to driver's unexpected carelessness, had had no opportunity to protest or to demand control of automobile.

2. Automobiles ⇨224(5).

Respecting contributory negligence, adequacy of warning against automobile driver's imprudence depends on particular circumstances.

3. Automobiles ⇨245(87).

Whether automobile owner injured by driver's unexpected negligence was contributorily negligent held for court in trial without jury.

4. Automobiles ⇨224(1).

Automobile owner voluntarily joining pleasure expedition did not thereby assume risks from driver's unexpected negligence.

Owner did not assume risks from driver's unexpected negligence, since one does not ordinarily assume risk of dangers which one has no reason to anticipate.

5. Automobiles ⇨196.

That injured member of pleasure expedition owned automobile involved or was engaged in joint pleasure excursion with driver did not estop her from recovering against negligent driver.

6. Negligence ⇨93(1).

Automobile driver's negligence may be imputed to passenger engaging in joint enterprise where each has equal right to control other regarding conduct causing accident, making both liable to injured third person.

Imputed negligence under such circumstances depends on authority of person sought to be charged therewith to direct and control conduct of driver of automobile with relation to acts or omissions which contribute to cause of accident.

7. Negligence ⇨93(1).

Those engaged in automobile pleasure excursion are not necessarily engaged in "joint enterprise."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Joint Enterprise," see Words and Phrases.]

8. Negligence ⇨93(1).

Owner who, having been invited to furnish automobile and accompany friends on pleasure trip, surrendered control thereof, held not "engaged in joint enterprise" so as to charge owner with driver's negligence.

9. Negligence ⇨93(1).

Imputed negligence doctrine is inapplicable where member of joint enterprise or common adventure sues another member for negligence; doctrine of joint enterprise being peculiar to subject of contributory negligence.

10. Trial ⇨404(1).

If reasonably possible, findings should be reconciled to support judgment.

11. Appeal and error ⇨1071(5).

Trial ⇨395(5).

Finding that injured owner of automobile riding therein retained right to voice in its control held surplusage and harmless, and not conflicting with finding that driver exercised sole management.

12. Automobiles ⇨224(5).

Owner lending automobile to another and becoming passenger therein has right, and, in absence of contrary agreement, duty to prevent driver's carelessness.

A failure by owner of automobile to exercise reasonable supervision and control over driver under such circumstances so as to warn him against violating traffic laws or to protest against driving in negligent or reckless manner may constitute contributory negligence which will preclude recovery for injuries sustained as a result thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Action by Julia A. Williamson against J. A. Fitzgerald and another. Judgment for plaintiff against defendant named, and defendant named appeals.

Affirmed.

Herbert Chamberlin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edward Van Vranken and R. M. Dunne, both of Stockton, for respondent.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment of $11,846.80, which was recovered against the appellant, for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff in an automobile casualty.

The plaintiff was employed as housekeeper at the Lincoln Hotel in Stockton. She was the owner of the Studebaker sedan automobile which is involved in this action. The codefendant Lucretia McConnell, also known as Mrs. Lou Tressler, was a clerk in the same hotel. For four years these ladies had been friends and associates. Mrs. Tressler kept company with the appellant, while the plaintiff associated with a gentleman by the name of Klein. By prearrangement this group of four planned to drive from Stockton to San Francisco to attend a show. July 17, 1928, Mrs. Tressler called the plaintiff on the telephone informing her of the plan to drive down to San Francisco and requested her to bring her machine over to her apartments on Lafayette street. The plaintiff accordingly obtained a leave of absence from her duties at the hotel, and, dressing for the occasion, drove to the Tressler apartments, where she found the trio above mentioned waiting for her. The appellant, who was known to the plaintiff to be a careful driver, operated the car both going to and returning from their destination. Mrs. Tressler occupied the front seat upon the appellant's right. The plaintiff and her companion sat in the rear seat of the machine. No previous statement was made regarding the operation of the vehicle. Mrs. Tressler appears to have planned the expedition, and the appellant assumed the responsibility of doing the driving. The plaintiff was not called upon to pay any of the expenses of the journey. The party had dinner and attended the show together in San Francisco, where they remained overnight.

The following morning they set out early to return to Stockton. It was then perfectly light and clear. Without previous incident of any significance, while they were driving at the rate of 35 or 40 miles an hour down a slight grade over a thirty-foot paved highway through Dublin canyon, they observed a truck loaded with lug boxes which was stalled upon this grade upon their left-hand side. Owing to a slight curve in the highway, an approaching Ford machine was concealed behind the truck. When the Studebaker car reached a point about one-half a block from the truck, without previous warning, Mrs. Tressler addressed herself to the appellant, who sat by her side driving the car, saying, "Punkey, kiss me." He proceeded to do so. His attention was thereby temporarily diverted from his operation of the car. At this instant, the approaching Ford machine appeared from behind the truck. There was ample room for both cars to pass the truck. But, observing this indiscreet act and apprehending the danger therefrom, the plaintiff exclaimed, "Oh, be careful." Mr. Klein also warned the appellant of the danger. The plaintiff testified that, as they warned the appellant of the danger of his conduct, he looked up, and, seeing the approaching machine, became startled and confused. She said, "He looked up and he acted as if he was panicky or something—he became excited. * * * When he looked up—it seemed like he became—well, I don't know whether you would call it frightened or not." The appellant thereupon suddenly pulled his car off to his right, and then violently back to his left, after they had passed the stationary truck and the approaching Ford machine. The Studebaker sedan swerved, careened, and toppled over. Mr. Klein, who sat in the rear seat with the plaintiff, was killed. She was seriously and permanently injured. This suit for damages was instituted against both the appellant and Mrs. Tressler, his companion. The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury. Judgment for damages was rendered in favor of the defendant Tressler, but against the appellant for the sum of $11,846.80. The serious nature of the injuries which were sustained by the plaintiff is not disputed. The amount of the judgment is not criticized.

The appellant contends that (1) the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence; (2) the plaintiff assumed the risk of riding with the appellant because she was engaged with him in a joint enterprise, or pleasure expedition at the time of the accident; (3) the findings of facts are in irreconcilable conflict.

[1] There is nothing in the present record to warrant a finding of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. She had frequently accompanied the appellant and Mrs. Tressler on former automobile excursions when he did the driving. His previous conduct led the plaintiff to believe he was a careful driver. He had never before attempted to kiss Mrs. Tressler while he was engaged in driving a car. The plaintiff had never before known him to permit himself to be diverted from careful attention to his driving. This careless act of kissing Mrs. Tressler, which diverted his attention so as to cause the accident, was so unexpectedly performed that the plaintiff had no opportunity to protest or demand the control of the machine.

[2, 3] The adequacy of a warning against imprudent conduct of the driver of an automobile so as to purge one of contributory negligence depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. 5-6 Huddy's Cyc. of Automobile Law, p. 266, § 144. The question of plaintiff's contributory negligence in the present case was a problem for the determination of the trial judge. Its solution of this question, under the facts of this case, will not be disturbed on appeal. In the authority last cited it is said in § 144 thereof: "Where the reckless driving has continued but for a short distance, and there has been but little time for the guest to take precautions for his safety, his negligence may be a question for the jury."

[4] Under the circumstances of this case it may not be said the plaintiff assumed the risks of danger from the negligent conduct in driving merely because she voluntarily became a member of the pleasure expedition. One does not ordinarily assume the risk of dangers he has no reason to anticipate.

[5-7] The plaintiff is not estopped from maintaining this action for damages against the driver of her automobile on the ground that she was the owner thereof, or because she was then engaged in a joint pleasure excursion with him and may have been entitled to exercise joint control with him over the operation of the machine. It is true the negligence of the driver of an automobile may be imputed to another occupant of a machine with whom he is engaged in a joint enterprise where each has an equal right to control and direct the conduct of the other with respect to the acts or omissions which furnish or contribute to the cause of accident complained of, so as to render them both liable to a third person for injuries sustained thereby. 45 C. J. 1020, § 574; 1 Blashfield's Cyc. of Auto Law, p. 969, § 13; 5-6 Huddy's Cyc. of Auto Law, p. 285, § 149. Imputed negligence under such circumstances depends upon the authority of the party sought to be charged therewith to direct and control the conduct of the driver of the automobile with relation to the acts or omissions which contribute to the cause of the accident. It is not true that all who are engaged in an automobile excursion for pleasure are necessarily participants in a joint enterprise. The mere fact that several persons are doing some particular thing together does not necessarily charge each with the negligence of the others. 45 C. J. 1020, supra; 1 Blashfield's Cyc. of Auto Law, p. 970, § 14; Meyers v. So. Pac. Co., 63 Cal. App. 164, 218 P. 284; Koplitz v. St. Paul, 86 Minn. 373, 90 N. W. 794, 58 L. R. A. 74. In 5-6 Huddy's Cyc. of Auto Law, p. 280, § 146, it is said: "Even the owner of the vehicle may in some cases be considered a guest of the driver, so that the driver's negligence will not be imputed to him."

In 19 California Jurisprudence, page 660, § 85, it is said: "Negligence may not be imputed to a person merely because he is the owner of an instrumentality which caused the injury."

[8] In the present case the pleasure expedition was not planned by the plaintiff. She was informed of the proposed trip by Mrs. Tressler and directed to furnish her automobile for their use. At the request of the appellant she delivered the keys of the car to him. He assumed the entire control and operation of the machine. The plaintiff was not asked to participate in the expense of gas, oil, or the storage bill for the car. She did not attempt to direct the course or operation of the machine. The evidence indicates without contradiction that the expedition was planned by the other members of the party, and that the plaintiff was invited to accompany them and furnish her automobile as a means of transportation. Under such circumstances the owner of a machine may not be said to be engaged in a joint enterprise so as to charge her with the negligence of the driver. In the case of Pope v. Halpern, 193 Cal. 168, 174, 223 P. 470, 473, it is said: "Parties cannot be said to be engaged in a joint enterprise, within the meaning of the law of negligence, unless there be a community of interests in the objects or purposes of the undertaking, and an equal right to direct and govern the movements and conduct of each other with respect thereto. Each must have some voice and right to be heard in its control and management.' It will be seen * * * that in order that there be such a joint enterprise it is not sufficient merely that the passenger of the machine indicate the route, or that both parties have certain plans in common, such as a 'joy ride,' but the community of interest must be such that the passenger is entitled to be heard in the control and management of the vehicle."

Reputable authority holds that the doctrine of imputed negligence between members of a joint enterprise does not necessarily apply to a mere pleasure excursion. In 1 Blashfield's Cyc. of Auto Law, page 971, supra, it is said: "The mere fact that the driver and passenger have the common purpose of a pleasure trip is not alone sufficient to show a joint enterprise." Nicora v. Cerveri, 49 Nev. 261, 244 P. 897.

In the case of Bailey v. Parker, 34 Ohio App. 207, 170 N. E. 607, it was held that the driver of an automobile and passengers who were members of the same orchestra and were riding in the same machine to fulfill an engagement to furnish music for an entertainment were not therefore occupied in a joint enterprise, so as to impute the negligence of the driver to the other members of the orchestra. In the case of Koplitz v. St. Paul, 86 Minn. 373, 90 N. W. 794, 58 L. R. A. 74, where twenty-eight young men and ladies participated in the expense of hiring a bus, in which they drove to Lake Johanna to attend a Fourth of July picnic dinner, it was held they were not engaged in a joint enterprise so as to impute the negligence of the driver, who was a member of the pleasure excursion, to the other members thereof. In the case of Wilmes v. Fournier, 111 Misc. Rep. 9, 180 N. Y. S. 860, four men went together on a hunting expedition. By common consent they used the automobile owned by one of the party as a means of transportation. Through the negligence of the owner of the machine, one of the party was injured. A judgment against the driver of the machine was sustained. On appeal it was held that the hunting expedition was not such a joint enterprise as would impute the negligence of one member of the expedition to another member thereof in a suit between them. In the case of Beard v. Klusmeier, 158 Ky. 153, 164 S. W. 319, 321, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1100, Ann. Cass. 1915D, 342, the court says: "We cannot agree with appellant's contention that, where one invites another for a pleasure ride, the two are engaged in a common enterprise or joint venture, and that neither is liable to the other for any act of negligence."

[9] Regardless of whether the circumstances of the pleasure party in the present case constituted a joint enterprise as that term is defined by the law, the doctrine of imputed negligence may not be invoked by one member of the joint enterprise against another so as to defeat a claim for damages for negligence on the part of the former. The doctrine of imputed negligence is inapplicable to a member of a joint enterprise or common adventure when one member of the enterprise is sued by another member thereof for injuries sustained through the negligent operation of an automobile which is being used in the course of the enterprise. The doctrine of joint enterprise is peculiar to the subject of contributory negligence and has no application to actions brought by one joint adventurer against another to recover for injuries due to the latter's negligence. 45 C. J. 1021, § 574; 62 A. L. R. 442, note IV; O'Brien v. Woldson, 149 Wash. 192, 270 P. 304, 305, 62 A. L. R. 436; Bailey v. Parker, 34 Ohio. App. 207, 170 N. E. 607, 609; Bloom v. Leech, 120 Ohio St. 239, 166 N. E. 137, 139; Wilmes v. Fournier, 111 Misc. Rep. 9, 180 N. Y. S. 860, 861; Bushnell v. Bushnell, 103 Conn. 583, 131 A. 432, 433, 44 A. L. R. 785, 789; Harber v. Graham, 105 N. J. Law, 213, 143 A. 340, 341, 61 A. L. R. 1232, 1235. In the case last cited a brother and sister were touring Massachusetts for pleasure in the defendant's automobile. The sister was injured through the negligence of her brother who was driving the car. On appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant, it was urged that the giving of the following instruction was prejudicial error, to wit: "If the jury find that the plaintiff and the defendant were engaged in a common enterprise at the time of the accident, then, regardless of any question of negligence, the defendant is entitled to a verdict."

The court said: "Taking up the 'common enterprise' point, we think the learned trial judge lost sight of the fact that this principle, resting as it does upon the relation of agency existing inter sese among persons engaged in a joint or common enterprise, is applicable only as regards third persons not parties in such enterprise."

In the case of Bushnell v. Bushnell, supra, the court quotes approvingly from 1 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (6th Ed.) § 65a, as follows: "The doctrine of imputed negligence is that in certain relation there shall be visited upon the plaintiff the negligence of another concurring with that of the defendant so as to defeat the action. It is peculiar to contributory negligence and can be invoked only where the negligence of another, for which the plaintiff is responsible, besides that of the defendant, proximately contributes to the injury."

In the case last cited the court says: "He who in the process of a joint enterprise is engaged in operating a vehicle represents, in so doing, all who are associated with him in that enterprise, and, if he is negligent, any one of them may look to him for damages upon the same basis as that upon which a principal holds an agent liable for his negligent conduct. * * * Where she [the plaintiff] was charging him [the defendant] directly with responsibility for injuries due to his own failure in duty, there was no place for any imputation of his want of care to her, and the sole issues were those having to do with his negligence and her own contributory negligence. The doctrine of joint enterprise was wholly inapplicable to such a situation."

In the case of Wilmes v. Fournier, supra, in discussing the same limitation of the application of the principle of imputed negligence, the court says: "No case has been cited by counsel in which one person, concededly engaged in a common enterprise, has sought to maintain an action against one of his associates. The fact whether there is a joint enterprise is one of importance in the class of cases cited, when the action is against a third person; but, as between themselves, I know of no rule of law that throws a mantle of protection over the tortious acts of an associate in a joint enterprise or in a partnership."

In the case of O'Brien v. Woldson, supra, the plaintiff and defendant were engaged in a pleasure excursion similar to the situation in the case at bar. The plaintiff paid for the gasoline and other expenses of the trip. Through the negligence of the defendant, who was driving the car, the plaintiff was injured. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. From this judgment the defendant appealed. He claimed exemption from liability on the doctrine of imputed negligence. The judgment was affirmed. The court said: "Where the action is brought against a third party, the rule is that the negligence of one member of the joint enterprise within the scope of that enterprise will be imputed to the other. * * * It does not necessarily follow, however, that that rule should be applied when the action is by one member of the joint enterprise as against the other. When the action is against a third person each member of the joint enterprise is a representative of the other, and the acts of one are the acts of all if they be within the scope of the enterprise. When the action is brought by one member of the enterprise against another, there is no place to apply the doctrine of imputed negligence. To do so would be to permit one guilty of negligence to take refuge behind his own wrong. The situation when the action is brought by one member of the enterprise against the other is entirely different from that when recovery is sought against a third person. For present purposes it is sufficiently accurate to say that the relations of joint adventurers as between themselves are governed practically by the same rules that govern partners. Harm v. Boatman, 128 Wash. 202, 222 P. 478. In the case of partners, an action for damages will lie by one partner against the other for wrongs inflicted upon the person or property of the one seeking to recover."

The doctrine of imputed negligence is therefore not available to the defendant in the present case.

[10-12] The findings of the court are not in irreconcilable conflict. The court did find that the plaintiff was the owner of the automobile in which the parties were riding at the time of the accident, but that the defendant Fitzgerald had the actual management, control, and operation of the car at that time. The court further found that the plaintiff's injuries were sustained as the proximate cause of appellant's gross negligence and carelessness in diverting his attention from driving the machine while he proceeded to kiss his companion, and that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence. The appellant contends that the court inconsistently found that "plaintiff did not then and there have, or take any part in the management, operation or control of said automobile, but did have, at said time, a right to a voice in the control thereof." All findings should be reconciled, if reasonably possible, so as to support the judgment. The complaint was first drawn on the theory that the plaintiff was riding in the automobile at the time of accident as the guest of the appellant. On motion of the plaintiff, all reference to this theory of her relationship as a guest was stricken from the complaint. Without objection, the cause was tried on the appellant's theory that his negligence might be imputed to the plaintiff so as to preclude her from recovering damages, provided the pleasure expedition could be construed to be a joint venture between the participants therein. In view of the preceding discussion upon the principle last mentioned, and in support of the judgment, it may be assumed the court concluded that the pleasure expedition upon which the parties were engaged did not constitute a joint enterprise. It may also be assumed, for the purpose of supporting the judgment, that the appellant was not driving the machine at the time of the accident as the agent of the plaintiff, but, upon the contrary, that she abandoned the entire operation and control thereof to him, and that he assumed the actual and absolute control and management thereof. But, even though it be assumed, as the findings declare, that the plaintiff retained the "right to a voice in the control thereof" this is not in conflict with the unqualified finding that the appellant actually exercised the sole management, control, and operation of the car, and that the plaintiff assumed no part in the management or control thereof. It is true that, when the owner of an automobile lends his machine to another person and becomes a passenger therein, he has the right, and, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, it becomes his duty, to prevent careless or reckless conduct on the part of the driver in the operation thereof. Randolph v. Hunt, 41 Cal. App. 739, 183 P. 358; Bosse v. Marye, 80 Cal. App. 109, 119, 250 P. 693; Rapolla v. Goulart, 105 Cal. App. 417, 287 P. 562. A failure on the part of the owner of a machine to exercise reasonable supervision and control over the driver under such circumstances so as to warn him against violating the traffic laws or to protest against driving in a negligent or reckless manner may constitute contributory negligence which will preclude the recovery of damages for injuries sustained as a result thereof. In the present case, however, there was nothing in the previous conduct of the appellant to indicate that he was operating the machine in a careless or negligent manner, or to warn the plaintiff that the driver of the machine proposed to engage in kissing his companion. This negligent act, on part of the appellant, of kissing Mrs. Tressler was evidently the proximate cause of the accident. The plaintiff had no opportunity to warn him against such conduct. There is therefore no evidence in the record to warrant a holding that the plaintiff was derelict in the performance of her duty as the owner of the car. The finding of the court that she had a right to a voice in the control of the machine was therefore surplusage and harmless.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Arthur L. Eckstrom, as administrator of the estate of John L. Eckstrom, deceased, against Ida Jean Brooks. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

James F. Brennan, and E. A. McDonald, both of San Francisco (Vincent Surr, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Gilbert D. Ferrell, of Redwood City (Fred W. Comba, of Redwood City, of counsel), for respondent.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued as administrator of the estate of John Eckstrom, deceased, to recover upon a promissory note of $9,000. The cause was tried with a jury and defendant had a verdict. Plaintiff has appealed on typewritten transcripts.

When about sixty years of age, John Eckstrom was divorced from his wife and moved to the home of the defendant, where he remained until his death, nine years later. During this entire time he was estranged from his family, and a short time before his death, stated that he did not desire any of them to have any of his property. He was afflicted with many physical ailments and was unable to carry on any steady labor. During all this time defendant, who was a practical nurse, cared for him, doing his cooking, washing, and nursing without compensation. The note in suit was executed in 1926 and was secured by a third deed of trust on property owned by defendant. A few weeks before his death in July, 1928, the deceased handed to the defendant in the presence of her son the promissory note and deed of trust, telling her that he wanted her to have the note and did not want any of his family to be able to collect from her. At the same time the deceased executed and delivered to the defendant an authorization to the trustee named in the deed of trust to reconvey to defendant. These documents were given by defendant to her son on the same day with instructions to record the authorization, but the son failed to do so until the day following the death of deceased.

[1-8] Counsel for appellant list their points under ten headings. The first three points relate to the burden of proof, which concededly rests with the respondent in cases of this character. The fourth point rests on the statement that "in this type of action the presumption is that the evidence of the defendant is false." There is no such presumption in the law. The further statement that the "conflict of evidence rule" is ameliorated in these actions is equally fallacious. Though the courts have frequently said that the testimony of the party in interest in these cases should be "viewed with caution and even with suspicion, to prevent fraud," our function is nevertheless that of a reviewing court which must presume that the trial court and jury honestly and fairly viewed the evidence with such care. The true rule of these cases is stated in Steinberger v. Young, 175 Cal. 81, 85, 165 P. 432, 434, where the court says: "If there be substantial evidence to support the conclusion reached below, the finding is not open to review on appeal" even where the law requires proof of the fact to be clear and convincing.

Appellant gives his fifth point the heading "Inherent improbabilities." In support of the point he refers to several portions of the testimony of the respondent and her son detailing the transactions which we have heretofore recited and insists that some of these transactions were inherently improbable. Without further repetition it is sufficient to say that we have read this testimony with care and that we cannot say that it is inherently improbable. Many of the transactions were not done with the care and prudence that one would exercise under the advice of counsel, in fact, some things were very carelessly done, and if we were viewing the case as jurors we might have strong suspicions as to the truth and accuracy of some of the testimony. But that is not always improbable which is merely irregular or suspicious. Running through the argument upon these points, the appellant frequently refers to the "forgery" of the decedent's signature to the authorization to reconvey the realty. The original exhibit has been brought up, and we are asked to test the validity of this signature in the light of other exemplars of decedent's handwriting. But this is a pure question of fact which was left to the jury under complete instructions. We cannot say upon a review of the evidence that the jury drew a wrong conclusion merely because some of the evidence may seem "suspicious."

[7-11] The sixth and seventh points may be treated under the general head that "Death revoked all agency and the gift remained uncompleted." In both respects the statement is a true statement of the law, but it has no application to the facts of this case. Death revokes an agency, but here there was no agency in so far as the issues raised by appellant are concerned. He was suing upon a promissory note which the evidence discloses was "paid in full" or canceled by the unconditional gift to the maker. From the very moment this gift was made the note became no longer enforceable, and it is of no concern of appellant that an agency might have been created to make a reconveyance in order to clear respondent's title to the land covered by the deed of trust. There is no conflict in the authorities that a promissory note may be the subject of a gift and that title passes on delivery with that intention irrespective of endorsement by the payee. 28 Cor. Jur. 666, 700.

[12] In his eighth point appellant argues for the presumption that the note having been shown to exist the obligation exists until shown to have been paid or canceled. Respondent does not quarrel with appellant. She relies on her evidence of gift as proof overcoming the presumption.

[13] Point No. 9 relates to the failure of appellant to secure the admission in evidence of some photographic enlargements of the handwriting of the deceased. Many cases are cited to the point that such photographs are admissible—a rule which is not disputed. But the point is not material here because the appellant failed to lay the proper, or any, foundation for the introduction of any photographs and because he has not marked for identification those offered. Hence we are unable to determine whether prejudicial error occurred in the ruling.

[14] Finally it is argued that the trial judge erred in refusing appellant's proposed instruction reading: "I instruct you that if John Eckstrom intended to make a gift to Ida Jean Brooks, and delivered certain papers to her, but intended that his gift should not take effect until after his death, then I instruct you that this was not a gift." The proposal was an incorrect statement of the law. Section 1149, Civil Code, provides that a gift made in view of death with the intent that it shall take effect only in case of the death of the giver is a gift causa mortis. In other instructions given the trial judge fully covered the subject of gifts "inter vivos" and gifts "causa mortis."

[15, 16] Complaint is also made of the portion of the instruction given upon request of respondent and reading: "That the gift did not depend upon reconveyance under the deed of trust to give it effect." The instruction in which the portion complained of was included related to the delivery of the promissory note and deed of trust only. It had no relation to the reconveyance nor the title to the realty. That a valid gift of the promissory note could be made without a conveyance of the security is too plain for argument. The effect of such a gift is a question which is not involved in this instruction.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Criminal law ☞665(4).

Witness' disobedience of court's order to remain outside courtroom during trial is not ground for rejecting his testimony.

2. Criminal law ☞804(7).

Court did not err in orally instructing jury without defendant's consent, where instruction was taken down by reporter (Pen. Code, § 1093, subd. 6, and § 1127).

3. Criminal law ☞804(1), 863(2).

Statutory provision that instructions shall be in, or reduced to, writing is mandatory, and applies to both original charge and further instructions after jury's retirement (Pen. Code, § 1127).

4. Criminal law ☞1144(14).

Presumption on appeal is that reporter performed duty to take down oral instructions in shorthand (Pen. Code, § 1093, subd. 6, and § 1127).

5. Criminal law ☞836.

Statutes requiring court to indorse and sign decision on each charge given or refused are inapplicable to charge given of its own motion (Pen. Code, §§ 1127, 1176).

6. Criminal law ☞1105(1).

Reporter's transcript of court's oral charge must be certified by trial judge to present it for review on appeal (Pen. Code, § 1176).

7. Criminal law ☞863(2).

Court's remark in answer to jury foreman's question regarding leniency that jury had only to find whether defendant was guilty or not guilty held not improper.

All possible forms of verdict need not be given jury, but it may prepare and present its own form of verdict, which court must accept, if legally sufficient.

10. Criminal law ☞1186(4).

Court's remarks, rebuking defendant's attorney in jury's presence, held not reversible error, in absence of showing of provocation therefor or tone of voice in which made (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

C. W. Mack was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

C. I. Bennington, of Oroville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PRESTON, P. J.

Defendant was convicted by a jury of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon. He appeals from the judgment and from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Appellant contends that the court committed prejudicial error in permitting the witness Clayburn to testify, for the reason that said witness had remained in the courtroom during the progress of the trial after the court had made an order excluding all witnesses from the courtroom. There is no merit in this contention. The disobedience of the court's order to remain outside the courtroom during the progress of the trial might well have subjected the witness to punishment for contempt of court, but it is no ground for rejecting his testimony. See People v. Boscovitch, 20 Cal. 436; 27 Cal. Jur. 64.

[2] Appellant also claims the court instructed the jury orally without the consent of the defendant. The statute authorizes such instructions to be given to the jury in a criminal case, if taken down by the phonographic reporter. Sec. 1093, subd. 6, Pen. Code; People v. Bourke, 66 Cal. 456, 6 P. 89; People v. Wheatley, 88 Cal. 114, 26 P. 95; People v. Leary, 105 Cal. 486, 39 P. 24.

To avoid uncertainty as to the instructions given the jury, the Criminal Practice Act required that the charge be given in writing, except when the parties mutually consented that it be oral. This was the rule until 1874 when section 1093 of the Penal Code was amended (amendments to the Codes 1873-74, p. 444) to provide: "If the charge be not given in writing, it must be taken down by the phonographic reporter."

In 1897 the law was further changed, when section 1127 of the same Code was amended (St. 1897, p. 184). This amendment provides: "All instructions given (except such as might incidentally be given during the admission of evidence) shall be in writing, unless both parties request the giving of an oral instruction, or consent thereto, and when so given orally, all instructions must be taken down by the phonographic reporter."

[3] The requirement that the instructions be in or reduced to writing is mandatory and applies both to the original charge and to further instructions given after the jury has retired for deliberation. People v. Hersey, 53 Cal. 574; 8 Cal. Jur., pp. 324, 325.

[4] The record in this case does not show whether the instructions were given orally or in writing, but, conceding that they were given orally, the presumption is that the reporter performed his duty and took down the charge in shorthand, and that he must have done so appears from the fact that the full charge is brought to this court in the transcript. People v. Barton, 88 Cal. 176, 25 P. 1117; People v. Cline, 83 Cal. 374, 23 P. 391; People v. Marks, 72 Cal. 46, 13 P. 149.

[5, 6] Sections 1127 and 1176 of the Penal Code requiring the court to indorse and sign its decision upon each charge presented and given or refused do not apply to a charge of the court given of its own motion, as appears to have been done in this case. 8 Cal. Jur., p. 318. However, the reporter's transcript of the charge must be certified by the trial judge, as provided in section 1176 if a review of the oral charge is sought on appeal. This was done in the case at bar.

Therefore, upon the record here presented, we find no error in the court not instructing the jury in writing.

[7] The record contains the following: "3:50 o'clock p. m. * * * the jury retire to their jury room to deliberate upon a verdict and at 5:10 o'clock p. m. of this same day the jury announce that they wish to come into the court room and they are conducted to the jury box whereupon the following proceedings are had:

"* * * The Court (to Foreman Strang): Now, Mr. Strang, are you the foreman?"

"Foreman Strang: Yes. So far we have been unable to agree and what information we require was in case we found the defendant guilty could we ask you—

"The Court (interrupting): Now don't ask me anything about punishment.

"Foreman Strang: We want to know if we could ask in regard to leniency?"

"The Court: No, you have nothing to do with that.

"Foreman Strang: We have nothing to do with that?"

"The Court: No, sir, you went in there and promised me, and took an oath that you would try this case solely from this evidence and the instructions of the Judge and find whether he was guilty or not guilty and that is all you have to do with. If you cannot find a verdict from that it is too bad, that's all.

"Foreman Strang: Well, that is all.

"The Court: All right, you can go back to your rooms now, gentlemen." At 5:44 o'clock of the same day the jury returned a verdict of guilty as charged in the information, to wit, assault with a deadly weapon.

Appellant insists that the court by these remarks intimated to the jury that it should find him guilty of the offense charged, and precluded the jury from finding him guilty of the lesser offense of simple assault; and that the trial court should, in answer to the foregoing question regarding leniency, have instructed the jury that it could find the defendant guilty of an assault only and submitted a form of verdict to that effect.

The remarks did not have reference alone to a possible verdict of guilty. It merely called to the attention of the jury the fact that they were to try the case upon the evidence produced and the instructions of the court and find a verdict of "guilty or not guilty."

The remarks here complained of are of an entirely different character from those condemned in such cases as People v. Kindelberger, 100 Cal. 367, 34 P. 852; People v. Blackwell, 81 Cal. App. 417, 420, 421, 253 P. 964, relied upon by appellant.

[8] The court in its charge to the jury had explained to them fully the difference between an assault and an assault with a deadly weapon, and the jury was at liberty to return a verdict of either assault with a deadly weapon as charged in the information or a verdict of what is generally termed "simple assault." The jury found him guilty of the higher offense. This verdict is amply supported by the evidence. In fact, the evidence shows without substantial conflict that appellant and the complaining witness became involved in a quarrel over a gambling debt of 25 cents, and that the appellant deliberately stabbed and cut the complaining witness a number of times with a knife, one wound penetrating the left lung and producing great bodily injury.

From all the facts and circumstances appearing in evidence it is difficult to see how the jury would have been warranted in convicting the appellant of assault only. If he was guilty of any offense, he was at least guilty of the offense with which he was charged and convicted.

[9] As a matter of convenience all possible forms of verdict are usually prepared by the clerk and explained and given to the jury by the court, but this is not required in a criminal case. The jury has the right to prepare and present its own form of verdict, and, if legally sufficient, must be accepted by the court.

[10] Complaint is made that the trial court committed prejudicial error in rebuking the attorney for appellant during the trial, and in the presence of the jury. The remarks complained of might well have been omitted, but we are unable to say from the record what provocation prompted them or in what tone of voice they were made. They may have been mere passing remarks and not calculated to offend counsel or prejudice his client's case in the eyes of the jury. We are unable to say that any miscarriage of justice occurred by reason of any of the court's remarks. Article 6, § 4½, Const.

In conclusion we might add that the court manifested its fairness and lack of prejudice against the defendant by imposing upon him punishment in the county jail for one year, instead of sending him to the state prison, which it might well have done under the verdict Section 245, Pen. Code.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

3. Trial $\S$ 296(3).

Instruction respecting right of way at intersection held, in view of other instructions, not misleading (St. 1923, p. 560, § 131 (a), as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15).

Instruction that plaintiff motorist was entitled to right of way if she had, at lawful speed, entered upon intersection and was proceeding over intersection at lawful speed, and if defendant automobile truck had not as yet entered upon intersection, was not misleading as premitting finding that plaintiff had right of way regardless of whether both vehicles approached intersection at same time, especially in view of later instruction that brought in St. 1923, p. 560, § 131 (a), as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15, which provides that where two vehicles approach intersection at approximately same time, vehicle approaching from right, if traveling at lawful speed, shall have right of way.

4. Automobiles $\S$ 246(47).

Record held not to contain substantial evidence that colliding automobiles approached intersection at approximately same time, as regards right of way instruction (St. 1923, p. 560, § 131 (a), as amended by St. 1925, p. 412, § 15).

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Letitia Howard against the National Ice Cream Company and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Joseph E. Reardon and Benjamin F. Curtaz, both of San Francisco (Enid Childs, of Berkeley, of counsel), for appellants.

Leo R. Friedman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J.

A motortruck owned by the defendant National Ice Cream Company and driven by the defendant McCarthy collided with and overturned a Ford coupe owned and driven by plaintiff, at the intersection of Broderick and Lombard streets in San Francisco, injuring plaintiff and Mrs. Ellen Murphy, who was riding with plaintiff at the time. Thereafter plaintiff brought this action for damages on account of the injuries she sustained and a jury awarded her a verdict for $6,000. From the judgment entered thereon defendants have taken this appeal, urging as sole ground for reversal the giving of two instructions relating to the subject of right of way at street intersections.

The accident happened about 1 o'clock in the afternoon. Plaintiff was traveling along the right-hand side of Broderick street in a southerly direction. The truck was traveling easterly on Lombard, which intersects Broderick at right angles. There is some conflict in the testimony as to whether plaintiff, upon reaching the intersection, brought the coupe to a dead stop or almost to a standstill; plaintiff and Mrs. Murphy having stated that it was brought to a stop or almost to a standstill, and the truck driver, another witness for the defendants, and a Miss Legeal, who was the third occupant of the coupe, but escaped injury, having stated that the coupe stopped at the intersection. However, after having brought it to a stop or almost to a standstill plaintiff proceeded across the intersection and reached the other side, beyond the southerly curb line of Lombard, when the coupe was struck by the truck. The force of the impact threw the coupe about twenty-five feet up a 13 per cent. grade on Broderick street, where it overturned on its side in a reverse position, pointing back toward the intersection.

[1-3] The first instruction objected to (numbered XXII), which is the important one to be considered, reads as follows: "Under section 131 of the California Vehicle Act as the same was in force on the first day of August, 1927, where a motor vehicle, traveling at a lawful rate of speed, has entered an intersection of public highways, such motor vehicle has the right of way over all other motor vehicles approaching or about to enter upon such intersection and all such other motor vehicles must yield to such vehicle so driven upon such intersection the right of way. Therefore, if you find from the evidence that the automobile driven by the plaintiff Letitia Howard had, at a lawful speed, entered upon the intersection of Broderick and Lombard streets and was proceeding over said intersection at a lawful speed and that the automobile truck driven by defendant Florence McCarthy had not as yet entered upon such intersection you must also find that the automobile driven by Letitia Howard had the right of way over said intersection and that it was the duty of said Florence McCarthy to yield said right of way to the automobile driven by Letitia Howard and that it was the duty of said Florence McCarthy to stop the automobile truck he was driving if the same was necessary to yield the right of way to the automobile driven by Letitia Howard." The substance of the other (numbered XXIV) was merely that if the jury found from the evidence and under the instructions theretofore given that the automobile driven by plaintiff had the right of way and that the driver of the truck failed to yield said right of way to her, and such failure was the sole and proximate cause of the collision, plaintiff was entitled to a verdict.

Defendants contend that the evidence in the case would have been sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that both vehicles approached the intersection at approximately the same time; that if it were so found, the truck, having approached from the right, would have been entitled to the right of way, under the provisions of subdivision (a) of section 131 of the California Vehicle Act, as amended in 1925 (St. 1925, p. 412, § 15), which was in force at the time of the accident, providing the truck was traveling at a lawful rate of speed, and irrespective of the fact that the coupe entered the intersection first; and they argue, therefore, that the effect of the instructions complained of was to instruct the jury erroneously that plaintiff was entitled to the right of way, if she entered the intersection first, regardless of whether both vehicles approached the intersection at the same time.

As in many other cases of this kind presented for review, defendants have singled out one instruction from the several given upon the same subject, and by a process of faulty reasoning endeavor to show that the instruction selected for criticism implies something contrary to its true meaning. As said in Weaver v. Carter, 28 Cal. App. 241, 152 P. 323, 326: "The courts have often pointed out the fallacy which often characterizes the attempt to invalidate a verdict by selecting certain detached passages in the charge of the court and subjecting them to a technical, and often a somewhat hypercritical, analysis to show that they misstate the law or are calculated to mislead the jury to the prejudice of the rights of one of the parties to the action. It is hardly conceivable that a set of instructions could be prepared from which isolated parts could not be selected and conclusively shown, when taken alone and by themselves, to be erroneous and detrimental to a party to the suit. Hence the obvious proposition has often been emphasized that all the limitations, qualifications, or conditions which must ordinarily accompany the statement of principles of law to a jury in a particular case cannot be given in one sentence, nor, indeed, in one paragraph or a single instruction, and that, where they are found properly stated in the general charge of the court, the cause will not be reversed, even though in isolated passages there is an omission to state them; in other words, if all the instructions, taken together, and not being inconsistent with each other or confusing, give to the jury a fair and just notion of the law upon the point to which they

The construction defendants would have placed upon the instruction above quoted is obviously based upon a distortion of its terms, for as will be observed it does not state unqualifiedly, as defendants argue, that plaintiff was entitled to the right of way if the jury found, merely, that she entered the intersection first, but it expressly declares that her right of way was dependent upon the conditions that she had already entered and "was proceeding over said intersection at a lawful speed and that the automobile truck * * * had not as yet entered upon such intersection" (italics ours); and it would seem to be quite impossible for the jury to find that she was in the position of "proceeding over" the intersection before the truck entered upon the same, without having first found that she approached the intersection ahead of the truck; unless, of course, the truck was stopped at the intersection and admittedly such was not the case, the truck driver himself having admitted that the coupe was at a standstill at the intersection when he reached the westerly property line of Broderick and that he did not stop.

However, aside from the technical wording of this particular instruction, the record discloses that the court gave some forty-nine instructions, all of which appear to be satisfactory to defendants except the two mentioned, and among them gave several others having either a direct or indirect bearing upon the question of the right of way at intersections. One of them embodied the very section of the California Vehicle Act upon which defendants rely. The instruction was as follows: "The law of this State in force at the time of this accident, provides as follows: Section 131 (a) of Motor Vehicle Act; Right of Way: 'When two vehicles approach an intersection of public highways at approximately the same time, the vehicle approaching from the right shall have the right of way, provided such vehicle is traveling at a lawful speed.' If you find that Mrs. Howard did not comply with the above provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act, and that her failure to comply with such provisions was the sole proximate cause of this accident, then I instruct you that your verdict must be in favor of the defendants." Furthermore, the jury was instructed that the driver of the truck had a right to assume that plaintiff would drive her machine in a lawful and prudent manner and would observe the provisions of the California Vehicle Act (instruction XV); and that he had the right to assume that other drivers of automobiles would yield to him the right of way if such right of way was given him (instruction XVI); also that a failure to comply with a duty imposed by a statute of a state constituted negligence as a matter of law (instruction XX). If defendants desired any instructions more specific in terms upon the subject, they should have proposed the same; and having failed to do so, cannot be heard to complain of those given. Wirthman v. Isenstein, 182 Cal. 108, 187 P. 12. As held in Brown v. Beck, 63 Cal. App. 686, 220 P. 14, defendants had the opportunity at the trial to request instructions in accordance with the views they are now advancing, and having failed to take advantage of that opportunity, they may not be heard to complain at this time. See, also, Wirthman v. Isenstein, supra; Viera v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 10 Cal. App. 267, 101 P. 690; 24 Cal. Jur., p. 796.

The case of Hoffman v. McNamara, 102 Cal. App. 280, 282 P. 990, upon which defendants mainly rely and from which they have extensively quoted in their brief, is essentially different from the present one. There the appellant admitted that both vehicles approached the intersection at approximately the same time, and that, therefore, the vehicle approaching from the right was entitled to the right of way, if traveling at a lawful speed; nevertheless the appellant requested the court to instruct the jury that as an exception to this rule the motorist on the left would be entitled to the right of way if he entered the intersection first. Obviously, to have given such an instruction would have been to add a distinct clause to the statute, containing an exception to the traffic rule therein declared; and consequently the trial court refused to give the same, and such refusal was sustained on appeal. The decision in the other case which is strongly emphasized by defendants, Jordan v. Great Western Motorways (Cal. App.) 294 P. 9, has since been set aside by a transfer of the cause to the Supreme Court. But even in the decision so vacated, there is nothing which conflicts with the views herein expressed, for there some six instructions were held to be prejudicially erroneous; and the court concluded therefore that under such circumstances the jury was not fully and fairly instructed as to the law of the case. Here, as pointed out, the principal instruction assailed was not erroneous, and whatever slight uncertainty there may have been, if any, in its wording, was done away with by giving the later instruction embodying the section of the California Vehicle Act upon which the preceding instruction was based. James v. Frazee, 209 Cal. 456, 288 P. 784.

[4] Moreover, from an examination of the reporter's transcript it would seem that the contention defendants now make, that both vehicles approached the intersection at approximately the same time, originated since the appeal was taken, and that there is no substantial evidence in the record to justify such conclusion. The truck driver did not so testify, and although there is a sharp conflict as to the exact location of the truck at the time the coupe started across the intersection, all of the testimony shows that the coupe reached the intersection and stopped there before the truck reached the intersection. In this regard plaintiff and Mrs. Murphy testified that before attempting to cross the intersection, after having stopped, they looked up and down Lombard street and saw no vehicle approaching, and that after having reached the middle of the intersection they looked again and at that time the truck was up Lombard street just about opposite a certain red house, which proved to be more than 55 feet from the intersection; and Miss Legeal testified that as they stopped at the intersection she looked up Lombard street and that the truck was then near the third pole, westerly of the intersection, which was shown to be at least 115 feet distant therefrom. And the truck driver himself, and another witness produced by defendants, stated that the coupe was stopped at the intersection when the truck reached the same, his testimony being that when he reached the westerly property line of Broderick street he saw the coupe stopped at the intersection; that believing he had the right of way he reduced his speed to about five or six miles an hour, and without stopping proceeded to cross the intersection, but that the coupe then entered the intersection ahead of him, turning first to the left as if to go down Lombard street and then to the right to go up Broderick; and that the collision was inevitable. In view of the foregoing testimony, it would appear that there was no substantial evidence to warrant the jury in finding that both vehicles approached the intersection at approximately the same time.

The judgment is affirmed.

RENO v. A. L. BOYDEN CO. et al.

Civ. 6834.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

July 28, 1931.

1. Chattel mortgages ⇨219.

Evidence showed that chattel mortgagor sold mortgaged honey with mortgagee's permission, justifying nonsuit of mortgagee's action against mortgagor and mortgagor's vendee for damages from sale.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1061(3).

Possible error in granting nonsuit could not be prejudicial, where only effect was to prevent judgment for defendant on merits (Code Civ. Proc. § 475).

3. Chattel mortgages ⇨219.

Where chattel mortgagee permitted mortgagor to sell mortgaged honey on mortgagor's promise to pay him from proceeds, mortgage lien was extinguished from time of sale.

4. Chattel mortgages ⇨219.

Chattel mortgagor may sell mortgaged property absolutely with mortgagee's oral consent.

5. Chattel mortgages ⇨219.

Chattel mortgagee permitting mortgagor to sell mortgaged goods waived penal statute requirement that mortgagee be notified of sale (Pen. Code § 538).

6. Chattel mortgages ⇨219.

Chattel mortgagor's promise to pay mortgagee $500 on mortgage note from proceeds of sale of mortgaged goods held good consideration for mortgagee's permission to sell goods, regardless of whether mortgagor kept promise.

Prior to June 1, 1926, plaintiff and defendant Fassel owned together a certain apiary and equipment pertaining thereto, located in San Bernardino county; also some honey and wax at the apiary and certain honey stored with the defendant A. L. Boyden Company in Los Angeles county. Apparently about that date, plaintiff sold his half interest in the apiary, equipment, wax, and honey to Fassel, who executed and delivered his promissory note in the sum of $4,500 therefor, and also executed and delivered a chattel mortgage covering said personal property to secure said note, dated June 1, 1926, but actually executed and acknowledged July 6, 1926, and recorded in Los Angeles county July 9, 1926, and in San Bernardino county August 3, of that year. A portion of the honey stored with defendant company was sold by defendant Fassel to said A. L. Boyden Company after the recording of said mortgage in Los Angeles county, and suit was brought by plaintiff against both to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of said sale. The case was tried before the court, a jury having been waived, and at the close of plain-tiff's evidence motion was made by each defendant for nonsuit on the ground that the evidence showed that plaintiff had given his consent to the sale. Such motions were granted, and, from the judgment and order, plaintiff appeals.

Appellant contends that the evidence shows a consent with a condition precedent, viz., that he was to be first paid $500, and that in consequence the court erred in granting said motions. Plaintiff was asked: "Did you ever give Mr. Boyden or Mr. West or anyone representing the company permission to sell or dispose of this honey? A. No, sir; not without written notice from me." It nowhere appears in the evidence that the sale was made by the Boyden Company, but it does appear that such company bought the honey from defendant Fassel, and the answer given is eminently correct.

On cross-examination, plaintiff was asked if defendant Fassel had talked with him about a permit to sell the honey, to which he replied: "He asked me many times if he couldn't sell it. I always refused.

"Q. You told him absolutely he couldn't sell it? A. Absolutely."

Plaintiff was then shown a letter dated November 29, 1927, which he said was in his handwriting, and which contained the following language: " * * * & don't forget that I give you permission to sell honey & if you sold all I was to rec. 500.00 & as it stands I never even rec. 5c can you blame me for not approving of such business."

Asked as to what he meant by that language, the witness said: "I didn't give you [sic] permission to sell anything unless you give me $500 and interest.

"Q. You did give him permission to sell the honey, did you not? A. If he paid me the money; but he never did.

"Q. You gave him permission to sell the honey providing he paid you? A. $500 cash and all interest. But under no other condition."

Asked for the conversation between himself and defendant Fassel at the time he gave such permission, he said: "Mr. Fassel did ask me several times about selling the honey. I told him the last time he positively couldn't sell that honey unless he paid me $500 and all interest to date. Other than that I wouldn't permit him to sell it at all.

"Q. The $500 he was to pay to you was to come out of the proceeds? A. I don't know where it was to come from. As long as he paid me I didn't much care where it came from.

"Q. You expected him to sell the honey and get $500 and turn that over to you, was that it? A. Yes."

The letter referred to was introduced in evidence and it appears therefrom that it was in reply to a "nasty letter" which plaintiff had received from defendant Fassel. In the beginning of the communication plaintiff says: "Well from all I can read in your letter you are quite in arms at this time. Am sorry it has to be as is but all I have asked for is the interest due me. Yes, you have paid 200.00 & there is still 100.00 due & it was due June first 1927. Why didn't you pay your interest when you sold the honey? No, you pay everybody but me & I guess you thought I could wait because I was easy."

[1-5] Taking the testimony of plaintiff in its entirety and giving it the most favorable inference, it clearly shows that he gave defendant Fassel permission to sell the honey on the latter's promise to pay him out of the proceeds $500 and the interest due, and that any language used by plaintiff which, taken by itself, might be susceptible to the inference that the consent above referred to was based on the condition that plaintiff first received $500 is but a conclusion of the latter, and creates no conflict in the evidence. On the other hand, it corroborates the testimony of Fassel to the effect that he did not sell the honey until after plaintiff had given him permission so to do. In our opinion, no other conclusion could be drawn from plaintiff's evidence. Even assuming that error was committed in granting the motions here in question, the only effect we can see that it had was to prevent a judgment on the merits in favor of defendant, and, from an examination of the entire record, we fail to see where any substantial rights of appellant were affected. Under the circumstances, even if it is error it should be disregarded. Section 475, Code Civ. Proc. Fassel having sold with plaintiff's consent, there could be no conversion, either in the sale by him or in the purchase by his co-defendant, as it was clearly intended under the permission granted that upon such sale the title should pass to the purchaser free of the lien of the mortgage above mentioned, and that the proceeds of the sale were to be received by Fassel, who in turn was to pay to plaintiff $500 thereof. As was said in White Mountain Bank v. West, 46 Me. 15, 20, concerning a similar situation, "from the time of sale, the lien of the mortgage was extinguished, and the mortgagee was left with no security but the personal promise of the mortgagor to pay the proceeds to him." The rule laid down therein was expressly approved by our Supreme Court in the case of Maier v. Freeman, 112 Cal. 8, at page 12, 44 P. 357, 53 Am. St. Rep. 151. In that case, there was a writing appointing the mortgagor agent of the mortgagee to take six cars of sheep from Arizona to California, "he to turn over the proceeds of said sheep to us." No authorization to sell was expressly conferred by such writing, but such authority might be inferred therefrom by reason of its reference to the disposition of the proceeds of sale. We know of no law requiring such authorization to be in writing, nor has any been cited us by appellant, although he calls attention to the fact that in this case it is not in writing. The rule seems to be that a mortgagor may make an absolute sale of the mortgaged property with the mortgagee's verbal consent. Section 456, Jones on Chattel Mortgages, 5th Ed. Section 538, Penal Code, so far as applicable here, provides in substance that one who sells any part of mortgaged property is guilty of larceny and punishable accordingly, "unless * * * at or before the time of making such sale * * * such mortgagor informs the person to whom such sale * * * is made, of the existence of the prior mortgage, and also informs the prior mortgagee of the intended sale, * * * in writing, by giving the name and place of residence of the party to whom the sale * * * is to be made." On the face of such statute, it is clear that its purpose is to protect not only the purchaser of mortgaged property by giving him notice of the existence of the mortgage, but the mortgagee as well, by giving him the name and address of the intended purchaser so that he can trace his property. But where, as here, the property is sold with the consent of the mortgagee, there would seem to be no reason for such requirement, as the latter waives his lien and the buyer is protected by the absolute sale.

As was said in Gage v. Whittier, 17 N. H. 312, 319, of a penal statute in New Hampshire which prohibited the sale by the mortgagor of mortgaged property without the written consent of the mortgagee entered upon the mortgage and upon the margin of the record thereof, "It was no part of its design to interpose any restraint upon the alienation of personal property, with the assent of the mortgagee, against whom a title may be acquired, as it would seem, as well since as before the statute, by any proper evidence of his having assented to the sale, or of his having become a party to it." In the case of People v. Phillips, 30 Cal. App. 31, 157 P. 1003, 1004, the court says that "the giving of mere permission to sell does not work a waiver of the right to have notice of the sale furnished" under section 538, Penal Code. The Supreme Court, however, in denying an application for hearing after such decision, says: "In denying the application we do not wish to be understood as holding that if permission to sell was given by the mortgagee it would not operate as a complete waiver of the requirement of the statute that notice of the sale shall be given to the mortgagee." People v. Phillips, supra, page 35 of 30 Cal. App., 157 P. 1005.

[6] Appellant urges that there was no consideration for the consent given by him. The honey sold was apparently only a small part of the property covered by the chattel mortgage, and, so far as the evidence shows, the note was not due. Plaintiff accepted the promise of the mortgagor to pay him $500 from the proceeds of sale on the principal of the note, which would seem to be a good consideration notwithstanding the fact that Fassel did not live up to his promise, if in fact he did not.

Judgment affirmed.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Defendant was accused by information of the crimes of rape and incest. The first four counts charged him with rape committed upon the person of a daughter then sixteen years of age, and counts 9 to 12, inclusive, charged the same acts as incest. Counts 5 to 8 charged defendant with rape committed upon the person of another daughter, of the age of fourteen years, all of said acts having occurred on and between September 1, 1928, and August 14, 1929. The jury returned verdicts of guilty on each of the sixteen counts on February 13, 1931, and defendant having also entered a plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity," was by stipulation tried as to such plea on February 16 before the same jury; a verdict finding him sane at the time of the commission of the offenses charged being returned on such plea. Prior to pronouncing judgment the court on motion of defendant vacated and set aside the verdicts as to counts 1 to 8, inclusive, charging rape. From the judgments of conviction on the verdicts on the remaining eight counts, charging incest, and from the orders of the court denying his motion for new trial and his application for probation, defendant has appealed.

Appellant contends: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdicts and judgments, and (2) that the verdict of the jury as to the sanity of defendant lacks support of evidence.

[1-3] 1. Outside of arguing that the testimony of each complaining witness is so inherently improbable as to be unworthy of belief, appellant does not question the fact that if worthy of belief such testimony amply supports the verdicts and judgments. He does, however, contend that both were accomplices, and that there is no sufficient corroboration of their testimony under section 1111, Penal Code. The testimony that they were sixteen and fourteen years of age stands undisputed. Said section defines an accomplice as "one who is liable to prosecution for the identical offense charged against the defendant on trial in the cause in which the testimony of the accomplice is given." The complaining witnesses both being under the age of eighteen years, it would be the duty of any magistrate in whose court a complaint was filed on the same charges as contained in the information here, upon ascertaining that fact, to immediately suspend all proceedings and forthwith certify the cases to the juvenile court of the county, where the same charge could not possibly be brought and prosecuted, and no other court could legally proceed on the original charges unless the persons charged had been remanded by order of the juvenile court for prosecution therein, either as being over the age of eighteen years or as being unfit subjects for consideration of the juvenile court. Sections 4c, 5, and 6, and 1, 2, and 3 of the Juvenile Court Law (St. 1915, pp. 1225-1229, as amended). In view of the positive mandate of section 5 above cited, and in the absence of any proof in the record before us that the juvenile court has refused to take jurisdiction of such cases, we fail to see how it can be said that either complaining witness is liable to prosecution for the offenses charged against appellant. In consequence they could not be accomplices, and no corroboration of their testimony was necessary. Both girls told a straightforward story, which must have carried conviction to the jury hearing them, and the jurors were the sole judges of the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses. As the evidence of the complaining witnesses seems to us to be "legally sufficient to prove the guilt of a defendant * * * we may not examine with minuteness claims that witnesses are discredited, or that their evidence is unworthy of belief." People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 200, 48 P. 75, 79. Nor do we find any error in the instructions complained of which related to the necessity of corroboration and the fact that the girls could not give legal consent to the acts charged.

[4, 5] 2. "In this state, in order that 'insanity may be available as a defense to a crime charged, it must appear that the defendant, when the act was committed, was so deranged and diseased mentally that he was not conscious of the wrongful nature of the act committed.'" People v. Troche, 206 Cal. 35, 46, 273 P. 767, 772. The evidence on this question consisted of the testimony of lay witnesses, friends and relatives of defendant, and of experts, some of the latter who had examined appellant at the time of his incarceration in the state hospital, which occurred in the fall of 1929, and during the period of his stay there. An examination of such evidence shows that on the point as to whether or not he was conscious of the wrongful nature of the act committed the evidence is not seriously conflicting, and, of course, the verdict of the jury is conclusive on that question (People v. Troche, supra), notwithstanding the fact that the evidence does show that appellant's mental balance was somewhat disturbed by overindulgence in alcoholic liquors. It is also to be noted that the testimony of the lay witnesses was largely in support of this last condition, none of them, or in fact any of the witnesses, so far as we have found, testifying that in their opinion the defendant did not understand the wrongful nature of the acts committed; and the fact that after the girls were taken to juvenile hall and the officers came to arrest him, he excused himself and disappeared and was not apprehended for several days, and then some three miles from his home, indicates rather persuasively that he did so understand.

[6] It is urged that the instructions given were conflicting and erroneous. While the evidence to a certain extent is conflicting, as we have said, we do not see how the jurors could have reached any other conclusion than they did, as the conflict seems not to be on the real point at issue; and even if the instructions were erroneous, which we do not find them to be, we do not see how appellant was prejudiced.

Appellant also urges the unconstitutionality of section 1027 of the Penal Code. We have had occasion to consider this question before and determined it adversely to such contention in the case of People v. Strong (Cal. App.) 300 P. 84, notwithstanding the direct conflict with the case of People v. Dickerson, 164 Mich. 148, 129 N. W. 199, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 917, Ann. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Coast Adjustment Bureau against the Indemnity Insurance Company of North America. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; SEAWELL and LANGDON, JJ., dissenting.

Hartley F. Peart and Sylvester J. McAtee, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Percy V. Long and Bert W. Levit, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

WARD, Justice pro tem.

This is an action based upon a bond issued by the appellant Indemnity Insurance Company of North America to the respondent, whereby appellant bound itself to pay to the respondent "any direct financial loss, that it may sustain by reason of any act of larceny, embezzlement, theft or any other fraudulent or dishonest act, wrongful abstraction or wilful misapplication," committed during the term of the bond by any employee covered by the schedule attached to the bond. A jury returned a verdict for plaintiff. Judgment was entered with certain interest, and defendant appealed. The bond provided: "When the Assured discovers a loss hereunder, written notice of same shall be delivered to the Company and within ninety (90) days thereafter an itemized statement of claim shall be furnished to the Company. * * * This bond shall terminate, as to any employee, upon the discovery by the Assured of a loss through or on account of such employee."

Respondent is engaged in the adjustment of losses for insurance companies. Its main office is in San Francisco, but it has branch offices located at points throughout the western states. Each branch office is in charge of a branch manager, and at each branch are located one or more adjusters and clerical help. The method of financing the branches was as follows: The branch manager had authority to draw drafts upon the head office of respondent, whereby he obtained the necessary funds for operating the branch office. Each branch manager was permitted to draw what he thought would be needed for the operation of his branch, and he was instructed not to draw too heavily in the early part of the month. The funds so obtained were used to pay all of the expenses of the branch, including the branch manager's salary. The funds drawn were charged to each branch manager personally, and it was not required that they be kept in bank in the name of respondent. At the end of each month each branch manager would submit to the head office an account wherein would be shown the amount of money received from the head office through the medium of drafts, a detailed itemization of all expenditures, and the balance due to the head office. A check for this balance payable to respondent was required to accompany the statement of account.

An employee, Pixler, was the agent of respondent at Boise, Idaho, from December, 1924, until July of 1926. Pixler was covered by the schedule attached to the bond. In the early part of 1925, Pixler, to meet certain payments on his property, etc., was permitted by the respondent to draw on his salary for the succeeding month. In June of the same year, Pixler drew a draft for $1,000 after having drawn one for $350. The home office withheld payment pending explanation by Pixler. It subsequently developed that $400 was used for Pixler's personal use, which was returned at the end of June. In April, 1926, Pixler drew a draft for $1,200, part of which was used for Pixler's doctor's and hospital expenses. This brought from the home office a wire to Pixler that he had exceeded his authority, and that no consent would be forthcoming for use of money beyond business requirements and necessities. Pixler accounted for the money at the end of the month. The adjustment company did not give notice to the bonding company of this transaction. During the first twelve days of July, 1926, Pixler drew on respondent for $2,450, upon which the verdict of the jury for $1,943 in favor of respondent was based. Respondent notified the bank at Boise City that a certain draft, a part of the $2,450, would not be honored, pending satisfactory advices from Pixler. Subsequently Pixler resigned. An accountant examined the books, appellant was notified of the result of the examination, and the filing of this action followed.

[1-4] The principal point in this case is whether there was discovery by respondent of the loss, on account of Pixler's financial transactions, prior to July, 1926. As used in the bond, the word "loss" has reference only to a wrongful abstraction, willful misapplication, or a fraudulent or dishonest act, such as larceny, embezzlement, or theft. "Abstraction" is taking from with intent to injure or defraud." Words and Phrases, Third Series, Vol. 1, page 46. Wrongful abstraction has been defined as "an unauthorized and illegal taking or withdrawing of funds, etc., and the appropriation of such funds or securities to the benefit of the taker." Chapman v. Nieman (Tex. Civ. App.) 276 S. W. 302, at page 303. "Willful misapplication * * * means a willful, unauthorized, and illegal application of the funds or securities of the bank to the use and benefit of the employee." Chapman v. Nieman, supra. In defining willful misapplication, Words and Phrases, Third Series, Vol. 7, page 1038, uses the following language: "The intent to injure and defraud, which is essential, does not necessarily involve malice or ill will, but merely that general intent to injure and defraud which always arises, in contemplation of law, when one willfully or intentionally does that which is illegal and fraudulent." The controlling element in all of the enumerated acts set forth in the bond is fraud. If the use of the money obtained by the drafts simply created an indebtedness from Pixler to the respondent and did not constitute a fraud, then it would be unnecessary to report such transactions to the bonding company. "The insured is not called upon to act on mere suspicion in the matter of giving notice to the insurer. * * *" See Los Angeles Athletic Club v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 41 Cal. App. 446, 447, 183 P. 174, 177. Though respondent cautioned Pixler not to draw in excess of his necessary business needs, and though he was plainly told that respondent's funds were not to be used for personal use, nevertheless, it is plain that respondent did not treat the use of such funds for personal expenses as anything more than an indebtedness, which in their minds did not arise to the enormity of a fraud. We find this position somewhat justifiable in view of the fact that from January, 1925, until June, 1926, the money was accounted for at the end of each month. It is true respondent had opportunity of investigation and means of knowledge, but the apparently frank statements of Pixler and the return of the funds at the designated periods was evidently sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that respondent did not discover; that is, that actual knowledge of fraud was not apparent until July, 1926. "It is held that these provisions (requiring the obligee to notify the surety promptly of any act of fraud or dishonesty) do not enlarge the duty of the obligee when no special stipulation is made for the exercise of diligence in supervising the conduct of the principal, and that the covenant that the obligee shall at once notify the surety of any act of fraud or dishonesty on the part of the principal, only covers such acts as are actually known to the employer, and not those he might have known by the exercise of diligence." Stearns on Suretyship (3d Ed.) 420; Perpetual Building & Loan Association v. United States Fidelity & Guarantee Co., 118 Iowa, 729, 92 N. W. 686.

In view of the foregoing facts and the conclusions reached thereon, the motion for a nonsuit was properly denied. What has been said heretofore answers the contentions of appellant relative to the instructions given and refused.

Appellant contends that a remark made by the court was an abuse of discretion and prejudicial to defendant's position. The record does not indicate that any objection, assignment of misconduct, or motion to strike out, or motion to instruct the jury to disregard the remark was made. We are satisfied that the remark was not intended to and did not sway the jury upon any phase of the issues involved in this case.

[5, 6] Upon motion of respondent after verdict and judgment, the court made an order amending the judgment, on the verdict, by allowing interest upon the amount of the judgment from August 11, 1926, the date upon which the proof of loss was filed. Appellant contends that plaintiff was not entitled to interest, as a matter of law, for the reason that the recovery sought was not for sums capable of being made certain by calculation. The case of Perry v. Magneson, 207 Cal. 617, 279 P. 650, relied upon by appellant, was a matter wherein the court had to determine the cost of completing a building. The amount was not fixed. In this case, the amount was made certain in the proof of loss. No claim of its uncertainty was made during the trial. "Every person who is entitled to recover damages certain, or capable of being made certain by calculation, and the right to recover which is vested in him upon a particular day, is entitled also to recover interest thereon from that day. * * *" Civ. Code, § 3287. The bond provided: "Third: When the Assured discovers a loss hereunder written notice of same shall be delivered to the Company and within ninety (90) days thereafter an itemized statement of claim shall be furnished to the company." The proof of loss was filed August 11, 1926, and interest was properly allowed from that date. There was no issue of fact as to interest, and the court had the right to amend the judgment. See Engelberg v. Sebastiani, 207 Cal. 729, 279 P. 795.

FEENY v. SMILEY et ux.

Civ. 4292.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

July 23, 1931.

1. Trusts ☞372(3).

In action to establish trust, finding that defendants, one of whom was trustee, were owners of land they caused plaintiff to purchase, allegedly as temporary accommodation to trustee, held supported.

2. Trusts ☞31.

To establish trust relationship, there need not be transfer of legal title to trustee.

3. Appeal and error ☞1011(1).

There being substantial evidence to support findings, judgment must be affirmed, though evidence be conflicting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas C. Gould, Judge.

Action by Nellie S. Feeny against William F. Smiley and wife. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Garner White, of Inglewood, for appellants.

Roane Thorpe, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem.

The main contention of the appellants on this appeal is that the evidence is not sufficient to support the judgment.

It is admitted that on the 25th day of April, 1927, defendant William F. Smiley was, by written instrument, appointed the trustee of plaintiff to receive for her certain money amounting to $8,500 from Orson L. Early, and that on or about the 5th day of August, 1927, the appellant William F. Smiley had in his possession, as such trustee, under said written instrument a sum in excess of $1,500, which he had received from the said Early.

There was evidence produced on the part of plaintiff to the effect that she reposed confidence and trust in appellant William F. Smiley, and for that reason had appointed him her trustee; that on or about the 5th day of August, 1927, appellant William F. Smiley represented to respondent that he was in trouble with one Minnie Handley to whom he had sold a tract of land for $5,250; that she was suing him for the return of her money; that he desired respondent to help him out of said difficulty by buying said tract of land; and that, if she would do so, he would sell the same within a short time and make her a profit, or that, if he failed to sell the land in a short time, he would return her money. He further stated to her that he had enough money in his hands, as trustee, to make a down payment of $1,500 for her.

Respondent informed Smiley that she did not want the property and did not wish to buy it, but was willing to help him temporarily, if he could sell the land within a short time, so that she would be repaid her money, and failing in that he would return her money, and, upon the assurance of Smiley that he would do so, she agreed to purchase the property; that the purchase price was $5,250, upon which the $1,500 held by Smiley, as trustee, was applied, and two notes for $2,000 and $1,750 were signed by respondent in favor of Jennie Smiley, and same were secured by two deeds of trust aggregating the sum of $3,750; that respondent was induced to enter into said deal and make the purchase of said property solely by reason of the representations made to her by appellant Smiley; and that but for said representations she would not have purchased it.

It is admitted by the amended answer that respondent demanded of appellants the return of the $1,500, and that she offered to return everything she had received under the said sale to her of said land, but the appellants, and each of them, refused, and still refuse, to comply with her demand.

Respondent was corroborated in her statements regarding the representations made to her by appellant Smiley by the testimony of Jane Garn and F. W. Rinehart, who were present when the representations were made by appellant to respondent and by Louise O'Connell, who was present at a subsequent interview respondent had with appellant Smiley.

[1-3] The claim of appellants that the court erred in finding that appellants were the owners of the tract of land in question on the 5th day of August, 1927, is without foundation. In the first place, it is admitted that one of the appellants, Jennie Smiley, was the owner. This is no evidence that it was her separate property. On the other hand, the escrow instructions, filed as an exhibit, show that this tract was conveyed by quitclaim deed to Jennie Smiley and William F. Smiley by Minnie Handley and Albert M. Handley, and that appellants joined in the deed conveying the property to respondent.

Appellants also contend that the following finding is not supported by the evidence: "That plaintiff during all of the times mentioned in the complaint herein reposed great confidence and trust in the defendant William F. Smiley and had for that sole reason appointed him trustee; that said plaintiff had not had any experience in business dealings of any kind and accepted without question the business advice of her said trustee, the said William F. Smiley."

Appellant testified that she had perfect confidence in Smiley; he was her trustee, and she thought, of course, he would look out for her interests; that she never did any business in regard to this piece of property or any other property that was discussed without his advice.

It is evident from her testimony that she had the utmost confidence in Smiley, and the inference is fairly deducible that it was owing to that confidence that she selected him as her trustee, and as such relied upon him.

Appellants take the position that in the agreement between Early and respondent Smiley was merely a depository, although named as trustee, and cites numerous authorities to the effect that a depository under those conditions is merely the agent of the parties for a limited purpose. However that may be, the acceptance by respondent of Smiley as her trustee under the terms of that agreement supports the claim of respondent that she had confidence in him and trusted him.

Appellants claim that to establish a trust relationship there must be a transfer of the legal title to the trustee. This is not the law. A trust may be established in many ways. It may be established where the bond between the parties is merely one of friendship. Cal. Jur. vol. 25, p. 130; Palladine v. Imperial Valley F. L. Ass'n, 65 Cal. App. 727, at page 745, 225 P. 291, 299, where the court said: "It has been held that when men deal as friends, and one accepts as true false representations by the other, into which, but for the relation of friendship, he would have made inquiry, the law will protect him in his trust."

The evidence produced by respondent in this case clearly shows that she relied wholly and entirely upon the representations of Smiley. She testified that she made no personal examination of the property, nor any independent investigation regarding it prior to its purchase by her. She did not regard it as a bona fide sale of the property to her, but merely as a temporary means of relieving Smiley from the trouble he was experiencing from the suit brought against him by Minnie Handley.

Appellants moved for a new trial, which was denied, and judgment was thereupon rendered.

While the evidence was conflicting, there is substantial evidence to support the findings of the trial court, and, such being the case, the judgment must be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

RATLIFF v. RATLIFF.

Civ. 6574.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 6, 1931.

1. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 162(4).

Denying plaintiff's motion to set aside default and judgment on cross-complaint made almost six months after entry of default, evidence conflicting concerning delay, held not abuse of court's discretion (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

2. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 875.

Plaintiff not appealing from default judgment entered on cross-complaint, on appeal from order refusing his motion to vacate default, could not object to sufficiency of cross-complaint; defects not affecting court's jurisdiction.

3. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 106(1).

Court was authorized to treat pleading containing essential elements of cross-complaint as to part of claim, as cross-complaint requiring answer, and to render default judgment thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Marshall F. McComb, Judge.

Action by Robert E. Ratliff against Christina D. Ratliff, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. From orders made after final judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Koenig & Brunton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. L. Belt and Edmund S. Green, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J.

On August 20, 1928, default of plaintiff was entered for failure to answer defendant's cross-complaint. Thereafter on December 11, 1928, and pursuant to said default, judgment on the cross-complaint was entered. On February 19, 1929, pursuant to notice given, cross-defendant presented to the court a motion that the said default and judgment be set aside and that the execution on the judgment be recalled and quashed. The grounds of motion were that the default and judgment and execution had been taken against cross-defendant through his inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect; and that the judgment was void for the reason it was rendered on a counterclaim. The motion was heard upon affidavits by the respective parties. At the same time cross-defendant moved that he be permitted to file answer to cross-complaint nunc pro tunc as of February 12, 1929. These motions having been denied, said cross-defendant appealed from each of said orders of denial.

[1] The first contention of appellant is that there was an abuse of discretion in the court's failure to grant relief from the default and judgment. Such applications for relief must be made within a reasonable time, but in no case exceeding six months after the judgment, order, or proceeding was taken. Section 473, Code Civ. Proc. This motion was presented on the next to the last day of the sixth month after the entry of default. The affidavits show a conflict in the evidence concerning the circumstances of delay involved in the motion. Abuse of discretion has not been shown and the order denying relief should be affirmed.

[2, 3] The next point suggested by appellant is that the judgment is void in that the cross-complaint did not state a cause of action as a cross-complaint, but was only a counterclaim, requiring no answer. The complaint of the plaintiff stated a cause of action for conversion of certain described personal property. The cross-complaint stated a cause of action apparently intended for recovery of certain personal property or its value, of which property at least a part corresponds in description to the property described in plaintiff's complaint. The amount of the demand, based upon the alleged reasonable value, exceeded $500. Since there was no appeal from the judgment, we think that appellant is not entitled, on appeal from the orders in question here, to raise this objection to the sufficiency of the cross-complaint. The defects are not such as could affect the jurisdiction of the court. Van Loben Sels v. Bunnell, 131 Cal. 489, 494, 63 P. 773. The pleading on which the judgment is based contained the essential elements of a cross-complaint, with respect to at least a part of the property claimed; therefore the court had authority to treat it as a cross-complaint requiring an answer and to render judgment on default. Under the law as existing at the time the cross-complaint was filed the amount of the demand was sufficient to bring the case within the jurisdiction of the superior court at that time.

Since the court was justified in refusing to vacate the judgment, it follows that there is no error in the second order from which the plaintiff appeals, viz., the order denying motion to file answer to cross-complaint.

The orders are affirmed.

PREDER v. FIDELITY & CASUALTY CO.
OF NEW YORK et al.

Civ. 6866.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Aug. 4, 1931.

Notaries  11.

Notary's certifying to trustee's forged signature on void trust deed securing note did not proximately cause loss to trustee who paid note.

It appeared that trustee's action to recover against notary and her surety was based on fact that notary certified to forged signature on trust deed and falsely certified that trustee, whose signature was forged, had appeared before notary and acknowledged signature, but it did not appear that, aside from creating cloud on title to realty involved, void trust deed executed by perpetrator of fraud created any obligation on trustee through instrumentality of notary, and, since it could not have resulted in valid subsisting indebtedness, there was no legal liability.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Marshall F. McComb, Judge.

Action by William Preder against the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

John F. Poole, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, for respondent Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York.

Fred E. Peterson and Berge Lion, both of Los Angeles, for respondent Henrietta Schreiber.

CRAIG, J.

General and special demurrers having been sustained, the plaintiff appealed from the resultant judgment.

Respondent Schreiber was a notary public in and for the county of Los Angeles, and the respondent corporation issued its usual bond guaranteeing the faithful performance of her services as such notary public. A deed of trust, bearing the forged signature of appellant as one of three trustees of a firm designated as Nau, Preder & Co., purporting to be a lien upon certain real property and to secure a promissory note, was certified as having been acknowledged personally by said trustees. Being "hard pressed financially * * * plaintiff was compelled to sell" said property, and "to make said sale and clear the title * * * was compelled to pay" the principal sum of said note. It was further alleged that the notary also certified to certain deeds "making up the title upon which said forged trust deed rested," but it nowhere appears as to what if any damage appellant claims to have sustained as a result of these latter alleged derelictions. The asserted basis of the action arises from the fact that the defendant Schreiber certified to a false signature, and falsely certified that the plaintiff appeared before said notary public and acknowledged the same.

It is contended that it was reversible error to sustain the demurrers of the defendants without leave to amend. However, it does not appear that, aside from a clouding of the title to the realty, the void deed of trust executed by the perpetrator of the fraud created any obligation upon the part of appellant through the instrumentality of the notary public. Since it could not have resulted in a valid subsisting indebtedness, it follows that there was not a legal liability. Neither involuntary payment of the amount of the note, nor the validity of the deed of trust, could have been alleged. "In an action such as this it must appear that the default of the notary was the proximate cause of the loss, or there can be no recovery. 20 R. C. L. 336; American Surety Co. v. PRESTON, P. J.

The plaintiff, Lutitia Smith, was kicked by a horse belonging to the defendants. She and her husband, William C. Smith, brought this action for damages. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, resulting in a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for both special and general damages in the total sum of $1,929.20. From this judgment the defendants prosecute this appeal.

Appellants, who are husband and wife, own and operate a merchandise store on the east side of Main street in the town of Campo Seco, in Calaveras county. In front of the store building is a porch about eight feet wide and three feet high, which was used by the people as a sidewalk in front of the store. About 100 feet south of the store, and on the same side of the street, is the post office. People living north of the store and on the east side of the street, in going to and from the post office, generally travel in the main street in front of the porch of store, for the reason that, at the north end of the porch, there were four steps to climb before reaching the top of the porch, and on the south side the steps were lower than on the north side, and it was much easier to traverse the porch going north than going south.

Appellants, in making deliveries of merchandise, used a wagon drawn by two horses, one a black mare named "Babe." When goods were to be delivered, the wagon would be driven parallel with the porch and close enough to permit the defendant A. Zana, the driver, to step from the wagon to the porch or vice versa.

The horses were only tied by setting the brake and wrapping the lines around the brake handle.

On the day of the accident, the wagon and team were parked in this position, with the team headed north and standing about 3 or 4 feet from the porch. While the team and wagon were in this position, Mrs. Smith went to the post office, and, upon returning, approached the team from the rear and walked between the porch and the team. In passing, the mare Babe kicked her and inflicted the injuries complained of.

[1,2] The defendants contend that Mrs. Smith was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. This contention is based principally upon the testimony given by Mrs. Smith to the effect that she had observed the mare Babe which kicked her, shortly before the accident, and she was "skittish," and that Mr. Zana could not drive her close enough to the porch for him to step from the wagon to the porch. That the mare "kind of shied off from the porch."

Also that she could have gone over the porch or to the west of the wagon in perfect safety. And that Babe had blinds on the bridle and could not see to the rear, and that she approached the team from the rear without speaking to them.

From these facts appellants strenuously insist "that Mrs. Smith did not exercise that ordinary care required by the law for her own safety, but on the contrary, chose a course that any person of ordinary prudence would consider positively dangerous." It must be admitted that there is much force to this argument.

We think, however, the question of contributory negligence on the part of Mrs. Smith was a question of fact to be determined by the court from all the facts and circumstances appearing in the evidence, and the learned trial court having determined that Mrs. Smith was not guilty of contributory negligence, and there being sufficient evidence in the record to sustain this finding, we are powerless to interfere.

The court also found upon sufficient evidence: "That for more than 5 years prior to the commencement of the action, the said defendants knowingly kept, maintained and harbored a vicious, mean and dangerous mare accustomed to kick, strike out and injure persons. * * *

[3] The law is well established that it is only where no fact is left in doubt and no deduction or inference, other than that of negligence, can be drawn by the court or jury from the evidence, that the court can say, as a matter of law, that negligence or contributory negligence is established.

[4] Even where the facts are undisputed, if reasonable minds can draw different conclusions upon the question of negligence or contributory negligence, the question is one to be determined by the jury, if there be a jury; if not, by the court.

The authorities supporting this rule are so numerous that we need only cite one or two: Fike v. San Joaquin Light & Power Corp., 73 Cal. App. 712, 239 P. 344, and cases there cited.

There is no other contention made for a reversal of the judgment. For the reason stated the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

CORCORAN v. PACIFIC AUTO STAGES,
Inc., et al.
Civ. 7909.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.
Aug. 6, 1931.

1. Appeal and error ⇨685.

Where record did not show appellee waived jury trial, reviewing court could not consider error in permitting jury trial.

2. Automobiles ⇨244(6).

Verdict for pedestrian struck by bus held sustained by evidence of negligence.

Evidence disclosed that, while walking along edge of highway and shortly before he was hit, a light shone from the rear on the pedestrian's back; that he turned his head to the left, and, as he did so, the bus was within two feet of him and hit him from the rear, despite his attempt to step to his right; that there were no other objects in the highway and that no object obstructed the bus driver's view ahead; and that at the time of the impact and for approximately one hundred feet back the bus was being operated half off the right-hand side of the highway.

3. Automobiles ⇨244(51).

Defense that pedestrian struck by bus was contributorily negligent in violating statute by walking on right-hand side of highway outside business or residential district could not be sustained, absent evidence showing nature of district, since it will not be presumed that pedestrian was violating law (St. 1923, p. 517, § 28½ (c), as added by St. 1929, p. 510, § 7; St. 1923, p. 517, § 150½, as added by St. 1929, p. 546, § 66; Code Civ. Proc. § 1869).

California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517) § 150½, as added by St. 1929, p. 546, § 66, requires pedestrian walking on highways outside of business or residence districts to walk close to his left-hand edge of the highway, and California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517) § 28½ (c), as added by St. 1929, p. 510, § 7, provides that every public highway shall be conclusively presumed to be outside of a business or residential district unless its existence within such district shall be established by clear and competent evidence and unless signposted when and as required by the act. Defendant did not introduce any evidence that the place was not signposted.

4. Automobiles ⇨242(8).

Defendants had burden of establishing contributory negligence of pedestrian struck by defendants' bus (Code Civ. Proc. § 1869).

5. Negligence ⇨136(5).

On personal injury action, refusing directed verdict for defendants upon evidence sufficient to sustain verdict for plaintiff held proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by John Corcoran against the Pacific Auto Stages, Inc., and another. From an adverse judgment, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Barry J. Colding, Theodore Hale, and Carroll B. Crawford, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

A. J. Stebenne, of Redwood City, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J.

This is an action for personal injuries. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed.

On the evening of the 16th day of March, 1930, the plaintiff was knocked down and suffered the injuries complained of when he was a few feet from the westerly side of the highway leading from San Mateo to San Francisco. The accident occurred in the city of San Mateo approximately ninety feet south of the southerly line of Sixteenth avenue where the street abuts on the highway.

[1] The appellant contends that the trial court erred in permitting the cause to be tried by a jury over the objection of the defendants' counsel, plaintiff having waived trial by jury by failing to deposit with the clerk, within ten days prior to the date set for trial, a sum equal to the amount of one day's jury fees. It will suffice to state that none of the facts supporting that contention appear on the record before us. True it is that the objection was made in the trial court, but the objection was not supported by an affidavit, the records of the trial court, or otherwise.

[2] The defendants next assert that the verdict is contrary to law inasmuch as no proof was presented at the trial of any act of negligence on the part of the defendants or of either of them or of any fact or facts from which the jury could rightfully infer such negligence. The plaintiff testified that he had alighted from an automobile at the corner of Sixteenth avenue and El Camino Real, and that he walked directly to the west side of the last-named highway, and then when he arrived there that he turned south and walked along the westerly side of the highway to the point where the accident happened. It was a dark rainy night and he was a stranger in the neighborhood. While he was walking rapidly along the edge of the highway and shortly before he was hit a light shone from the rear on his back. He turned his head to the left, and as he did so the defendants' bus was within two feet of him. He turned his head and attempted to step to his right, but as he did so he was hit from the rear by the bus. There was evidence that at the time of the accident a Studebaker automobile was traveling parallel to the bus and on its left side, and both were going south. However, the record shows affirmatively that there were no other objects in the highway, and that no object at all obstructed the driver's view ahead. There was also evidence that at the time of the impact and for approximately one hundred feet back the defendants' bus was being operated half off the right-hand side of the highway. In view of these facts, it cannot be said that there was no evidence of negligence. Bauhofer v. Crawford, 16 Cal. App. 676, 117 P. 931.

[3, 4] The next point made by the defendants is that the verdict was contrary to the evidence because the evidence affirmatively showed that plaintiff's injuries were sustained directly and proximately through his own negligence and carelessness. True it is that the defendants introduced some evidence to that effect. It was their contention that immediately before the collision the plaintiff was in the act of jay-walking, and, furthermore, that he ran in front of the Studebaker automobile, and, having done so, dived in front of the bus being operated by the defendants, and that as he did so the defendants were powerless to avoid the accident. However, there is other evidence in the record. We have set forth that according to the plaintiff's testimony he was walking on his right-hand side of the highway in the city of San Mateo. His counsel contend that the accident occurred in a residence or business district, and that the plaintiff was within his rights in walking on that side. California Vehicle Act, § 150½ as added by St. 1929, p. 546, § 66. The defendants answer that there is no evidence that the place was in a "residence or business district." We think there was. Furthermore, it will not be presumed that plaintiff was violating the law. If it be conceded, as defendants claim, that there is no evidence in the record to the effect that the place where the plaintiff was walking was in a residence or business district, still the point must be ruled against the defendants. To prove a defense there should have been evidence showing the nature of the district. Section 150½ of the California Vehicle Act provides: "It shall be unlawful for any pedestrian to walk along and upon any highway outside of a business or residence district otherwise than close to his left-hand edge of the highway." And subdivision (c) of section 28½ of the same act as added by St. 1929, p. 510, § 7, provides: "Every public highway shall be conclusively presumed to be outside of a business or residential district unless its existence within a business or residential district shall be established by clear and competent evidence as to the nature of the district, and unless signposted when and as required by this act." But the defendant did not introduce any evidence that the place was not signposted. To establish a defense of contributory negligence the burden was on the defendants. Code Civ. Proc., § 1869; Kohler v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 26 Cal. 606, 611; Wilson v. California C. R. R. Co., 94 Cal. 166, 174-175, 29 P. 861, 17 L. R. A. 685; Alaska Salmon Co. v. Standard Box Co., 158 Cal. 567, 570, 112 P. 454.

[5] The last point made by the defendants is that they tendered an instruction instructing the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendants and the trial court refused to give it. It is claimed that the refusal was error. In view of what we have said above, it is quite clear that no error whatever occurred by reason of the trial court's refusal.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MUNSON.

Cr. 1626.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

July 28, 1931.

1. False pretenses ⇨49(1).

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for grand theft.

2. False pretenses ⇨49(3).

In grand theft prosecution, corroboration required by statute may consist of statements made to others similar in character to fraudulent ones relied on by prosecuting witness (Pen. Code, § 1110).

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Porter Munson was convicted of grand theft, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Alfred J. Hennessy, of San Francisco, for appellant.

TYLER, P. J.

Defendant was accused under two separate indictments of grand theft. The two indictments were consolidated. Trial was had, and he was found guilty as charged in both indictments. Motion for a new trial was made and denied, and this is an appeal from the order and judgment. The main point urged for a reversal is that the verdict is contrary to law and the evidence.

The first indictment charged that defendant did feloniously steal, take, and carry away certain shares of stock, belonging to one J. A. Daly, in different corporations, of the value of about $4,500. The second indictment charged that he did steal, take, and carry away similar property belonging to a different person of the value of about $15,888. The offenses charged are of the character that was formerly designated as obtaining money under false pretenses. In support of the claim that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, it is urged that the complaining witnesses received for their property all that defendant agreed to give them, and hence there was no crime committed. We cannot subscribe to this conclusion, as we are of the opinion that there is ample evidence in the record to show that defendant, with fraudulent intent, was engaged in an unlawful enterprise or scheme designed to prey upon ignorant, credulous and foolish persons.

[1] With reference to the first indictment, there is evidence to show that on or about the 15th day of May, 1930, defendant, accompanied by two young women, called upon one James A. Daly at his home. They were familiar with the fact that he owned shares of stock in different corporations. Defendant represented to Daly that he was the owner of a wonderful mine which was producing ore running over $20 a ton, and that he desired funds with which to purchase certain machinery. Defendant stated that the mine was in full operation, and that twenty men were employed on the premises. He exhibited samples of ore and a vial containing gold dust which he represented came from the mine. He assured Daly that he would make large profits in a few months. The securities that Daly owned had cost him some $4,500, but had suffered a depreciation in value. Defendant informed Daly that he would give him his note for an amount equal to the original cost of the securities, and in addition thereto an interest in the mine, if he would put his stock in the venture. Daly was given the further assurance, which was false, that he could not possibly suffer a loss, as defendant carried life insurance in the sum of $100,000, and he would see to it that, in the event of anything happening to him, Daly's funds would be protected. Acting upon these representations, Daly went to his bank, withdrew his securities, and indorsed and delivered them over to defendant, who in turn delivered to Daly his promissory note as agreed. The next day defendant sold the securities for the sum of $2,825. The evidence further shows that, while defendant had a deed to the mine, it was not in operation, no men were employed thereon, and, in fact, it had not been in operation for a long time.

The evidence in support of the second indictment is of a like character. It shows that on about the 6th day of September of the same year defendant interviewed one Pierre Cerise, and represented to him that he was the owner of a mine located in Calaveras county with some two hundred acres adjoining thereto; that it was in full operation, some sixteen men being employed therein. Cerise, like Daly, was the owner of certain securities for which he had paid the sum of $15,888. The securities had also depreciated in value. Defendant informed Cerise that, in the event of his investing in the mine, he would give him his promissory note for the original cost of the above securities, and, in addition thereto, a 2 per cent. interest in the mine. He further stated that he would hold the stock in escrow under certain conditions. Acting under these representations, Cerise thereupon indorsed and turned over his securities to defendant, who sold them the next day for a sum several thousand dollars less than their cost. It appeared in evidence that defendant did not own this particular mine, but simply held an option to purchase the same for which he had paid the sum of $1. The mine was not in operation as represented, nor were any men employed on the premises.

For the purpose of showing motive and intent, evidence of other grand thefts committed by defendant in connection with the mining property was offered and received, and it appears therefrom that defendant secured large sums of money by reason of his false and fraudulent scheme. It is argued that the statements that the mines would pay large profits is but an expression of opinion of something to occur in the future, and therefore not what the law designates as a false pretense. Admitting this to be true, there were other representations as to existing and past facts which were untrue and made with the design of fraudulently obtaining possession of the property of the complaining witnesses. The evidence is ample to sustain the charge in both indictments.

[2] And, finally, it is claimed that the charges against defendant are wholly lacking in the corroboration required by section 1110 of the Penal Code. The claim is without merit. The corroboration required by the section invoked may consist of statements made to others similar in character to the fraudulent ones relied upon by the prosecuting witness. People v. Whiteside, 58 Cal. App. 33, 208 P. 132. As above indicated the record contains such statements.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ROSENBLOOM.
Cr. A. 654.

Appellate Department, Superior Court, Los Angeles County, California.
July 23, 1931.

1. Indictment and Information ⇨125(4).

Where statute denounces series of acts altogether, and each separately, constituting offense, indictment charging all acts is sufficient and supported by proof of one act.

2. Criminal law ⇨252(2).

Defendant in municipal or justice's court cannot take advantage of formal defects in complaint (Pen. Code, § 1426).

3. Criminal law ⇨252(3).

Nicety of pleading is not exacted in justice's or municipal court (Pen. Code, § 1461a).

4. Criminal law ⇨252(1).

Sufficiency of complaint in justice's or municipal court must be tested by statute outlining requirements thereof, not by statute prescribing requirements of indictment (Pen. Code, §§ 950, 1426).

5. Criminal law ⇨252(1).

Complaint in justice's or municipal court, lacking in anything required by statute, is defective in substance (Pen. Code, § 1426).

6. Criminal law ⇨252(3).

Defendant in justice's or municipal court may not insist on sufficient particularity in complaint to enable pleading former acquittal or conviction (Pen. Code, § 1426).

7. Criminal law ⇨258(1).

On motion in arrest of judgment in municipal court, for defects in complaint, proceedings at trial may be considered in determining prejudice (Pen. Code, § 1452).

8. Criminal law ⇨968(1).

Motion in arrest of judgment can be made only upon grounds specified in Code (Pen. Code, § 1452).

9. Criminal law ⇨1044.

Unless motion in arrest of judgment points out particulars of insufficiency of pleading, point will not be considered on appeal (Pen. Code, § 1452).

10. Criminal law ⇨260(10).

That complaint in municipal court, charging defendant with selling misbranded drug, failed to state manner of misbranding, could not be considered on appeal, where motion in arrest of judgment did not state grounds of motion (Pen. Code, § 1452).

11. Druggists ⇨12.

Where labels on bottles contained words "pure fluid extract of ginger," and "U. S. P.," misbranding could be shown by proof that any other ingredient than ingredient properly belonging in fluid extract of ginger was contained therein, or that contents did not come up to U. S. P. standards (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 58, §§ 1, 5, 6).

This was so, since words on labels constituted representation that no ingredients were contained in contents of bottles other than those which properly belonged in fluid extract of ginger, and that drug conformed to standards of United States Pharmacopoeia.

12. Druggists ☞5.

If label is false or misleading, drug may be "misbranded," though nothing be said about it or label be not shown to or read by buyer (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 58, §§ 1, 5, 6).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Misbrand; Misbranding," see Words and Phrases.]

13. Druggists ☞5.

Where ginger did not conform to U. S. P. standards, and contained poison not properly in ginger, label containing words "pure fluid extract of ginger" and "U. S. P." constituted "misbranding" (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 58, §§ 1, 5, 6).

14. Druggists ☞12.

In prosecution for misbranding, evidence that, as result of drinking defendant's ginger extract, buyers became paralyzed, held admissible to prove that ginger labeled "pure fluid extract of ginger" contained certain poison not properly contained therein (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 58, §§ 1, 5, 6).

Such testimony was not only admissible as means of showing that ginger labeled "U. S. P." was mislabeled, since not conforming to United States Pharmacopœia, and was substandard, but also because, although labeled as ginger, it contained other substances, including this poison, as disclosed by effect on drinkers, and which had no place in extract of ginger.

15. Criminal law ☞1144(12).

On appeal, court held required to disregard contradiction in testimony of people's witness, and assume that jury believed statement making other testimony based thereon admissible.

16. Druggists ☞12.

In prosecution for misbranding ginger extract, presence of poison producing paralysis held provable by effect of ginger on drinkers.

Expert testified that, but for presence of such poison, men would not have become paralyzed.

17. Druggists ☞12.

In prosecution for misbranding, evidence, admissible to prove ginger contained poison not properly contained therein, held not rendered inadmissible because tending to prove adulteration (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 58, §§ 1, 5, 6).

18. Criminal law ☞442.

Reply letters are presumed genuine, although bearing typewritten or rubber stamp signatures.

19. Criminal law ☞442.

In prosecution for misbranding drugs, letter containing jobber's alleged guaranty against misbranding held inadmissible as reply letter, because of insufficient proof of contents and mailing of first letter.

Reply letter bore signature of signer, but signature was stamped thereon. Defendant testified merely that some one in his office wrote letter "to the firm from which he bought the ginger," that he saw it before it went out, and that shortly thereafter he received the alleged guaranty. There was no proof that letter, to which letter offered in evidence was a reply, was ever deposited in United States mails with postage paid.

20. Criminal law ☞323.

There is presumption that matter deposited in mails, with postage paid, is delivered to addressee.

21. Criminal law ☞442.

To make reply letter admissible as such, there must be internal evidence that it is reply letter, which must be either by showing contents or subject-matter of first letter.

22. Druggists ☞5.

Offense of misbranding drugs held not to require specific intent (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 58, §§ 1, 5, 6).

23. Criminal law ☞808.

In prosecution for misbranding, reading to jury of portions of act defining adulteration held not error, where one means of proving misbranding was by showing adulteration (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 58, §§ 1, 5, 6).

24. Criminal law ☞1172(1).

In prosecution for misbranding drugs, reading to jury of portions of act defining adulteration, even if error, held not to call for reversal, where record conclusively showed misbranding (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 58, §§ 1, 5, 6).

Appeal from Municipal Court of Los Angeles; Ellis A. Eagan, Judge.

Jacob Rosenbloom was convicted of violation of the Pure Drugs Act of 1907 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 58), and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Charles P. Johnson, City Prosecutor, and Joe W. Matherly and John L. Bland, Deputy City Prosecutors, all of Los Angeles, for the People.

YANKWICH, Judge pro tem.

The defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of violation of the Pure Drugs Act of 1907 (Deering's General Laws, 1923 Ed., Act 58).

The complaint alleged that the defendant did, on March 23, 1931, "sell and offer for sale and hold out for sale and offer to deliver a drug, to-wit: extract of ginger, Superior Brand, which was then and there mislabeled and misbranded." It is contended that the complaint does not state an offense. Sections 5 and 6 of the act describe several distinct acts by way of definition of the terms "mis-labeled or misbranded," and section 1 provides that "any person who shall * * * sell, or offer for sale, or keep for sale, * * * any such adulterated, mislabeled, or misbranded drug, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." From the evidence in the case, it appears that the misbranding here involved is that denounced by section 5, which declares an article to be misbranded "the package or label of which shall bear any statement, design, or device, regarding such article or the ingredients or substances contained therein which shall be false or misleading in any particular."

[1-6] It is elementary that, where a statute denounces a series of acts, each of which separately and all together constitute an offense, an indictment or information is sufficient which charges all the acts denounced by the statute, and may be supported by proof in the record which shows the commission of one of the series of acts. People v. McClenne-gan, 195 Cal. 445, 452, 234 P. 91; People v. Welch, 89 Cal. App. 18, 264 P. 324. However, here the complaint described the offense by using terms defined in the statute, without specifying the particular act of mislabelling or misbranding. It has been held in California that charging a statutory offense in the language of the statute without designating the means is, at most, a defect of form. People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 191; People v. Welton, 190 Cal. 236, 240, 211 P. 802. However, there is authority in the federal courts, under the Federal Pure Food Law, to the effect that the failure to specify the particular act of misbranding of which the defendant was guilty is a defect of substance, justifying the court in sustaining a demurrer to the evidence. United States v. St. Louis Coffee & Spice Mills (D. C.) 189 F. 191.

There is no demurrer to a complaint provided for in criminal procedure in municipal courts. "Any substantial defect in the complaint" is, however, made a ground for arrest of judgment. Penal Code, § 1452. The use of a limiting adjective here implies, of course, that there may be defects to which the section does not apply, but its proper construction is a matter of some difficulty. In the Superior Courts any defect which would be ground for a general or special demurrer is available on motion in arrest of judgment (Penal Code, § 1004; People v. Welton, 190 Cal. 236, 211 P. 802); but defects which are ground merely for a special demurrer are not so available, unless they are first objected to by demurrer. Such minor defects, consisting in the absence of that particularity which, in view of the peculiar nature of the offense, might be necessary in order to enable the defendants to prepare properly for and make their defense, are not defects of substance, but of form. People v. Welton, supra, 190 Cal. at page 240, 211 P. 802. In the justices' and municipal courts, since no provision is made for a demurrer, and the motion in arrest of judgment is limited to substantial defects, there appears to be no mode by which a defendant can take advantage of defects of form; that is, he is in the same position as a defendant in the Superior Court who has failed to demur. But nicety of pleading is not exacted in justices' courts (Ex parte Winston, 160 Cal. 18, 21, 116 P. 390), and, since the practice in the municipal courts, in criminal cases, is the same as that of justices' courts (Penal Code, § 1461a), this rule should apply to the municipal courts also. By section 1426 of the Penal Code, a complaint in the justices' (and municipal) courts is sufficient if it sets forth "the offense charged, with such particulars of time, place, person, and property as to enable the defendant to understand distinctly the character of the offense complained of, and to answer the complaint." The sufficiency of a complaint in a justice's (or municipal) court must be tested by this section, not by section 950 (Ex parte Winston, supra, 160 Cal. at page 20, 116 P. 390), and, if it is lacking in any matter required by section 1426, it may be regarded as defective in substance.

In the Winston Case it was held that a complaint which discloses the character of the offense charged (battery), and charges it in the words of the statute, is sufficient on habeas corpus, though it says nothing as to the particular acts of force and violence. Here the court also declared that cases holding that a defendant is entitled to have the charge against him set forth with sufficient particularity to enable him to plead an acquittal or conviction in bar of a subsequent prosecution are all cases where the question arose on special demurrer, and that such particularity is not a jurisdictional matter, since the identity of offenses can be otherwise determined. Since there is no provision for special demurrer in the justices' (or municipal) courts, or other mode of objecting to defects in form, a defendant is not entitled, in those courts, to insist on particularity in the respect here mentioned.

[7-10] The defect in the present case is not a total absence of a necessary averment—that is supplied, though by way of conclusion, by the allegation that the ginger was mislabeled and misbranded—but an uncertainty as to the particulars regarding the matter. It sets forth the offense with such particulars as to enable the defendant to understand distinctly the character of the offense and to answer the complaint. Since the question may be raised only after trial, the proceedings at the trial may be given consideration in determining this matter, and they fail to show that the defect in the complaint in any way prejudiced defendant in making his defense.

A motion in arrest of judgment can be made only upon the grounds specified in the Code. None others are available. People v. Bawden, 90 Cal. 195, 27 P. 204; People v. Gardner, 98 Cal. 127, 32 P. 880; People v. Chaves, 122 Cal. 134, 143, 54 P. 596; People v. Delhantie, 163 Cal. 461, 125 P. 1066. It was decided in an early case (People v. Dick, 37 Cal. 277)—which has never been questioned or overruled,—that the particulars of the insufficiency of the pleading must be specifically pointed out in the motion. Otherwise the point will not be considered on appeal. See People v. Sansome, 98 Cal. 235, 239, 33 P. 202. The necessity for pointing out the particulars of insufficiency is much more apparent in cases arising in municipal courts, because no provision is made for a demurrer, either general or special. And it is not quite consonant with fairness and fundamental justice to allow the defendant to pass unnoticed or to overlook deliberately a defect in the complaint which is not jurisdictional, and permit him to spring it for the first time on appeal.

Even if we assume, therefore, that the complaint is defective, in a matter of substance, for failing to specify with which of the kinds of misbranding denounced by the statute the defendant is charged, the error cannot be considered here, because the record before us, while stating that a motion in arrest of judgment was made, does not state the grounds of the motion. We do not even know whether the insufficiency of the complaint was one of them. For all we know, counsel for the defendant may have urged some other grounds which are not even sanctioned by the Code. In view of the strict interpretation which our courts have placed upon the motion, the failure of the record to disclose as ground of the motion in arrest of judgment the particular ground urged here is fatal to its consideration by this court. We may add that, by being compelled to stand trial upon a complaint which lacks the required particulars, the defendant is in no worse situation than if the complaint had charged all the kinds of misbranding and mislabelling denounced by the act. In that event, as already stated, the conviction would depend (and could be supported) upon proof in the record of guilt as to any one of these species of misbranding and mislabelling. In neither case would the defendant know until the trial the particular act of the series with which he is charged. In last analysis, therefore, the hardship, if any, is no different when he is compelled to plead to a complaint which (without particularizing) charges him with an offense which is designated by a statutory name than when he is required to plead to a complaint which charges him with a series of acts.

[11, 12] The evidence of misbranding is clear. The labels on the bottles contained the words "pure fluid extract of ginger" and "U. S. P." This was a representation that no ingredients were contained in the contents of the bottles other than those which properly belonged in fluid extract of ginger, and that it conformed to the standards of the United States Pharmacopœia. The falsity of this claim on the label could be shown by proof that any other ingredient was contained in the contents, or that they did not come up to the U. S. P. standards. Of course, such evidence might have a tendency to show also that the ginger was adulterated, but it does not follow that the conviction was based on a showing of adulteration only. A drug is adulterated under section 4 of the act if, when sold under or by a name recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia, it differs from the standard of strength, quality, or purity laid down therein, or if the strength or purity fall below the professed standard or quality under which it is sold. The question of adulteration does not, therefore, concern itself with the label. The representation as to quality or character required on a charge of adulteration may be made orally, by letter, or in many ways other than by label. On the other hand, if the label is false or misleading the drug may be misbranded though nothing is said about it or the label is not shown to or read by the purchaser.

[13] In this case the evidence is clear that the ginger did not conform to the standard set by the United States Pharmacopœia. The label was therefore false in this respect. There was also evidence tending to show that it contained a poison which would not be in pure extract of ginger. Hence the statement on the label that the ginger was "pure" was also false. These falsehoods on the label in relation to the article contained in the bottles and the ingredients thereof constituted a misbranding.

[14-17] The defendant sold the ginger to pharmacists, and several paralytics, who had purchased the product from a druggist to whom the defendant sold it, were allowed to testify to the fact that they became paralyzed as a result of drinking the ginger. It is insisted that this was error, because there was no charge of adulteration and the testimony on behalf of the people showed that paralysis would result only from the presence in the ginger of the poison known as triorthocresylphosphate, and that none was found in the remnants of the ginger sold by the defendant, upon test. The absence of the poison, if it were a positive fact proved, might, at first blush, make the admission of testimony as to the effect of the drinking of the ginger appear erroneous. However, the evidence on the subject is purely negative. There is no showing that any chemical test was made to find the poison. Dr. F. G. Crandall, a witness for the prosecution, who testified to the effect upon drinkers of the presence of this poison, was asked: "Now, so far as you know, there is no phosphate, that long name, found in it?" He answered: "No sir, none found in the particular sample Mr. Abernathy tested." Abernathy was the chemist who had analyzed the sample. The sole object of his analysis was to determine compliance with United States Pharmacopœia. He testified that the product was substandard. It is evident that the absence of the poison was merely assumed by Dr. Crandall, from the fact that Abernathy's analysis made no mention of it. Moreover, on cross-examination, by the defendant's own counsel, Dr. Crandall stated that, but for the presence of the poison, the men would not have become paralyzed. The testimony was therefore admissible as a means of showing that the ginger was mislabelled, not only because it did not conform to the United States Pharmacopœia, and was substandard, as disclosed by analysis, but also because, although labelled as ginger, it also contained other substances, including this poison, as disclosed by the effect on the drinkers, and which had no place in extract of ginger. It is true that the witness also testified that the victims might have become paralyzed even if they had drunk unadulterated ginger. But, on appeal, we must disregard the contradiction and assume that the jury believed the statement which makes the testimony admissible. In this view of the evidence, the presence of the poison could be proved by the effect of the ginger upon the persons who drank it. Such evidence would show misbranding. And, it being admissible for that purpose, the evidence was not rendered inadmissible by the mere fact that it also tended to prove adulteration. People v. Ciulla, 44 Cal. App. 719, 722, 187 P. 46; People v. Ball, 102 Cal. App. 353, 357-358, 282 P. 971.

[18-21] Error is predicated upon the refusal of the court to receive in evidence the following letter:

"Columbus 8774                      Jordan Bros.
     "1841 Broadway
     "New York City.
                     "Aug. 15, 1930.

"Gentlemen: We have your letter of recent date and in reply beg to advise that we are not manufacturers of any of the products which we handle; we are jobbers of such items as Imitation Extracts, Drug Sundries, Fluid Extract of Ginger Bitters, etc. We buy these products from the manufacturing or jobbing houses and in the case of extracts or any item which comes under the Pure Food and Drug Act or the Internal Revenue Dept. (Prohibition Unit) we always insist on a guarantee and naturally we can give you the same guarantee that we receive, which is as follows:

"Guarantee.

"Trusting to hear from you at some early future date, we are,

"Yours very truly,

"Tom Jordan
     "Jordan Bros."

The letter was offered as a guaranty under section 21 of the act. The refusal to receive it was based upon the ground that no proper foundation had been laid for its reception. The signature of the signer was not written in, but stamped. If this was a reply letter, the objection upon that ground was not valid. Fielding v. Iler, 39 Cal. App. 559, 563, 179 P. 519; note, 9 A. L. R. 990 et seq. The presumption of genuineness of reply letters is indulged in even as to letters bearing typewritten or rubber stamp signatures. Barham v. Bank of Delight, 94 Ark. 158, 126 S. W. 394, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 439; Lancaster v. Ames, 103 Me. 87, 68 A. 533, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 229, 125 Am. St. Rep. 286; National Acc. Society v. Spiro, 78 F. 774 (C. C. A. 6). However, the letter was inadmissible under the rule as to reply letters, because of insufficient proof of the writing or contents, and, more particularly, of the mailing of the letter to which it was said to be an answer. Kvale v. Keane, 39 N. D. 560, 168 N. W. 74, 9 A. L. R. 972; Consolidated Grocery v. Hammond, 175 F. 641 (C. C. A. 5).

The rule admitting reply letters depends in part on the presumption that matter deposited in the United States mail with the postage paid is delivered to the addressee, and in part on the internal evidence of the contents of the reply that it is an answer to a letter sent to the writer of the reply by the person who produces it. There can be no such internal evidence without a showing of the contents, or, at least, the subject-matter of the first letter. Here the defendant testified merely that some one in his office wrote a letter "to the firm from which he bought the ginger," that he saw it before it went out, and that shortly thereafter he received the alleged guaranty. The evidence in the case of Kvale v. Keane, supra, was much stronger. And yet the court there held that the proper foundation as to mailing or receipt had not been laid for its introduction. It is to be borne in mind that the letter was offered as a guaranty from the manufacturer which, under section 21 of the act, was a complete defense to the charge of misbranding, if believed by the jury. We feel that the nature of the document—the force which the law gives to it—should make us apply the rules just declared, if at all, with greater strictness, lest fraud be encouraged by a looser rule.

[22-24] Several minor contentions may be disposed of briefly. We think the sample of ginger analyzed was sufficiently identified as coming from bottles bearing the brand of the defendant. The court's charge to the jury was, on the whole, adequate and fair. It consisted, in addition to the usual instructions as to the presumption of innocence, of the reading of the various sections of the act, in hæc verba. The court even went so far as to read to the jury section 21 of the act, relating to the effect of a guaranty, although the written evidence of the guaranty was excluded. Thus the jury were left to infer the existence of a guaranty from other testimony. The court properly instructed the jury that intent was immaterial. The offense is not one which requires a specific intent. People v. Dillon, 199 Cal. 1, 7-9, 248 P. 230; U. S. v. Sprague (D. C.) 208 F. 419; U. S. v. Thirty-Six Bottles of London Dry Gin (C. C. A.) 210 F. 271. In view of the conclusion reached that adulteration was one of the means of proving misbranding and mislabelling, we cannot say that the reading to the jury of the portions of the act which define adulteration was error. As the jurors could conclude that there had been a misbranding or mislabelling through failure to disclose the presence of ingredients which showed adulteration, a definition of adulteration under the act would aid them in determining the fact. Moreover, the record shows so conclusively the mislabelling—and facts from which one could readily infer that the ginger contained the poison which produced paralysis—that, on the basis of the whole record, we would be compelled to hold that any error in this or any other respect comes within the saving grace of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution of California. See People v. Stefani (Cal. App.) 300 P. 112; People v. North, 81 Cal. App. 113, 122, 252 P. 1063.

Public Works Act (St. 1919, p. 487) provides that on public work the contractor must give a bond for at least one-half of the contract price of the work, guaranteeing that, if the contractor fails to pay for any materials, provisions, provender, or other supplies or teams, used in the performance of the work contracted to be done, the surety or sureties will pay the same.

Equipment which will ordinarily be entirely consumed on particular job for which it is purchased is "materials" and "supplies" within public contractor's statutory bond (St. 1919, p. 487).

Special demurrer to materialman's complaint seeking recovery on public contractor's statutory bond held properly sustained, without leave to amend, for uncertainty regarding date materials were furnished (St. 1919, p. 487).

Complaint contained copy of notice of claim of lien, which contradicted itself and complaint as to date materials were furnished, which was important because materials were required to be sold to the contractor to be used in carrying out his contract, and must have been furnished after the date of the contract and before the date of filing of the notice of claim of lien, which necessary fact the notice of claim of lien did not clearly show, and, while the complaint might have been amended to conform to the true facts, time for filing notice of claim of lien as required by St. 1919, p. 487, had elapsed, and no new or amended notice curing the defect in the notice filed could have been filed, and a proper and legal notice of claim of lien was a prerequisite to the materialman's recovery against the surety company.

6. Highways ⇨113(5).

Filing of proper notice of claim of lien was prerequisite to materialman's recovery upon public contractor's bond (St. 1919, p. 487).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Action by the A. L. Young Machinery Company against I. H. Cupps and others, including the Indemnity Insurance Company of North America. From a judgment of dismissal in favor of Indemnity Insurance Company of North America, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

CURTIS, J.

In this action we granted a rehearing for the reason that we failed in the opinion heretofore rendered by us to pass upon the special demurrer interposed to the second amended complaint in this action by the defendant surety company. We are in entire accord with the conclusions reached by us regarding the merits of the general demurrer as set forth in our former opinion, and we express our approval of this opinion by adopting it in its entirety.

It reads as follows:

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment of dismissal in favor of defendant insurance company entered after the trial court had sustained a demurrer to plaintiff's second amended complaint without leave to amend. The facts as set forth in plaintiff's complaint, so far as necessary to be considered on this appeal, are as follows:

On November 26, 1924, defendant Cupps entered into a contract with the county of San Joaquin for the construction of a designated public highway in that county for the total sum of $10,459.50. On December 4, 1924, Cupps filed with the board of supervisors of the county of San Joaquin a bond in the sum of one-half the contract price, naming the defendant insurance company as surety. The bond specifically recited that it was given and executed pursuant to the Public Works Act of 1919 (St. 1919, p. 487). It is then alleged that during the performance of the work under this contract, and between January 13 and February 16, 1926, the plaintiff sold, delivered, and furnished to the contractor certain materials, supplies, implements, and machinery, consisting of one 30-foot steel frame bucket elevator complete; one 36 by 12 inch screen; a one-yard drag scraper; and certain pulleys, belts, lanterns, hose, and extension for the elevator; that there still remains due and unpaid on the above articles the sum of $1,405.75. It is then specifically alleged that the above equipment was "furnished for use under the contract above mentioned and were used in, upon, for and about the work contracted to be executed and performed under said contract, and were totally used up, consumed, destroyed and worn out in, upon, for and about the performance of said work under said contract, and at the completion of said work had no further use or value for the purpose for which they were constructed, and were without salvage value." The date of completion of the work and the filing of the verified claim and withhold notice required by the statute are then alleged, it appearing from such allegations that these steps were all taken within the time and in the manner provided by law. Plaintiff asks judgment against the surety on its bond for the amount of the unpaid balance on the purchase price of the above equipment.

[1-3] The trial court, holding the view that the purchase price of such equipment was not covered by the bond, sustained a demurrer without leave to amend. Respondent surety company contended on the demurrer, and contends now, that it is not liable on the bond for the purchase price of such equipment, on the theory that the bond required by the public works statute allows recovery only for the reasonable rental value of such equipment, when such equipment is in fact rented, and allows no recovery for the purchase price thereof.

As stated above, the bond in question was a statutory bond given and executed under the 1919 act, as it then read. That act provides that on public work the contractor must give a bond for at least one-half of the contract price of the work, which bond must guarantee that if the contractor "fails to pay for any materials, provisions, provender or other supplies, or teams, used in, upon, for or about the performance of the work contracted to be done or for any work or labor done thereon of any kind, that the surety or sureties will pay the same. * * *

The bond issued by respondent is broader in many respects than the bond required by the statute. Both appellant and respondent devote the major portion of their briefs to the question as to whether those provisions in the bond more onerous than those required by the statute can be enforced against the surety. It is not necessary to determine that point on this appeal. It is our opinion that the expressions "materials" and "supplies" found in the statute are sufficiently broad to include equipment of the nature involved herein, when such equipment is purchased for the particular job, and is entirely consumed thereon, except for normal salvage value. It is true, of course, that the purchase price of equipment capable of being used on more than one job, and which becomes part of the contractor's general equipment, is not covered by the statute, but when the equipment is of such a nature that in the usual course of events it will be entirely used and consumed on the particular job for which it was purchased, it is our opinion that such equipment is included within the meaning of "materials" and "supplies," as used by the statute. Respondent cites several mechanics' lien cases which indicate that in those cases the lien extends only to those articles which physically go into the structure against which the lien is sought to be exerted. Those cases are not in point. It has repeatedly been held in reference to the 1919 act, and its predecessors, that such acts are to be more liberally construed than the mechanic's lien statutes, and that the reasons for giving a limited construction to the latter are not applicable to the former. Pacific Wood & Coal Co. v. Oswald, 179 Cal. 712, 178 P. 854; Sherman v. Amer. Surety Co., 178 Cal. 286, 173 P. 161; French v. Powell, 135 Cal. 636, 68 P. 92; Associated Oil Co. v. Commery-Peterson Co., 32 Cal. App. 582, 163 P. 702. It has been held under the 1919 act and similar public work statutes, that rental of machinery, money expended on the hiring of mule teams, money spent for provisions, harness, and other equipment including scrapers, freight on mules and equipment etc., are all recoverable against the surety. Williamson v. Egan (Cal. Sup.) 287 P. 503; Pacific Wood & Coal Co. v. Oswald, supra; Bricker v. Rollins & Jarecki, 178 Cal. 347, 173 P. 592, 594; Sherman v. Amer. Surety Co., supra; People's Nat. Bank v. Southern Surety Co. (Cal. App.) 288 P. 827. The theory of these cases is that the statute was intended to cover all those things which have contributed to the improvement, whether directly by physically going into the construction, or indirectly, by being entirely consumed or used in the construction. In discussing the word "supplies," as used in a previous statute, the court in Bricker v. Rollins & Jarecki, supra, stated: "The ordinary meaning of this term in its general and accepted use is such as to include goods, wares, and merchandise of almost every kind and nature, whether used in the household or on the farm, or in any sort of productive or constructive work requiring the labor or service of men or animals or machinery. In the instant case they were furnished to be used and were actually used in advancing the work to be done under this contract, and in that sense entered into and became a component part of it and of the thing produced by it. This being so, we are of the opinion that as to the above classes of claims the trial court was correct in their allowance."

The true test in such cases was indicated by the Supreme Court of South Dakota in the recent case of Dennis v. Enke, 224 N. W. 925. In that case the question involved was whether the seller of a $3,000 tractor could recover from the surety the balance of the purchase price on a bond somewhat similar to the one here involved. We take the liberty of quoting from that case at some length. At page 927 of 224 N. W., that court, after analyzing certain earlier cases, stated:

"This court has indicated in those cases that absolute and entire consumption in the work is not essential to liability, and liability is not necessarily prevented by the fact that there may be some salvage value in the materials or other supplies. It is enough if they were purchased directly and particularly for the work, were proper for the work, and were used therein, and consumed therein to such an extent that their residual value is a salvage value only as distinguished from a new value, as illustrated by pipe cut and threaded in certain lengths, lumber cut up and nailed in place to make a tool shed or a form for cement, etc. That these items have some residual value is of course true, but it is a very different value both in kind and amount from that of new lumber or new pipe in standard lengths and dimensions, and this court has held, under the circumstances of the cases heretofore considered, that the existence of some such residual salvage value did not necessarily prevent liability on the part of the surety.

"The same rule was applied to the matter of minor tools and appliances in the Dennis Case [53 S. D. 646], 222 N. W. 269, where the items involved were two scrapers at $25.50 each, and certain repair items, and where the court below found as a fact (the appeal being from the judgment only) that all of the items were purchased for the purposes of the contract and were practically worn out in carrying out the provisions of the contract."

Again, at page 927 of 224 N. W., it is stated:

"It is a matter of common knowledge that the performance of contracts of this kind requires a plant and equipment suitable therefor, many items of which are expensive and the purchase of which could not be justified by any single contract unless it was extremely large. It is further a matter of common knowledge that this kind of work is generally performed by persons who engage therein as a business and who maintain, for the purpose of the general contracting business, a very considerable amount of equipment intended and designed to be used in that business over a period of several years and in the performance of a number of contracts. We do not think it can be said to be within the contemplation of the parties that the surety on such a bond as this should be liable for the purchase price of tools and appliances which constitute and create, or become a part of, the general plant and equipment of the contractor, as distinguished from those minor tools and appliances which are consumed or practically consumed in the performance of a particular contract. The underlying principle which distinguishes between liability and nonliability is comparatively easy to perceive and grasp, difficult to phrase accurately, and still more difficult to apply precisely in border line cases. There must always be somewhat of a twilight zone in these cases between liability and nonliability dependent upon the facts in particular cases. The problem is similar to that faced by the cost accountant of a manufacturing plant in determining whether a certain tool or appliance should be charged as a direct expense item to a particular job, or should be charged to plant and equipment; the established cost of its use in the particular job being ultimately taken into account by being embraced in the percentage of general overhead expense of plant equipment and factory charged to the particular job.

"In order to create liability on the part of the surety for the purchase price of tools and appliances under these contract bonds, at least the following elements we think must be present: First, the tool or appliance must be purchased specifically and particularly for use in the performance of the particular contract; second, the use of such tool or appliance must be at least proper, if not reasonably necessary, in connection with and about the carrying out of the contract; third, the tool or appliance must be used in or about the performance of the contract; fourth, the tool or appliance must be such that it is reasonably to be expected in the natural course of events that its normal life for the purpose for which it was designed will be practically consumed by its use in and about the performance of the contract, and in this connection the facts of each particular case must be taken into consideration. For example, general experience indicates that a crew of men engaged in the performance of a contract of this kind lose and break numerous small tools and items of equipment, such as shovels, spades, hammers, etc., by reason of which they are for all practical purposes really consumed in the performance of the contract, notwithstanding the fact that such tools, if carefully handled and not lost, would be far from worn out by the actual amount of work for which they are used in the performance of a particular contract. If such small tools are purchased for the performance of the contract, are proper or reasonably necessary therefor, are used in such performance, and in such performance are lost or broken, and such loss or breakage is reasonably to be anticipated, it is entirely possible that the surety on the bond might be liable."

[4] The articles herein involved fully comply with all the requirements suggested by the above case. It is our opinion that if the articles in question were totally used up in the usual and ordinary performance of the contract, so that nothing remained in excess of normal salvage, they then lost their identity as tools, appliances, implements, and machinery, and are included within the broader definition of the words "materials" and "supplies." In such a case, in effect, they entered into and became a component part of the construction work. Certainly it is true that their full usefulness has entered into the work to the same extent as has hay for the horses or food for the men. Each case must be determined on its own facts. In the case at bar, the plaintiff has alleged the articles were purchased for the particular job and were entirely used up and consumed thereon. The truth of these allegations is admitted on demurrer. We are of the opinion that it was error to sustain the general demurrer without leave to amend. It is our opinion that plaintiff not only can, but has stated a cause of action. We do not mean by this to forecast the result of the action which, of course, must await upon the character of the evidence adduced at the trial.

The second amended complaint as against a general demurrer states a good cause of action, and, were there no other questions presented on this appeal, the order sustaining the demurrer would have to be reversed.

Defendant surety company, however, in addition to its general demurrer, also demurred specially to plaintiff's second amended complaint, which pleading we will hereafter refer to as the complaint.

[5, 6] One of the grounds of uncertainty specified in said special demurrer was that it could not be ascertained from said complaint when said implements were sold to the defendant Cupps. In paragraph VIII of the complaint it is alleged that the time of the furnishing and delivery of said implements to defendant Cupps, was between the 13th day of January and the 16th day of February, 1926. In the notice of claim of lien this time is stated in one place as between the 13th day of January, 1923, and the 16th day of February, 1925, and in another place as between the 10th day of January, 1925, and the 23d day of May, 1925.

It is apparent, therefore, that there is a direct conflict between the averments of the complaint as to the time the implements were sold and the statement in the notice of claim of lien, a copy of which is attached to and made a part of the complaint. There is also a conflict in the two statements contained in the notice of claim of lien as to the time of the sale of these implements.

The complaint, therefore, is uncertain, in that it cannot be ascertained therefrom whether said implements were sold to the contractor during the months of January and February, 1926, as alleged in the complaint, or between January 13, 1923, and the 16th day of February, 1925, as set forth in said notice of claim of lien.

The time of sale of said implements becomes important for the reason that they must have been sold to the contractor to be used in carrying out his contract with the county of San Joaquin, which, as appears from the complaint, was dated November 26, 1924. They also must have been purchased before May 26, 1925, the date of the filing of the notice of claim of lien with the officials of the county. If we take the date of sale shown by the allegations of the complaint—"between the 13th day of January and the 16th day of February, 1926"—as the time of sale, then it appears that the implements were sold to the contractor long after the notice of claim of lien was filed. If we take the time given in the notice of claim of lien as the true date—"between the 13th day of January, 1923, and the 16th day of February, 1925"—then it appears that a part, and possibly all, of said implements were sold to the contractor before the execution of the contract.

It thus appears that plaintiff's pleading is in hopeless confusion. Conceding that plaintiff might have amended its complaint to conform to the true facts, the same rule does not apply as to its notice of claim of lien. The statute requires said notice to be filed for record with certain officials of the county within a certain designated time. The time fixed by the statute for filing such a notice had elapsed long prior to the commencement of said action. No new or amended notice curing the defect in the notice which was filed could, therefore, legally have been filed. The filing of a proper and legal notice of claim of lien was a prerequisite to plaintiff's recovery against the defendant surety company.

The special demurrer on the ground of uncertainty was therefore properly sustained by the trial court. As it was impossible for plaintiff to amend its complaint so as to cure this defect—the uncertainty appearing in the notice of claim of lien—the order of the trial court sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend was not erroneous. In fact, no other order could have been proper.

The judgment is affirmed.

GOLDEN v. STATE BAR OF CALIFORNIA.
S. F. 14118.

Supreme Court of California.

July 30, 1931.

1. Attorney and client ☞52.

Complaint in writing duly verified was not essential to disbarment proceeding.

2. Attorney and client ☞57.

Concurrence of majority of state bar governors held sufficient to sustain disbarment recommendation.

3. Attorney and client ☞51.

In disbarment proceeding before state bar governors, any members present may act as prosecutors without being disqualified to participate in recommendation.

4. Attorney and client ☞57.

Charge against attorney not pursued or found upon by state bar governors could not be considered upon review of governors' disbarment recommendation.

5. Attorney and client ☞53(2).

In disbarment proceeding, state bar governors could not disbelieve attorney's testimony that he paid $50,117.54 obligation merely because petitioner testified that payment was in currency.

This circumstance gave rise to no more than a suspicion, surmise, or conjecture, and the fact that the board of governors did not believe attorney's testimony was not enough, since their disbelief must be founded on evidence sufficient to support a finding against the attorney.

6. Attorney and client ☞53(2).

Disbarment proceeding is quasi criminal, and accuser has burden to sustain charges by convincing proof to reasonable certainty; reasonable doubts being resolved in attorney's favor.

7. Attorney and client ☞53(2).

In disbarment proceeding, evidence held insufficient to sustain finding that attorney falsely swore that he had no funds in his possession as trustee belonging to trustor, where trustor had theretofore assigned interest in trust funds.

Evidence was that, although attorney had trust funds in his possession at the time, the trustor had theretofore assigned in writing her entire interest in the trust funds to friends and relatives, reserving to herself only the right to monthly payments during her lifetime.

8. Attorney and client ☞53(2).

Petition by Frank J. Golden to review a recommendation of the Board of Governors of the State Bar of California that petitioner be disbarred.

Proceeding dismissed without prejudice.

J. W. Hawkins, of Modesto, Joe G. Sweet, of San Francisco, and Philbrick McCoy, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is a proceeding to review the action of the board of governors of the state bar recommending that the petitioner be disbarred.

The board found the petitioner guilty of misappropriation of funds intrusted to him as trustee and while acting in the dual capacity of attorney and trustee for Mary Cynthia Gesford Lott. The petition is based mainly on the contention that the evidence before the board is wholly insufficient to support the findings and conclusion of the board. Preliminarily certain other contentions may be disposed of briefly.

[1, 2] The proceeding was initiated by issuing and serving upon the petitioner an order to show cause, preceded by an informal complaint made against him. It is insisted that a complaint in writing duly verified is essential to prosecution of the charge. This is not so. In the Matter of William F. Herron (Cal. Sup.) 298 P. 474.

Ten members of the board participated in the hearing. Eight of the ten made the findings and recommendation for disbarment. Two dissented, one of whom filed a dissenting opinion stating his conclusion that the evidence was wholly insufficient to support the findings upon which the recommendation was made. The other joined in the dissent. It is contended that the accused was entitled to the active participation of the entire board. We do not so conclude. In the absence of a controlling authority to the contrary, and none has been cited, the concurrence of a majority of all of the members of the board would seem to be sufficient. The dissenting opinion was not made a part of the return. It should have been returned, as this court is entitled to the views of those members of the board who do not concur in the majority action if they desire to express them in a dissenting statement or opinion.

[3] The hearing was had before local administrative committee No. 3 of the city and county of San Francisco, and was heard de novo by the board of governors. It is contended that two of the majority members of the board acted as prosecutors; that they thereby disqualified themselves to sit in judgment and participate in a recommendation. The nature of the proceedings requires that some one elicit the facts. This may be done by any or all of the members present, and we see no impropriety in the designation of a certain member or members to undertake that task. From a practical standpoint such must be the proper procedure, otherwise the investigation would get nowhere unless an outside member of the bar be designated to act for and on behalf of the board, which should not be required in view of the limited powers of the board as investigators of fact.

We find no ruling on the part of the local administrative committee or the board of governors with reference to the admission and production of evidence which has worked to the prejudice of the petitioner. We then come to a consideration of the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to support the recommendation and justify disbarment or other disciplinary order.

Mrs. Lott formerly resided in Napa county. Her name was Mary Cynthia Gesford. Her near living relations are a brother, Henry C. Gesford, a former judge of the superior court of Napa county; a sister, Lillian Johnson, of San Francisco; a sister, Louisa J. Gesford, of San Francisco; a nephew, Charles P. Hunt, residing in Alameda county but engaged in business in San Francisco; and a cousin, Ada W. Neal, a business woman residing in San Francisco. At the time of the investigation under review Mrs. Lott was a widow of the age of seventy-two years. Her husband died in 1925. She had been in poor health for many years, resulting in large measure from the attention and care given to her husband during his declining years. She had known Frank J. Golden, the petitioner, for about forty years, their acquaintanceship having extended from the petitioner's boyhood days in Napa county. For many years prior to her husband's death, and for some time thereafter, she had been at times in straitened circumstances. The petitioner had befriended her in many ways, had advanced money to her for her livelihood when she could obtain means from no other source. He had also acted as her attorney in several lawsuits and she had implicit confidence in him.

Some time prior to June, 1926, Mrs. Lott was apprised of the fact that she would receive a considerable sum of money from what is called the Jennings estate then under administration in Cook county, Ill. Each of the Gesfords, brother and sisters, were to receive equal shares. Mrs. Lott desired to have some one to receive and manage this fund for her. Very naturally, it would seem, she went to the petitioner, whom she often referred to as the best friend she had in the world, and requested that he take charge of it, as her trustee. He suggested that some member of her immediate family act in that capacity. Her relationship with her brother and her sisters was not cordial. She refused to accede to the suggestion and insisted upon the petitioner undertaking the task. She was, however, in close and friendly relationship with her nephew, Mr. Hunt, and her cousin, Mrs. Neal, both of whom were substantial business people and with whom she consulted with reference to her plans. They were in accord with her in her plan to have the petitioner handle the fund, and he accepted the responsibility. Accordingly Mrs. Lott executed to the petitioner an assignment of her interest in the Jennings estate. Shortly thereafter and under date of June 26, 1926, a declaration of trust was executed, signed by both petitioner and Mrs. Lott, in which it was provided, among other things, that as soon as the funds should come into his hands the trustee should pay therefrom such obligations and debts of Mrs. Lott as she and the trustee should determine were justly due; that the trustee should keep the trust funds invested in income producing securities, mortgages, or deeds of trust, and, after paying all debts and other expenses of handling the fund, should pay out and distribute the income from the fund, first by the payment to Mrs. Lott of $300 or more per month, provided that, if the income from the fund should be insufficient, said payment should be made from the principal; that the trustee should pay such further sums to Mrs. Lott as should be mutually agreed upon; that the trustee agrees that the income shall be not less than 6 per cent. per annum on the unexpended balance, and that, if the income should be less than 6 per cent., the trustee shall make up the difference from his own funds; that, if the income should exceed the 6 per cent., the excess should be retained by the trustee as full compensation for administering the trust, including attorney's fees in litigation, if any, affecting the trustor or the trust estate; that the trustee should be liable for any and all losses that might be sustained by the trust estate, either to principal or interest, while the trustee continued to act as such; that upon the death of the trustor the trustee should pay the balance remaining in the fund as directed in the declaration and in accordance with written instructions to be thereafter given by the trustor. The form of this agreement was submitted to Judge Gesford and other relatives of Mrs. Lott, and no objection was raised by them or any of them as to the sufficiency or propriety thereof. The agreement was also submitted to and approved by an eminent member of the bar of San Francisco employed by Mrs. Lott for that purpose.

On June 26, 1926, Mrs. Lott, by letter, gave to the petitioner written instructions to pay to numerous friends and relatives the entire trust estate, after her death, with the residue to her nephew, Mr. Hunt, and to her cousin, Mrs. Neal, and the latter's husband, share and share alike. The instrument took the form, not only of written instructions, but also of a direct assignment to the beneficiaries therein named. In order to confirm these instructions and assignments and to make the terms thereof more certain, the petitioner and Mrs. Lott, under date of June 27, 1926, executed a formal instrument to that effect, carrying out in detail the desire of Mrs. Lott, but in no wise altering the substance and effect of the original trust agreement except that the trustee thereunder should pay to the petitioner the sum of $450 per month.

[4] In the order to show cause served on the petitioner he was charged with entering into an unconscionable agreement with his trustor. The local administrative committee, upon a consideration of the proof, decided not to press this charge. The board of governors have not pursued nor found upon that phase of the charge, and it is not argued in the briefs. For that reason it may be considered as removed from consideration in this proceeding. The controversy is then narrowed to the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of the board to the effect that the petitioner has violated his trust in maintaining an inconsistent position and in investing the trust funds to his own profit and in failing properly to account to the trustor upon the termination of the trust.

In July, 1926, the petitioner received from the estate of Jennings by a remittance from Chicago a check in the sum of $53,334. In September of the same year he received the sum of $11,893 as Mrs. Lott's distributive share of the estate of her deceased sister, Rebecca F. Gesford, which estate consisted of the portion of the Jennings estate coming to the deceased sister, and in February, 1929, the petitioner received the further sum of $699.38, the balance due the trustor from the Jennings estate. He thus received into the trust fund the sum of $66,016.38.

From the time of the receipt by the petitioner of this money, Mrs. Lott was furnished money sufficient to keep her in comfortable and at times luxurious quarters and surroundings. She had a companionable nurse who ministered to her wants. She improved in health, gained in weight, appeared happy and contented, and made no complaint of the administration of the trust fund by the petitioner or of the amount of the payments therefrom made to her or on her behalf except as hereinafter related.

Mrs. Lott for some time lived at the Leamington Hotel in Oakland. While residing there and in the early part of 1929 she met one Harry Cobb and one Eva K. Walters. Mrs. Lott had not known Cobb before, and from the record he is shown to be of a lawless and designing character. Mrs. Lott and Mrs. Walters had apparently met before and Mrs. Walters knew much about the personal and family relationship of Mrs. Lott and of the fact that the latter had come into funds. Cobb and Mrs. Walters established themselves in the good graces of Mrs. Lott and began to exercise a dominating influence over her, and seemingly gained complete control over her. About March or April, 1929, they abducted her from or persuaded her to leave the Leamington Hotel and prevented her from communicating with the petitioner. Cobb and Mrs. Walters had interested themselves in the financial affairs of Louisa J. Gesford, who was about eighty years of age at the time she received her allotment of the Jennings estate, and as a result of their activities, so the record shows, the funds of the elderly Louisa were dissipated to a large extent. They persuaded Mrs. Lott that the petitioner was mishandling her estate, caused her to make the complaint before the local administrative committee, had themselves appointed guardians ad litem, and as such and on behalf of Mrs. Lott brought an action against the petitioner for money had and received and caused an attachment to be levied on the petitioner's property. This action is now at issue and is pending in the superior court in and for Los Angeles county. They also brought proceedings in the San Francisco superior court to have Mrs. Lott declared incompetent to handle her own affairs. Cobb brazenly stated to Mrs. Neal that the motive behind his activities was financial gain to himself. The record shows without conflict that Cobb and Mrs. Walters were interlopers and were concerning themselves with Mrs. Lott's affairs, notwithstanding the fact that neither Mrs. Lott nor any of her relatives, nor those who would benefit by the safe administration of the trust or would lose by its maladministration, made no complaint against the petitioner, and notwithstanding the fact that Mrs. Lott continued to place confidence in the petitioner and that Mr. Hunt and Mrs. Neal opposed the appointment of a guardian for Mrs. Lott's estate. The antagonism thus engendered between Cobb and Walters on the one hand and the petitioner on the other has an important bearing on the reasons for the means employed later on the part of the petitioner to thwart the purposes of Cobb and Mrs. Walters, which point unerringly to a consistent endeavor to obtain control of Mrs. Lott's money.

At the hearing before the local administrative committee and also before the board it developed that the petitioner had invested the first moneys received by him from the Jennings estate in $51,000 and accrued interest in promissory notes, totaling in all approximately the amount originally received by the petitioner, secured by a second trust deed on the Leamington Hotel property and by a chattel mortgage on the equipment of the hotel. Straus & Co. held a first trust deed as security for the payment of notes totaling $835,000. The second trust deed was security for several notes totaling some $75,000 which were executed by the hotel company to one Hengen, who was the owner of the real property on which the hotel was built, and said second trust deed notes were issued to represent the purchase price of the realty. The improved property was appraised by Straus & Co. at $1,500,000. It was also appraised by A. H. Breed & Sons to the commissioner of corporations for the purpose of the issuance of a permit at $1,753,500, including the value of equipment, furniture, fixtures, machinery, etc. The petitioner believed and on the record would seem to have been justified in believing that the second trust deed notes so purchased by him were amply secured. The transaction was called in question by the local administrative committee and by the board of governors by reason of the following facts: The petitioner had become interested in the promotion of the Leamington Hotel enterprise and was an officer and director of the corporation. He had invested some $40,000 of his own funds in the common stock of the hotel company long before he entered into the trust agreement. He acquired and owned 43½ per cent. of the common stock of the company. He purchased the second trust deed notes from one Howard H. Bru, a man of substantial business interests and financial responsibility in the San Francisco bay section. Mr. Bru had purchased the $75,000 second trust deed notes from Hengen. The record is not clear as to how much Bru paid for these notes, and the inference from the evidence is justifiable that he purchased them at a discount with the aid of the petitioner. The findings of the board are to the effect that the petitioner bought $51,000 of said notes at par with accrued interest when he should have bought them at a discount if Bru bought them at a discount, and that a loss to the trust estate resulted; and the inference is drawn that either the petitioner profited personally by the transaction, or that he permitted Bru to gain thereby an unconscionable profit at the expense of the trust estate. Without going into detail, there is ground for suspicion that the transaction was not in all respects regular, but the evidence is undisputed that the petitioner finally sold the $51,000 trust deed notes to one Herman Schumacher for approximately the face value thereof, and thus recovered to that extent the corpus of the trust in cash.

The accounting feature of the present investigation will now be considered. The local administrative committee and the board of governors went into that subject. The petitioner refused to testify before the local committee as to certain features of the accounting and as to the location of the trust funds. He did this, so he claimed, for the reason that any disclosure there made would become known and enable the so-called Cobb-Walters group further to harass him and permit them to impose on Mrs. Lott. However, he made disclosure as to these matters before the board of governors. He there claimed and now vigorously insists that he has accounted for every dollar of the funds intrusted to his care and has paid over to Mrs. Lott the balance remaining in the fund and obtained a full release from her. In support of his contention he produced his account showing receipts and expenditures which he had theretofore submitted to Edward S. Bell, an attorney independently employed by Mrs. Lott for the purpose, which account was approved by Mr. Bell in writing appended to the account. This account is not as full and complete as it should be as to the particular purposes for which cash expenditures were made, and it may be freely stated that the petitioner is subject to criticism by reason thereof, but the record is devoid of evidence sufficient to support a finding that the account does not represent the facts.

The petitioner also presented to the board a written agreement of settlement, of date June 14, 1930, signed by himself and Mrs. Lott, and approved in writing by Edward S. Bell as Mrs. Lott's attorney, wherein the history of the trust transaction was briefly recited and wherein it was agreed between the parties that the balance in the trust fund properly chargeable to the petitioner was the sum of $50,117.54; that the petitioner should pay to Mrs. Lott the sum agreed to be the trust balance, and that upon payment thereof the petitioner would be fully discharged. The petitioner also presented to the board a receipt, dated June 17, 1930, signed by Mrs. Lott acknowledging payment to her of the sum agreed upon.

[5, 6] The majority of the board found that the petitioner did not pay to Mrs. Lott on the 17th day of June, 1930, or at any other time, said sum of $50,117.54, or any part thereof; that he converted said sum to his own use, and concluded that he was guilty of misappropriation of funds intrusted to his care—conduct involving moral turpitude. The board refused to believe that the petitioner paid the money as shown by said receipt, apparently on the ground that it was paid, as petitioner testified, in currency, and therefore his testimony was inherently improbable and unworthy of belief. The petitioner testified that when the agreement of settlement of June 14th was made with Mrs. Lott he was prepared and offered to pay the amount in cashier's checks and cash, but that Mrs. Lott refused to accept any checks, stating that she was afraid that Cobb and Mrs. Walters and those working on their behalf to have her declared incompetent to handle her own affairs would get possession of the same, and that she wanted cash, only, in order that she might invest the same in gilt-edged bonds on her own behalf. The petitioner was corroborated by documentary evidence to the effect that he had in his possession immediately prior to the final settlement seven cashier's checks for $5,000 each which he was prepared to deliver to Mrs. Lott. When she refused to accept them he testified that he cashed them and delivered the proceeds therefrom, together with $10,000 that he had in his safe and sufficient in addition from his bank account to make the full payment to Mrs. Lott at his brother's home in Oakland on the afternoon of June 17th. There is no evidence in the record contradicting the testimony of the petitioner in this respect or dispelling the genuineness of the written receipt, excepting only the circumstances that the money was paid in cash. This circumstance gives rise on this record to no more than a suspicion, surmise, or conjecture. The fact that the board did not believe the petitioner's testimony is not enough. Their disbelief must be founded on evidence sufficient to support a finding against the accused. This proceeding is quasi criminal in its nature, and, while it is not essential that the proof of guilt be established beyond a reasonable doubt, yet the charges must be sustained by convincing proof to a reasonable certainty, and any reasonable doubts should be resolved in favor of the accused. Bar Association of S. F. v. Goldman, 53 Cal. App. 42, 199 P. 836. The burden of proof was on the accuser. The testimony of the accused as to the accounting and final payment was contradicted, except by the circumstances related which in and of themselves are insufficient to brand his statements (corroborated as they are by documentary evidence and the approval of an independent attorney for Mrs. Lott as to the accounting and by a written receipt as to payment), as inherently improbable, and are insufficient to support a finding of guilt.

It is insisted that, when the money was paid on the final settlement, the petitioner knew that Mrs. Lott was undergoing investigation in the superior court as to her competency to handle her own affairs, and that the payment to her of such a large sum of money under such circumstances was a willful neglect of duty on the part of the petitioner, especially since it appears that Mrs. Lott was declared incompetent two days after the payment. It is undisputed on this record that Mrs. Lott was under the baneful influence of Cobb and Mrs. Walters from March to November, 1929. It was during this time that the present proceeding was started for the avowed purpose, on the part of those urging Mrs. Lott to institute the charges and obtain control of Mrs. Lott's funds, of compelling the petitioner to surrender them. It is significant that none of the relatives of Mrs. Lott objected to the petitioner's handling of the trust funds even after the charges were brought against her before the local committee or after suit was brought against him to recover the money or after the incompetency proceedings were initiated. It would seem that, if any objection to the petitioner's course were to be made, it would be by those interested in the residue after the death of Mrs. Lott. On the contrary, Mr. Hunt and Mrs. Neal at all times have allied themselves with the petitioner, testifying in his behalf in this matter and resisting the incompetency proceedings. Furthermore, Mrs. Lott filed an affidavit with the board objecting to the findings of the local administrative committee and in opposition to its recommendation, reaffirming her confidence in the petitioner, declaring her entire satisfaction with the way he had administered the trust fund; that he had made payments to her therefrom as required and expressing her desire that he continue in his capacity as trustee. After this matter had been taken under submission by the board of governors and ten days before their findings and recommendation were made and filed, the board received a three-page letter from Mrs. Lott, posted at San Diego, and entirely in her own handwriting, again reaffirming her confidence in the petitioner, stating that she had received the 50,000 odd dollars on June 17, 1930; that the money had been invested by her in bonds which she had theretofore stated were bonds of the Great Western Power Company, the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, and the Southern California Edison Company, and that said bonds were in her safekeeping; that she had not willingly made the charges against the petitioner, but had been influenced so to do by Mr. Cobb; that she would gladly give her deposition to substantiate her statements if the same were desired, and if so to get in touch with her attorney, Mr. Edward S. Bell, Latham Square building, Oakland.

The foregoing affidavit with reference to the recommendations of the local administrative committee and the letter from Mrs. Lott above referred to may not be said to be evidence in a strict sense, but they suggested a field of investigation which in fairness to the petitioner should have been entered upon, in view of the fact that the burden of proof was upon the board to establish by convincing evidence the guilt of the accused.

The board further found that the petitioner had sworn falsely as to material matters. No specification of the particulars in which he is declared to have committed perjury are incorporated in the findings. From the briefs it is disclosed that in two instances he is claimed to have sworn falsely. The first is a statement or statements incorporated in an affidavit executed by the petitioner and filed in the case of the Scott Company et al. v. Oakland Title Insurance and Guaranty Company, wherein the petitioner denied that, while he was acting as attorney for Howard H. Bru, he received a large or any sum of money in which said Bru was interested or which in any way appertained to said second trust deed, and denied that he had made any personal profit in the transaction whereby said Hengen assigned said second trust deed to Bru, and denied that any of his own money was invested in said trust deed or that he expected to gain a profit for himself in the transaction. Aside from the fact that the denials in the affidavit were not in contradiction of anything testified to by the petitioner before the board, it may be said that the petitioner was not charged with an offense relating to this matter in the order to show cause (see San Francisco Bar Ass'n v. Oppenheim, 186 Cal. 75, 198 P. 1069), and it cannot be said from the evidence whether the denials were true or false.

[7] The second matter related to the sworn statement of the petitioner when he was being examined upon supplementary proceedings in connection with an endeavor to collect a judgment against Mrs. Lott. He testified that he had no funds in his possession belonging to Mrs. Lott. This was at a time when he was in possession of the trust fund. The petitioner sought to justify his statements upon such examination upon the ground that Mrs. Lott had theretofore assigned in writing her entire interest in the trust funds to friends and relatives, reserving to herself only the right to the monthly payments during her lifetime. On the facts it is an exceedingly debatable question whether Mrs. Lott, in view of the assignment, could have compelled, as against the objection of the assignees, the payment to her of any more than the monthly allowance, and the petitioner testified that at the time of his said examination in supplementary proceedings Mrs. Lott had been fully paid up to that time under the contract. We see no reasonable basis for the finding of false swearing on the part of the petitioner under the evidence here presented.

[8] The action against the petitioner in Los Angeles county was at issue when the petitioner was examined before the board and is still pending. In that action the question of the validity of the trust agreement and the sufficiency of the accounting are involved. At all times the petitioner has been willing to have an adjudication in that case. On one occasion he went accompanied by his present attorney from San Francisco to Los Angeles for the purpose of trying the case, but the cause was continued because no department of the court was available to try the same. Anything said in this opinion, or the conclusion herein reached, should not be taken or considered as an adjudication of the issues involved in that litigation. The only effect to be ascribed to our determination in the present matter is that the evidence before us is insufficient upon which to base an order of disbarment or of suspension from practice.

In view of the pendency of the action in the superior court in and for Los Angeles county, and in view of the unsatisfactory state of the record herein, we think this proceeding should be dismissed without prejudice, to await the determination of the issues in said pending action.

It is so ordered.

Action by the White Mallard Outing Club against the Reclamation District No. 1004, a public corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Rich & Weis, of Marysville, and Lawrence Schillig, of Yuba City, for appellant.

Rutledge & Rutledge, of Colusa, for respondent.

PRESTON, J.

The judgment appealed from must be affirmed and it is so ordered. Our reasons are to be found in the following observations:

Prior to 1917, Moulton Irrigated Lands Company and Gould Land Company, corporations, were the owners of a large area of land in Colusa county, the easterly boundary of which was Butte creek. In said year these companies entered into an agreement with William G. Henshaw to convey to him that portion of said lands, consisting of about nine hundred acres, bounded on the north by property of the Murdock Land Company, on the east and south by the waters of Butte creek and on the west by the Crocker levee and by a slough known as Drumbheller slough, leading southeasterly from the south end of the levee to Butte creek. This tract lay between Butte creek and the remaining lands of the corporations.

In conveying these lands the then owners desired to retain for their remaining lands their riparian and other rights in the waters of Butte creek, together with the privilege of conducting said waters across the lands to be conveyed, and, accordingly, it was provided that they were to have the privilege of constructing and maintaining a canal, not to exceed fifty feet in width at the bottom, westerly across said lands, connecting said Butte creek with the east side barrow pits of said Crocker levee. The agreement of sale also provided for the dredging and deepening of the barrow pits from the point where the proposed canal would cut it, southerly to the point where it connects with said Drumbheller slough. The slough itself was also to be cleaned and deepened, all for the purpose of drainage into Butte creek of surplus waters falling or used on the corporations' lands. Said corporations likewise reserved the right of private navigation up and down said slough, with the added privilege of entering upon the lands to be conveyed for improving and maintaining said diversion and drainage works.

These improvements, substantially as provided for, were constructed prior to 1918 and water was conducted through said canal to said barrow pits and there diverted and used upon the corporations' lands. But to properly use said waters, it was necessary to cross the said Drumbheller slough, and this, of course, in view of the slope and deepening thereof, required the construction of a dam across the slough. This, too, was erected prior to 1918. Later, and in 1924, a more permanent and perhaps higher dam was installed, with a large pipe underneath to be used in operating it and kept open or closed by respondent at its option in using the water. It is around the manipulation and use of this pipe that the controversy before us centers.

It should be further noted that in 1921 said lands were conveyed to Henshaw by a deed containing substantially the covenants of the agreement. In 1923 plaintiff succeeded to these lands. Defendant has succeeded to the rights of said corporations to the use, maintenance, and control of said diversion and drainage works.

Plaintiff, complaining about the overflow of its lands, caused by manipulation of said pipe in the dam across said slough, sued for an injunction against threatened injury and for damages resulting to it from the operations during the year 1927. Defendant set up its rights under said contract and deed and claimed to have been faithfully following their provisions. Defendant was sustained by the court below with ample findings of fact, followed by a judgment from which plaintiff appeals.

As above noted, plaintiff complains only of the flooding resulting from the closing of the pipe underneath said dam. In other words, it admits a servitude upon its lands in favor of respondent, but denies the extent of the burden asserted by respondent. The essence of the complaint is found in certain paragraphs of the agreement, which may be paraphrased to read as follows: "* * * Such work to be reasonably adequate to protect the lands hereby conveyed from flood by reason of the conducting or discharge into said waterways of drainage water from the lands now owned by the corporations, or of water necessary for irrigation as contemplated by the terms hereof. * * * The rights of the corporations to use each such slough, barrow pit or canal * * * are conditioned upon the corporations, their successors or assigns * * * keeping the waterway so used clear so that the waters may freely flow therein to the end that the lands to be conveyed shall be protected from drainage or irrigation waters to the extent as herein provided. * * *" But it must be noted that by other clear provisions the right to construct and maintain the canal, together with the right to make convenient, effective, and beneficial use of the waters extracted from Butte creek, is also given.

The court finds that the flooding, if any, as now practiced, is necessary to the use and enjoyment of this water privilege. This finding must be removed for appellant to prevail. We are in no way referred to an absence of evidence to support it, however; appellant rests solely upon the interpretation of said provisions that respondent must not cause any backwater upon the land or to any extent retard the free flow of water through the various channels. This, as already stated, is not in accord with the interpretation of the covenants as a whole. When it may be said that defendant is unnecessarily flooding these lands, then plaintiff will have a cause of action in this behalf. Besides the court further finds that no greater overflow prevails than would have prevailed had the canal not been constructed or the slough deepened or obstructed by said dam, the lands in a natural state being wet during the summer months.

Under the findings there is nothing at this time of which appellant may legally complain.

WASTE, C. J.

Following their conviction in the Superior Court upon charges of the commission of a felony, the defendants Malone and Brown appealed to the District Court of Appeal. The Attorney General moved to dismiss the appeal on the ground that it was not perfected as required by section 7, rule II, Rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, which requires that an appellant "must, within five days after giving notice of the appeal, file with the clerk and present an application to the trial court, stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which the appellant relies, and designate what portions of the phonographic reporter's notes it will be necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points relied upon." The rule further provides: "If such application is not filed within said time, the appeal shall be dismissed. * * *" (Italics ours.)

In the case of these defendants, the judgment was entered in the Superior Court, and notice of appeal orally given on July 15, 1930. The five-day limitation fixed by the rule, supra, expired with Sunday, July 20, unless the fact that the fifth day was a holiday excluded it from the calculation. Civ. Code, §§ 10 and 11; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 12 and 13; Pol. Code, §§ 12 and 13. The District Court of Appeal of the Fourth District took the view that the Code sections, supra, apply, and refused to dismiss the appeal. We are satisfied with the decision of that court, per Mr. Justice pro tem. Lamberson, concurred in by Mr. Presiding Justice Barnard and Mr. Justice Jennings, and adopt the following portion as the opinion of this court:

[1] This court will take judicial notice of the fact that July 20, 1930, the fifth day after the giving of notice of appeal, fell on Sunday.

[2] The provisions of the rule of the Judicial Council above cited follow substantially the language theretofore used in section 1247 of the Penal Code prior to its repeal in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1048), and are to be interpreted in the same manner. The provisions of that section and of the rule of the Judicial Council have been held to be mandatory in effect. People v. Riga, 104 Cal. App. 477, 285 P. 1069; People v. Shaw, 81 Cal. App. 312, 253 P. 747. In the latter case it was held that even though the objection is not raised by the respondent, the court would have no jurisdiction to proceed if it should appear to the court that the appellant has failed to comply with the provisions of section 1247 of the Penal Code.

In none of the cases, however, do we find that the question which has arisen here was before the court.

Section 12 of the Political Code provides as follows: "The time in which any act provided by law is to be done is computed by excluding the first day, and including the last, unless the last day is a holiday, and then it is also excluded."

Section 13 of the Political Code provides: "Whenever any act of a secular nature, other than a work of necessity or mercy, is appointed by law, or contract to be performed upon a particular day, which day falls upon a holiday, such act may be performed upon the next business day with the same effect as if it had been performed upon the day appointed."

Like provisions are also contained in the Civil Code and Code of Civil Procedure, and section 4480 of the Political Code says that "with relation to each other, the provisions of the four codes must be construed * * * as though all such codes had been passed at the same moment of time, and were parts of the same statute."

[3] An examination of the California cases discloses that generally speaking when the last day of performance of an act provided by law falls on a Sunday or a holiday, that day is excluded in the computation of time and the act may be performed on the next succeeding day. It has been so applied in the case of service of notice of appeal (Estate of Rose, 63 Cal. 346), in the case of filing an undertaking on appeal (Robinson v. Templar Lodge, etc., 114 Cal. 41, 45 P. 998; Rauer's Law, etc., Co. v. Standley, 3 Cal. App. 44, 84 P. 214), to the service or presentation of a bill of exceptions (Derr v. Busick, 63 Cal. App. 134, 218 P. 280), to the filing of points and authorities upon appeal (Troy, etc., Co., Ltd., v. Drivers' etc., Co., 13 Cal. App. 115, 109 P. 36), to an application for relief from a judgment made under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Bell v. Krauss, 169 Cal. 387, 146 P. 874), and to the time for commencing an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien (Mox v. Leventhal, 89 Cal. App. 253, 264 P. 562).

Those of the above cases which relate to the perfecting of appeals are peculiarly applicable to the condition under consideration, because they cover similar situations, although they are civil and not criminal cases.

In the case of People v. Preciado, 31 Cal. App. 519, 160 P. 1090, it was said, quoting from Estate of Nelson, 128 Cal. 242, 60 P. 772: "The right of appeal is conferred by the Constitution, and statutes and rules of procedure for its exercise are to be liberally construed. We are not disposed to dismiss an appeal upon grounds that are purely technical, where there has been no violation or disregard of any express rule of procedure."

In the case of People v. Bryant, 207 Cal. 450, 278 P. 1025, involving a motion for dismissal of a criminal appeal under section 1247 of the Penal Code, the court said: "It is the policy of this court, of course, to hear appeals upon the merits and to avoid, if possible, all forfeiture of substantial rights upon technicalities."

The outstanding exception to the general rule hereinbefore stated is found in the interpretation by the courts of that part of section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides in substance that the power of the court to pass upon a motion for a new trial shall expire within two months after the verdict of the jury or service on the moving party of notice of the entry of the judgment, and that if such motion is not determined within said two months the effect shall be a denial of the motion, without further order of the court. This provision constitutes a limitation upon the power of the court and is to be distinguished from the rules governing the procedure to be followed by the parties to the action. No particular stress is to be laid upon the use of the word "within," because an examination of the cases hereinbefore cited, particularly those relating to the service of notice of appeal and the filing of an undertaking on appeal, discloses that the word "within" was used in the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure under consideration. Section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "an appeal may be taken from any judgment or order of a superior court * * * within sixty days from the entry of said judgment or order." Section 940 of the Code of Civil Procedure formerly provided in part as follows: "The order of service is immaterial, but the appeal is ineffectual for any purpose unless within five days after service of the notice of appeal, an undertaking be filed. * * *"

[4] We are of the opinion that the provisions of the Political Code hereinbefore cited are applicable to the filing of the notice and application prescribed by section 7 of rule II of the rules of the Judicial Council, that each of the appellants acted in substantial compliance with said rule, and that the motion to dismiss the appeal should be denied.

In so far as there is anything in People v. Riga, supra, contrary to the holding here, the holding in that case must give way to the decision in the present case.

The motion of the Attorney General to dismiss the appeal is denied, and the cause is retransferred to the District Court of Appeal of the Fourth Appellate District for consideration of the questions raised by the appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Action by Peter Nordquist against E. A. Malmberg, as administrator of the estate of Christina Nordquist, deceased. From a decree in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

G. B. Hjelm and Harold L. Hjelm, both of Turlock, for appellant.

W. Coburn Cook, of Turlock, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J.

Appeal from a decree in favor of defendant administrator decreeing that certain real property situate in the city of Turlock and described in a certain deed executed by third parties in which the wife of appellant since deceased, was named as the sole grantee, the purchase price of which was paid by appellant husband, was a gift from said husband to his wife. Said real property when conveyed, November 17, 1917, was approximately of the value of $1,200. The appellant, Peter Nordquist, and his deceased wife, Christina Nordquist, were of Swedish descent, if not of Swedish birth. They intermarried in Minnesota in 1915. The wife had been married twice before and the husband had been married once.

Both had children by said former marriages. Both had small estates before intermarriage, ranging in value from $2,000 to $3,000, respectively. They removed from Minnesota to the city of Turlock, Cal., on October 10, 1917, and shortly after their arrival at Turlock entered into negotiations which terminated in the purchase, on November, 17, 1917, of the home owned by Arvid Anderson and wife and situate in the city of Turlock at the price of $1,200, the whole of which sum was the separate funds of appellant. The deed was duly recorded. Mrs. Nordquist was the aunt of Mrs. Anderson. Mrs. Nordquist was made the sole grantee in said deed. This was with the consent of appellant husband. About one year thereafter a second deed, describing the same premises, was executed by the Andersons to Mrs. Nordquist. This deed contained the clause "as her sole and separate property." Said second deed was made and executed without the knowledge of appellant. Said deed, however, upon being duly recorded, was placed in a joint depository of said spouses, where it seemingly remained until Mrs. Nordquist's death, which occurred in 1926, approximately eight years after its execution. The real property in suit was inventoried as the separate property of decedent, and, by the decree of distribution appellant, as the heir of said decedent, was awarded a one-third interest therein. Appellant was not at any time represented by counsel at said probate proceedings, and, although present when the petition for distribution came before the court, he made no objection thereto. The probate judge, nevertheless, thereafter, upon motion made by counsel retained by him, set aside said decree of distribution in order to give him an opportunity to litigate the merits of his claim to the effect that he had no intention of making a gift of said property to his wife, and, inasmuch as he had paid from his separate estate the whole consideration therefor, a trust resulted in his favor, as provided by section 853, Civil Code.

[1, 2] Appellant testified that he had paid all taxes levied against the property during the eight years he and his wife resided thereon, and had made repairs to render the residence habitable in the sum of approximately $170. Such acts, although constituting acts of ownership, are not in every case sufficient to overcome the presumption of gift arising from relationship. Kimbro v. Kimbro, 199 Cal. 344-347, 249 P. 180. Nor is the presumption that the property was intended as a gift to the wife as her separate property overcome or affected by the presumption arising by virtue of the facts recited in section 853, Civil Code. Alferitz v. Arrivillaga, 143 Cal. 646, 77 Pa. 657; Faylor v. Faylor, 136 Cal. 92, 68 P. 482; Hamilton v. Hubbard, 134 Cal. 603, 65 P. 321, 66 P. 860; Kimbro v. Kimbro, 199 Cal. 344, 249 P. 180.

[3] The sole question presented is as to the sufficiency of the inferences arising from the acts and the several major facts and circumstances disclosed by the transaction and offered in rebuttal of the testimony given by the appellant, the principal witness on his own behalf. While the way may have been open upon the record for the trial court to have decided the case either way, we cannot say that its findings are not supported by the evidence.

The court made several findings, but we deem it unnecessary to refer specifically to all of them, inasmuch as the entire cause is ruled by the finding that the appellant, by causing the deed of November 17, 1917, to be executed in favor of his said wife, thereby intended to make a gift to her of the real property therein described. We have given no probative value whatsoever to the second deed, and it is not regarded as an important factor in the case. The same may be said concerning the issues of estoppel and the statute of limitations.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Interpleader by Joint Pole Association, a voluntary association, against J. A. Steele and others, including the Acme Gravel Company. From a judgment in favor of the Acme Gravel Company, J. A. Steele and another appeal.

Affirmed.

L. L. Steele, of Oakland, for appellants.

Augustin Donovan and James R. Agee, both of Oakland, for respondent.

PRESTON, J.

On March 9, 1927, both respondent Acme Gravel Company and appellant J. A. Steele were creditors of defendant Harry B. Williams, the former in the sum of $1,572.60, the latter in the sum of about $2,500. Apparently Williams was a contractor engaged in laying cement sidewalks, to whom respondent had furnished materials for that purpose and expected to supply further materials thereafter. On March 7, 1927, Williams had entered into a contract in writing with the plaintiff, Joint Pole Association, to repair holes in cement sidewalks and to receive therefor the agreed price of "twenty cents (.20) per surface foot." On said March 9th respondent Gravel Company took an assignment of said contract from said Williams which recited a consideration of $1,572.60, and provided that "all monies due or to become due" under the contract were assigned to it.

Formal notice of this assignment was given to plaintiff Pole Association on September 8, 1927. Appellant Steele, however, had, on May 24, 1927, reduced his claim to judgment and on June 24, 1927, the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco levied an execution by way of garnishment upon plaintiff Pole Association seeking possession of all sums due Williams under the terms of said contract above referred to. With both parties to this appeal claiming the fund, plaintiff interpleaded them and asked the court and was allowed by it to pay the sum due to Williams, to wit, $1,010.88, into court. Williams was also made a defendant. He disclaimed any interest in the fund, however, and cast his lot with respondent in the controversy.

Issues were made up between respondent and appellant Steele as rival claimants. The case was tried by the court without a jury. Findings were made and judgment followed decreeing the whole of said sum to respondent gravel company. From said judgment, this appeal followed.

[1] Appellant claims that there was fraud between respondent gravel company and said Williams. The court found contrary to this contention, and we see no reason to disturb its finding in this respect. Apparently, as above noted, Williams was in the business of contracting for the construction of cement sidewalks, and respondent was furnishing him with materials to carry on his business, and, for the purpose of securing payment of sums due for materials already advanced, and for further materials to be advanced thereafter, it took the assignment in question. Even though it is conceded by all parties that Williams then and at all times herein involved was insolvent, we cannot see that this fact is of controlling importance. Appellant took no steps to bring Williams before the bankruptcy court. No fault can be found with respondent's effort to secure itself both for past debts due it and for its future advances.

[2] Appellant, however, devotes the greater portion of his brief to the support of the contention that said assignment, taken in connection with the other facts and circumstances of the case, shows that it was but an assignment for security, and as such does not meet the requirements of the law as to chattel mortgages or as to pledges; consequently it was void as to him as an execution creditor. Considering all the facts and circumstances of the transaction, particularly the fact that at the time of assignment no sums had been earned thereunder, coupled with the ledger account kept by respondent of its transactions with Williams, and other facts not necessary to dwell upon, we are inclined to agree that the transaction between them was entered into by respondent to secure itself both as to existing indebtedness and as to future advances of construction materials, and said assignment was therefore an instrument of security only. But this observation does not entitle appellant to a reversal of the judgment.

[3] The assignment was a pledge, pure and simple, and in our opinion is valid as such. The contention that it was not supported by change of possession of the property and is therefore void under section 3440 of the Civil Code cannot be maintained. The instrument of assignment was duly executed, and all the delivery and change of possession that could be made of this chose in action was made. As early as Goldstein v. Hort, 30 Cal. 372, 375, 376, Currey, C. J., stated the rule as follows: "A delivery of the possession of the pledged property must be made to the pledgee, otherwise his right cannot be consummated. When the property is of a character or quality not capable of manual delivery, such as debts and choses in action, the same may be pledged by a written assignment or other effective means of transfer, as the transfer of the capital stock of a corporate company by the delivery of the scrip or certificate; or of goods at sea by an assignment of the bill of lading, which is deemed equivalent to actual possession, because it is a delivery of the means of obtaining possession."

Again Rhodes, J., stated the rule in Brewster v. Hartley, 37 Cal. 15, 25, 99 Am. Dec. 237, as follows: "Incorporeal property, being incapable of manual delivery, cannot be pledged without a written transfer of the title. Debts, negotiable instruments, stocks in incorporated companies, and choses in action generally are pledged in that mode. Such transfer of the title performs the same office that the delivery of possession does in case of a pledge of corporeal property. The transfer of the title, like the delivery of possession, constitutes the evidence of the pledgee's right of property in the thing pledged." See, also, Gay v. Moss, 34 Cal. 125; Works v. Merritt, 105 Cal. 467, 38 P. 1109; 21 R. C. L., p. 648, § 14; 49 C. J., p. 918, § 44.

It is not contended by respondent that the assignment meets the test of a valid chattel mortgage. If Williams was insolvent at the time he gave a preference to respondent, appellant could have then acted to secure its just proportion of the insolvent's estate, but he did not avail himself of this remedy. There is no relief for him in this proceeding.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; F. M. Jamison, Judge.

Action by the Oregon-California Livestock Company against L. L. McDonald and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

J. T. Sharp, of Alturas, for appellant.

C. S. Baldwin, of Alturas, for respondents.

CURTIS, J.

This action was instituted to recover on three promissory notes, executed by the defendants L. L. McDonald and B. L. McDonald and secured by a mortgage upon certain real property and personal property. The mortgage was executed by the defendants above named and by defendant Mary E. McDonald in favor of defendant J. W. Seimens. The plaintiff became the owner thereof by assignment through the said Seimens. The real property described in said mortgage consisted of a quarter section of land in Modoc county, and the personal property therein described consisted of 229 head of cattle and their increase. The action was dismissed as to defendant Seimens, for the reason that no personal service of summons has been made upon him. While the defendant Mary E. McDonald did not sign either of said promissory notes as maker thereof or otherwise, she did sign and execute the mortgage given to secure same, which, after referring to the principal amount secured by said mortgage, with interest and charges and attorneys' fees, contains a further covenant reading as follows: "And we do for ourselves, our heirs or assigns (do) covenant and agree to pay all of said sums of money hereinbefore mentioned."

The action was tried, and the court below rendered judgment for the amount due on the promissory notes, with costs and attorneys' fees, and for the foreclosure of the mortgage, directing the sale of the real property described in the mortgage and the application of the proceeds of the sale to the satisfaction of the judgment, but declined to render personal judgment against said defendants or any of them.

Plaintiff, the appellant, contends in the first place that it is entitled to a personal judgment against the defendant Mary E. McDonald under and by virtue of the provisions of the mortgage quoted above to the same extent and in the same manner as if she had with her codefendants signed the original promissory notes. From the view we take of the case it will not be necessary for us to decide this point.

[1] The court found in pursuance to the allegations of the answer of the defendants that in November, following the execution of the promissory notes in April, 1923, the plaintiff agreed with defendants that, if they would deliver to plaintiff the possession of said live stock mentioned in the mortgage and concede to plaintiff the ownership of said stock, it would release said defendants from all personal liability on said promissory notes and mortgage. The court also in its findings expressed this agreement in the following words: "That is to say, plaintiff agreed to take said cattle and the said lien on said real estate in full settlement and satisfaction of all debts owing to it by the said McDonalds, or either or any of them." The court further found that in pursuance of said agreement "the said L. L. McDonald did deliver and cause to be delivered to plaintiff all of said cattle, and at the time of the agreement for the delivery of said cattle paid to plaintiff the sum of $700 that he had received from the sale of certain of said cattle."

[2] There is ample evidence in the record to support these findings. It is conceded that said live stock was delivered to the plaintiff as found by the court, and that plaintiff sold the same and kept the entire proceeds of said sale. The defendant L. L. McDonald testified that, at the time said cattle were delivered to the plaintiff, the agent of plaintiff, C. L. Jamison, accepted said cattle in full settlement of the personal liability of the McDonalds for said indebtedness, and agreed to take the mortgage lien upon the said real and personal property in full settlement and satisfaction of the said indebtedness. While Jamison denied that any such agreement was made by him, no question is made as to the authority of Jamison to bind his principal by his said agreement. The testimony of Jamison therefore merely created a conflict in the evidence, which the trial court resolved in favor of said defendants. Under these circumstances, it is not within the province of a reviewing court to disturb or in any way modify the findings in question.

[3] A further contention is made by appellant that the court erred in crediting upon the amount due on said promissory notes the sum of $3,000 received from the sale of a portion of said live stock. It is contended that this amount was received by plaintiff and applied on the indebtedness represented by said promissory notes prior to their execution; it being conceded that the promissory notes sued upon were in part renewals of prior promissory notes representing the same indebtedness. The time when this $3,000 was credited on said indebtedness becomes immaterial, in view of the finding of the trial court that plaintiff agreed to take the cattle and the mortgage lien on the real property in full settlement and satisfaction of said indebtedness so far as the McDonalds were personally liable therefor.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by Harriet C. Lanktree against the Spring Mountain Acres, Inc., and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Harry I. Stafford, of San Francisco, Allen C. Cunha, of Oakland, and Edward A. Cunha, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Nathan F. Coombs, of Napa, for respondents.

SHENK, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment for the defendant in an action to set aside a deed.

For many years the plaintiff was the owner of a ranch called "Spring Mountain Ranch," comprising some 688 acres, and situated in Napa and Sonoma counties, this state. Prior to July, 1927, the property had become run down, the buildings dilapidated, and the owner had become financially involved. The Bank of America, St. Helena branch, held a trust deed against this property securing a loan of $3,900 which the bank was threatening to foreclose. Wilbur J. Lanktree, son of the plaintiff, and acting in her behalf, approached the defendant Roberts to enlist his interest in aiding the plaintiff in her financial difficulties. Mr. Roberts was in association with the defendant Robinson as building contractors in Oakland and elsewhere, conducting their business through the medium of a corporation called Roberts-Robinson Company. At the solicitation of the son, Mr. Roberts visited the plaintiff's ranch, and, after a considerable lapse of time, became interested in a proposition to improve said ranch and convert it into a resort of mountain cabins, golf course, etc., as well as to conduct ranching operations in conjunction with an adjoining 240-acre ranch acquired by Mr. Roberts. During his investigation and negotiations with the plaintiff, Mr. Roberts advanced money to pay taxes and incidental expenses on the plaintiff's ranch. Finally an agreement was reached whereby a corporation was to be formed under the name of Spring Mountain Acres, Inc. To this corporation the title to the two ranch properties was to be conveyed and the capital stock of the corporation was to be 250 shares of the par value of $100 each; 123 shares were to be issued to the plaintiff, 64 shares to Mr. Roberts, and 63 shares to Mr. Robinson. The defendants Roberts and Robinson agreed to assume and pay the $3,900 obligation secured by the trust deed on the plaintiff's property.

Pursuant to the agreement, the plaintiff, in January, 1928, executed a deed conveying title to her ranch to "Spring Mountain Acres, Inc.," and delivered it to Mr. Roberts for the purpose of carrying out the transaction. Thereafter, in March, 1928, the corporation was organized by the plaintiff, Roberts, and Robinson; a qualifying share of stock having been issued to each. The plaintiff, as secretary of the corporation, joined in an application to the commissioner of corporations for a permit to issue the stock upon the representation to the commissioner that the two ranches were to become the property of the corporation. The permit was issued upon the condition, among others, that the lands should be conveyed to the corporation free and clear of all incumbrances. The 240-acre ranch was deeded to the corporation free and clear, and the deed to the Spring Mountain Ranch executed by the plaintiff to said corporation was filed for record on July 13, 1928.

Five days later this action was brought to set aside and cancel the deed, alleging in the first count that the deed had never been delivered and had been recorded without authority and in violation of an alleged trust on the part of Roberts, and in the second count that there was no consideration for the deed.

The trial court found that delivery of the deed had been accomplished; that there had been no violation of any alleged trust relation existing between the plaintiff and the defendant Roberts; that there was a good and valid consideration for the deed; and that the plaintiff was estopped by her conduct from claiming a cancellation of said deed. Judgment for the defendants was accordingly entered.

It is contended on this appeal (1) that there was no delivery of the deed to the defendant corporation; (2) that there was no consideration for the deed; and (3) that the permit of the corporation commissioner was not complied with, and that therefore the corporation never became entitled to issue the certificate of stock to the plaintiff.

[1, 2] The evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding that the deed was delivered. It was handed by the plaintiff to Mr. Roberts in pursuance of the agreement to consummate the conveyance of the title to both ranches to the corporation to be formed. A deed executed to a corporation prior to its organization, but, as here, delivered to another with the intention to have it delivered to the corporation after its organization, and duly accepted by the corporation and recorded, vests title in the corporation. San Diego Gas Co. v. Frame, 137 Cal. 441, 70 P. 295; Clark & Marshall, Private Corporations, vol. 1, § 111a, p. 336; Thompson on Corporations (3d Ed.) vol. 4, § 2521. The mutual promises of the incorporators here in evidence were a sufficient consideration for the plaintiff's deed. West v. Crawford, 80 Cal. 19, 21 P. 1123. This is especially so since in compliance with said agreement the 240-acre adjoining ranch was conveyed to said corporation before the plaintiff's deed was delivered to the corporation.

[3] At the instance of the plaintiff, the permit of the corporation commissioner was temporarily revoked, and the stock certificates therefore have not been issued. However, upon the acceptance of her deed by the corporation, the plaintiff became the equitable owner of her proportion of the stock. The stock certificate would be evidence only of such ownership. In any event, the plaintiff is in no position to insist, under the circumstances here shown, that the deed be canceled because the certificate had not been issued. The actual payment of the $3,900 trust deed note was not made a condition precedent to the passing of title to the corporation. The defendants Roberts and Robinson assumed the obligation, and accordingly took effectual steps to prevent a sale under the trust deed.

[4] The plaintiff did not rescind the transaction or offer to restore to the defendants, or any of them, the benefit she had received from the expenditure by the defendants Roberts and Robinson of over $3,200 in repairs and improvements on her ranch, paid and expended in reliance upon the validity and sufficiency of her deed to the corporation. At the trial, the plaintiff, through her counsel, disavowed any intention to restore, and expressly refused to make any restitution on account of the expenditures made for the benefit of Spring Mountain Ranch. These facts were sufficient upon which to base the finding and conclusion of the court that the plaintiff was estopped from claiming a cancellation of the deed.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action to quiet title by Theodore A. Kohler against Frank V. Thomas and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

SHENK, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment for the defendants in an action to quiet the plaintiff's title to real property in Grass Valley. The court granted a motion for a nonsuit after both sides had introduced evidence and rested.

The action covered numerous pieces of property, but was finally narrowed down to a controversy over the title to what is called "Old Block Mining Claim," consisting of about ten acres of unimproved land. The original claim was patented to Reuben Thomas, father of the defendant Frank V. Thomas, in 1871. The defendant Thomas acquired a three-sevenths interest in the property in 1904. In 1912 he conveyed his interest therein to one Hughes. Thereafter on July 11, 1921, he reacquired said three-sevenths interest. In 1925 he acquired the remaining four-sevenths.

In 1919 the plaintiff commenced an action for an unpaid grocery bill against the defendant Thomas in the justice's court of Grass Valley township and levied an attachment against said real property. The action went to judgment, execution was issued, and the constable went through the form of selling the property to satisfy the judgment and issued his deed. The evidence shows that the property was sold under execution and the constable's deed was issued six months prior to the time the defendant reacquired the three-sevenths interest, and that from the time the action was commenced until six months after the issuance of the constable's deed the defendant Thomas had no interest in said property. Upon this showing the plaintiff during the trial very properly ceased to press his claim of title based on the constable's deed, but insisted upon the sufficiency of his proof of title by adverse possession. The trial court held that the proof in this respect was fatally lacking in that the essential elements of actual, continuous, uninterrupted and adverse possession by the plaintiff for the statutory period was not shown to exist.

[1, 2] The real property is vacant land adjoining property owned by the defendant Thomas and on which he resided. The land involved herein was not inclosed by a fence or otherwise, although a wire fence on the east side thereof had existed for many years. The plaintiff had never lived on the property. The only semblance of occupancy on his part was that many times during the course of the years he and his family had gone into the property for a picnic or outing, the plaintiff's son had been thereon many times hiking and hunting, and the plaintiff had authorized others at times to cut and remove manzanita wood therefrom. There is no evidence that the plaintiff or any member of his family or anyone authorized to act for him ever resided on the property. Furthermore, the plaintiff never advised the record owner during the time he claimed the prescriptive right to have attached that he was claiming adversely to such owner. The defendant Thomas did not know of the adverse claim until the present action was filed, and there is nothing in the evidence upon which he or his predecessor may legally be charged with notice of the adverse claim on the part of the plaintiff. The fact that the plaintiff had the land resurveyed with the knowledge and without objection on the part of the defendant Thomas is not such constructive notice as would satisfy the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 322). Hart v. All Persons, etc., 26 Cal. App. 664, 148 P. 236.

From a review of all the evidence it must be declared that a prima facie case was not presented in favor of the plaintiff and the court properly granted the motion for nonsuit.

The judgment is affirmed.

GREEN v. STATE BAR OF CALIFORNIA.
L. A. 12540.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 15, 1931.

Attorney and client ☞58.

Attorney misleading court by giving false testimony concerning nonexistent person should be suspended from practice for one year (Code Civ. Proc. § 232 (4)).

In Bank.

Proceeding by E. S. Green to review a recommendation of the State Bar of California for petitioner's disbarment.

Petitioner suspended from practice of law for one year.

Earle Stuart Rhode and E. S. Green, in propria persona, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Benjamin F. Bledsoe and William M. Farrer, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J.

Petitioner, E. S. Green, was brought before local administrative committee No. 3 of the State Bar for the county of Los Angeles, to show cause why he should not be disbarred, suspended, or reproved for conduct alleged to involve moral turpitude. At the conclusion of its hearings, the local committee made findings upon which it based a recommendation that petitioner be suspended from the practice of the law for the period of one year. The board of governors adopted the findings, but has recommended that petitioner be disbarred. This is a proceeding to review the action and recommendation of the State Bar.

There is no merit in petitioner's points questioning the completeness of the record filed herein or attacking the regularity and validity of the proceedings taken against him. Nor do we think petitioner's client was coerced or compelled to divulge confidential communications between herself and petitioner. We therefore pass to a consideration of the circumstances giving rise to petitioner's difficulties.

On May 11, 1929, Fannie K. Harder, a client of petitioner, purported to transfer and assign her interest in certain valuable securities, then held by the Title Guarantee & Trust Company, to one Frances Ficker; the latter name being the maiden name of the said Fannie K. Harder. The purported transfer to "Frances Ficker" was apparently prompted by the desire to avoid the levy of an attachment issued in the case of Platina Eschelbach v. Fannie K. Harder. A motion was subsequently made in the Eschelbach Case to set aside this purported transfer and to subject the securities, so fraudulently transferred, to the lien of the attachment. It is found by the local administrative committee that at the hearings on this motion, held respectively on June 27 and July 23, 1929, the petitioner had appeared for the defendant Fannie K. Harder, both as attorney and as witness, and testified under oath that he knew Frances Ficker to be an existing person and that she was his client and had been introduced to him by Mrs. Fannie K. Harder at the latter's home. The committee also found that prior to either of the two court hearings on the motion, the petitioner had been informed and advised by his client, Fannie K. Harder, that her maiden name was Frances Ficker, and, knowing that Fannie K. Harder and Frances Ficker were one and the same person, and knowing that Frances Ficker was the maiden name of Fannie K. Harder, petitioner deliberately misled the court, and falsely testified as to the facts of the case, and permitted his client to testify in his presence to facts which the petitioner then knew to be false, and maintained silence before the court when he owed the duty to the court of bringing out the true facts, thereby working a fraud upon the court.

We have carefully examined the record in this proceeding, and conclude that while the evidence is conflicting in some particulars, there is ample to support the findings above narrated. In fact, petitioner himself testified before the investigating committee that he had never been introduced to any one by the name of Frances Ficker, nor had he ever handled any legal business for any one by that name. A reading of the entire record fails to convince us that petitioner was unaware of the fraud being practiced upon the court. His conduct was such as to constitute a violation of his duty as an attorney and officer of the court never to "mislead the judge or any judicial officer by an artifice or false statement of fact." Code Civ. Proc. § 282 (4).

In Bruns v. State Bar (Cal. Sup.) 1 P. (2d) 989, we suspended the offending attorney for a period of three months for an attempt to mislead the court by means of the inclusion of a false averment of fact in a pleading filed on behalf of a client. Petitioner's conduct is more reprehensible and deserving of greater condemnation and more severe punishment because his deception of the court resulted from the giving of false testimony while under oath in court.

It is therefore ordered that petitioner be suspended from the practice of the law in all the courts of this state for a period of one year, said suspension to become effective thirty days from the service of notice of the within order, said service to be made upon him by the clerk of this court by means of the United States registered mail.

WASTE, C. J.

[1] This is an appeal from a judgment declaring the infant daughter of the appellants to be an abandoned child. There is also a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the transcript of the evidence is incomplete. The appeal was regularly taken, and we have before us a clerk's transcript and what purports to be a reporter's transcript. The motion must therefore be denied, and the appeal considered on the merits. Waymire v. California Trona Co., 176 Cal. 395, 398, 168 P. 563.

The proceeding is one prosecuted under subdivision 1 of section 15 of the Juvenile Court Law (Stats. 1915, p. 1225, and amendments; 1 Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, p. 1535, Act 3966), which provides, in substance, that a child left in the care and custody of another by his parents "without any provision for his support, or without communication from such parent or parents, for the period of one year with the intent to abandon," is deemed to be an abandoned person. Mary Lopes Silva, the child, about whom this proceeding revolves, is the infant daughter of the appellants. Several years prior to the commencement of this proceeding, the care and custody of the child was intrusted to the respondent Marie S. Canisso, a neighbor. The original understanding between the parties was that the child might remain with the respondent and her husband for a two weeks' period. For one reason or another, the child was permitted to remain with respondent uninterruptedly for approximately five years, during all of which time the respondent adequately cared and provided for her. Upon this and other evidence, the trial court found that the minor had been left in the care, custody, and control of the respondent for more than a year without any provision for her support and with the intent of her parents to abandon her. The appealing parents question the sufficiency of the evidence to support this finding.

[4] Appellants contend that this presumption is inapplicable to the present case for the reason that we are precluded from going behind the trial court's certificate which purports to settle and authenticate the reporter's transcript as a complete report of all the proceedings had and taken before it. In support of this proposition, the appellants cite, among others, the case of Bell v. Brigance, 194 Cal. 445, 229 P. 27, 28. It was necessary, in that case, to determine whether or not the trial judge's certificate that the transcript was full and complete should prevail over the reporter's certificate that it was incomplete and but a partial report of the proceedings. We held that the "certificate of the judge is the only certificate required or provided for by section 953a, supra, and is the only authentication of the transcript to which this court will look. The reporter's certificate may have been of assistance to the judge below * * * but it adds nothing to the authenticity of the transcript in question." It is intimated in the decision that, if a proper and contrary showing be made, the certificate of a trial judge as to the completeness of a transcript need not prove a stumbling block to the proper disposition of a cause. It is there declared that respondent "has not pointed out a single particular in which it [the reporter's transcript] fails to contain the matters required by the sections of the code. * * * No affidavits are presented here in support of his claim that a complete record has not been transmitted to this court. His contention must therefore give way in the face of the certificate of the judge attached to the transcript."

In the instant case, we have ample evidence before us to overcome the effect of the certificate attached to the transcript. In addition to the failure of the transcript to include a copy of respondent's testimony given on direct examination, it is admitted that the reporter was not in the courtroom while the respondent was testifying on direct examination. More important still, we have before us a certified copy of an order of the trial judge amending and correcting his original certificate to the transcript to conform to the facts. This amended certificate reads, in part:

"Whereas, * * * the Judge of the above entitled court, did certify that said transcript was a full, true, correct and fair transcript of the proceedings had at the trial and of the testimony offered or taken, and

"Whereas, said certificate was and is contrary to fact and contrary to the records and files of this court in the above entitled matter, and was inadvertently made, and it appearing proper that said certificate should be amended and corrected to conform to the truth and to the records and files of this court,—

"Now, Therefore, it is hereby ordered that said certificate be and the same is hereby amended to read as follows. * * *" The amended certificate then declares the reporter's transcript to be full, true, and correct, "except that said transcript does not contain any record of the direct examination of the petitioner in said matter, to-wit: Marie S. Canisso [respondent here], and that there was no official court reporter present at the time of the direct examination of the said Marie S. Canisso."

[5-7] We find no merit in the point that the court below was without authority to amend its certificate subsequent to the filing of the transcript in this court. It has repeatedly been held that a court of record has the inherent right and power to cause its acts and proceedings to be correctly set forth in its records. Dowd v. Superior Court, 69 Cal. App. 4, 7, 230 P. 961, 962, and leading cases therein cited. A trial court may correct and augment an incomplete reporter's transcript, inadvertently settled, even subsequent to its filing in an appellate court. In the case last above cited it is held that the trial court might with propriety amend a settled transcript then on file in the appellate court, by adding thereto certain inadvertently omitted instructions. Such a course is declared to be proper because "the record on appeal, as certified to by the trial court, did not speak the truth." In fact, the proper procedure whereby inadvertently omitted papers, etc., might be included in a reporter's transcript duly certified and filed in an appellate court is by way of application, in the first instance, to the trial court for relief. Martin v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 195 Cal. 544, 546, 234 P. 321. If a trial court may thus substantially amend its record on file in an appellate court so as to cause it to "speak the truth," we perceive of no good reason why it may not amend its certification thereof for the same reason. In Lapique v. Superior Court, 40 Cal. App. 582, 584, 181 P. 227, 228, it is intimated that, "if the order of settlement was made through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect," relief may be had under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It may well be that the amended order of certification made herein was by way of relief under that section. Nor are we precluded from a consideration of such amended order of certification by reason of respondent's failure to bring it before us by suggestion of diminution of the record. Section 953 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares, in part: "If it appear that there is any paper or record in the custody of the clerk of the trial court which was before the trial court but which is not included in the record on appeal, and an examination of such paper or record will assist in a determination of the appeal on its merits, the court in which the appeal is pending may, on motion of either party, or on its own motion, require the production of a certified copy of such paper or record, and the same shall thereupon be deemed a part of the record on appeal." (Italics ours.) A certified copy of the amended order of certification has been filed here, and we may with propriety, and under the authority of the above Code section, consider such amended order as though we had, of our own motion, required its production.

It being definitely established that the reporter's transcript now before us does not contain all of the testimony adduced before the court below, we are not in a position to declare the evidence insufficient to support the trial court's finding of an abandonment. Under the authorities already cited, it must be presumed that the testimony of respondent given on direct examination, and not included in the reporter's transcript, authorizes and sustains the finding.

The motion to dismiss is denied. The judgment must be, and it is hereby, affirmed.

That father, after alleged gift of personality to son, returned property for taxes as his own, did not conclusively show invalidity of gift.

Fact that father during the three years before his death continued to return personality as his own did not conclusively show invalidity of gift, especially where it appeared that, after making valid conveyance of real property to son, father also returned such property to tax collector as his own, indicating that, notwithstanding transfer of both personal and real property, father simply followed course previously pursued by him in returning property for taxes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

Action by W. A. Robinson against Georgia M. Hoalton and another, with a cross-complaint by defendants and a complaint in intervention by Harriet W. Stewart, as administratrix of the estate of Alba G. Robinson, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and the intervenor appeals.

Affirmed.

Eugene Selvage, of Eureka, for appellant.

Irwin T. Quinn, of Eureka, for respondent.

CURTIS, J.

This action was instituted to foreclose a mortgage given to secure a promissory note for $2,200, executed in favor of the plaintiff by the defendants. In their answer the defendants did not contest the execution and delivery of the note and mortgage, but set up as an affirmative defense to said action that the money, loaned them and to secure which said note and mortgage were given, was not the money of the plaintiff, but that it belonged to and was the money of Minnie Robinson. A cross-complaint was filed by defendants, setting up the same facts as were alleged in defendants' affirmative defense, and praying that the action abate for the reason that it was not prosecuted by the real party in interest. An amended cross-complaint was later filed, the allegations of which were not materially different from those of the original cross-complaint. An answer to this amended cross-complaint was filed by the plaintiff. This was the condition of the pleadings at the time the case was called for trial when, by leave of court, a complaint in intervention was filed by Harriet W. Stewart, as administratrix of the estate of Alba G. Robinson, deceased. An answer to the complaint in intervention was made by plaintiff and the action proceeded to trial manifestly upon the complaint, the complaint in intervention, and the answer thereto. The defendants evidently abandoned their cross-complaint, as no mention thereof is to be found in the findings or the judgment. The same attorney represented both the defendant cross-complainant and the plaintiff in intervention. The appeal from the judgment, which was in favor of the plaintiff and against both defendants and the intervenor, was taken only by the intervenor. The only parties therefore before this court are the plaintiff and the intervenor. In her complaint in intervention, the intervenor, as the administratrix of the estate of Alba G. Robinson, deceased, claimed that the money loaned to the defendants and secured by said note and mortgage, was the property of the said estate, and asks for a decree declaring that plaintiff holds said note and mortgage in trust for said intervenor.

The trial resulted in a judgment and decree in favor of the plaintiff, foreclosing said mortgage and declaring that the entire proceeds of the sale be paid to the plaintiff. This judgment was predicated upon findings and conclusions of the trial court, fully supporting said judgment.

W. A. Robinson, the plaintiff herein, is the son of Alba G. Robinson, deceased. The defendant Georgia M. Hoalton, the intervenor Harriet W. Stewart, and Minnie Robinson are the daughters of said deceased, and sisters of the plaintiff. During his lifetime Alba G. Robinson was the owner of a small dairy farm near Rio Dell in Humboldt county. He made his home with his wife and children on this farm for many years prior to his death. Some years before the death of their father, the defendant Georgia M. Hoalton, then Georgia M. Robinson, and Harriet W. Stewart, then Harriet W. Robinson, having married and made homes for themselves, left the family homestead. The plaintiff and Minnie Robinson never married during the lifetime of their parents. They remained with their father and mother on the farm until the death of the father. Minnie Robinson was defective mentally; she never married, and the plaintiff never left the farm until some time after the death of his parents. He assisted his father in the care of the farm and, after old age had rendered the father physically unable to perform manual labor, the plaintiff assumed active management of the farm and performed practically all the labor required for its upkeep.

On January 16, 1913, Alba G. Robinson executed a grant deed of the farm to the plaintiff, reserving, however, a life estate therein to himself, his wife and his incompetent daughter, Minnie Robinson, with a stipulation therein that the plaintiff should pay to Georgia M. Hoalton, one of the defendants, and Harriet W. Stewart, the intervenor, the sum of $500 each. It was following the execution and delivery of this deed that the plaintiff assumed and actually took practically the entire management of the farm. Alba G. Robinson died intestate on November 9, 1916, his wife having predeceased him. After the death of his parents, the plaintiff continued to operate the farm and to provide a home for his incompetent sister. In the course of time he paid the sum of $500 to each of his sisters, Georgia M. Hoalton and Harriet W. Stewart, as directed by the grant deed from his father. In January, 1921, plaintiff sold considerable personal property, consisting of some fourteen head of cows, a horse, a plow, a disc harrow, mowing machine, and rake, for which he received between $2,300 and $2,400. Of this amount he loaned to the defendants Georgia M. Hoalton and her husband the sum of $2,200 and, to secure the payment thereof, received from them the note and mortgage which are the subject of this action. At the time of the execution and delivery of the deed from Alba G. Robinson to the plaintiff, there was a small amount of personal property on the farm belonging to the father. No mention of this personal property was made in said deed, and there was no written evidence of the sale or gift of it to the plaintiff by his father. The plaintiff, however, testified that at the date of the delivery of said deed, his father gave to him all the personal property then on the farm. The court found in accordance with this testimony. It further found that plaintiff "sold said personal property in January of 1921 and that thereafter and on April 18, 1921, he loaned some of the funds derived upon the sale of said personal property to the defendants, secured by a mortgage as set forth in the complaint. That said funds were plaintiff's own personal property," and that neither Harriet W. Stewart, as administratrix, nor the estate of Alba G. Robinson, deceased, had any interest in the same, nor did plaintiff hold the same in trust for the intervenor.

[1, 2] This finding is in our opinion fully sustained by the evidence. The plaintiff testified that his father at the time he executed the deed to the real property referred to above, "turned over" the personal property then situated on the ranch. His testimony was as follows:

"Q. What did your father tell you at that time? A. * * * he would turn the thing over to me. He said I worked there long enough, and cooked and helped around the house. He was getting old and he was not able to do work. * * * "Q. Well your statement was that he will turn the thing over to you. He didn't say anything about turning the farming wagon over to you? A. I said the things, farming things.

"Q. He said I will turn the farming implements over to you? A. Yes sir. * * *

"Q. Did he say I will turn the stock over to you? A. Yes sir."

While in other parts of Robinson's testimony are found statements which to a certain extent might be held to conflict with these just quoted as to the exact words used by the elder Robinson on the occasion mentioned, it was the province of the trial court to weigh the evidence as a whole and determine for itself which of the conflicting statements, if there was any conflict in them, to accept. Having found that "Alba G. Robinson did during his lifetime convey all of the personal property on the Robinson ranch near Rio Dell in said county and state, to his son, W.

A. Robinson," we must assume that the trial court accepted the testimony of the plaintiff set out above as the true account of the transaction, which took place between father and son regarding the personal property, at the time the father made the conveyance of the real property.

[3, 4] It is contended by appellant, however, that even if we accept the evidence of the plaintiff as above related, still it is not sufficient to show a gift of the personal property by the father to the plaintiff, for the reason that a verbal gift is not valid unless there is an actual or symbolical delivery of the thing to the donee. While this is undoubtedly the general rule, it is not always strictly applied, especially when the parties to the gift are members of the same family and occupy the same house as a home. "The rule as to delivery is not so strictly applied to transactions between members of a family living in the same house, the law in such cases accepting as a delivery acts which would not be so regarded if the transactions were between strangers living in different places. It is not required that the thing given should be removed from their common residence. It is sufficient, if it clearly appears that the donor has relinquished, and the donee has acquired, all dominion over and control of the property, but even in such cases there must be something to show that the gift was completed." 28 Cor. Jur. 638. This exception to the rule we think is fully met by the facts in this case. While the property in question was not in the house in which the parties resided, it was upon the lands upon which they made their home. Most of the property was used in the care of the ranch and for the common good of both parties to the gift. The father having made final disposition of all his real property, it is only natural to suppose that he would take the same action regarding his personal property. As evidence that he had surrendered all control over his personal property, it appears that after the gift thereof to the plaintiff, the latter not only assumed entire charge of the ranch, but from that time on dealt with the personal property as his own, without any objection from his father. Furthermore, for almost five years after the death of his father and until its sale in January, 1921, he continued to use and treat the property as his own, even to the extent of selling the whole thereof without any objection or question by the appellant or her sister, Mrs. Hoalton. After the sale and in the following April he loaned the greater part of the money received from said sale to Mrs. Hoalton as his own money, neither of these two sisters disputing his right to do so. It was not until this action was brought in September, 1927, over ten years after the death of the father and more than five years after the personal property was sold and the loan made to the Hoaltons, that either Mrs. Hoalton or Mrs. Stewart made any claim that their brother was not the absolute owner of said personal property, or the proceeds of the sale thereof. And another full year went by before the intervenor, having in the meantime been appointed administratrix of her father's estate, made claim that the money derived from the sale of said personal property belonged to her father's estate.

We think this evidence is sufficient to show that the elder Robinson relinquished to his son, and the latter acquired all dominion and control over, said personal property at the date shown therein, and that the gift was completed at said date. Furthermore, it seems inconceivable to us, if these two sisters had any question as to their brother's right to said personal property, that they would have remained silent during all these years and made neither claim to the property, either as heirs of their father or otherwise, nor protested against their brother's continued assumption of ownership over it. The further fact is significant that one of them went to the extent of borrowing from the brother as his money, practically the whole amount for which the personal property was sold.

[5] Appellant relies with considerable assurance upon the fact that the elder Robinson, during the three years intervening between the time when plaintiff claims a gift of the property to him and the death of his father, returned this personal property to the county tax collector as his own property. Appellant contends this evidence shows conclusively that the father had not relinquished all control over said personal property. We do not regard this evidence in any such conclusive aspect. It was only one of the circumstances to be considered by the trial court in passing upon the validity of the asserted gift. This evidence is considerably weakened in our opinion by the further showing that the elder Robinson, after the conveyance of his real property, returned the same for three successive years as his own property. Evidently in making his annual return to the county assessor, after the transfer of his property, he simply followed the course pursued by him in the years preceding the transfer. No question is made as to the validity of the transaction involving the transfer of his real property. The circumstance, therefore, that in his assessment returns for these years, he had also included the personal property as his own cannot be given any great significance. At most it would not be determinative of the validity of the gift of the personal property.

From the foregoing we conclude in the first place that, under the circumstances surrounding the parties, the evidence was sufficient to show a gift of said personal property by the elder Robinson to his son, the plaintiff herein, and that the conduct of the intervenor and her sister, Mrs. Hoalton, for a period of over eleven years after the death of their father, was inconsistent with any theory that they, as heirs of their father or otherwise, ever had any interest in the personal property in question, or to the proceeds of its sale. After remaining silent all those years, it would tax the credulity of any court to believe that the belated assertion of their claim rested on any substantial grounds.

The judgment in our opinion should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

FIRST NAT. TRUST & SAVINGS BANK OF SAN DIEGO v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

L. A. 12809; S. F. 14225.

Supreme Court of California.

July 31, 1931.

1. Master and servant ⇨361.

National bank operating, as executor, cigar business on behalf of estate held personally liable, to employee in business, not only for wages, but in compensation for injury, such employee being, under statute, "employee" of bank (St. 1917, p. 835, § 8; § 7, as amended by St. 1929, p. 306; p. 858, § 30 (e) (1), as amended by St. 1929, p. 1167, § 1).

Since, under provision of Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, St. 1917, p. 835, § 8; § 7, as amended by St. 1929, p. 306, employee in business operated by bank as executor was "employee" of bank, it was personally liable in compensation for injuries to employee, of which liability it could be relieved only by finding of Industrial Accident Commission under the act, St. 1917, p. 858, § 30 (e) (1), as amended by St. 1929, p. 1167, § 1, that it had complied with act in protecting itself by procuring proper and adequate compensation insurance.

2. Banks and banking ⇨2.

In California, word "banking" includes business carried on by trust companies (St. 1909, p. 87, § 2, as amended by St. 1913, p. 137, § 2).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Banking," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Insurance ⇨435.

Compensation insurer of bank with powers of trust company held liable for injuries sustained by employee in cigar business operated by bank as executor (St. 1917, p. 835, § 8; § 7, as amended by St. 1929, p. 306; St. 1909, p. 87, § 2, as amended by St. 1913, p. 137, § 2).

Policy issued to bank insured bank against liability for injuries sustained by its employees in course of its banking business, classification of operations reading as follows: "Banking: Clerical Office Employees * * * including all Executive Officers." However, there were other provisions sufficiently broad and comprehensive to include employee in question, one particular provision of policy providing that agreement should apply to injuries so sustained by reason of business operations described in declarations which, for purpose of insurance, should include all operations necessary, incident, or appurtenant thereto or connected therewith, whether such operations be conducted at work places defined and described in declarations or elsewhere in connection with or in relation to such work places.

4. Partnership ⇨63.

In California, partnership is not usually considered as legal entity.

5. Insurance ⇨146(3).

In case of ambiguity, policy should be strictly construed against insurer who prepared it.

6. Partnership ⇨264.

Transfer of interest of any one partner dissolves partnership, no matter how many remain.

7. Insurance ⇨328(9).

Code provision that transfer of interest by one of "several" partners to others does not avoid insurance applies though there are but two partners (Civ. Code, § 2557).

Civ. Code, § 2557, provides that a transfer of interest by one of "several" partners, joint owners, or owners in common, who are jointly insured, to others, does not avoid insurance, notwithstanding agreement that insurance shall cease upon alienation of thing insured. While word "several" sometimes means more than two, it also means different and separate and is often used to designate a number greater than one.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Several," see Words and Phrases.]

9. Insurance ☞311½.

Provision that transfer of partner's interest to others does not avoid insurance, being remedial, should be liberally construed (Civ. Code, § 2557).

9. Insurance ☞332¼.

Transfer of interest of one of two insured partners to remaining partner held not to avoid workmen's compensation policy (Civ. Code, § 2557).

10. Insurance ☞332¼.

Provisions of workmen's compensation policy that liability shall not be affected by employer's death held applicable, where death occurred prior to employee's injury.

11. Insurance ☞392(8).

Insurer held not estopped, by reason of having sent bill for premium after injury, to deny liability on workmen's compensation policy, record not showing knowledge of facts allegedly constituting defense, or agency of person having knowledge.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Mabelle Bojens and others, widow and dependent children, for the death of Rinehard Bojens, employee, opposed by the First National Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego, as executor of the estate of Charles Williams Hascall, deceased, employer, the Occidental Indemnity Company, insurer, and others. To review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of claimants and against employer, dismissing proceedings as to insurer and others, employer petitions for writ of review.

Award annulled and matter referred to Commission for further order consistent with opinion.

CURTIS, J.

Petitions for transfer to this court of this proceeding, after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Fourth District, were filed by the Occidental Indemnity Company and by the Industrial Accident Commission. These petitions were granted, and the whole matter is now before us as presented upon the original pleadings of the parties filed in the District Court of Appeal.

At the time of granting said petitions we were and still are in perfect agreement with the opinion of the District Court of Appeal in so far as it annulled the order of the commission dismissing the Occidental Indemnity Company from liability. We were in doubt, however, as to the correctness of the opinion in failing to annul the order of the commission dismissing the First National Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego and its insurance carrier, the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, from liability.

[1] There is no contention but that the First National Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego was during all of the times mentioned in the proceeding a corporation organized, existing, and doing business under the laws of the United States of America, and as such was authorized to carry on the banking business, both savings and commercial, and also to transact a general trust business. Being incorporated as a trust company, it had the power and authority to act as the executor of the last will of a decedent when appointed to act in that capacity by any court of competent jurisdiction. While acting as the executor of the will of a deceased, if it undertook to carry on any business on behalf of the estate of said decedent, it became personally liable to all persons employed by it in such business, not only for their wages, but, in our opinion, for compensation in case any of such employees sustained a compensative injury while in its employ. "While an executor or an administrator is bound to perform his decedent's contracts, except as authorized by will, or by statute, he cannot by virtue of his general powers as such make any contract which binds the estate, or create any debt or liability against the deceased, or the estate, which will authorize a judgment de bonis decedentis, even though it is made in the interest of and for the benefit of the estate he represents, and although he is described in such contract as personal representative." 11 Cal. Jur., p. 1046. "An executor or administrator does not, by his contracts, bind the estate he represents, but he is personally liable on his contracts for necessary matters relating to the estate, such as for services rendered in the performance of his duties as such." 11 Cal. Jur., p. 1048; Golden Gate Undertaking Co. v. Taylor, 168 Cal. 94, 141 P. 922, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1152, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 742; Southern Pacific Co. v. Swanson, 73 Cal. App. 229, 238 P. 736. Under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act (sections 7 [as amended by St. 1929, p. 306] and 8), Bojens was an employee of the First National Trust and Savings Bank of San Diego. The latter was, therefore, personally liable in compensation for the injury to him and can only be relieved of this liability by a finding of the Industrial Accident Commission that it has complied with the Workmen's Compensation Act in protecting itself by securing proper and adequate compensation insurance. Section 30 (e) (1), as amended by St. 1929, p. 1167, § 1. We think there can be no question but that this result followed from the facts shown herein. The bank, acting as executor, employed Bojens to perform certain duties for it in the settlement of said estate. As already noted, while the bank as executor employed Bojens, it was liable to him in its individual capacity for his wages. The amount paid as wages to Bojens would, if legally incurred, be allowed the bank by the court upon the settlement of the bank's annual or final account. Being the employer of Bojens at the time of the injury of the latter, the bank was liable for compensation to him on account of said injury, the same having arisen out of and in the course of his employment. It is therefore clear that the commission was in error in finding that the First National Trust & Savings Bank was not individually liable for the payment of compensation arising from the injuries sustained by Bojens.

[2, 3] As we have seen, the bank at the time of Bojen's injury carried compensation insurance with the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York. The policy issued to the bank by this company insures the bank against liability for injuries sustained by its employees in the course of its banking business. This appears in certain "declarations" set forth therein under the head of "Classification of Operations." The classification of operations reads as follows: "Banking: Clerical Office Employees * * * including all Executive Officers." By section 2 of the California Bank Act (as amended by St. 1913, p. 137, § 2), "Banks are divided into the following classes: (a) Savings banks; (b) Commercial banks; and (c) Trust companies." In the Estate of Wellings, 192 Cal. 506, 519, 221 P. 628, 634, this court held "that it was competent for the Legislature, considering the business which trust companies are doing in this state, to define such business as banking." It would appear, therefore, that the word "banking" in this state, by legislative enactment and judicial sanction, has been accorded a meaning sufficiently comprehensive to include the business carried on by trust companies. Therefore, when the policy of insurance issued by the Fidelity & Casualty Company purported to cover the employees of the First National Bank of San Diego employed by it in its banking business, by its very terms it covered those employees of the bank whose duties were confined to the trust department carried on by the bank. It might be questioned whether the classification "Clerical Office Employees" would cover Bojens, who was, as we have seen, employed in the cigar business, which the bank as executor was carrying on. There were other provisions of the policy, however, which in our opinion extended the coverage provisions of the policy to all employees of the bank whether expressly included in the above classification or not. The policy issued by the Fidelity & Casualty Company was a standard form of policy provided by the law of this state. It contained provisions regarding occupations of the insured other than, and in addition to, those set forth in the "declarations" of the policy identically like those in the policy of indemnity considered by this court in the case of Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corp. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 194 Cal. 127, 228 P. 1. We there held that the description in the declarations of classes of occupations in which the insured might engage was not intended as limiting the list of operations, but only as fixing a premium rate applicable to the particular operations described therein; and that, even though the insured was engaged at the time of the injury in work outside the terms and limitations expressed in said classifications, the effect was not to take the employer or employee outside the protection of the policy, but only to require the employer to pay a different premium than that provided for the particular employments specified in the declarations. The court in that opinion followed its prior ruling expressed in the case of Worswick Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 181 Cal. 550, 185 P. 953. The rule thus announced is applicable to the facts in the present proceeding. While the occupation in which Bojens was engaged at the time of his injury may not have been expressed in the "classification of operations" contained in the "declarations" of the policy, other provisions of the policy were sufficiently broad and comprehensive to include him within the protection of the policy. One particular provision of the policy to which we refer is as follows: "This agreement shall apply to such injuries so sustained by reason of the business operations described in said declarations which for the purpose of this insurance shall include all operations necessary, incident or appurtenant thereto or connected therewith whether such operations are conducted at the work places defined and described in said declarations or elsewhere in connection with or in relation to such work places."

Under this provision of the policy we are clearly of the view that the Fidelity & Casualty Company is liable as the insurer of the bank for the injury sustained by Bojens, while in the service of the bank as executor of the will of said decedent.

The argument is advanced by the Fidelity & Casualty Company that in the instant case it is in the same position as if it had insured a private individual carrying on a business who, while the insurance was in force, had been appointed executor of the will of a decedent. In such a case it is claimed, and rightly so, that the insurance carrier of the private business of the individual would not be liable for any injury sustained by an employee of this same individual while acting as executor. The cases are not analogous. In the case of a private individual appointed to administer an estate, the settlement of the estate is distinct from and cannot in any sense be held to be a part of his private business. In the case of a bank, with the powers of a trust company, the administration of estates under appointment of the court is just as much a part of its corporate business as the receiving of deposits over its bank counter or the loaning of funds entrusted to it. A private individual, acting as executor, carries on the business of the estate entirely separate and distinct from his private business, while a trust company in performing like services is simply carrying out the objects and purposes of its creation. The argument, we think, is not sound.

We are appending hereto the opinion of the District Court of Appeal written by Presiding Justice Barnard annulling the order of the commission dismissing from liability the Occidental Indemnity Company as adopted by us. It correctly expresses our views upon the questions considered and is as follows:

This is a petition for a writ of review, seeking to annul an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission.

Charles Hascall and S. W. Powell, as co-partners, were conducting a wholesale and retail cigar store in the city of San Diego. On December 28, 1928, the respondent Occidental Indemnity Company issued to them a standard form workmen's compensation policy, covering the employees of said business from that date until December 28, 1929. About May 1, 1929, Hascall purchased the partnership interest of Powell in said business, and thereafter, until his death, continued to conduct the business under the same name of Hascall & Powell, with no change in the manner of conducting the business, or in the nature of the employment of one Rinehard Bojens, who had been an employee of the partnership. On September 27, 1929, the said Hascall died, and the First National Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego, a corporation, was appointed executor of his estate. The executor continued to operate the cigar store to the end that it might be sold as a going concern. One of the employees of the cigar store was made manager thereof by the executor, at an increased salary, and the other employees, including Bojens, were continued at the same work and at the same salary as before. On November 15, 1929, the said Rinehard Bojens, in the regular course of his employment in said cigar business, received injuries which resulted in blood poisoning and caused his death on January 18, 1930. Shortly after November 15, 1929, one Robert E. Holmes, through whom the Occidental policy was procured, was notified of the injury. After making some investigation, Holmes referred the matter to the respondent Occidental Indemnity Company, which company on December 30, 1929, wrote to an adjuster in San Diego, requesting him to make further investigation, which he did. It is admitted that Holmes knew that Hascall had purchased the partnership interest of Powell shortly after that transaction occurred and also knew that he was continuing the business as sole owner thereof. Also, that Holmes knew of the death of Hascall within a few days after it occurred, and prior to the date Bojens was injured. On December 27, 1929, respondent Occidental Indemnity Company issued a statement addressed to Holmes, calling for an additional premium, based upon the wages actually paid by the business during the entire policy year, including the period during which the business was operated by Hascall alone and also the period during which the business was operated by the executor. The amount of this additional premium was paid by the executor to Holmes on January 6, 1930. It also appears that upon the expiration of the policy year on December 28, 1929, the policy was renewed for another year. The First National Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego carried a workmen's compensation policy with the respondent the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, which policy was written for the benefit of all of the employees of the bank, as set forth in said policy. After a hearing, with various continuances, the respondent Industrial Accident Commission made an award in the amount of $5,000 in favor of the dependent wife and children of Bojens, and found that the First National Trust & Savings Bank of San Diego, executor of the estate of Charles Williams Hascall, deceased, was the employer of the said Bojens at the time of his injury, and that said employer was not insured. An order was also made dismissing the proceedings as to the First National Trust & Savings Bank individually, as to the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York, a corporation, and as to Occidental Indemnity Company, a corporation. A petition for a rehearing was later denied by the Industrial Accident Commission.

It is conceded by all parties that the dependent wife and children of Bojens are entitled to the award made, the only question raised being as to who should pay the same. It is also conceded that the insurance policy issued by the Occidental Indemnity Company was in full force and effect at the time of the injury, unless the same had been avoided either by the transfer of the interest of S.W. Powell to Charles Hascall, or by his subsequent death and the continuance of the business by his executor. In behalf of the respondents, it is urged that in the policy referred to the Occidental Indemnity Company insured a particular entity, namely, the partnership of Hascall & Powell, and that at the time of his fatal injuries Bojens was not the employee of this entity, but was the employee of the trust company in its capacity as executor; it being urged that the employer, within the meaning of the policy, was twice changed after the policy was issued.

[4, 5] Item 1 of the declarations in this policy reads as follows:

"Name of this Employer Charles Hascall and S. W. Powell, d. b. a. Hascall & Powell
"P. O. Address
1072-4th Street, San Diego, California.
Street City or Town

"For the purpose of serving notice, as in the policy provided, this Employer agrees that this address may be considered as both the residence and business address of this Employer or any representative upon whom notice may be served.

"Individual, co-partnership, corporation or estate? Co-partnership."

It will be noted that under "Name of this Employer," there are set forth two names, who are described as "doing business as Hascall & Powell." In paragraph 1 (a) of the policy the company agrees with this employer to pay to any person entitled thereto under the Workmen's Compensation Law the entire amount of any sum due. It will be noted that the policy, in naming the employer, names two individuals who are not even described as a partnership. It does not specify that the partnership, as an entity, is named as the employer. While a little further down there appears a description as a copartnership, this is not included under the name of the employer. Not only does the policy fail to specify that the employer insured is a copartnership, as an entity, but in this state a partnership is not usually considered a legal entity. 20 Cal. Jur. 680; People v. Maljan, 34 Cal. App. 384, 167 P. 547; Woodward v. McAdam, 101 Cal. 439, 35 P. 1016. The point relied upon by respondents as freeing the Occidental Indemnity Company from liability under this policy is a most technical one. If we are to be extremely technical in interpreting this policy, it would seem that, strictly speaking, in naming the employer, this policy has insured two individuals, Charles Hascall and S. W. Powell, while they are doing business as Hascall & Powell. In other words, they are each insured while doing business under that firm name. While one of them dropped out of the business, the other continued to run the same business in the same manner and in the same name, so that not even such an increase of risk could be claimed, as might have occurred if a new personality had been brought into the business. Strictly interpreted, the policy insured either Charles Hascall or S. W. Powell while doing business as Hascall & Powell. If an ambiguity exists, an insurance policy should be strictly construed against the insurer who prepared it. Welch v. British American, etc., Co., 148 Cal. 223, 82 P. 964, 113 Am. St. Rep. 223, 7

Ann. Cas. 396. Had this insurance company desired to insure only this copartnership as an entity, it could have been easily so designated in naming the employer.

[6-9] In any event, we feel that section 2557 of the Civil Code applies. This section reads as follows: "A transfer of interest by one of several partners, joint owners, or owners in common, who are jointly insured, to the others, does not avoid an insurance, even though it has been agreed that the insurance shall cease upon an alienation of the thing insured."

That section applies to all kinds of insurance. Civ. Code, § 2534. Respondents insist that this section does not apply, but should be interpreted in connection with the entire Code, particularly in connection with the provisions with respect to dissolution of copartnerships. It is urged that by these latter provisions, a transfer from one of only two partners to the other, effects a dissolution of the partnership, and that section 2557 was meant to apply only when there are more than two partners, and where the partnership would not be dissolved by the transfer of the interest of one to the others remaining. If that were the case, section 2557 would have no meaning in respect to partnerships because, by the law of partnership, the transfer of the interest of any one partner dissolves the partnership, no matter how many partners remain. It is also urged that the word "several" in section 2557 means more than two. While that is one meaning of the word, there are also other meanings, such as, different and separate. The word is often used to designate a number greater than one. The section refers not only to partners, but to joint owners or owners in common. And in speaking of such owners, no reason appears why the beneficial provisions of the section should be limited to cases where more than two are involved. It seems to us that the object and purpose of the section is to provide for a perfectly natural and just situation, and that it was intended to apply to such a transfer by one of two or more such parties. The section is unquestionably remedial, and for the benefit of the insured, and as such, should be liberally construed. This section of the Civil Code was a part of this insurance contract. General Acc., etc., Corp. v. Indus. Acc. Comm., 196 Cal. 179, 237 P. 33. We are therefore of the opinion that the transfer of the interest of S. W. Powell in this business to Charles Hascall did not avoid this policy and that Charles Hascall continued as the employer named in the policy up to his death.

[10] Among the conditions of the policy in question, section D reads as follows: "The obligations of paragraph one (a) foregoing are hereby declared to be the direct obligations and promises of the Company to any injured employee covered hereby, or, in the event of his death, to his dependents; and to each such employee or such dependent the Company is hereby made directly and primarily liable under said obligations and promises. This contract is made for the benefit of such employees or such dependents and is enforceable against the Company, by any such employee or such dependent in his name or on his behalf, at any time and in any manner permitted by law, whether claims or proceedings are brought against the Company alone or jointly with this Employer. If the law of any state in which the policy is applicable provides for the enforcement of the rights of such employees or such dependents by any commission, board or other state agency for the benefit of such employees or such dependents, then the provisions of such law are made a part hereof, as respects any matter subject thereto, as fully as if written herein. The obligations and promises of the Company as set forth in this paragraph shall not be affected by the failure of this Employer to do or refrain from doing any act required by the policy; nor by any default of this Employer after the accident in the payment of premiums or in the giving of any notice required by the policy or otherwise; nor by the death, insolvency, bankruptcy, legal incapacity or inability of this Employer, nor by any proceeding against him as a result of which the conduct of this Employer's business may be and continue to be in charge of an executor, administrator, receiver, trustee, assignee, or other person."

Charles Hascall being, up to the time of his death, the employer of Bojens, the section of the policy just quoted not only makes the insurance company directly and primarily liable to Bojens for the obligations of paragraph 1 (a) thereof, which was to pay the amount due to his dependents under the Workmen's Compensation Law, but the last sentence of the paragraph quoted provides that this obligation and promise of the company shall not be affected by the death of this employer, nor by any proceedings as a result of which this employer's business should continue in charge of an executor. It is argued by the respondent Occidental Indemnity Company that this provision only applies and refers to a death of an employer, and the administration of his estate, taking place after the injury to the employee. We think this position cannot be maintained. Such an interpretation would make the clause meaningless, as the liability of the insurance company would, in the absence of this provision in the policy, become fixed at the date of an injury occurring during the life of the employer, and would not be affected by his later death. Moreover, the policy specifically refers to "after the accident" in the second clause preceding this one, but makes no such reference in the clause in question. We conclude, therefore, that under the law and the provisions of this particular policy, it was still in force at the date of the injury to Bojens, and that respondent Occidental Indemnity Company was responsible for the payment of the award. It follows, therefore, that the finding of the commission that the employer was uninsured at the time of the injury is not supported by the evidence.

[11] An attempt is made by petitioner to establish that respondent Occidental Indemnity Company is estopped to deny its liability by reason of having sent out a bill for an additional premium, after the date of the injury to Bojens. While the record shows that Holmes, through whom the policy was originally secured, had knowledge of the transfer of Powell's interest in the business to Hascall, and later of the death of Hascall, the record fails to show that Holmes was an agent of the Occidental Indemnity Company and nothing appears in the record to definitely show knowledge upon the part of the insurance company itself, prior to December 30, 1929.

The equities are with the petitioner in this proceeding. While Holmes testified that he was a broker, and he was not clearly shown to have been the agent of this insurance company, the general situation was one that might easily mislead an employer. The insurance company received its premium, the risk was not increased, the executor paid the additional premium covering the entire year, and the policy was renewed at its expiration. Holmes having been informed of the changes, it was a natural thing to rely on the policy as continuing. While the knowledge of Holmes was not definitely fastened upon the company, the circumstances are such as to further justify the rule that a contract should be strictly interpreted against the party who drew it.

For the reasons set forth, the award of the Industrial Accident Commission is annulled and the matter is referred to said commission for a further order, consistent with the views herein expressed.

Action by R. Barcroft & Sons Company against Neil J. Cullen and others, including the Pacific Steel Building Company. From the judgment, the last-named defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal.

Motion denied.

Sherman & Sherman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

F. W. Henderson, of Merced (deceased), Julian H. Biddle and Duncan A. McLeod, both of San Francisco, for respondent (substitutes).

PRESTON, J.

The motion to dismiss the appeal herein is denied, being without merit for the following reasons:

Plaintiff sued to foreclose a materialman's lien and to have it impressed upon two city lots in Merced, together with the building erected thereon, praying also for the sale of the property to satisfy its claims. The building was a portable steel service station structure furnished by appellant for installation and use as a gas and oil service station. Pending trial of the action, appellant corporation removed the structure from the real property, and at the trial contended that it was a mere trade fixture, not subject to the lien of plaintiff. The trial court held otherwise, and ordered the whole of the property sold, without distinction or preference between the lots and the building.

The court entered its judgment on April 15, 1930. In due time appellant, as well as some of the other defendants, filed a notice of intention to move for a new trial. The court heard and denied said motion but modified the decree, apparently acting under the powers conferred by the recently enacted section 662 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The chief modification in the decree was to order that the building be exposed to sale first and, if sufficient funds were not created thereby to satisfy plaintiff's demand, then that the lots be sold to pay the deficit. In other words, the court modified its decree in a material respect as to appellant, and to put this modification into effect made new findings and a new decree, which said decree was entered on August 12, 1930. On September 5, 1930, appellant duly filed its notice of appeal.

The notice was clearly within the time allowed by law. Respondent's theory is that the new judgment was but a correction of clerical misprisions in the old one, and hence the appeal should have been taken in time from the original judgment.

Appellant proposes to have reviewed only the judgment entered on August 12th, and, if that judgment is a material departure from the original judgment to the prejudice of appellant, it has a plain right of appeal therefrom. It is our view that the new judgment does depart from the old in material respects to the injury of appellant. This is evident from the facts already recited; hence the order above made.

BARBEE v. STATE BAR OF CALIFORNIA.

Supreme Court of California.

July 31, 1931.

1. Attorney and client ⇨53(2), 58.

Although attorney's allegedly withholding clients' moneys or charging excessive fee was subject to disapproval, evidence held insufficient to establish fraudulent intent or moral turpitude; three months' suspension being adequate penalty.

2. Attorney and client ⇨44(1).

In workmen's compensation proceedings, attorney cannot lawfully charge fee exceeding that allowed by commission.

In Bank.

Petition by James W. Barbee to review a recommendation of the Board of Governors of the State Bar of California that petitioner be suspended for one year.

Modified to three months' suspension.

James W. Barbee, of Long Beach, for appellant, in propria persona.

Walter J. Little and Philbrick McCoy, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is a petition to review a recommendation of the board of governors of the State Bar that petitioner be suspended from the practice of the law for a period of one year. The proceeding was commenced before local administrative committee No. 6, in Los Angeles county, and resulted in a recommendation of disbarment, which was reduced to suspension by order of the board of governors.

[1] Petitioner was tried on three accusations. In the Burns case, the complainant, Mrs. Michael Burns, made charges based upon an action against her husband brought by Walker Collection Service Company, in which petitioner acted as attorney for said husband. Burns later directed petitioner to settle the case, and agreed to pay him a fee of $15. Petitioner negotiated the settlement, and over a considerable period of time received remittances in small sums from his client to be paid over to the adverse party. The committee found that petitioner withheld the sum of $78.50 for some time before finally remitting to the collection company. The committee also found that "at the time respondent was handling said case of Walker's Collection Service Company against complainant, respondent was handling two other matters for complainant, in which he was making certain payments on behalf of complainant, for report on title for street assessments, and other items of minor importance. The evidence as to whether or not complainant furnished the money to respondent with which to make these last mentioned payments is conflicting, but the committee finds that the evidence preponderates in favor of complainant."

"* * * We are not sure that we agree with this statement of the weight of the evidence, but irrespective of this, the complainant admitted, and the committee found, that petitioner was representing Mr. and Mrs. Burns in several matters, and handling their accounts with several creditors. His explanation of the delay in making payments is that he was acting in their interests in spreading the small payments received among the various claimants. The whole case appears to us to be a dispute over accounting methods, and perhaps the evidence establishes laxity on the part of petitioner in handling the money. But we find little in the record to justify the conclusion that he deliberately withheld the sum of $78.50, intending to appropriate it to his own use. Indeed, it plainly appears that he performed continuous services for the parties without adequate compensation and that he became a guarantor for Mr. Burns on a note for $100 evidencing a loan obtained from the Morris Plan Company. There is also in the record the testimony of John B. Stirk, manager of the collection company, that petitioner had personally guaranteed the payment of the balance of the account at a time when there was owing $150.25; that he had so informed Mr. and Mrs. Burns; and that in reliance upon the personal assurance of petitioner, he had released a garnishment which had been levied upon the wages of Mr. Burns. On the whole, we are inclined to the view that the evidence in this case is insufficient to justify the findings and order.

The McDaniels case grew out of a divorce action brought by Mrs. Pearl McDaniels against her husband, in which petitioner represented her. It appears that she paid him $50 in advance with the understanding that if he were able to collect the whole of an agreed fee of $150 from the defendant, he would return the $50 to her. Petitioner secured a settlement in which she was to receive certain property and $350, and he was to receive $250 for his fees and $15 additional for his costs. Thereafter she demanded that he return the $50, which he failed to do until after the commencement of this proceeding. Petitioner's explanation is that she had agreed to accept a settlement of $300 and the property; that he had negotiated such a settlement; that thereafter he had made further overtures to the attorney for the defendant to raise the additional sum of $50 to cover the part of his fee advanced to him; and that this was finally accomplished. On this point petitioner is corroborated by the testimony of the husband's attorney. Hence, he contends, the $50 was really returned to Mrs. McDaniels when he turned over to her the sum of $350 instead of $300 which she had agreed to take and which he had secured for her. With respect to the fee of $250, it appears from Mrs. McDaniels' testimony that she acquiesced in this charge, and petitioner states that the original figure of $150 was quoted for a simple action involving no alimony or property settlement. No such acquiescence is shown as to the item of $50, for when the matter was presented to Mrs. McDaniels she took the papers under consideration, and a few days later demanded the return of the money. In the meantime she had become reconciled to her husband. Again we may concede that petitioner's conduct is subject to criticism. Without doubt he should have obtained her consent prior to the agreement with counsel for the adverse party, and lacking that consent, should have remitted to her the entire amount apparently received in settlement of the action. But in this case also the record does not satisfactorily establish an intent to defraud. Petitioner was, we believe, stubbornly but honestly mistaken in his understanding of his rights in the matter. We are not prepared to hold that such a dispute over the fixing of a fee is grounds for the drastic punishment inflicted by the order herein.

[2] The third case was one in which petitioner was engaged by Mrs. Frances Slates to institute a proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission to recover for herself and minor child an award for the death of her husband. The commission made an award of $3,410.40, out of which it directed that the sum of $100 be paid to petitioner and another as attorney's fees. Payments on account of the award were made to petitioner from time to time, from which he deducted the specified fee and the additional sum of $150 for additional services. The committee found that this additional sum was wrongfully deducted and that he also withheld sums at various times and for various periods. Ultimately all the money claimed was paid over to complainant. Petitioner presents an explanation for each of the acts criticised. The additional fee was charged, he claims, for additional services in attempting to collect the award from a somewhat recalcitrant debtor. Some of the delays in payments are accounted for by the fact that checks paid to petitioner by the other party to the proceeding were dishonored, and were collected only after considerable effort. Petitioner also testified that Mrs. Slates was desirous of keeping the money away from her husband and that he withheld money with her consent. In this he is corroborated by Mrs. Henigan, Mrs. Slates' aunt, who testified that Mrs. Slates was having trouble with her husband, and intended to secure a divorce; that Mrs. Slates asked petitioner to prepare the papers for such an action; and that she told petitioner not to tell her husband how much money was available, and not to pay the bulk of the sum collected until after the parties were separated. Petitioner testified further that Mrs. Slates expressed herself as being satisfied with his charge of $150 for special services, and in this he is also corroborated by Mrs. Henigan. Mrs. Slates herself stated in response to a question of petitioner that she had made no complaint about this sum as long as he had continued to work on the matter of collections. On the essential issues, the evidence in this case is conflicting. We should not hesitate to condemn the exaction of a fee in excess of that allowed by the commission, which act would be in violation of the law; but there is testimony in the record to support petitioner's contention that it was a separate charge for the separate services involved in collection, in which Mrs. Slates had acquiesced. With respect to the claim of withholding the money to keep it from her husband, petitioner's testimony is fully corroborated by that of Mrs. Henigan.

It seems unfortunate that in these matters, assuming petitioner's testimony to be true, he failed to keep sufficient records and accounts, and relied upon oral agreements and understandings as a foundation for his various claims and his acts. As we have already stated, his conduct is subject to criticism and disapproval. Nevertheless, our reading of the whole record leaves us without the firm conviction that his moral turpitude is established. We think that the committee has in its findings magnified his errors somewhat, and that his conduct does not call for the severe penalty meted out to him. Moreover, petitioner presented numerous letters from judges, lawyers, and business men of the community in which he practiced, which testified to his good character and reputation. An additional fact of some significance is a long period of practice in the courts of this state without any complaints of this nature ever having been made. For the acts herein considered, however, some penalty is deserved, and we are of the opinion that suspension for a period of three months would be adequate.

It is therefore ordered that petitioner be suspended from the practice of law in all courts of this state for a period of three months, said suspension to become effective thirty days from the service of notice of the within order, said service to be made upon him by the clerk of this court by means of the United States registered mail.

S. F. 13478.

Supreme Court of California.
July 27, 1931.

Joint tenancy $\S$ 3.

Interest acquired by purchasers under contract of purchase naming purchasers disjunctively held not joint tenancy, where instrument itself did not so declare (Civ. Code, §§ 683, 686).

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Suit by Anna Dalton against Louis H. Keers, Jacob Huntzicker, as executor of the last will and testament of George W. Gould, deceased, and another, in which defendant last named filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant last named appeals.

Reversed.

Ernest K. Little, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Austin Lewis and M. M. Getz, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHENK, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment in specific performance.

In October, 1919, Anna Dalton, the plaintiff, and George W. Gould, since deceased, established a joint bank account in the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society in San Francisco. Thereafter from time to time and until August 24, 1926, deposits were made in that account aggregating some $15,000. It is an admitted fact that all of the money deposited in that account, prior to deposit, belonged to George W. Gould, and that all of the withdrawals therefrom were made by the plaintiff.

On May 10, 1926, the defendants Keers and McGain were the owners of the real property involved in this action, which is located in San Mateo county, and which is described by metes and bounds. On that day they were paid from the joint account the sum of $1,100, which was the full purchase price of said property. Instead of taking a deed to the property, and for reasons which do not appear from the record, an ordinary contract of conditional sale was executed, wherein Keers and McGain were named as the sellers and G. W. Gould or Anna Dalton were named as the purchasers. Receipt of the $1,100 was acknowledged therein as payment in full. On July 26, 1926, George W. Gould and Anna Dalton executed a written contract with a builder for the construction of a house on said property for the sum of $3,375.

George W. Gould died on October 28, 1926, in the city of San Francisco. On the day before his death, Anna Dalton withdrew from the bank account the sum of $2,000, and on the day of his death she withdrew the further sum of $270, thereby reducing the balance in the account to the sum of $5.53.

The decedent's will was filed for probate, and in February, 1927, the defendant executor was appointed. In April, 1928, this action was brought by Anna Dalton to compel the conveyance to her as sole owner of the title to said property. The complaint is grounded on said contract of purchase and sale. The defendants Keers and McGain interposed no defense and stand ready to convey the title in accordance with the order of the court. The executor answered and also filed a cross-complaint, in which it was alleged that George W. Gould, prior to 1914, was a resident of South Dakota; that about that time he came to California to regain his health; that shortly thereafter he took up his residence with Anna Dalton and her husband in San Francisco; that Mr. Gould paid the rent and upkeep of the house until the time of his death; that by reason of his poor health he could not conveniently attend to his banking and other business; that he reposed great trust and confidence in Anna Dalton and by reason thereof he established the bank account in the manner above described; that during the existence of said account the withdrawals from said fund were made by Anna Dalton for the use and benefit of George W. Gould; that in May, 1926, said real property was purchased on the advice of Anna Dalton; that said building contract was entered into for and on behalf of George W. Gould; and that the withdrawals were made from said bank account by Anna Dalton as the agent and trustee of George W. Gould. The prayer of the cross-complaint was that it be decreed that George W. Gould was the owner of said property during his lifetime; that a conveyance be ordered in favor of the executor and for an accounting of said fund on the part of the plaintiff.

The trial court refused to permit the defendant executor to introduce any evidence as to the confidential relationship existing between Anna Dalton and the decedent. On proof of the contract to convey and the payment of the $1,100 from said bank account, the court found the allegations of the complaint to be true and the foregoing allegations of the cross-complaint to be untrue, and ordered judgment accordingly. The defendant executor appeals on the ground that the evidence does not support the findings and judgment.

It is apparent that the only theory upon which the judgment may be supported is that the contract of purchase created a joint interest in the purchasers which inured to the benefit of the survivor. Section 683 of the Civil Code provides: "A joint interest is one owned by several persons in equal shares, by a title created by a single will or transfer, when expressly declared in the will or transfer to be a joint tenancy, * * * or when granted or devised to executors or trustees as joint tenants." Section 686 of the Civil Code provides: "Every interest created in favor of several persons in their own right is an interest in common, unless acquired by them in partnership, for partnership purposes, or unless declared in its creation to be a joint interest, as provided in section 683, or unless acquired as community property."

The foregoing sections remained the same from the time of their enactment, in 1872, to the time of the commencement of the present action. Prior to their enactment it was declared in the early case of Bowen v. May, 12 Cal. 348, that in order to constitute a joint estate in lands in two or more persons, such estate must be expressly declared in the conveyance itself, otherwise the estate conveyed will be held by the grantees as tenants in common. In Estate of Hittell, 141 Cal. 432, 75 P. 53, it was held that an interest in real property in favor of several persons is an interest in common, unless a joint interest is created as provided in section 683 of the Civil Code.

It is clear that the contract now under consideration did not create a joint tenancy in Anna Dalton and George W. Gould. This is true, not because of the use of the disjunctive, but by reason of the fact that the instrument itself did not so declare. The question is, what interest, if any, did the instrument create? No question is raised as to the obligation of the sellers to convey to the party or parties entitled. The purchasers thereunder became the equitable owners of the property (Estate of Dwyer, 159 Cal. 664, 115 P. 235; 6 Cal. Jur. p. 527), and entitled to demand performance. If the purchasers had been named in the conjunctive, no doubt could arise, and they would take as tenants in common. There is a strong inference from the evidence that the purchasers intended to take as tenants in common arising from the execution by them jointly of the building contract. If such was the intention the instrument might have been reformed so as to effectuate that intention and the two would take as tenants in common.

In any event the interest, if any, which the purchasers acquired under the contract of purchase was not a joint tenancy, under the express language of sections 683 and 686 of the Civil Code, and the judgment based on such contract, vesting exclusive title in the plaintiff, cannot be sustained.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; CURTIS, J.; PRESTON, J.; SEAWELL, J.

Court found that plaintiffs and defendants became owners as tenants in common of undeveloped tract of land in remote portion of state; that defendant was son and brother respectively of plaintiffs, who reposed great and implicit confidence and trust in defendant; that they conveyed land to defendant, sole consideration for conveyance being defendant's agreement to sell land and to pay plaintiffs proportionate share of proceeds; that defendant made improvements in good faith and was entitled to reimbursement for them and for taxes paid; that no period was specified within which sale must be made; and that there were equities in favor of both parties.

4. Tenancy in common ⇨21.

Tenant in common has right to occupy whole of common lands, being presumed to hold for himself and cotenants.

5. Tenancy in common ⇨32.

Tenant in common held entitled to deduct from rents and profits received proportionate part of proper expenditures made in working and developing property and protecting common estate.

6. Equity ⇨66.

In suit for reconveyance against cotenant holding whole legal title for purpose of sale, plaintiffs, having permitted defendant to hold and improve lands for over eleven years without protest, held required to do equity by reimbursing defendant for improvements and taxes.

7. Judgment ⇨229.

In suit for reconveyance against cotenant holding legal title, "interlocutory order" decreeing reconveyance, provided plaintiffs reimburse defendant for taxes and improvements before certain date, held really "final decree" unduly prejudicing plaintiffs.

Under such decree, if plaintiffs had submitted to such requirement by discharging claims, they would have thereby waived and foregone right to complain of justice of such exaction. Hence, to make compliance with such judgment a condition precedent to granting defendants relief to which they were otherwise found to be entitled, unduly prejudiced them.

8. Judgment ⇨217.

In suit for reconveyance against cotenant, held, decree should be framed so as to enable aggrieved party to prosecute, without hindrance, review of adverse provisions.

PRESTON, J.

Appeals from judgments for defendants in suits to compel the reconveyance of certain real property. The causes of action are identical, are submitted under one set of briefs, and will be considered together; the word "appeal" will refer to both appeals.

The real basis of the appeal is the contention that the findings do not support the judgment. The substance of these findings will therefore be set forth:

In 1916 plaintiffs and defendant S. A. McCush became owners, as tenants in common, of an undeveloped tract of land in northern Mendocino county of the reasonable value of $5,000, which they incumbered soon thereafter with a $1,700 mortgage. Said defendant was the son of one plaintiff and the brother of the other plaintiffs, and they all reposed great and implicit confidence and trust in him. In October, 1917, they executed a deed, intended to convey their respective interests in said property to him. However, by mutual mistake, a portion of the land was omitted from the description in the deed and the court found that it should be corrected to conform to the true intent of the parties.

The deed was delivered to defendant with the understanding and agreement on his part to sell the property, apply the proceeds first to payment of said mortgage and cost of sale, and then to payment to each plaintiff of his proportionate share of the residue. The court found that plaintiffs would not have made the deed but for their confidence and trust in said defendant and that the sole and only consideration therefor was his said agreement to sell the property and distribute the proceeds as aforesaid.

Defendant went into possession and did not or could not sell the land. But out of his own funds he paid taxes from the date of the deed to him, aggregating some $900. In addition, he had improvements erected on the land, a house, garage, fences, chicken house, and a woodshed, at a total cost of $2,775. These improvements greatly enhanced the value of the property. The court found that plaintiffs first discovered in 1925 that said defendant did not intend to keep his agreement to sell and they then and there demanded that he sell the land and carry out his agreement with them. Also in 1925 said defendant borrowed money from defendant Cobb to discharge the renewal of the mortgage of 1917, with accumulations of interest thereunder, and he executed to her a new mortgage in the sum of $2,176, which became and the court found to now be a first lien against the whole of said property.

The court further found that in this cause there were equities in favor of both parties; that while plaintiffs' cause was not barred by statutory limitation, equity, or laches, yet said defendant had made the above improvements in good faith and was entitled to be reimbursed therefor. The proceeds of the land received by defendant since October 31, 1917, were found sufficient to cover the cost of all other improvements made by him, such as clearing the ground, etc.

On March 8, 1929, the court made an interlocutory order requiring said defendant to reconvey said property, in proportionate shares, to each of the plaintiffs, provided each of said plaintiffs repay to defendant his proportionate share of the sums so expended by said defendant for taxes and improvements, but that in the event of plaintiffs' failure to repay said sums before May 7, 1929, said defendant would not be required to reconvey and plaintiffs would take nothing by their action. On June 14, 1929, no repayment having been made by plaintiffs, the court made another order extending their time to July 20, 1929. No payment having been made by that date, the court thereupon prepared and on July 29, 1929, filed its findings, in substance as above set forth, and concluded as a matter of law that said deed should be reformed to contain a complete description of said land; that said Cobb mortgage is a valid first lien against the property; and that plaintiffs take nothing by their action. Judgment was entered accordingly, and plaintiffs have appealed.

As above stated, the court found that the sole consideration for execution of said deed was said respondent's agreement to sell the land and distribute the proceeds as aforesaid, which agreement he refused and failed to perform. Appellants claim that these findings establish the status of respondent as an involuntary trustee "through his own fault" of the legal title to the land, thus precluding him from the assertion of any right to reimbursement for the sums expended by him (sections 2217, 2273, 2275, Civ. Code); hence they claim that in denying them relief because of their failure to reimburse, the judgment is unsupported by the findings and is contrary to law. These same facts, they contend, show the lack of any equity in respondent sufficient to justify the reformation of said deed. Lastly they claim that, from the facts found, the trial court should have entered a decree establishing a trust in their favor, directing conveyance of the property to them, and denying reformation of the deed.

[1, 2] In disposing of these several contentions we may first make the observation that as this is an appeal upon the judgment roll alone, the findings are conclusively presumed to be supported by the evidence; furthermore, it is also elementary that they are to receive, if possible, such a construction as will uphold rather than defeat the judgment thereon; they are to be liberally construed and, if possible, any ambiguity or inconsistency will be resolved in favor of sustaining the judgment.

[3-6] We cannot say that these findings establish the status of respondent as an involuntary trustee through his own fault. With the finding that the agreement to sell the land was the sole consideration for appellants' deed to respondent is to be considered the finding that there was a relationship of trust and confidence between the parties; that respondent made said improvements in good faith and was entitled to reimbursement for them and for taxes paid. It is also to be considered that the court specifically found that there were equities in favor of both parties. The land appears to have been an undeveloped tract in a remote portion of the state. The evidence is not before us. It is significant that no period was specified within which the sale must be made. Had respondent made every effort to sell over a long period of time and to fulfill the terms of his agreement but had he been unable to find a buyer, it would not be said that he acted in bad faith in entering upon the land to hold and protect it, securing renewals of the mortgage and paying taxes, interest, etc., out of his own funds, meanwhile improving the property to enhance its value.

Even though respondent held legal title to the tract merely for purposes of sale thereof, the equitable title to undivided shares remaining at all times in appellants, yet he and appellants were tenants in common and he held in his own right both the legal and equitable title to his undivided share of said property. He therefore had the right to enter upon and occupy the whole and every part of the common lands, being presumed, so long as he remained in possession, to hold for himself and for his cotenants. Wood v. Henley, 88 Cal. App. 441, 452, 453, 263 P. 870, and cases cited. He was entitled to deduct from the rents or profits received the cost of all proper expenditures made in working the property and developing it and protecting the common estate. Higgins v. Eva, 204 Cal. 231, 238, 267 P. 1081.

Thus the circumstances of this case show plainly that there were equities in favor of both parties, as found by the court. From the fact that appellants permitted respondent to hold the property without protest from 1917 to 1925, the presumption on his part would not be unwarranted that they were satisfied to be relieved of the burden of the mortgage and taxes and he may have believed in all sincerity that his right had ripened into legal title. At any rate, in allowing said respondent to hold, improve, and increase the value of their property over a period of eleven years, without so much as raising a voice in protest or entering a court of equity to demand a reconveyance, appellants obviously induced a situation demanding the application of equitable principles and requiring that they do equity by reimbursing respondent, before seeking equity by demanding a reconveyance from him. Pomeroy's Equity Juris. (4th Ed.) vol. 3, § 1241, and cases cited.

[7, 8] Notwithstanding our approval in the main of the action of the court below, we are unable to follow it as to the form of its judgment in these causes. The interlocutory order made was in reality a final decree disposing of a part of the main issue in the cause. Pista v. Resetar, 205 Cal. 198, 200, 270 P. 453. To make compliance with this judgment a condition precedent to granting appellants the relief to which they are otherwise found to be entitled unduly prejudiced them. Such a decree only should be framed as will enable an aggrieved party to prosecute, without hindrance, a review of all adverse provisions thereof. Under the present decree appellants must first submit to the judgment respecting compensation for taxes and improvements before they may have the title restored to them. If they had submitted to such a requirement by discharging the claims, they would have thereby waived and foregone the right to complain of the justice of such an exaction. The decree, of course, could have provided that said respondent was under no obligation to reconvey until the claims were paid, but the time of payment could only have followed the point of time when the decree should become final.

It is also worthy of mention that the regularity of the record title to said property would be best preserved by the decreeing of a lien upon the respective interests in favor of said respondent for the several amounts due and the directing of reconveyances subject thereto.

At any rate, a retrial of these causes seems unnecessary.

The judgments are therefore reversed, and the causes are remanded to the court below with instructions to enter final judgments therein not inconsistent with these views.

4. Gas ☞20(2).

In action against gas company for injuries from explosion in sewer, evidence failed to show defendant was responsible for explosion.

There was some evidence that there were leaks in the pipes of the gas company, but no evidence was introduced showing that any of those leaks led to the sewer in which employee was working when the explosion occurred, and there was uncontradicted evidence that escaping gas would rise and not fall, and that it could not fall below the water level down into the sewer which was lower than the top of the water.

PER CURIAM.

Upon a re-examination of the record on this appeal after decision by the District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, we are satisfied with the statement of the facts, reasoning, and conclusions of that court, and hereby adopt the opinion there rendered, prepared by Mr. Justice Sturtevant, as the opinion of this court. It is as follows:

Action for personal injuries. The verdict was in favor of the plaintiff, and, from the judgment entered thereon, the defendant has appealed. For some months prior to the happening of the accident the Los Angeles county sanitation district had been engaged in laying a sewer along the west side of Atlantic boulevard in the city of Los Angeles. In the immediate neighborhood of where the work was being done the ground is marshy. The water level is within six or seven feet of the surface of the ground. The sewer trench was dug, and at the same time the water was pumped out and the pipe was so laid that the bottom of it was about ten feet below the surface of the ground. The pipe was about three feet in diameter and was made in joints of reinforced concrete. North of Tweedy boulevard the sewer had been laid. Manholes had been installed, and some of them had been covered, but the joints of the pipe had not been caulked. The dirt and rock had been thrown back into the trench and the ground had been leveled up. The evidence does not show that any apertures, channels, or pipes of any kind led to, or into, the sewer from any direction except as they may have been created by or arisen out of the conditions we have noted. On the afternoon of the 22d day of February, 1927, the plaintiff took a coal oil lantern, tools, and materials, and entered the sewer to caulk the joints. He had worked about two hours and was inside of the sewer at a point approximately one hundred and fifty feet from the manhole he entered when an explosion occurred and he was seriously burned. He commenced this action to recover damages for his injuries. In his complaint he alleged that the defendant maintained gas pipes in Atlantic boulevard near the intersection of the two streets named above; that the pipes were negligently and carelessly maintained, and that gas escaped therefrom in large quantities and exploded and injured him. In its answer the defendant denied specifically the allegations of the complaint. In presenting his case the plaintiff introduced evidence showing that he entered the sewer as above stated; that an explosion occurred; that he was injured; and the nature and extent of the injuries. He also introduced evidence to the effect that one or two days after the explosion the defendant sent its employees into the neighborhood of the explosion and there made excavations and examinations and alterations. Some of the witnesses saw certain leaks. No one of those leaks was described as being closer than one hundred feet from where the plaintiff was at the time of the explosion. After the explosion had occurred no gas pipe was shown to be so broken as to allow gas to escape in large quantities. When the explosion occurred some of the witnesses stated that the flame was blue. At least one of the witnesses testified that the explosion was of such force as to shake the buildings and windows. The defendant's gas pipes contain natural gas and extend along the east side of Atlantic boulevard, and, from the main pipes, service pipes are led at right angles to the west over the sewer, or to the east to the properties of the defendant's customers. The pipes were so laid that they were from two to three feet under the surface of the ground. At the end of the plaintiff's case the defendant moved for a nonsuit. The court denied the motion, and thereupon the defendant proceeded to introduce its case. It called to the stand the employees who did the work and the employees who directed the work of making the above-mentioned excavations, alterations, and examinations of the gas pipes. Each one of those witnesses was examined and cross-examined as to what leaks, if any, were located. One leak, located about one hundred feet from where the plaintiff was working, was on the east side of the defendant's pipes and in a service pipe serving one of the customers residing on the east side of Atlantic boulevard. The witness testified that, when he located it and applied the soap-suds test, there were small bubbles, and the extent of the leak would be one or two cubic feet in ten or twelve hours. It was twenty feet east of the sewer and one hundred feet south of the manhole. One witness testified that there were two other small leaks at a distance of a few hundred feet from the place where the explosion occurred. The defendant's witnesses testified that, applying their pressure tests, they found no major leaks in any of the pipes at any place. They further testified that gas will not sink through water at all; that it is only about seven-tenths as heavy as air, and that it will rise from, but not sink into, trenches or pits. Neither party introduced any evidence showing that defendant's escaping gas flowed to, or into, the sewer.

[1-4] At all times the defendant claimed that there was no evidence that the gas which exploded was defendant's gas. It also claimed that the explosion was caused by the explosion of the plaintiff's coal oil lantern. It also contended that the explosion might have occurred from gasoline which those who were constructing the sewer had spilled from time to time. Furthermore, they claimed that the explosion might have been marsh gas instead of the defendant's gas. It cites and relies on Union, etc., Co. v. S. F. Gas, etc., Co., 168 Cal. 58, 141 P. 807. In reply, the plaintiff quotes evidence showing the explosion lifted the lids on the manholes. He argues that the explosion could not have been merely the explosion of a single lantern. He then contends that the surface soil of the street may have been packed and hardened, and that the defendant's gas leaked out of the pipes, approached the surface of the street, and was forced to pass under the surface of the street and across to, down to, and into the sewer. The answer is not sufficient. The plaintiff was bound to introduce some evidence, direct, or indirect, showing, not only that defendant's gas was allowed to escape, but also that it entered and accumulated in the sewer pipe. Of course it is not contended that there is any direct evidence in the record that defendant's gas was in the sewer. Furthermore, an inference to that effect must be founded on a fact legally proved and on such a deduction from that fact as is warranted by a consideration of the course of nature. Code Civ. Proc. § 1960. But the direct positive proof in this record is that from "a consideration of the course of nature" natural gas will rise and not sink, and that it will not pass down into water. The plaintiff also makes the contention that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applied, and he cites Smith v. Southern Counties Gas Co., 89 Cal. App. 81, 264 P. 532. But in that case the injured person at the time of the injury was standing in a pit in which the gas company had its pipes located. Both the plaintiff and the defendant in the case at bar concede that Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 40 P. 1020, 1021, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146, states the rule correctly when the court quotes from Shearman and Redfield on Negligence as follows: "When a thing which causes injury is shown to be under the management of the defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from a want of care." The italicized words present the very question before us, to wit, What caused the injury, defendant's gas or some other explosive? Not until it is shown that the defendant's gas caused the injury can the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur be relied on. 19 Cal. Jur. 708, § 125. Assuming that the defendant was negligent in having some leaks in its pipes, no evidence was introduced showing that any of those leaks led to the sewer, and the uncontradicted evidence is that the escaping gas would rise and not fall, and that it could not fall below the water level down into the sewer which was lower than the top of the water. It thus appears that there was no evidence showing that "the thing which caused the injury" was under the management of the defendant or that it belonged to the defendant, or that the defendant was in any way responsible for injuries caused by it.

[5] The defendant claims that it was not negligent. Hereinabove we have shown to what extent there were any leaks. Evidence was introduced by the defendant showing that it had a large corps of inspectors and repairers who diligently examined. All of these facts were for the consideration of the jury. They were properly submitted, and this court may not say as a matter of law that no negligence was shown. However, it is clear that the defendant's negligence was not shown to have been the cause of the injury.

In view of what we have said above, we need not discuss other points made by the defendant.

Judgment reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Action by Oscar Karlslyst against Elsie Frazier. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

George E. McCutchen, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Otis D. Babcock, of Sacramento, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J.

Appellant, Oscar Karlslyst, brought this action to obtain equitable relief from a provision in an interlocutory decree of divorce entered in an action brought against him by respondent herein, who is now Elsie Frazier, ordering him to contribute $25 a month to the support of Marian Elaine Karlslyst, found by the court to be the child of the parties, until further order of court.

As grounds for relief, appellant alleged that said Marian Elaine Karlslyst, born four months after his marriage to respondent, was not his child; that at the time of their separation, which was about a year after marriage, he had agreed to pay respondent $400 in installments in full satisfaction of all claims against him, and in consideration thereof she had agreed to care for and provide for said child, and he had faithfully paid said sum; that when it appeared that respondent prayed for support for said child in her action for divorce, an agreement had been entered into between her attorney and appellant's attorney, on behalf of their respective clients, that if appellant did not appear and contest said action she would not apply for any relief other than temporary alimony and no other relief would be asked for or taken; and that respondent applied for an interlocutory decree without further notice to appellant or his attorney, and, in violation of said agreement, and without advising the court thereof, applied for and was awarded relief in excess of that provided for in the agreement. Respondent denied the making of said agreements, and also the appellant's contention that the child was not his, and the court found in her favor on both questions.

[1] The action was brought in 1929, more than five years after the entry of the interlocutory decree, appellant claiming that he had no notice of the provision for support contained therein until 1927. Said provision was not carried into the final decree, but in view of the fact that the final decree did not purport to modify the order of support, said order remained effective.

Conceding that extrinsic fraud was practiced upon appellant by respondent concealing from the court her agreement to assume full support of said child and to take no award for its support, which agreement induced appellant to absent himself from the hearing, appellant is not entitled to equitable relief on the facts shown.

[2] Before relief may be obtained in equity from a judgment affected with extrinsic fraud, it must appear that said judgment is unjust and that a different judgment would have been entered but for the fraud practiced. Lee v. Colquhoun, 175 Cal. 16, 164 P. 894; Matson v. John Batto & Sons, 173 Cal. 800, 161 P. 1144; Bell v. Thompson, 147 Cal. 689, 82 P. 327; Burbridge v. Rauer, 146 Cal. 21, 79 P. 526; 15 Cal. Jur. 29; 3 Freeman on Judgments, §§ 1189, 1190. Appellant has not met the burden which the law placed upon him as the party attacking the judgment.

[3, 4] The evidence offered by appellant to establish that the child was not his falls far short of meeting the requirements of the law. It is admitted that he did not at any time deny paternity of the child born four months after his marriage with respondent until he filed the complaint in the present action, some seven years after the birth of said child. In a justice court action brought to compel him to comply with the terms of the decree which provided that he should contribute to the support of said child he made no question of its paternity. Said parties were residents of Wisconsin before they came to California, and had been intimate in that state. Upon coming separately to reside in this state, they resumed their former relationship. Appellant knew that respondent was pregnant when he married her in 1921.

In the present action appellant introduced the testimony of a physician, who stated that he was then sterile by reason of having been afflicted at some time in the past with a venereal disease. Appellant himself testified that he had suffered from such a disease in 1919, which was more than a year before the conception of the child. The physician's testimony related to a time more than eight years after the conception of the child, and he was unable in the nature of the case to determine at what time the condition of sterility had developed. Furthermore, the testimony of said physician would not seem to establish absolute sterility. Respondent testified that appellant was the father of her child, and all reasonable inferences to be drawn from the circumstances support her testimony. For the court to have found in favor of appellant upon evidence so inconclusive as that relied upon to establish illegitimacy as to the child and promiscuity on the part of her mother, would certainly have been a finding in derogation of rather than in favor of legitimacy, contrary to the rule favoring legitimacy in cases such as this, wherein the facts are sufficient to sustain legitimacy.

[5, 6] Appellant has also failed to show that if the agreement of respondent to assume the full support of the child had been disclosed and he had been present in court he would not have been required to contribute to the support of said child. It was beyond the power of the parties to deprive the court by their private contract of its right to make such suitable provision for the support of their minor child as her welfare required. Lewis v. Lewis, 174 Cal. 336, 163 P. 42; Black v. Black, 149 Cal. 224, 86 P. 505; Parkhurst v. Parkhurst, 118 Cal. 18, 50 P. 9; Merritt v. Merritt, 106 Cal. App. 238, 289 P. 240; Fernandez v. Aburrea, 42 Cal. App. 131, 183 P. 366. Evidence of an agreement is relevant in placing the burden of support, but the court is not bound thereby. Appellant offered no evidence to show that if the agreement had been given effect the child would have been adequately cared for by her mother, or that he was unable to contribute $25 a month to her support.

[7, 8] For the same reason the decree cannot be set aside on the ground that the relief granted exceeded that prayed for (section 580, Code Civ. Proc.), in that it was to continue in effect until further order of the court, whereas plaintiff prayed for support only during the pendency of the action. Such a decree is not void. Cohen v. Cohen, 150 Cal. 99, 88 P. 267, 11 Ann. Cas. 520; Parker v. Parker, 203 Cal. 787, 266 P. 283. In view of the fact that the interests of the child are a factor of prime importance, the court is not bound by the contract of the parties or the prayer for relief. In the absence of a showing that the amount awarded is not necessary for the support of the child nor beyond the ability of the plaintiff to pay, equity will not afford relief from the decree.

Nothing said herein bars appellant from applying for a modification of the original order. Sections 138, 139, Civ. Code. As to the merits of such an application we express no opinion.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; SHENK, J.; PRESTON, J.; LANGDON, J.; CURTIS, J.

Driving automobile upon street car tracks at rural crossing without looking or listening for approaching trolley car would constitute negligence.

2. Railroads ⇨333(2).

Driving automobile upon street car tracks at rural crossing with car in plain view, and approaching crossing at speed rendering collision reasonably probable, would constitute negligence.

3. Negligence ⇨122(1).

Law presumes that person possessing normal sight and hearing must have seen and heard that which was within range of sight and hearing.

4. Automobiles ⇨244(20).

Evidence held to support verdict finding driver of automobile, struck by trolley car at open rural crossing, guilty of negligence, and therefore liable for death of guest.

Action for wrongful death of guest, riding in automobile which collided with trolley car at rural highway crossing, was brought against the trolley company, its motorman, and the driver of the automobile. Decedent at time of accident was employed by the defendant automobile driver at his ranch, and he was returning her from a visit to her mother.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Charles R. Barnard, Judge.

Action by Clyde E. Cate, as administrator of the estate of Genevieve Brennan, deceased, against the Fresno Traction Company and others, wherein the defendant William H. Bruce filed a cross-complaint against the other two defendants. From a judgment for the plaintiff and against the cross-complainant, the defendants appeal.

Superseding opinion of the District Court of Appeal, 295 P. 98, which superseded 291 P. 215.

Conley, Conley & Conley, of Fresno, for appellant William H. Bruce.

Everts, Ewing, Wild & Everts and Dan F. Conway, all of Fresno, for appellants Fresno Traction Co. and W. E. Gash.

George R. Lovejoy and Ray W. Hays, both of Fresno, for respondent.

CURTIS, J.

The facts in this case are correctly stated by the District Court of Appeal (295 P. 98), and are as follows:

"This is an action brought by Clyde E. Cate, as administrator of the estate of Genevieve Brennan, deceased, against the Fresno Traction Company and its motorman, W. E. Gash, and also against William H. Bruce, the driver of the automobile in which Genevieve Brennan, deceased, and her minor son were riding at the time of the collision, which occurred at a railroad crossing on September 20, 1928. The case was tried before a jury, and resulted in a verdict against all of the defendants for $20,001; also a verdict in favor of the Fresno Traction Company and W. E. Gash as against the cross-complainant on the cross-complaint of William H. Bruce. All of the defendants have appealed.

"The Fresno Traction Company operates its electric trolley line on regular schedule between the city of Fresno and the town of Pinedale, which is situated some 9 miles north of Fresno, and has been operating such line for a number of years. The line runs approximately north and south between Fresno and Pinedale, and is a single track line where it crosses Shaw avenue, which is a paved highway and runs approximately east and west. The paved portion of the highway is 24 feet in width, and crosses the tracks of the Fresno Traction Company at a right angle. This intersection is about 5 miles from the city of Fresno in a level and sparsely settled country.

"The deceased, Genevieve Brennan, a woman of thirty-five years of age at the time of the accident, was employed by defendant William H. Bruce, a man of thirty-seven years of age, to do general housework on a ranch upon which he was living and was leasing, which is located about 11 miles north of Madera. Some two weeks prior to the accident Bruce had taken Mrs. Brennan and her small boy to visit her mother, and on the date of the accident had gone for them and was returning them to his ranch. Bruce drove his automobile in a westerly direction along Shaw avenue. The trolley car involved in the collision approached Shaw avenue from Bruce's right, and was traveling in a southerly direction towards Fresno. For 637 feet along Shaw avenue before reaching the car tracks, and on Bruce's right as he approached the crossing and in the direction from which the electric car was approaching, there was nothing to obscure Bruce's nor Mrs. Brennan's vision of the electric car; the ground was level, no foliage, house, or other obstructions of any kind were in the open country on their right as they proceeded towards the rails of the Fresno Traction Company; 307 feet from the tracks facing east and in the direction from which Bruce and the deceased approached the tracks was a standard California State Automobile Association railroad sign. The property lines extend 18 feet both north and south of the paved portion of Shaw avenue; 12 feet 6 inches from the rail, and facing the direction from which the automobile was approaching, and 13 feet north of the paved portion of the highway, stood a standard railroad crossing sign. The automobile in which Bruce, Mrs. Brennan, and the child were riding was an open Ford. Mrs. Brennan sat next to Bruce in the front seat, and the boy was sitting at the right of his mother. From defendant Bruce's testimony, it appears that he and Mrs. Brennan were discussing what he had done while she had been away and a dance he attended. As they approached the tracks, and at a distance of about 60 or 80 feet therefrom, they both looked to the right and then he looked to the left. He further testified that he saw nothing; that Mrs. Brennan said nothing until just before the crash, when she said: 'Lord! There is a car'; that he did not slow the speed of his automobile at any time during his approach to or while he was upon the tracks. As to the motorman giving a warning signal, there is some conflict. Both the motorman and Robert Morris Hogan—the only passenger on the electric car at the time of the accident—testified that the motorman sounded a warning gong, the motorman stating: 'Somewhere within about sixty feet of the edge of the paved portion of the highway, and I rang my gong * * * and he didn't check his speed any, and they were looking right at me, and I thought he was going on through, or he might have been aiming to stop; I can't say but he didn't check his speed * * * I went over and got a little air. Taken just enough air through my air valve to pull the car down so it would give him plenty of time for clearance on through. * * * Well, he didn't check his speed. I got up within—something about ten or twelve feet of the edge of the paved portion of the highway and he was anywhere from about seven to nine feet east of the street car rail and all of a sudden he slammed on his brakes and swayed just a little to the left, and I had taken all the air I had, then at that time, and I realized there was going to be an accident.' The passenger, Hogan, stated that the motorman rang his gong 'ten or fifteen feet before we hit the crossing. I couldn't say just exactly how far.' Defendant Bruce testified that he heard no such gong sounded, and Floyd Lawden, a youth of thirteen years of age, who was walking along Shaw avenue and when about 100 feet west of the car tracks his attention was attracted by the crash of the collision, testified that he did not hear a gong or bell ring. When the motorman first observed the automobile, the electric car was traveling at 18 or 19 miles an hour, and when it approached the crossing it had been slowed down to 17 miles per hour. The speed of the automobile, according to defendant Bruce, was from 18 to 22 miles an hour. The automobile was struck about the center of the highway, shoved along and across the same and up to a telephone pole which stood 18 feet south of the southerly edge of the paved portion of the highway and a few feet west of the electric car tracks. Mrs. Brennan and her son sustained injuries from which they both died the next day."

[1-4] We will first dispose of the appeal of the defendant Bruce, the driver of the automobile in which plaintiff's intestate was riding at the time of her injury. He contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict of the jury finding him guilty of negligence in the operation of his car at the time of, and just previous to, its collision with the street car of his codefendant, the Fresno Traction Company. We are unable to see upon what theory this appellant can make such a contention with any reasonable hope or assurance that it will be sustained. The appellant Bruce drove upon the street car tracks either without looking to see whether a car was approaching thereon, or, if he did look, with the car in plain view and approaching the highway at a rate of speed which would cause it in all reasonable probability to collide with his automobile as soon as the two reached the crossing. In either event, he would be guilty of gross negligence. If he approached the railway tracks without either looking or listening for an approaching car he was, under the circumstances appearing in the evidence, guilty of negligence. There was a standard California State Automobile Association rail sign on Shaw avenue 370 feet from the crossing, which Bruce could have seen before he reached the crossing, had he used reasonable care. The railway tracks were themselves in plain view of motorists using the highway at this point, and there is evidence that Bruce was familiar with the highway and knew of the presence of the traction company's line of railway at this crossing. It is manifest that Bruce was guilty of negligence if he drove his machine upon the track of the defendant corporation without first looking to see whether he could cross said track with safety. If Bruce looked for an approaching train, and his testimony is that he did, he must have seen it, as it could not have been more than one hundred feet from the crossing at the time, and there was nothing to obscure his vision for a quarter of a mile up the track from the crossing. "The law presumes that a person possessing normal faculties of sight and hearing must have seen and heard that which was within the range of his sight and hearing." Young v. Southern Pacif- ic Co., 189 Cal. 746, 754, 210 P. 259, 262. Therefore, if he looked for a car he must have seen it, and, in deliberately driving his machine upon the car track with the car approaching, Bruce was guilty of negligence of the most extreme character. We, of course, do not know just which one of these two views of the evidence the jury accepted. As we read the evidence, it seems plain to us that Bruce was so much engrossed in his conversation with the deceased that he did not look to see whether the crossing was clear before attempting to pass over it, and that, without taking any of the reasonable precautions which the law enjoins upon one approaching a railroad crossing, he deliberately drove his machine almost upon the tracks before he observed the street car approaching the crossing. It was then too late for Bruce to stop his machine, and, although he set his brakes and turned to the left, he was unable to avoid a collision with the street car. Under no construction of the evidence can it be held to be insufficient to support the verdict of the jury against the appellant Bruce.

[5] We will now turn to the consideration of the appeal by the Fresno Traction Company and its motorman, W. E. Gash. These appellants first make the contention that the evidence fails to show that Gash, the motorman, was negligent in the operation of the car which collided with Bruce's machine, resulting in the death of the deceased and her minor child. The testimony of the motorman as to his actions immediately prior to the collision is at best somewhat equivocal. He testified that he saw the machine in which Bruce and the deceased were riding when the car of the traction company was from 175 to 200 feet from the crossing, and that at that time the automobile was possibly a little further from the crossing than was the street car. The train was traveling about 18 to 19 miles per hour, and the automobile a little faster, possibly 25 miles per hour. Gash testified that at this time he did not pay "much attention to him until I come on up. I was somewhere about 135 to 140 feet, and I threw off my power and was coasting up to the highway."

"Q. Where was he; what was he doing?

A. He was still coming on up, all the time.

"Q. Did he change his speed any? A. Not any at all. * * *

"Q. You threw off your power —? A. And coasted up.

"Q. Did you put on any air at that time?

A. Not at that time, I didn't.

"Q. What next took place? A. Well, I got up within about—somewhere within about 60 feet of the edge of the paved portion of the highway, and I rang my gong—I always rang there, it is a crossing—and he didn't check his speed any, and they were looking right at me, and I thought that he was going on through, or he might have been aiming to stop; I can't say, but he didn't check his speed. * * *

"Q. Then when [what] did you do? A. I went over and got a little air.

"Q. Please explain what you mean by that? A. Taken just enough air through my air valve to pull the car down so it would give him plenty of time for clearance going on through.

"Q. That was about 60 feet away from the roadway? A. From the north edge of the paved portion of the highway.

"Q. Then what happened? A. Well, he didn't check his speed. I got up within something about ten or twelve feet of the edge of the paved portion of the highway and he was anywhere from about seven to nine feet east of the street car rail and all of a sudden he slammed on his brakes and swayed just a little to the left, and I taken all the air I had, then, at that time, and I realized there was going to be an accident.

"Q. Did you give it all the air you had? A. I gave it all the air I had. * * *

"Q. Then you came into collision. Describe the collision; how it happened. A. Well, he passed out in front of me and I caught him just behind the fender of the car and drug him just across the edge of the highway against this line post. * * * One of the poles of the street car line. * * *

From this testimony of the motorman, it is clear that he saw Bruce and the deceased in an automobile approaching the track of the car line, and that he thought the driver in the automobile intended to pass over the crossing in front of the street car. He accordingly slackened the speed of the car, intending to give time for the automobile to pass in front of the street car. When at a point sixty feet from the edge of the paved highway he rang his gong, at the same time he noticed that the speed of the automobile was unchecked. It might be well here to note the contradiction in the evidence of the motorman regarding the ringing of the gong at this point. Bruce testified that he heard no gong, and the passenger in the street car, Hogan, testified that the motorman rang his gong "ten or fifteen feet before we hit the crossing." The jury may well have accepted the testimony of Hogan and believed that the gong was not sounded by the motorman until the street car was from ten to fifteen feet from the highway. Hogan's testimony finds some corroboration in the evidence given by the motorman when he testified that "at the time I gave all the air I had, I was about 10 or 12 feet from the edge of the highway," and that when the street car was about ten or twelve feet from the edge of the highway Bruce slammed on his brakes and turned his machine to the left. It would be a natural thing for the motorman to do when he gave his car "all the air he had," in an endeavor to stop his car, that he would also sound his gong to warn Bruce of the presence of the street car. Evidently it was at this point when the street car was somewhere from ten to twelve to fifteen feet from the north edge of the highway that the motorman first realized that there was liable to be a collision between his car and the automobile. It was at this time that Bruce apparently first had knowledge of the street car. Whether we are correct or not in this conclusion, there is ample evidence in the record to support the conclusion that when the motorman saw the automobile approaching the street car track he was of the opinion that the driver of the automobile intended to cross in front of the street car. He accordingly lessened the speed of his car in order to permit the automobile to pass. In doing so, however, he did not attempt to stop his car or to reduce its speed to a rate which would permit the automobile to make the crossing in safety, but, on the other hand, he allowed his car to travel at such a rate of speed that it collided with the automobile at the crossing. He discovered his mistake when he was only a few feet from the highway, and then, to use his language, "gave it all the air I had" in an endeavor to avert the collision. It was then impossible for him to stop his car before it collided with the automobile. We think this evidence establishes a clear case of negligence against the motorman in the operation of his car, which negligence, being that of an employee, is imputed to his employer, the Fresno Traction Company.

[6] These appellants contend, however, that the motorman had the right to assume that Bruce would stop his automobile or turn to one side before crossing the track, and thus avoid a collision with the street car. The law on this subject seems to be correctly stated in the cases of Arnold v. San Francisco-Oakland T. Rys., 175 Cal. 1, 164 P. 798, 800, and Billig v. Southern Pacific Co., 192 Cal. 357, 219 P. 992, 995. In the first of these cases, we find the statement that, "He [the motorman] had the right to presume that Arnold [the driver of the automobile] would stop or turn aside, until the conduct of Arnold was such as should reasonably have led him to apprehend the contrary." In the second case cited, the court stated the rule as follows: "The operator of such train or car was not bound to check the otherwise rightful speed of his train or car in approaching and passing such crossing until at least he has reason to believe that such person so approaching such crossing is not performing, or is not likely to perform, his duty in the foregoing regard."

Undoubtedly in the present case the motorman had the right to presume that Bruce would perform his duty and would either stop or turn aside until the conduct of Bruce led him to apprehend the contrary. From the motorman's own testimony, it clearly appears that the conduct of Bruce, when the street car was 135 to 140 feet north of the crossing, was such as to lead the motorman to believe that Bruce was intending to cross in front of the train. He did not assume that Bruce would stop, but, on the other hand, he assumed that Bruce did not intend to stop, and he, the motorman, attempted to regulate the speed of his car in order to permit the automobile to pass over the crossing ahead of the car. The two cases above cited cannot be held applicable to the facts of this case. On the other hand, the facts of this case bring it more nearly within the rule enunciated in Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 378, 113 P. 663, 667. In that case, the court said: "The evidence then being sufficient to show that the motorman had reason to believe that the plaintiff was likely to be injured, the law imposed upon him the duty of exercising at least ordinary care to avoid the injury. It is clear that within the contemplation of ordinary care and prudence and in consonance with a just regard for the safety and welfare of others the act required of him was to endeavor to stop his car before a collision occurred. At least, the case was such as to make it a proper question to be determined by the jury whether he acted promptly in his effort to stop the car when he was apprised of plaintiff's danger. If he made an honest effort to do so, no one, of course, could contend that he was at fault. But, on the other hand, if he failed to use the means at hand and made no effort to prevent the accident until he saw that it was impossible to avert it, the jury would be justified in finding for the plaintiff."

[7] Here the evidence shows that the motorman when sixty feet from the crossing was firmly of the opinion that Bruce did not intend to stop before crossing over the street car track. He had it in his power to resort to his air brakes to stop his car and thus prevent the collision. Instead of doing so, he waited until he was between ten or fifteen feet from the crossing when, for the first time, he made a real attempt to stop his car. It was then too late. Notwithstanding the brakes, the car proceeded across the highway and collided with the automobile just as it reached the car track. The act of the motorman in failing to stop his car cannot under this evidence be justified or excused by resort to the rule that he had the right to assume that Bruce would stop his machine before crossing the street car track, as by his own testimony he admits that the conduct of Bruce clearly indicated to him that Bruce did not intend to stop or turn aside before reaching the street car track. We have referred to the testimony of the motorman as equivocal, due to the fact that, while he testified as above set forth that he thought

Bruce intended to pass in front of the approaching street car and that he, the motorman, attempted to regulate the speed of his car so as to permit him to do so, in other parts of his testimony he states, in one place that he did not know whether Bruce intended to stop or not before reaching the street car track, and in still another place he says he thought Bruce intended to stop before passing over the crossing. The jury had the right to accept any one of these conflicting statements as true in passing upon the conduct of the motorman. Evidently they believed that portion of his testimony in which he stated that he thought from Bruce's actions that Bruce intended to pass in front of the street car.

[8-11] It is next contended that the deceased, Genevieve Brennan, was herself guilty of contributory negligence which was the proximate cause of her injury, and therefore the plaintiff, as her administrator, cannot recover. It is not claimed that the deceased was guilty of any overt act which contributed to her injury, but, on the other hand, the contention is that she failed to exercise due care for her own safety in not observing the street car before she did, and warning Bruce that it was approaching the crossing. It is conceded that the negligence of a driver of a vehicle cannot be imputed to a passenger. It is also, we think, conceded that contributory negligence is a question for the jury. If there is any question as to the correctness of either of these two statements, we would cite in support of them the following cases: Bryant v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 737, 164 P. 385; Irwin v. Golden State Auto Tour Corp., 178 Cal. 10, 171 P. 1059; Nichols v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 178 Cal. 630, 174 P. 319; and Marchetti v. Southern Pacific Co., 204 Cal. 679, 269 P. 529. We must construe the evidence, therefore, bearing upon the issue of contributory negligence of the deceased in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. The evidence shows, we think, without any question that Mrs. Brennan, the deceased, had absolutely no control of the machine in which she was riding, and that she occupied the position of a guest therein, pure and simple. She was an employee of Bruce, and was being taken by him from the home of her mother to the home of Bruce, where she acted as the latter's housekeeper. The deceased assumed no responsibility in the operation of the machine, and, under the facts in this case, the law cast upon her no responsibility. There was no evidence that Bruce up to the time of the collision was not properly and carefully operating his machine. Deceased, therefore, had no reason to be apprehensive of her safety while riding with him, or to take any unusual precaution against their running into danger. The most that can be said as to her responsibility in this regard is that, if she observed anything which might tend to endanger her safety, it was her duty to notify the driver of this danger in order that he might avoid it. Ordinary prudence for her own safety would require this. If she saw the street car approaching the crossing in front of them, it was undoubtedly her duty to notify Bruce, if she had reason to believe that he did not also see the car and might collide with it at the crossing at the rate of speed at which they were traveling. The evidence as to whether she saw the street car before it entered the crossing may be said to be conflicting. The motorman said that she and Bruce were looking straight at the street car long before it reached the crossing. As we have said regarding the claim that Bruce saw the street car when it was some distance from the crossing, we think on the whole it favors the view that he did not see it or know of its being on the track until just before the collision. The evidence, we think, is much stronger in favor of the conclusion that Mrs. Brennan was not aware of the presence of the street car until just before their machine collided with it. Her exclamation, evidently spontaneously uttered just before the crash, "Lord! There is a car," indicates her complete surprise on seeing the street car in front of them. Had she seen it a few minutes or seconds previously, as might be inferred from the testimony of the motorman, we would not expect such an exclamation from her. The jury, we think, could well have believed from the testimony in the case that Mrs. Brennan was wholly oblivious to the fact that the street car was approaching the crossing until the moment she uttered the above exclamation. They were, therefore, justified in finding that she was not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to warn Bruce of its presence. For a discussion of the responsibility of a person while riding as a guest in a vehicle driven by another, we would refer to the following cases decided by this court: Parker v. Southern Pacific Co., 204 Cal. 609, 269 P. 622; Marchetti v. Southern Pacific Co., 204 Cal. 679, 269 P. 529; Martinelli v. Poley (Cal. Sup.) 292 P. 451.

Appellants rely with considerable strenuousness upon the case of Barnett v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 99 Cal. App. 310, 278 P. 443, in support of their contention that the evidence in the present action establishes beyond conflict that the deceased, although riding in the automobile as a guest, was guilty of contributory negligence. We had reason to refer to that case in our decision in Smellie v. Southern Pacific Co., 299 P. 529, 539. We there held that it had no application to the facts in the Smellie Case, in which case damages were asked for the death of plaintiff's husband, who was riding as a guest at the time of his injury. We referred to the fact that in the Barnett Case, "No mention of the rule applicable to guests is to be found in that entire case." No point was made in the Barnett Case that any of the parties riding in the ill-fated machine were the guests of the driver, or of any other person. It cannot therefore in any sense be regarded as an authority upon the question before us. The contention that there is no evidence to support the implied finding of the jury that the deceased was not guilty of contributory negligence is accordingly not sustained.

[12] A third contention made by appellants is that the court erred in submitting to the jury special findings. The deceased, Genevieve Brennan, left as her heirs at law a husband, from whom she had been separated for some time immediately preceding her death, and four minor children. The children were dependent upon their mother for support. The court, after instructing the jury as to the law applicable to the general facts of the case, gave the following instruction: "In the event you find for the plaintiff, you will fix the amount of damages in one lump sum in accordance with the instructions I have given you and that, of course, would be inserted in the verdict which you brought in. Now, in addition to that, after that is done, in the event you should find a verdict for the plaintiff, and after you have fixed the damages in one lump sum, then at the request of the plaintiff I am asking you to bring some special findings on special issues which have been requested by the plaintiff." It then submitted to the jury five special findings by which it permitted the jury to find specially the amount each particular heir was entitled to receive from the total damage found. In response to those special findings submitted, the jury found that the husband, by the death of the deceased, had sustained a pecuniary loss of one dollar, and that each of her four minor children had sustained a pecuniary loss of $5,000. A verdict in this form, while criticized, was upheld by this court in the case of Robinson v. Western States Gas, etc., Co., 184 Cal. 401, 194 P. 39, 43. The court there said: "The defendant has no interest in the division which the plaintiffs may make among themselves, or which may be made for them, of the damages recovered. The statute contemplates a single recovery for the benefit of the family of the deceased, or those of his heirs who are dependent upon him for support. Whether it is divided among them after recovery or not, or how it is divided, are matters of no concern to the defendant." In view of this prior holding of the court, the action of the trial court in submitting these special findings to the jury cannot be held to be reversible error.

[13] Finally the appellant Fresno Traction Company assigns as error the action of the court in refusing to give certain instructions requested by it, and designated instructions Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4. As to instructions Nos. 1, 2, and 3, it is apparent that they are directed to the question of Bruce's negligence in failing to exercise proper care in the operation of his automobile just prior to and at the time of the collision. We fail to see how the refusal of the court to give these instructions could affect the case of the plaintiff, inasmuch as the negligence of Bruce was not imputable to the deceased. Instruction No. 4, while directed to the question of negligence on the part of the deceased, was fully covered by other instructions. It was not error, therefore, to refuse to give it.

We are satisfied after a consideration of the entire evidence in this case that it is ample to justify the verdict of the jury finding that the death of the deceased was proximately caused by the concurrent negligence of the driver of the automobile and the motor-man.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal from a judgment rendered for the defendant for costs.

The plaintiffs' complaint alleged the execution of a lease dated December 26, 1924, whereby the plaintiffs let to the defendant a 331-acre ranch and an additional 160-acre tract for a period of three years at a monthly rental of $100 per month payable $400 on the first of June of each year and $800 on the first of November of each year; that the defendant took possession of the leased premises and remained thereon until October 15, 1926, when without the plaintiffs' consent he abandoned possession; that the plaintiffs reentered the premises on April 15, 1927; that the defendant has not paid the installment of rent due November 1, 1926, in the sum of $800, nor any rent for the period from January 1 to April 15, 1927, amounting to $350. The complaint contained statements of further causes of action wherein it was alleged that the defendant caused damage to the leased premises and violated the covenants and terms of the lease, all to the plaintiffs' loss and damage in the total sum of $7,657.87. The defendant filed his answer containing certain admissions, averments, and denials, and his cross-complaint in several counts wherein he set up fraud and deceit on the part of the plaintiffs in the making of certain false representations as an inducement to the execution of certain leases on the part of the defendant and which, if supported by the evidence, it may be conceded constitute actionable fraud. The defendant alleged injury and damage aggregating $9,000. After a trial on the issues the jury brought in its verdict for the defendant without specifying any amount of damages, and judgment for the defendant for costs was entered thereon.

[1] On this appeal the plaintiffs contend that the court erred in overruling their demurrer to the defendant's second amended cross-complaint for the reason that the defendant should have elected either to rescind the lease or to stand on the lease and sue for damages. But the court instructed the jury that the "defendant in addition to his answer to plaintiff's complaint has filed a plea by way of recoupment. * * * And in this the court instructs you that this is a 'defensive relief' whereby the alleged fraud is set up by way of defense to defeat the action brought to enforce an apparent obligation or liability. The alleged fraud is given in evidence as a defense and an answer to the whole demand or in abatement of the damages according to the circumstances of the rase. This defense, however, the defendant must prove to your satisfaction by a preponderance of evidence under the following rules." (And the court then proceeded properly to advise the jury thereon.) That the court and the jury both so understood the purpose of the defendant's cross-complaint is apparent from these instructions and from the jury's verdict and is in accordance with the principles enunciated in Paolini v. Salprizio, 201 Cal. 683, 258 P. 380, relied upon by the plaintiffs. The contention in that respect is therefore not meritorious. Neither is there any merit in the claim that the defendant's cross-complaint is predicated upon a different lease from that alleged in the plaintiffs' complaint. An examination of the pleadings discloses that both parties alleged the lease dated in December, 1924.

No serious contention is made by the plaintiffs that the evidence does not support the jury's inferential finding that the allegations of the defendant's cross-complaint on the issues of fraud and deceit are true. The only contention made under the heading "Evidence Insufficient to Justify Verdict of Jury," appearing in the appellants' opening brief, is that the plaintiffs should have recovered rent at least for the period during which the defendant actually occupied the premises. That the jury, however, found that the amount of any claim made by the plaintiffs was offset by the damages sustained by the defendant must have become apparent from what has hereinbefore been said.

[2] The plaintiffs also contend that the court erred in refusing to grant their motion for a nonsuit of the defendant's cross-action for the reason, so it is claimed, that there was no evidence that the defendant relied upon the misrepresentations. It was in evidence that the defendant executed a second lease about a year after the execution of the first lease, identical in its terms with the exception that it ran to the defendant alone as the lessee, the first lease having named both the defendant and his brother as lessees. The plaintiffs ground their contention on the fact of the execution of the second lease. But this alone is insufficient to overcome the inferences which may be drawn from other sufficient evidence in the record that the defendant did rely upon the representations made by the plaintiffs, and that the defendant was in fact misled and deceived by the plaintiffs to his injury and damage. In this connection the plaintiffs urge that the defendant's execution of the second lease was an express affirmation of the contract between the parties, which operated as a waiver of any rights which may have accrued to the defendant by reason of any fraud practiced upon him by the plaintiffs. But the record does not uphold this contention. On the contrary, the evidence supports the conclusion which the jury must have drawn that the execution of the second lease was a continuing transaction resulting from and based upon the repeated false representations and deceit of the plaintiffs. The jury under the evidence was justified in finding that the execution of the second lease by the defendant was not an entry into a new arrangement or engagement by which he may be deemed to have waived any right to pursue a claim for damages on account of fraud.

The plaintiffs contend that several of the court's instructions were erroneous. We have examined each of such instructions and all of the instructions given to the jury, and on the whole record we cannot say that any error appearing therein operated to the prejudice of the plaintiffs.

We conclude that the verdict is supported by the evidence, and we find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

Supreme Court of California.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 14, 1931.

Appeal and error ☞687.

Record did not show defendant was deprived of opportunity to present his side in action for accounting, notwithstanding court adopted referee's findings (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 644, 645).

Record disclosed that after each party introduced his evidence and rested the court appointed a referee to expert the books involved in the action and make a report to the court; the findings of the referee to be deemed and considered the findings of the court. After the filing of the report and in the presence of both parties, an extended hearing was held, and another referee was appointed to make a further examination of the books, and, after receiving two of this referee's reports, as well as additional testimony of the parties, the trial court approved the first report and made formal findings in which it incorporated the findings of this report.

Action by J. D. Shaw against H. Irving Lee. From the judgment, defendant appeals.

CURTIS, J.

This action was brought for an accounting after dissolution of a partnership consisting of the plaintiff and defendant. The action came on for trial. Each party introduced his evidence and rested. Thereupon the court, by order entered upon its minutes, appointed Louis M. Simonsen referee to expert the books of the copartnership and make a report to the court in accordance with said accounting. It was further provided in said order "that the said findings of said referee be deemed and considered the findings of the court." Thereafter the referee made an examination of the copartnership books, and reported to the court "that the plaintiff J. D. Shaw is entitled to receive from H. I. Lee, defendant, the sum of $1,523.90, to equalize their respective transactions."

The court, after certain proceedings had subsequent to the filing of said report with the court, made findings of fact in which it adopted the report of the referee, and also made separate conclusions of law in which it found that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the defendant in the sum of $1,523.90. A proper judgment in accordance with these findings of fact and conclusions of law was thereupon entered against defendant. From this judgment the defendant has appealed.

The position of the appellant may best be shown from the following statement contained in his brief: "* * * If it shall be contended by counsel that the Simonsen report is to be construed simply as a report showing the balance reflected by the books, leaving for additional evidence the explanation of the items contained in the books, the correctness and propriety of the charges, and such other matters as can be explained only by extrinsic evidence, it at once becomes obvious that the court below did not try the whole case and that the defendant has been deprived of his opportunity to present his side of the controversy." In view of the record in the case, we think there is no merit in appellant's position. The minutes of the court showing the proceedings taken at the trial, after stating that each party introduced witnesses in support of his contentions, further recited: "Thereupon both parties rest and the matter is submitted to the court. Whereupon the court makes its order appointing Louis M. Simonsen referee to expert the books of said copartnership and make a report to the court in accordance with said accounting; and it is further ordered that the said findings of said referee be deemed and considered the findings of the court." No attack is made upon these minutes of the court as not containing a true statement of the proceedings in court at the time of the trial. It appears therefrom that each party had rested his case and submitted the same to the court for decision. If either party desired to dispute the correctness of the partnership books or had any extrinsic evidence to offer in explanation of any matters contained therein, it was his duty at that time to make his wishes or purposes known to the court. This was especially true, in view of the order of the court, to which the appellant made no objection, that the findings of the referee would be deemed and considered the findings of the court.

As we have seen, there was but one issue before the court, and that was the amount due as shown by the accounting. This issue the court referred to the referee to try and determine. "The finding of the referee * * * upon the whole issue must stand as the finding of the court. * * *" Section 644, Code Civ. Proc. The next section of the Code provides how such a finding may be reviewed, that is, "in like manner as if made by the court."

Had no other proceedings been taken than those recited above, the judgment of the court against the defendant would have to stand. But the record before us shows that, upon the filing of the report of the referee, the court set a day for a hearing of said report. Both parties were present, and an extended hearing was held. Another referee, a Mr. Rosenthal, was appointed to make a further examination of the partnership books. Rosenthal made two reports, in one of which he found that the plaintiff was indebted to the defendant in the sum of $2,311.83. He later filed a second report finding that plaintiff was indebted to defendant in the sum of $1,352.92. These reports of Rosenthal, as well as additional testimony of the parties, were before the trial court at the time it finally approved the Simonsen report "as the Finding of the Court, and the conclusions found therefrom are also the conclusions of the court." Thereafter, as already stated, the court made formal findings in which it incorporated the findings of the referee.

It is apparent that appellant's claim that the court did not try the whole case, or that he was deprived of his opportunity to present his side of the controversy, finds no support whatever in the record of the case before us and which has been referred to above.

The judgment is affirmed.

BAYLIS ESTATE CO. v. TROTTER.

Sac. 4472.

Supreme Court of California.

Boundaries ⇨13.

Patents referring to plat showing lake shore as boundary held to convey title to 83 acres between meander line and water line (Civ. Code, § 830).

Since meander line of plat in question purported to coincide with water line of lake, but did not actually do so, there being a tract of about 83 acres lying between meander line and actual water line, it was contended that size of tract was sufficient to require finding that survey was fraudulent, and that no title was conveyed to such tract, but evidence showed that land in controversy at time of survey was worth only about $100, that it was not suitable for cultivation, and that it was used only for pasturage and as a source of supply for small quantities of firewood.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; Benjamin C. Jones, Judge.

Three actions by Iantha C. Anderson, by John Russel Anderson and others, and by the Baylis Estate Company, against Mary S. Trotter, were tried together. Judgments for the respective plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

William Sea, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellant.

Herbert V. Keeling, of Lakeport, and Lovett K. Fraser, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PLUMMER, Justice pro tem.

The three actions above named were tried together, and involve only one question, to wit, the ownership of a tract of land lying between the meander line and the waters of Clear Lake. The respective plaintiffs had judgment, and the defendant appeals.

The actions were brought to quiet the title to lots 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of section 29, township 15 north, range 7 west, M. D. B. & M., abutting on Clear Lake, the plaintiffs alleging ownership to the actual water line of the lake, irrespective of the meander line, as shown by the original survey of the property in dispute. The tract in dispute involves approximately 83 acres, of which the plaintiff Iantha C. Anderson claims to be the owner of 39.50 acres. The plaintiff John Russel Anderson alleges ownership to 43 acres of the tract, and the plaintiff Baylis Estate Company, a corporation, alleges ownership to approximately 2.25 acres. The record shows ownership in the plaintiff John Russel Anderson of lots 1 and 2; ownership in Iantha C. Anderson of lots 3 and 4, save and except a certain portion thereof owned by the Baylis Estate Company, lot 5 being owned also by the Baylis Estate Company.

Section 29 was originally surveyed in December, 1875, by George Tucker, a regularly licensed United States surveyor, and the plat thereof was subsequently filed in the office of the surveyor general at San Francisco, Cal., and approved by the surveyor general on the 18th day of December, 1876. In 1925 a resurvey of the premises involved was made by William H. Thorne, which survey was approved by the United States supervisor of surveys, on the 26th day of January, 1926, and by the acting commissioner United States general land office on March 16, 1926. The following plat shows the difference in the respective surveys:

The Tucker survey began at point "A" and ran a line westerly to a point marked "B"; thence northerly to a point marked "C," returning to the point of beginning. What is known as the meander line of Clear Lake was run as follows: "A" to "D"; thence to point marked "E"; thence to point marked "F"; thence to point marked "C." This latter line was described on the plat as the meander line of Clear Lake, and the plat filed with the United States surveyor general and in the office of the Interior Department shows the water line of Clear Lake coincident with the meander line of the survey made by Tucker in 1875. It being discovered later that the meander line of the lake, as run and platted by Tucker, did not actually coincide with the water line of the lake, a resurvey was made in 1925, which resurvey gives the meander line indicated on the plat as running from "E" to "G" and from "G" to "F," and, by running a line from "F" to "E," incloses a tract comprising a trifle over 83 acres, the respective plaintiffs alleging ownership to portions of the 83 acres as heretofore described, by reason of their ownership of lands described in the Tucker survey to which we have referred. A duly certified copy of the plat of the original survey made by Tucker in 1875 was admitted in evidence, and the meander line of the survey and the plat coincide as to the water line of Clear Lake; that is, the original plat does not show the existence of any land between the meander line of the survey and the actual water line of the lake.

The patents issued by the United States government, under which the respective plaintiffs claim, describe the land conveyed by lots numbered as we have indicated on the plat, containing so many acres according to the official plat of the survey of the lands returned to the general land office of the surveyor general, etc. In other words, the lands were conveyed according to the plat of the survey thereof made by Tucker, which describe the lands as extending to, and abutting upon, the waters of Clear Lake.

The court found that a patent was issued to Algernon Sidney Jones for 126.1 acres, and that there were approximately 41 acres between the meander line of said land and Clear Lake, which said 41 acres were included in said patent to Algernon Sidney Jones from the United States of America, and that 38.78 acres of the same lies between the meander line of the plaintiff Iantha C. Anderson and Clear Lake, and is a part of the land conveyed by said patent.

As to the property claimed by the plaintiff John Russel Anderson, the court found that the United States government issued a patent to Harvey W. Grigsby for 155.79 acres, and that there was approximately 42.72 acres between the meander line of said land and Clear Lake, and which said 42.72 acres was included and conveyed by the patent to Harvey W. Grigsby.

The court further found that as to the Baylis Estate Company the 2.25 acres claimed by said estate was covered by the patent issued to Algernon Sidney Jones, as above stated.

The plaintiffs in this action claim the property through mesne conveyances from the patentees named. Following the Thorne survey a patent was issued by the United States government to the defendant, which includes the land indicated on the plat to which we have referred, as follows: Beginning at point "E"; thence to point marked "G"; thence to point marked "F"; thence to point of beginning.

The meander line of the Tucker survey, according to which the plat was made, filed, and approved, as heretofore stated, is as follows:

"Beginning at meander post on south boundary of township 17.70 chains east of corner to sections 32 and 33.

| "In Section 33 |              |                                              |  |

Approximately fifty years later a different plat was filed after the Thorne survey, indicating a different meander line, as we have shown by the lines running from points "E" to "G," "G" to "F," and "F" to "E." The testimony shows that the land included within the Thorne survey and lying between the meander line of the Tucker survey and the waters of Clear Lake was rocky, covered by live oak, chamisal, and manzanita trees, and was of little value; the testimony being to the effect that the land at the time of the Tucker survey was not worth over $1.25 an acre, or an aggregate sum of $100, was not suitable to cultivation, and during all the years intervening between the Tucker and the Thorne surveys was used only for pasturage purposes. Some of the trees thereon were cut for use as firewood. Following the Thorne survey, the defendant and her husband built a cabin on one corner of the disputed tract. Taxes were paid upon the disputed premises by the plaintiffs in this action for a number of years. The trial court, however, did not make any finding as to adverse possession by any of the parties hereto, and we have found nothing in the testimony which would justify such finding.

The claim of the plaintiffs, as we have stated, is based upon the survey made in 1875, and carried with it all the lands lying between the lots mentioned in the patents and the actual water line of the lake. The claim of the defendant is based upon the theory that the 83 acres of land is sufficient in size to warrant and demand a finding that the Tucker survey was fraudulent, and that no title or claim of ownership to the disputed premises can be based thereon. The trial court found against the claim of the defendant, holding that there was no basis for setting aside the Tucker survey, or holding that it was the result of either mistake or fraudulent act, and that under the law the water line, and not the meander line, constituted the true boundary of the patented lands, and that the subsequent patent based upon a survey made fifty years later conveyed no title.

The patents issued following the Tucker survey purported to convey the land according to the plat on file in the general land office, which plat gave the waters of Clear Lake as the boundary line. In 9 C. J. p. 180, § 50, the rule with reference to such conveyances is thus stated: "When maps, plats or field notes are referred to in a grant or conveyance they are to be regarded as incorporated into the instrument and are usually held to furnish the true description of the boundaries of the land." It will be noticed that the rule here stated reads, "maps, plats or field notes," not "maps, plats and field notes." In the instant case the deed refers to the "official plat," and does not mention the field notes. The plat gives Clear Lake as the boundary. Hence the application of the rule set forth in section 830 of the Civil Code, as follows: "Except where the grant under which the land is held indicates a different intent, the owner of the upland, when it borders on tide-water, takes to ordinary high-water mark; when it borders upon a navigable lake or stream, where there is no tide, the owner takes to the edge of the lake or stream, at low-water mark; when it borders upon any other water, the owner takes to the middle of the lake or stream." In 9 C. J. p. 181, § 51, the rule is stated as follows: "Grants by the United States of its public lands bounded on streams or other waters, navigable or nonnavigable, made without reservation or restriction, are to be construed according to their effect and according to the law of the state in which the land lies." "The general rule adopted by both state and federal courts is that meander lines are not run as boundaries of the tract surveyed, but for the purpose of defining the sinuosities of the banks of the stream or other body of water, and as a means of ascertaining the quantity of land embraced in the survey. The stream, or other body of water, and not the meander line as actually run on the ground, is the boundary, the purpose of meander lines being merely for the benefit of the government in ascertaining the quantity of land in the survey for which it requires payment; and the rules adopted in the various states as to the extent of the title of the owner of land bounded on rivers and other bodies of water apply in the case of land bounded on meandered waters." 9 C. J. p. 189, § 69. The exceptions to this rule include references to bodies of water which do not exist, and to tracts of land so large as to palpably indicate fraud or such a mistake in the survey that a court will, for equitable reasons, treat the meander line as the boundary. As we have stated, the testimony in this case shows land of little value, land suitable only for pasturage purposes, and land that has never been cultivated or used other than for pasturage purposes and the cutting of small quantities of wood for use as fuel.

In Craig v. White, 187 Cal. 489, 202 P. 648, 649, this court had before it a somewhat similar question. There the meander line was sufficiently distant from the shore line of Clear Lake as to omit from the survey about 350 acres of land. This tract of land was about 13 miles in length. The principle there stated, however, is applicable here, to wit: "These conveyances were made on the theory that the meander line as marked by the United States survey constituted the actual boundary between the uplands belonging to the government and the state lands included within the borders of the lake. Prior to the issuance of state patents to the defendant, United States patents had been duly issued to settlers on the government uplands bordering on this part of the lake, which patents, under the established rule governing such transfers, conveyed title to the patentees to the actual margin of the lake"—citing Civ. Code, § 830; Lamprey v. State, 52 Minn. 181, 53 N. W. 1139, 18 L. R. A. 670, 38 Am. St. Rep. 541; Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U. S. 371, 11 S. Ct. 808, 35 L. Ed. 428. Some claim was made in that case that the waters of the lake had receded, but the evidence shows that such was not the case.

In Foss v. Johnstone, 158 Cal. 119, 110 P. 294, 298, this court, in answering like questions involved in the instant case, used the following language: "The patents expressly declare that they grant the lots mentioned, and that they contain a stated number of acres, being the same number of acres mentioned in the plat of the corresponding lots. It is claimed that this shows an intent to grant no more than the stated number of acres, and to make the meander line the boundary, and not the shore line of the pond. This claim is disposed of by the following passage from Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U. S. 384, 11 S. Ct. 808, 35 L. Ed. 428: 'It has been the practice of the government from its origin, in disposing of the public lands, to measure the price to be paid for them by the quantity of upland granted, no charge being made for the lands under the bed of the stream, or other body of water. The meander lines run along or near the margin of such waters are run for the purpose of ascertaining the exact quantity of the upland to be charged for, and not for the purpose of limiting the title of the grantee to such meander lines. It has frequently been held, both by the federal and state courts, that such meander lines are [not] intended for the purpose of bounding and abutting the lands granted upon the waters whose margins are thus meandered; and that the waters themselves constitute the real boundary.'" The court then cites a number of cases where the lands granted corresponded with the plat but did not include acreage between the meander line and the shore line, holding that such acreage was conveyed, as the shore line constituted the boundary. The opinion in the Foss Case, supra, quoting from Mitchell v. Smale, 140 U. S. 406, 11 S. Ct. 819, 840, 35 L. Ed. 442, thus sets forth the rule as to the binding effect of the official plat: "The patents when issued refer to this plat for identification of the lots conveyed, and are equivalent to and have the legal effect of a declaration that they extend to and are bounded by the lake or stream. Such lake or stream itself, as a natural object or monument, is virtually and truly one of the calls of the description or boundary of the premises conveyed; and all the legal consequences of such a boundary in the matter of riparian rights and title to land under water regularly follow." To the same effect is the case of Kirby v. Potter, 138 Cal. 686, 72 P. 333.

In Maginnis v. Hurlbutt, 49 Cal. App. 460, 193 P. 606, the District Court of Appeal for the First District had before it the question of ownership of lands lying between the meander line and the actual shore line of Clear Lake. It was there held that the grant of land by the government carried the boundary to the shore line of the lake, and was not limited to the meander line. The briefs of counsel state that 38 acres were included in the tract lying between the meander line and the shore line of the lake. The opinion of the court, however, does not indicate the number of acres. The Maginnis Case differs from the case at bar in that the title asserted as against the original patent was based upon an act of the state of California commonly known as the "Swamp Land Act." The character of the land, however, and the character of the title claimed does not affect the principle which we have heretofore stated that a patent purporting to convey land according to a plat which describes the land as bounded by a body of water conveys the land to the shore line unlimited by the meander line, unless there enters into the case a question of fraud or palpable mistake justifying a court of equity to intervene, and the question therefore arises: Should the court in this case have held that the tract of land between the meander line of the Tucker survey and the shore line of Clear Lake was such as to limit the boundary of the lands claimed by the plaintiff to the meander line shown by the Tucker survey, or was the court correct in fixing the boundary of the plaintiff's land according to the plat on file?

U. S. 24, 38 S. Ct. 21, 62 L. Ed. 128; Producers' Oil Co. v. Hanzen, 238 U. S. 325, 35 S. Ct. 755, 59 L. Ed. 1330; French-Glenn Live Stock Co. v. Springer, 185 U. S. 47, 22 S. Ct. 563, 46 L. Ed. 800; Scott v. Lattig, 227 U. S. 229, 33 S. Ct. 242, 57 L. Ed. 490, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 107. A review of these cases, however, we think shows that they are readily distinguishable from the facts found by the court in this case. In the Jeems Bayou Fishing & Hunting Club Case, supra, a compact body of land of 500 acres was omitted from the original survey. The court there held that the omission of such a large tract of land indicated a deliberate purpose on the part of the surveyor and rendered his actions fraudulent. In the case of Security Land & Exploration Co., supra, the patent called for 140 acres. The omitted land comprised 570 acres, which, according to the language of the court, indicated that the surveyor never saw the grant and never saw the lake he pretended to have measured. In the case of Lee Wilson & Co., supra, the controversy involved 853 acres of unsurveyed swamp land. In the French-Glenn Live Stock Co. Case, supra, a large tract of land was involved, and it was found that there was no body of water to meander. The case of United States v. Lane, 260 U. S. 662, 43 S. Ct. 236, 67 L. Ed. 448, where the facts are more similar to those involved here, held, quoting from the syllabus: "A patent to land under a survey along the margin of a lake, which purports to follow such margin, will carry title to the water's edge, where the land is wild and remote and of little value, and numerous ravines run into the land from the water, so that the running of the line on the water's edge would have been difficult, while the survey follows with fair accuracy the contour of the lake, although in a length of 4,000 feet, with an indicated area of 271 acres, about 98 acres are outside of the meander line." The opinions in the Jeems Case, supra, and the Lane Case, supra, were written by the same justice. In the former case the size of the tract of land omitted was held to indicate fraud, while in the Lane Case 98 acres omitted were not held to constitute a sufficiently large body of land to indicate fraud or deliberate mistake, etc.

In deciding the Lane Case the court used the following language, which is pertinent here: "The official plat made from such survey does not show the meander line, but shows the general form of the lake deduced therefrom, and the surrounding fractional lots adjoining and bordering on the same. The patents when issued refer to this plat for identification of the lots conveyed, and are equivalent to and have the physical effect of a declaration that they extend to and are bounded by the lake or stream." This language is quoted from the case of Mitchell v. Smale, 140 U. S. 406, 11 S. Ct. 819, 840, 35 L. Ed. 442. The court then proceeds: "While the facts are somewhat different and the extent of the omission somewhat greater, we think the general rule should, likewise, be applied in the remaining two cases. The Warren survey and plat here indicate an area of about 271 acres in the fractional subdivisions conveyed. The lands added by the new survey constitute a compact body of 97.64 acres—65.77 acres of which are involved in the Greene Case and 14.13 acres in the Loucks Case—having the outline of a long and rather irregular crescent, with the outer curve next to the water," etc.

In the case of Barringer v. Davis, 120 N. W. 65, a case referred to in the citations which we have given, it is held that the meander line is not the limit of the land conveyed when the lands border upon a body of water, but that the shore line constitutes the true boundary. On pages 66 and 67 of the volume cited are two maps or plats showing the lands in controversy. The original survey made in 1875 called for 154 acres. A resurvey made in 1901 added 104 acres. The court held that the original patents conveyed the lands in controversy. This case is also reported in 141 Iowa, 419, 433. It would appear from the opinion and the plats in the Barringer Case that the acreage involved was considerably larger than that with which we are dealing.

In the case of Rue v. Oregon & Washington Railroad Co., 109 Wash. 436, 186 P. 1074, the Supreme Court of Washington held that 43 acres of land lying between the meander line and the shore line was insufficient upon which to hold that the survey was fraudulent or so palpably erroneous as to justify the interference of a court of equity. Other questions were involved in that case, but the principles there stated are applicable here.

In the case of Mitchell v. Smale, supra, the patent covered 4.53 acres. As platted it was held to carry title to 25 acres. In Sherwin v. Bitzer, 97 Minn. 252, 106 N. W. 1046, the title to the riparian owner of 143.93 acres of land between the meander line and the lake in a different section was sustained where his patent called for but 68.06 acres. As reported in 106 N. W. 1046, this case exhibits plats illustrating the questions involved and the lands in dispute.

In Schlosser v. Cruickshank et al., 96 Iowa, 414, 65 N. W. 344, the opinion discloses that there were 100 acres between the meander line and the shore of the lake. It was there held that the patent under the cases which we have cited carried the boundary line to the shore of the lake.

In Schmitz v. Klee, 173 P. 1026, 1027, the meander line left between it and the shore line 30.71 acres of high land. It was held that the patent conveyed the intervening tract. A plat showing the unsurveyed land appears on page 1027 of the volume cited.

In Greene et al. v. United States (C. C. A.) 274 F. 145, 149, and Loucks et al. v. United States (U. S. v. Lane) 260 U. S. 662, 43 S. Ct. 236, 67 L. Ed. 448, are quoted practically all the cases which we have cited, and, where a larger tract of land was omitted than lies between the Tucker meander line and the shore of Clear Lake, the court said: "The case is well within the rule that a meander line is not to be considered as a line of boundary, where the plat of survey shows a body of water as the boundary," etc.

Some minor questions were presented as to errors in the admission of testimony, but they are not such as to affect the application of the legal principles enunciated by the foregoing cases, and, in view of what we have heretofore stated, we think that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by H. J. Read against Carl Johnson, administrator of the estate of Andrew Johnson, deceased. After the discharge of Carl Johnson, as administrator, Regnhild Johnson and others, heirs at law of the deceased, were substituted as parties defendant. From an adverse judgment, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

H. W. Zagoren, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Matthew A. McCullough, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHENK, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action to enforce a stockholder's liability.

Andrew Johnson died intestate on July 22, 1921, in the county of Sacramento. Carl Johnson was appointed administrator of his estate, consisting of separate and community property. A final decree distributing the estate to the heirs at law and the assigns of certain of them was filed on April 7, 1924. The administrator was discharged on April 13, 1925.

At the time of his death the decedent was the owner of 330 shares of the capital stock of the Yuba Vineyards Company, a corporation, and this stock came into the possession of the administrator. The rights, privileges, and powers of said corporation were suspended on March 1, 1924, by reason of the nonpayment of its license tax. After the appointment of the administrator, and during the years 1923 and 1924, said corporation contracted certain indebtedness by reason of the purchase of farm machinery, materials, and supplies from Booth and Herboth, merchants at Marysville. Much of this original indebtedness, after it was incurred, was merged in promissory notes executed by the corporation to the creditor firm. Some of the notes were paid, but four of them remained unpaid. The unpaid notes and the open book account were transferred to the plaintiff for purposes of collection. On June 30, 1924, this action was commenced against the administrator to recover the proportionate share of said indebtedness chargeable to the decedent as a stockholder of said corporation.

The complaint is in five counts, four of which are on the indebtedness evidenced by the promissory notes and for interest and attorney's fees provided for therein. The first note is dated January 2, 1924, for $950; the second is dated November 21, 1923, for $261.20; the third, December 3, 1923, for $940; and the fourth, February 1, 1924, for $1,371.95. The fifth count alleged the indebtedness of the corporation to the plaintiff's assignor in the sum of $998.16 on an open book account extending from July 25, 1923, to February 18, 1924. After the discharge of the administrator and on December 22, 1925, the plaintiff, by leave of court, filed an amended and supplemental complaint, substituting as parties defendant the heirs at law of the decedent who were the distributees of the estate and the California National Bank as assignee of the defendant widow, in the place and stead of the administrator. The demurrer of the defendant bank was sustained, and the action as to it was dismissed. On issue joined by the remaining defendants the case was tried, and the court ordered findings in favor of the plaintiff, and appointed a referee to take the account and determine the amounts properly chargeable to each defendant. The referee found the defendant widow chargeable with the sum of $1,194.33 and each of the nine remaining defendants with the sum of $146.46. Judgment was entered accordingly.

The first point made on the appeal is that the defendant stockholders are not liable on account of the promissory notes alleged in the first four counts of the complaint, for the reason that their liability, if any, can be predicated only on the original indebtedness and not on the promissory notes. As to the fifth count It is contended that a stockholder is not liable on an open book account, but is liable only upon each individual purchase for a period of three years next ensuing.

The defendants cite as controlling the case of Winona Wagon Company v. Bull, 108 Cal. 1, 40 P. 1077, 1078. In that case a stockholder was sought to be held on an indebtedness evidenced by the promissory note sued on, executed as a renewal of prior promissory notes. It was held that neither the date of the note sued on nor the date of the notes of which it was a renewal were conclusive as to the time when the liability arose, in the absence of a showing as to when the indebtedness was created. It was stated as well settled "that the liability of the stockholder is an original liability created by the statute; that his liability is dependent upon the fact that he is a stockholder at the time the debt is created, and the extent of his liability is measured by the proportion between the stock then held by him and the total number of shares issued," and that an allegation "that the defendant was a stockholder at the time the note was given, is not an allegation that the debt was incurred at that date, nor that the defendant was a stockholder at any prior date when the indebtedness was in fact contracted." For aught that appeared in the complaint, the defendant in that case may not have been a stockholder when the debt was created. It was accordingly held that the complaint did not state a cause of action.

[1, 2] In the case at bar the times when the several indebtednesses were contracted were alleged in the complaint. The dates of the notes and of the items of the indebtedness represented thereby were proved. The dates of the items making up the open book account were also proved. This, we think, was sufficient. The dates thus shown remove the case from any question of the statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 337), and the estate in the person of the administrator was the stockholder during all of said times. The action to enforce the stockholder's liability could have been maintained against the decedent had he been living. Upon his ownership of the stock at the time of his death, the action was maintainable against his administrator. Sections 385, 1582, Code Civ. Proc.; sections 313, 322, Civ. Code; Miller & Lux, Inc. v. Katz, 10 Cal. App. 576, 102 P. 946.

[3, 4] Although both the original and the amended and supplemental complaints alleged the execution of the four notes by the Yuba Vineyards Company, the original indebtedness was proved and the notes were admissible as evidence of the original indebtedness. It is true that the notes provide for interest on the indebtedness, and for attorney fees in the event of suit, and include certain so-called "carrying charges." These items can be viewed in no other light than as additional obligations which the corporation had the right to assume, and, since they were incurred within the period of the statute, and while the stock was owned by the estate, the stockholder's liability would attach thereto, and the consideration therefor was the extension of the time of payment. We find nothing in Santa Rosa National Bank v. Barnett, 125 Cal. 407, 58 P. 85, or Cordes v. Paulson, 78 Cal. App. 90, 248 P. 546, which would justify a contrary conclusion. Those cases are clearly distinguishable on the facts, and do not support the defendants' position. They do not involve the point presented.

[5, 6] The second contention in support of the appeal is that the Superior Court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, especially as to the nine defendants against whom judgment was rendered in the sum of $146.46. There is no merit in the point. The court had jurisdiction of the action originally filed against the administrator. During the course of administration, the stock of the defendant was sold with the approval of the court. It does not appear that the sale was necessary to the settlement of all claims of the estate, but it does appear that the sale was advantageous to the estate. However this may be, the sale did not affect the plaintiff's cause of action against the administrator.

[7] After distribution was ordered to the defendants, and after the discharge of the administrator in April, 1925, the plaintiff filed his amended and supplemental complaint, in which the new matter was appropriately alleged, and in which it was sought to follow the funds, which should have been held to discharge the plaintiff's claim during administration, into the hands of the distributees and to impress a trust thereon for the protection of said claim. We find no error in allowing the amended and supplemental complaint to be filed. In its essential characteristics, the purpose of the action remained the same, and it was necessary, by reason of the discharge of the administrator pending the action, to set up the new matter alleged in the amended and supplemental complaint in order that the relief sought might be granted. This new matter was within the equitable cognizance of the court, and jurisdiction was thus retained. Gardiner v. Royer, 167 Cal. 238, 139 P. 75.

[8] The defendants make what are called minor points. The only one requiring notice is that the court erred in admitting in evidence the deposition of one Albrecht, secretary of the Yuba Vineyards Company, taken before the substitution of the parties defendant. The substituted parties were in reality the real parties in interest. When they were brought in, they took the case as they found it, and were bound by the prior proceedings in the case to the same extent as if the administrator had not been discharged and had continued to be the party defendant. Briggs v. Briggs, 80 Cal. 253, 22 P. 334; Fredricks v. Judah, 73 Cal. 604, 15 P. 305. The case of Lange v. Braynard, 104 Cal. 156, 37 P. 868, cited by the defendants, is not in point on the facts. On the contrary, the discussion therein supports the plaintiff's position.

The judgment is affirmed.

SMART v. PEEK et al.

Sac. 4451.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 25, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 24, 1931.

1. Taxation ⇨809(3).

In suit to quiet title, defendant need not plead tax title specially; answer denying plaintiff's title and right to possession being sufficient.

An answer denying plaintiff's title and right to possession is always sufficient, since under such an answer defendant may prove whatever right he may have, including a tax title.

2. Pleading ⇨35.

Where defendant in suit to quiet title, after denying plaintiff's ownership and right to possession, pleads tax title specially, special allegations may be deemed surplusage if defective.

Assessor is not sole official authorized to sell mining property comprising possessory interest in government land for delinquent taxes, in view of Pol. Code, § 3821, under which assessor's powers of seizure and sale terminate in August, whereas tax collector does not initiate proceedings for collection of delinquent taxes until December, in view of sections 3758, 3790, and there is therefore no conflict between duties of the two officials.

5. Taxation ⇨764(1).

Tax sale of mining equipment wherein deed described property as realty held not invalid as including equipment not shown to be realty (Pol. Code, §§ 3617, 3898; Civ. Code, § 661).

Under Pol. Code, § 3617, all improvements affixed to land are excluded from definition of personal property, and under Civ. Code, § 661, machinery or tools together with other enumerated equipment used in developing mine are to be deemed affixed to mine, and Pol. Code, § 3898, declares that tax deed is prima facie evidence of truth of all recitals therein.

Appeal from Superior Court, Calaveras County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Action by W. G. Smart against Percy Peek and others, with cross-complaints by defendants. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Barker & Keithly and Donald Barker, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Virgil M. Airola, of San Andreas, for respondent Robert Irvine.

Edward R. Solinsky, of San Francisco, for respondents Percy Peek and others.

SEAWELL, J.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment for defendants in an action brought by him to quiet his title to four parcels of mining property and a mill site situate in the county of Calaveras. Defendants assert that plaintiff's title has been divested by proceedings taken against said property for nonpayment of county taxes for the fiscal year 1913-14 which resulted in the sale of the property to them by the state of California under the provisions of section 3897, Political Code. Plaintiff attacks the validity of said proceedings, and further contends that as the pleadings stand defendants are not entitled to rely on a tax title.

[1-3] The attack upon the pleadings is based upon defendants' failure to set forth with particularity all the several steps required to be taken in a tax proceeding to vest title in the purchaser from the state. This has been held to be a requirement where a party undertakes to plead a tax title specially. Russell v. Mann, 22 Cal. 132; Metteer v. Smith, 156 Cal. 572, 105 P. 735. But in a suit to quiet title the party relying on a tax title need not plead it specially. An answer denying the plaintiff's title and right to possession is always sufficient. Warden v. Stoll (Cal. Sup.) 291 P. 835; Hinds v. Clark, 173 Cal. 49, 159 P. 153; Tilton v. Russek, 171 Cal. 731, 154 P. 860; United Land Ass'n v. Pacific Improvement Co., 139 Cal. 370, 69 P. 1064, 72 P. 988. Under such an answer the defendant may prove whatever right he may have, including a tax title. Hinds v. Clark, supra; Tilton v. Russek, supra. Where the answer contains denials of the plaintiff's ownership and right to possession, as in this case, and further attempts to plead the tax title specially, the special allegations may be treated as surplusage if insufficient or defective. Cole v. Segraves, 88 Cal. 103, 25 P. 1109. The cited case involved a complaint in a suit in ejectment; but what is there said is equally applicable to the answer to a complaint in an action to quiet title which is in the usual form. Furthermore, any defects appearing in the cross-complaints were cured by appellant's failure to demur, the nature of the allegations and denials of the answers, and the definite and clear-cut issues which the parties addressed themselves to upon the trial of the cause.

[4] As to the merits of the case, plaintiff contends that the proceedings taken by the tax collector are invalid for the reason that one of the four mining properties included is a possessory interest in land of the United States government, and that under sections 3820 and 3821, Political Code, the assessor, rather than the tax collector, is the sole official authorized to take proceedings to subject such possessory interest to sale for delinquent taxes, which proceedings must be in the manner prescribed by section 3822, Political Code. Plaintiff cannot succeed in this contention. Said sections as they stood at the time of the proceedings herein provided as follows:

"3820. The assessor must collect the taxes on all property when, in his opinion, said taxes are not a lien upon real property sufficient to secure the payment of the taxes. The taxes on all assessments of possession of, claim to, or right to the possession of land * * * shall be immediately due and payable upon assessment and shall be collected by the assessor as provided in this chapter.

"3821. In the case provided for in the preceding section, at the time of making the assessment, or at any time before the first Monday of August following the assessment, the assessor may collect the taxes by seizure and sale of any personal property owned by the person against whom the tax is assessed, or if no personal property can be found, then the assessor may collect the taxes by seizure and sale of the right to the possession of, claim to or right to the possession of land.

"3822. The provisions of sections 3791, 3792, 3793, 3794, 3795 and 3796 apply to such seizure and sale."

The validity of said sections and their applicability to possessory mining rights and possessory oil leases has been fully sustained. Ventura County v. Barry, 207 Cal. 189, 277 P. 333; Mohawk Oil Co. v. Hopkins, 196 Cal. 148, 236 P. 133; Bakersfield, etc., Co. v. Kern County, 144 Cal. 148, 77 P. 892; Graciosa Oil Co. v. Santa Barbara County, 155 Cal. 140, 99 P. 483, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 211. But none of said cases goes to the extent of holding that said sections prescribe the exclusive method by which possessory interests or personal property may be subjected to the claim of the county for taxes.

As to taxes upon personal property not a lien on real property, section 3790, Political Code, provides for seizure and sale of any personal property owned by the delinquent by the tax collector, whose powers do not, however, commence until the auditor shall have delivered the assessment books to him. This must be done on or before the fourth Monday in September. The assessor's powers of seizure and sale in such cases terminate on the first Monday in August. Section 3821, Pol. Code. Possessory interests are defined by the revenue act as real estate (section 3617, Pol. Code), and the tax thereon is a lien on the interest assessed. The revenue act provides a complete method for the collection of delinquent taxes which are a lien on real property, and makes no exception of possessory interests defined by the act as real estate. The prescribed procedure was followed in the instant case. The tax collector does not initiate proceedings for the collection of delinquent taxes until the third Monday in December (section 3758, Pol. Code), which is several months after the assessor's powers of sale have terminated. There is no conflict between the duties of the two officials. If the taxes are not collected by the assessor within the time allowed, they are not lost to the people, but the duty of collection devolves upon the tax collector.

Section 3805a, Political Code, makes express reference to the sale of a possessory interest in land to the state, thereby showing the intended application of the provisions providing for sale by the tax collector to such interests, since the power of acting in the matter of a sale to the state is not conferred upon the assessor.

[5] The contention that the proceedings are invalid because they embrace mining equipment not shown to be real property is without merit. By the terms of section 3617, Political Code, "all buildings, structures, fixtures, fences, and improvements erected upon or affixed to the land, except telephone and telegraph lines," are excluded from the definition of personal property. Section 661, Civil Code, provides that "sluice-boxes, flumes, hose, pipes, railway tracks, cars, blacksmith-shops, mills, and all other machinery or tools used in working or developing a mine, are to be deemed affixed to the mine." The deed issued to the defendants as purchasers under section 3898, Political Code, characterized the property as real property, and said deed is declared by the section to be prima facie evidence of the truth of all recitals contained therein.

[6] Plaintiff also objects to the sale on the ground that it was not shown that the notice of sale required by the terms of section 3897, Political Code, had been given to him as the party to whom the land was last assessed. By the provisions of section 3898, supra, the deed from the state must recite that the tax collector offered the property for sale "in conformity with law." The deed is, by the further terms of said section, prima facie evidence of all facts recited therein. Since a sale in conformity with law could not be had except upon notice duly given, the deed is prima facie evidence thereof. Hayes v. Ducasse, 119 Cal. 682, 52 P. 121. At the time of the decision in Johnson v. Canty, 162 Cal. 391, 123 P. 263, a case especially relied on by appellant, it was necessary that the deed state that notice was given.

[7] The deed is not ineffective for uncertainty in the description of one of the parcels included in the proceedings, which is described as "frac. of lot 2 and frac. of SW¼ of SW¼ of Section 26, Township 6 North, Range 12 East (containing 4.95 acres), known as the 'Occident Mill Site.'" Section 1092, Civil Code, furnishes express authorization for a description by name. Murray v. Tulare Irrigation Co., 120 Cal. 311, 49 P. 563, 52 P. 586; Haley v. Amestoy, 44 Cal. 132; Bates v. Howard, 105 Cal. 173, 38 P. 715; Carter v. Bacigalupi, 83 Cal. 187, 23 P. 361. Hence the designation of the property as "Occident Mill Site" removes any uncertainty.

[8, 9] Appellant contends that the sale made by the state to defendants is void for the reason that defendants bid less for the property than $2,272.99, which sum was the total of all taxes levied and all costs and penalties, and was the lowest price at which the property lawfully could be sold. Pol. Code, § 3897. And, further appellant contends that even if the sale was for the proper amount, a deed which misrecites a sale for a smaller amount is void. The deed in the instant case recited a sale for $2,219.87. When a tax deed founded upon a valid sale is defective in form or misrecites the true facts, the sale is not rendered void, but the purchaser may compel the issuance to him of a conveyance in due form. Morton v. Sloan, 96 Cal. App. 747, 275 P. 223, and cases there cited. In Morton v. Sloan, supra, in which a hearing was denied by this court, the District Court of Appeal considered the validity of a tax deed issued under section 3785b, Political Code, which recited that all taxes levied and assessed prior to 1919 had been paid, instead of reciting that all taxes prior to sale had been paid. Although a corrected deed had been filed in the Appellate Court under section 956a, Code of Civil Procedure, the court held that the original deed was not void, but sufficient to pass title, and merely irregular. A similar decision was made in Schainman v. All Persons, 96 Cal. App. 753, 275 P. 225, 276 P. 113, decided the same day. We regard the rule of said decisions as equally applicable to a deed issued under section 3898, Political Code, and to an error in stating the amount bid for the property. The misrecital does not destroy the effect of the deed as prima facie evidence of the other facts recited therein.

[10] Appellant contends, however, that there is not a mere misrecital of the amount bid, but that in fact defendants bid less for the property than the lowest sum for which it lawfully could be sold. It was advertised for sale at $2,272.99. The deed from the state to defendants recites a sale for $2,219.87, which is $53.12 less than the sum required. The charge for advertising the notice of sale and serving copies thereof, as stated in the notice of sale, was $53.12. Respondents argue that since the charges for advertising are no longer charges against the county, but charges against the property which must be deposited in advance of the sale with the tax collector, said items are not to be included in the bid or statement of sale price in the deed. We think they are in error in this contention.

[11, 12] The record, however, contains evidence in the form of receipts covering both charges, it being stipulated that said receipts were a part of the records of the tax collector's office. These receipts, connected with the transaction in such fashion as to compel the inference of payment on account of the publication of said notice and service, must be held to be prima facie evidence of payment. No attempt was made by appellant to minimize their effect in this respect. Beyond question the sum of $53.12 paid in advance of the sale was paid in addition to the sum of $2,-219.87 paid at the time of sale, and with said sum constituted the minimum amount named in the notice of sale as the lowest price at which the property could lawfully be sold and in fact was sold. This was a substantial compliance with the law, and we cannot see that appellant was prejudiced or misled in any respect by the proceedings.

Judgment affirmed.

BATES v. CAMPBELL.
L. A. 10585.

Supreme Court of California.
Aug. 19, 1931.

1. Libel and slander  $\S$ 19.

Whether publication is libelous is determinable from expressions used, whole scope and apparent object of writer, and from viewpoint of probable effect upon average reader (Civ. Code,  $\S$  45).

2. Libel and slander  $\S$ 89(1).

Publications coming within statutory definition of libel are "libelous per se," obviating necessity for averring special damage (Civ. Code,  $\S$  45).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Libel," see Words and Phrases.]

3. Libel and slander  $\S$ 86(2).

Where alleged libelous publication is susceptible of harmless as well as injurious meaning, plaintiff must plead by innuendo facts showing injurious meaning.

4. Libel and slander  $\S$ 86(1).

Office of "innuendo" is to merely explain or interpret, without enlarging, alleged libelous publication.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Innuendo," see Words and Phrases.]

5. Libel and slander  $\S$ 86(2).

Statement in alleged libelous letter that it would probably serve no useful purpose to recite circumstances leading to request for plaintiff's resignation could not be enlarged by innuendo to mean that plaintiff was discharged for unfitness.

6. Libel and slander  $\S$ 86(2).

Where published statements were actionable regardless of innuendo, allegations by way of innuendo could be disregarded as surplusage.

7. Principal and agent  $\S$ 48.

Publicity agent stands in fiduciary relation to principal.

8. Libel and slander  $\S$ 9(9).

Statement that bar association's publicity agent, after being discharged, unauthorizedly continued to use association's stationery, resulting in misleading people, held libelous per se as tending to injure agent in her occupation and as "exposing her to obloquy" (Civ. Code,  $\S$  45).

The statement was injurious to the publicity agent in her occupation, since men of business prudence would not employ one who subsequent to the termination of such employment, and without permission or consent, and to the confusion and possible deception of third persons, would continue to use for her personal ends letterheads or other property of her principal intrusted to her solely for the purpose of effecting the satisfactory discharge of her duties as publicity agent, and the statement was calculated to and undoubtedly exposed the agent to obloquy as one untrue to a trust reposed in her by a former employer. "To expose one to obloquy," within Civ. Code,  $\S$  45, is to expose him to censure, reproach, blame, or reprehension.

9. Appeal and error  $\S$ 843(4).

On appeal from judgment sustaining demurrer to libel complaint, truth or privileged character of allegedly libelous charges required no consideration, being purely matters of defense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon R. Yankwich, Judge.

Action by Rosalind Bates against Kemper Campbell. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Superseding opinion of District Court of Appeal in 295 P. 355.

Rosalind Goodrich Bates, in pro per.

W. Joseph Ford, Meserve, Mumper, Hughes & Robertson and Anderson & Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages from the defendant for an alleged libel. A demurrer to the first amended complaint was sustained without leave to amend. Judgment for costs was thereupon entered for the defendant, from which judgment this appeal was taken.

It is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff was, and is, what is generally known and termed a "publicity agent"; that by her perseverance, endeavors, and ability she had created and built up a lucrative business as such publicity agent; that on or about October 31, 1927, the defendant, an attorney at law, and then president of the Los Angeles Bar Association, and a man of great wealth and influence, wrote, published, and caused to be published by others, a certain letter or article of and concerning the plaintiff, which said letter or article reads as follows:

"Referring to certain letter appearing in a morning paper of this date. Without taking the time to comment upon the entire letter of Mr. McNitt, I desire to correct one or two misstatements therein contained. These misstatements were perhaps due to the stress under which Mr. McNitt is apparently laboring in his campaign for election to the Board of Governors of The State Bar. I did not as stated by Mr. McNitt, nor did my office send 'to the metropolitan dailies publicity containing statements which were erroneous.' No publicity whatever was sent out from my office or by me concerning the election, which fact Mr. McNitt could have ascertained by the slightest inquiry.

"I did not ask Mr. McNitt to withdraw although I did consider it my duty as a long time acquaintance and as a member of the State Bar Commission to ask him whether he had considered the fact that as a member of the Board, if elected, it would be his duty to establish standards for admission which might conflict with the policy of the law school with which he is connected, this being a duty which cannot be delegated to a committee. In the course of the conversation, he stated he did not like to be in the position of running against leaders of the Bar, such as Mr. Hunsaker and Mr. James and he thought he would withdraw. Later on he informed me that he had been importuned by his friends to stay in the race.

"As to the principal subject of controversy to which the letters of Judge Hollzer, Miss Bates, Mr. McNitt, and Mr. Hunter, are directed, I think this could have been avoided, had there not been confusion with respect to the fact and date of termination of employment of Miss Bates by the Los Angeles Bar Association. This confusion is apparently cleared up by the publication of those letters. It would probably serve no useful purpose to recite the circumstances leading to the request for Miss Bates' resignation which in pursuance to such request, was received and accepted by the Board of Trustees on or about July 7, 1927. The confusion, however, is easily understood in view of the fact that Miss Bates without permission or consent continued to use Bar Association stationery and failed to notify the metropolitan papers of her change of status and in using her articles it was assumed that she still represented the bar association. In fact, not only Judge Hollzer, but a number of other judges and lawyers who signed certain petitions and letters at the request of Miss Bates have stated that they would not have done so had they known she was not employed by the Bar Association and had they known that certain other candidates were in the field.

"October 13, 1927. Kemper Campbell."

That by said letter or article the defendant intended it to be understood, and it was so understood by the readers thereof, to mean that plaintiff had been discharged by the board of trustees of the Los Angeles Bar Association for the reason that she was not a fit person to occupy such position; that she had appropriated to her own use, and had used, property of said bar association by reason of which conduct and the employment of false pretenses she had induced divers persons to sign certain petitions and letters which they would not otherwise have signed; that to the defendant's knowledge all of said statements were false, defamatory, and untrue; that said letter or article is false, libelous, defamatory, untrue, and unprivileged, and was written and published maliciously and with the evil intent to injure and defame plaintiff and to destroy her business and to prevent plaintiff from earning a livelihood for herself and minor children; that said false and defamatory letter or article has greatly injured

the reputation of plaintiff in the city of Los Angeles and the county of Los Angeles, and has exposed her to public hatred, contempt, ridicule, and obloquy, and has injured her in her profession, all to her damage in the sum of $50,000. The complaint also prays for an award of exemplary or punitive damages in a like amount.

[1] Section 45 of the Civil Code defines libel as "a false and unprivileged publication by writing, printing, picture, effigy, or other fixed representation to the eye, which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which causes him to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation." The Code definition of libel is very broad and has been held to include almost any language which, upon its face, has a natural tendency to injure a person's reputation, either generally, or with respect to his occupation. Schomberg v. Walker, 132 Cal. 224, 64 P. 290; Stevens v. Snow, 191 Cal. 58, 62, 214 P. 968; Tonini v. Cevalasco, 114 Cal. 266, 272, 46 P. 103. In the determination of this question, the alleged libelous publication is to be construed "as well from the expressions used as from the whole scope and apparent object of the writer." Stevens v. Storke, 191 Cal. 329, 334, 216 P. 371, 373; Bettner v. Holt, 70 Cal. 270, 11 P. 713, 715. The case last above cited states that: "Not only is the language employed to be regarded with reference to the actual words used, but according to the sense and meaning, under all the circumstances attending the publication, which such language may fairly be presumed to have conveyed to those to whom it was published; so that in such cases the language is uniformly to be regarded with what has been its effect, actual or presumed, and its sense is to be arrived at with the help of the cause and occasion of its publication. And in passing upon the sufficiency of such language as stating a cause of action, a court is to place itself in the situation of the hearer or reader, and determine the sense or meaning of the language of a complaint for libelous publication according to its natural and popular construction." That is to say, the publication is to be measured, not so much by its effect when subjected to the critical analysis of a mind trained in the law, but by the natural and probable effect upon the mind of the average reader. A defendant is liable for what is insinuated, as well as for what is stated explicitly. Schomberg v. Walker, supra, page 227 of 132 Cal., 64 P. 290.

[2-4] Publications falling within the statutory definition above set out are libelous per se, thus obviating the necessity for an averment of special damage. Layne v. Kirby, 208 Cal. 694, 696, 284 P. 441. Should the alleged libelous publication be ambiguous and susceptible of two meanings, one of them harmless and the other injurious, it is necessary for the plaintiff to plead by innuendo the facts upon which he relies to point out the injurious meaning of the writing. Mellen v. Times-Mirror Co., 167 Cal. 587, 593, 140 P. 277, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 766; Ousdal v. Sansum, 86 Cal. App. 119, 122, 260 P. 322; Vedovi v. Watson & Taylor, 104 Cal. App. 80, 84, 285 P. 418. However, it is not the purpose of an innuendo to "beget an action," and the meaning of the language complained of may not be enlarged or extended thereby. Chavez v. Times-Mirror Co., 185 Cal. 20, 25, 195 P. 666; Grand v. Dreyfus, 122 Cal. 53, 61, 54 P. 389; Hearne v. De Young, 119 Cal. 670, 52 P. 150, 499; Des Granges v. Crall, 27 Cal. App. 313, 315, 149 P. 777. In other words, it is the office of the innuendo to merely explain or interpret, without enlarging, the alleged libelous publication.

[5] Viewing the alleged libelous communication in the light of these well-established principles of law, we are of opinion that there is merit in respondent's contention that the innuendo contained in the complaint attempts, in some particulars at least, to enlarge and extend beyond its fair and reasonable import the meaning of certain of the statements published of and concerning the appellant. To illustrate: The statement in the letter that "It would probably serve no useful purpose to recite the circumstances leading to the request for Miss Bates' resignation which in pursuance to such request, was received and accepted by the Board of Trustees on or about July 7, 1927," may not be construed, as in the complaint here, to mean that "plaintiff was discharged by the Board of Trustees of the Los Angeles Bar Association for the reason that she was not a fit person to occupy such position." The statement quoted from the letter makes no reference whatever, either expressly or impliedly, to appellant's fitness or unfitness to occupy such position, and is not therefore reasonably open to the construction attempted to be placed on it. Maynard v. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co., 47 Cal. 207, 208; Id., 34 Cal. 48, 91 Am. Dec. 672. This sufficiently illustrates the point as to the office of an innuendo. In view of our conclusion to be presently announced, we deem it unnecessary to determine whether other allegations of the complaint also attempt to improperly extend and enlarge the alleged libelous publication.

[6-8] Considering the publication herein as well from the expressions used as from the whole scope and apparent object of the writer, we are of the view that certain of respondent's written statements of and concerning the appellant are actionable entirely regardless of the innuendoes by which it is sought to explain or enlarge their sense. This being so, the allegations by way of innuendo may be disregarded as surplusage. The publication here complained of charges, among other things, that "Miss Bates without permission or consent continued to use Bar Association stationery and failed to notify the metropolitan papers of her change of status and in using her articles it was assumed that she still represented the Bar Association. In fact, not only Judge Holzner, but a number of other judges and lawyers who signed certain petitions and letters at the request of Miss Bates have stated that they would not have done so had they known she was not employed by the Bar Association and had they known that certain other candidates were in the field." It is this portion of respondent's letter that contains the sting of the libel. In this connection, it must be borne in mind that the complaint alleges and for present purposes it must be taken to be true, that appellant for some time prior to the publication of the alleged libel had been engaged as a publicity agent, and by means of her ability as such had created and built up a lucrative business. There can be but little doubt that a publicity agent, like any other agent, stands in a fiduciary relation to his principal, and because of the trust and confidence reposed in him by his principal he must exercise the utmost good faith, must acquire no interest adverse to that of his principal, and must not unite his personal and representative capacities. As an incident to his employment, a publicity agent is necessarily intrusted with certain intimate information, files, letterheads, and other property of his principal essential and expedient to the proper and satisfactory discharge of his duties. To state of such a fiduciary that, without having first obtained the "permission or consent" of his principal, he had "continued to use" these instrumentalities subsequent to the termination of his employment, is to injure him in his occupation within the meaning of section 45, supra. It is only reasonable to conclude therefrom that other persons contemplating the employment of such a faithless servant, upon hearing of this charge, would hesitate, and in all probability would decline, to contract for his services because of the possible consequences. Surely no one can read the respondent's letter without understanding it to mean that plaintiff had been guilty of reprehensible conduct that would deter people from trusting her in her occupation.

While, as contended by respondent, it may not be libelous to state that appellant had failed to notify the newspapers of her change of status (it not being incumbent upon her to do so), and likewise, while it may not be libelous to state that the newspapers, being ignorant of appellant's change of status, had assumed that her articles were still being written for and on behalf of the Los Angeles Bar Association (appellant not being answerable for the construction placed on such articles by the newspapers), the fact still remains that respondent wrote and published of the appellant that subsequent to the severance of her confidential connection with the Los Angeles Bar Association, and without its permission or consent, she had continued to use bar association stationery, with the result that certain persons, thinking appellant still in the employ of the bar association, were so deceived or misled as to have performed certain acts and done certain things which they would not have performed or done had they been accurately advised as to appellant's status. That respondent's letter charges, both expressly and by necessary implication, that appellant had been guilty of a flagrant violation of the confidence and trust reposed in her by the bar association when it employed her, and that such charge of unethical conduct would have a "tendency to injure" appellant in her occupation goes without saying.

In Swan v. Thompson, 124 Cal. 193, 198, 56 P. 878, 880, a slander case, a charge that a "master mariner is in the habit of getting drunk" is said to be sufficiently broad to cover his conduct upon his voyages, as well as between his voyages, upon the sea as well as upon the land. The opinion declares: "We can imagine no language better calculated to ruin a master mariner than the language here used. * * * No man of the slightest business prudence would employ such a master mariner to navigate his ship." This language, paraphrased to fit the present case, would read: "No man of the slightest business prudence would employ as his publicity agent one who subsequent to the termination of such employment, and 'without permission or consent,' and to the confusion and possible deception of third persons, would continue to use for his own private and personal ends, letterheads or other property of his principal entrusted to him solely for the purpose of effecting the satisfactory discharge of his duties as such publicity agent."

Moreover, and aside from any "tendency" of the charge to injure appellant in her occupation, respondent's letter charges appellant with having been guilty of conduct which is calculated to and undoubtedly did expose her to obloquy, as one untrue to a trust reposed in her by a former employer, and, if the charge is false, it is libelous under section 45, supra. To expose one to obloquy is to expose him to censure, reproach, blame, or reprehension, for the terms are synonymous. Stevens v. Snow, supra, page 62 of 191 Cal., 214 P. 968; Tonini v. Cevasco, supra, page 273 of 114 Cal., 46 P. 103; Bettner v. Holt, supra, page 275 of 70 Cal., 11 P. 713.

[9, 10] The complaint is therefore immune from general demurrer on either of the foregoing theories. As the truth or privileged character of the charges directed at appellant are purely matters of defense, we need not consider them upon this appeal from a judgment entered upon the sustaining of a demurrer to the first amended complaint. We cannot agree that the complaint, on its face, shows the publication to have been a privileged one. While the parties in their briefs concern themselves solely with the general demurrer, we have also considered the several grounds of special demurrer, and likewise find them not to be well taken.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the court below to overrule the demurrer and permit the defendant to answer, should he be so advised.

Action for specific performance of written contract with prayer for damages as alternative relief.

A trial was had; findings and judgment were made in favor of defendants; plaintiff appealed. The several individual defendants constituted the board of education of the city of Modesto as of July 16, 1926. This board is made by law the governing body of a series of school districts of various kinds, centering about the city of Modesto. "Modesto City School District" is also made a party defendant and the existence of such an entity is questioned, but it is not necessary to pass an opinion upon this contention.

It is a fact that in the fall of 1925 the then board of education of said city favored the idea of purchasing as a school site some thirty-eight acres of land, known as the Dry creek site, near Modesto, and to that end, at a special meeting held October 7, 1925, all being present, they resolved to purchase this site at the price of $600 per acre and appointed two of their number as a committee to arrange the purchase. Admittedly there was then no fund available from which the purchase price might be taken. However, certain public spirited citizens, acting with said committee, decided to make the site available when funds for the purchase should be in existence and to that end they found it advisable to take over at once the title to said property. To do this, it was necessary that these citizens subscribe $10,000, which they did, taking a deed in the name of plaintiff corporation, which in turn gave a trust deed on the property to the original owner for $12,800, representing the balance due on the purchase price.

Seeking to give the board power to acquire said property at cost, plus carriage charges, plaintiff and said board executed a written agreement, which, in substance, provided that each recognized that no funds were available at the time for the purchase of said property, but that funds should be created, either by a tax levy or by a bond issue or by an election within one year; therefore, plaintiff agreed to hold the property for the use of said board and to protect the title by payment of taxes and other costs and the board agreed on its part to raise the necessary funds within said period of one year to pay for it. It was further planned from such funds so raised to reimburse the citizens who had advanced or who might thereafter advance money in order to hold said property available. This contract was executed on or about November 2, 1925, and a deed from plaintiff to the "Modesto City School District" was drafted and placed in escrow.

The board of education of said city as then constituted took possession of said property as its own and exercised dominion over it by leasing it at the rate of $750 per year and received a portion of said rents. Likewise, out of a fund known as the "Book Fund," it refunded to one of said citizens the sum of $2,000 advanced by him. Said board also undertook faithfully to carry out its covenants. It first caused a bond election to be held in June of 1926, which would have produced sufficient funds to buy and improve said site as high school property. This proposition was defeated. Later, and on June 30, 1926, pursuant to section 1612a of the Political Code, it prepared its annual budget for the year 1926-1927 and among other things included therein an item of $25,000 designed to absorb this contract and secure unencumbered title to this school site.

During this period the political winds began to blow fiercely, bringing a recall election against three of the principal members of said board. On July 14, 1926, the election was held and the said three members were decisively recalled. The vacancies caused by their recall were filled on or about July 16, 1926, by the three first-named individual defendants in this action. Said board, as newly constituted, and within the period allowed by said section of the Political Code, acting with the co-operation of the county superintendent of schools, recalled the budget of its predecessors filed on June 30th and caused an amended budget to be filed on July 31, 1926, which last-mentioned budget specifically eliminated the $25,000 item above referred to and failed to include any substitute item whatsoever for the purchase of school sites.

As a result of this situation not only were there no funds available to carry out said contract for the fiscal year 1925-1926, but, likewise, the same condition existed for the year 1926-1927. Following the said action of the new board, plaintiff and the citizens represented by it immediately became concerned as to the validity and enforceability of their said contract and in 1927 this action was instituted.

[1] The discussion in the briefs covers a wide range. Although the equities are strongly with the plaintiff and those who advanced moneys on the faith of the action of the board, we can see no legal ground upon which the court would be authorized to give them relief. The contract over and over acknowledges and the facts show without dispute in accord with the findings of the court that no funds were available during either of said fiscal years for the making of this purchase.

If the agreement be deemed a binding obligation to purchase, whether it was to be completed in the year 1925-1926 or in the year 1926-1927, the absence of available funds for the purpose renders it unenforceable because it is forbidden by the express terms of the constitutional provision. Article 11, § 18; Mahoney v. San Francisco, 201 Cal. 248, 257 P. 49; City and County of San Francisco v. Boyle, 195 Cal. 426, 233 P. 965; Arthur v. City of Petaluma, 175 Cal. 216, 165 P. 698. There is no feature of the contract which removes it from the operation of said provision. For a discussion of such cases, see Cal. Pac., etc., Co. v. Boyle, 209 Cal. 398, 287 P. 968; Mahoney v. San Francisco, supra; and Chester v. Carmichael, 187 Cal. 287, 294, 201 P. 925.

[2] If the agreement be construed as an effort to bind the board of education to a particular line of official action toward a predetermined result, it is obviously void as being against public policy.

Freedom of action when transacting public business presupposes that such officers may counsel with each other to reach a proper conclusion without being hampered or fettered by any previous contract which one or all may have entered into. McGinn v. Willey, 6 Cal. App. 111, 112, 91 P. 423.

[3, 4] The latter observation disposes of the claim that a relation of trust arose between the parties by reason of said contract, and likewise disposes of the contention that by failing to act in accord with such contract a personal liability arose in favor of plaintiff and against such individual officers.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Action by Jo Dell Kershaw, a minor, by Della Kershaw, her guardian ad litem, against Lloyd E. Tilbury and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

ALLEN, Justice pro tem.

This is an action for damages brought by Jo Dell Kershaw, by her guardian ad litem, against the defendants Lloyd E. Tilbury and Helen L. Tilbury, as physicians, for alleged malpractice. The salient facts of the case are about as follows:

On July 7, 1927, the plaintiff being about nine years of age, suffered pain in her left leg just above her ankle. The mother, who is her guardian ad litem herein, called a physician, who advised her that pus was forming on the bone similar to a bone felon. He advised her to make arrangements to take her to a hospital and have an X-ray made and an operation performed and that the child was suffering from an infection known as osteomyelitis. The child had, for her age, become proficient in toe dancing. The mother, fearing an operation would leave an ugly scar on the child's leg and that an operation might result in permanently disabling her daughter from future dancing, sought the services of a drugless physician. Disclosing these facts to a neighbor, she was told by her friend that Dr. Lloyd E. Tilbury was treating his wife with some success. The neighbor, at the request of the child's mother, got in touch with the defendant Lloyd E. Tilbury by phone and asked him whether he could cure a case of infection of the bone of a girl about nine years of age. This neighbor was advised by the doctor to have the child write her name on a piece of paper and bring the specimen of her handwriting to him and that he would advise him if he could cure the plaintiff.

Dr. Tilbury had for some time prior thereto been diagnosing and treating diseases by a method known as radio treatment. His diagnosis was made by what is called a diagnostic machine, which is briefly described as follows: The mechanism is contained in a box approximately 16 inches long, 12 inches wide, and from 4 to 5 inches deep; the top of the box being covered with bakelite. Two dials on the right were for measuring the wave length of the disease. Two dials on the left were for measuring the intensity of the disease. These dials measured from 1-10 and from 10-1000. One dial is set near the center and is used to measure greater intensity from 100-10,000. Another dial near the center is used for turning on the different kingdoms, such as animal, vegetable, mineral, electrical, and ether waves, measuring from 1-5. Appellant briefly sets out and describes the contents of the box which, so far as the decision of this case is concerned, need not be gone into.

With this machine Dr. Tilbury diagnoses diseases in the following manner: From the terminal on the left front of the machine extends a wire attached to an electrode which is placed over the solar plexus of the patient. The patient's emanation passes through this terminal through the aerial to the kingdom wire and from there to the plate condenser, from whence it passes to the coil condenser on the right of the machine where the wave length of the disease is ascertained. These emanations from the patient passing through the condenser are amplified 3,000 times. From the terminal in the front left of the machine extends a wire which is attached to an electrode which is placed over the solar plexus of a healthy individual. Thus emanations from the patient passing through the machine amplified 3,000 times are received by this healthy individual. By tuning in on the wave length there is a vibration set up through the sympathetic nervous system of a healthy individual to such a degree that a tenseness will appear over a definite area of the solar plexus of a healthy individual or reagent. In order to ascertain the degree of intensity of the disease, Dr. Tilbury used a plain circular rubber rod about eight inches in length and about five-eighths of an inch in diameter, charged with a woolen cloth, and picked up this reaction of the tenseness by passing this rubber rod, which is a negative field, over the tensed area, causing the rod to adhere. Then by turning on the dials to the left of the machine and if necessary the one in the center front, passing the rod over this area until the rod no longer adheres or until the tenseness disappears, and by reading the amount of intensity on the dials, Dr. Tilbury knows how severe the disease is. This method was used for all diseases, keeping in mind each disease as a definite wave length.

After ascertaining the nature of the disease that the patient is suffering from, Dr. Tilbury treats said disease with a machine known as "radio method." This treating machine is briefly described as follows: It consists of a box 5 inches wide, 8 inches long, and 6 inches deep, the top of which is covered with bakelite, to which one dial and four terminal posts are affixed. One post connects with the aerial, one post connects with the ground wire and one post to an electrode which is placed on the occiput of the patient and from the other post a wire extends with multiple electrodes which go to any part of the body which is affected. Inside of the box are multiple coils and other devices which need not for the purpose of this decision be described herein. The dial on this machine registers from 1-100 and is capable of giving off 550 different wave lengths.

This machine is used in the following manner: From the terminal to the right extends a wire on which is an electrode that is placed on the occiput or back of the head. From the terminal to the left extends a wire with many terminal branches to which are attached electrodes that are placed over various parts of the diseased areas of the patient's body.

Immediately after the telephone call by the neighbor of the plaintiff to the doctor, he obtained a specimen of the handwriting of Jo Dell Kershaw and brought it to Dr. Tilbury's office. Dr. Tilbury took it and between himself and his wife, Helen L. Tilbury, codefendant herein, operated certain dials on what Dr. Tilbury described as his diagnostic machine by placing a metal plate on the paper containing the handwriting of the plaintiff, which plate was connected up with the diagnostic machine. Thereupon the defendant Helen L. Tilbury exposed her bare abdomen while the defendant Lloyd E. Tilbury stroked it with his rubber rod and worked the dials on the radio. While the doctor was thus stroking her bare abdomen, Mrs. Tilbury exclaimed that she felt a pain in the left leg and hip. Dr. Tilbury then stated to the friend that he had found one condition that required immediate attention and requested him to bring the child in for treatment; that in his opinion an operation was not necessary. About 5 o'clock Mrs. Kershaw took the plaintiff in her arms, as she was unable to walk and in intense pain, and brought her to the office of the defendants, where she was placed upon a settee in the office. There the defendants diagnosed plaintiff's trouble by placing one of the electrodes on the back of plaintiff's neck and a similar electrode on her stomach and on the part of the leg which was affected, all of said electrodes or plates being connected to the little radio box. As Dr. Tilbury turned the dials on the radio box, Mrs. Tilbury bared her stomach and

Dr. Tilbury rubbed a rubber rod directly over her bare abdomen. As Dr. Tilbury was rubbing the rod over the stomach, Mrs. Tilbury was heard to say: "Yes, that is the pain in the leg. It is a very bad pain."

After this examination Dr. Tilbury stated that plaintiff was very, very ill, but that he could cure her without an operation and that plaintiff would only have to be there a few days; that the child was suffering from meningitis and that instead of settling in her back the germs had settled in her left leg and that in the course of three or four days, or inside of a week, the child would be able to be up and around and would be well and could go home.

At the time of the examination defendants stated that they were going to use said radio to find out what kind of stipes would be best to apply to the affected parts of the bone, and thereupon Mrs. Tilbury went out and obtained a small bottle of vinegar, placing it on the radio with a metal plate thereon, which plate was connected with the radio, and the doctor again rubbed the rubber rod over Mrs. Tilbury's bare abdomen and operated the dials, stating that "vinegar is fine, we will use hot vinegar stipes for the affected part, for the pain in her leg."

At that time the child was placed in the care of defendants and remained there from July 13, 1927, to August 4, 1927, during which time she received the following treatment at the hands of the defendants and their employees: She was given the radio treatment, placed in a vit-o-net or magnetic blanket for approximately 45 minutes and until the patient freely perspired. A few days after this treatment began pus began to discharge from about two inches above the ankle, after which the child was not in such severe pain. In about four or five days after receiving such treatment the defendants prepared to and did leave on their vacation, leaving the patient in the care of one Dr. Peterson, who continued the same method of treating the patient, using the nurse as the subject for rubbing the rod on her bare stomach. Upon inquiry of Dr. Peterson what the child could eat, the doctor replied that he would test out food on the radio and find out. The attending nurse brought up some plums, pears, grapes, and oranges and placed the metal plate, which was connected with the radio, on each fruit, and Dr. Peterson worked the dials on said radio and rubbed the rod on the stomach of the nurse and stated that the child could eat any of the fruits except the oranges, but that the oranges would not agree with her. Thereafter the child was fed fruits except oranges, and given some broth. The child continued to have great and intense pain which would become more severe during the nights. After she was in the hospital and before the infection came to a head and broke, the mother remained with the child at night and followed out the treatments the defendants had instructed her to follow, she being instructed to keep up the radio treatments and to apply hot salt stupes on that part of the leg where the child felt the pain. In applying the radio treatments the nurse set the dial, and the plates were placed as hereinbefore described and remained on the child from three to four hours per day. Subsequently the swelling spread from the ankle to the knee, and the left leg appeared to be about twice as large as the other. Upon being informed by Dr. Peterson that the plaintiff's leg was soon going to be well and that it was practically all right, the mother decided to take the child home and attempted to follow the instructions of Dr. Peterson by continuing to apply the hot packs to the child's leg and to give her radio treatments as described by the defendants, but on the second day after the child was taken home she was in such an alarming condition that the mother decided to call in another physician who, after an examination, had X-rays taken and then advised that in his opinion the child's leg could not be saved, suggesting taking her to a bone specialist in order to save her life; that in his opinion the child was suffering from acute osteomyelitis and that she had been suffering from that disease for at least three or four weeks. The child was thereupon taken to the hospital and operated upon by the removal of a portion of the tibia from about three inches below the knee to about two inches above the ankle, which part of the bone was about one-half inch in width and one-eighth inch thick. This operation further consisted of cleaning out as much of the infection as possible by scraping the bone, laying the skin open so that adequate drainage was provided and leaving the opening in such a condition as not to interfere with the drainage. Two other operations were necessary for the purpose of opening up collections of pus and providing for adequate drainage for localized infection at the lower end of the wound, and it was found necessary that the child have at least one and perhaps two other operations to thoroughly remove all diseased bones and to clear up all infections.

Let it be understood that the defendant Lloyd E. Tilbury had a license to practice as an osteopathic physician.

Appellants first contend that the trial court erred in overruling the general demurrer to the amended complaint. Those portions of the complaint seriously objected to by them are paragraphs 4, 5, and 7, which are as follows:

"IV. That on or about the said 11th day of July, 1927, the said defendants Lloyd E.

Tilbury and Helen Tilbury, representing themselves as licensed physicians, did represent to the plaintiffs herein that by a certain process known as a radio treatment, that they could and would cure the minor child of the plaintiff herein from an infection that had set in the bone about two or three inches above her left ankle. That at the said time, the said defendants, Lloyd E. Tilbury and Helen Tilbury did represent to the plaintiff herein and the said minor child, that by reason of said radio treatments, that they could and would within a period of about one week remove the said infection and completely cure the said JoDell Kershaw, on account of said infection.

"V. That the plaintiff herein relying and believing the said representation of the defendants to be true, did place the minor child, JoDell Kershaw, under the care of the said defendants, and that the said minor was placed under the care and custody of the said defendants on or about July 11th, 1927, at a place known and designated as 245 South Oxford Avenue, in the city of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles, state of California.

"VII. That during the time that the said minor, JoDell Kershaw, remained under the care and custody of the said defendant, Lloyd E. Tilbury and Helen Tilbury, their agents, servants and employees, that in truth and in fact these said defendants and each of them, and their agents, servants and employees were guilty of gross negligence and malpractice in that the said defendants did not follow or pursue the recognized universal system and standard method of curing the said minor from her said disease, and that they failed and neglected to use and exercise reasonable and ordinary care, diligence and skill in curing the said infection for the following reasons, to wit, that the universal recognized standard system of curing, universally recognized by medical authorities was and should have been the taking of an X-ray photograph of the said infected bone, and the subsequent scraping or removal of that portion of the bone which would have been revealed as infected and diseased. That had the said defendants followed the said course of treatment which is the universally recognized system and standard method practiced by the medical profession, that the said minor, JoDell Kershaw, could and would have fully recovered from her said injuries within about two months and could and would have the full use of her said leg that she enjoyed prior to said infection."

[1] It is of prime importance to get the gravamen of the action, which is to be determined by the allegations of the complaint. It can be conceded that the complaint is inartificially drawn, but aside from this, an examination will disclose that Della Kershaw, as the guardian ad litem of Jo Dell Kershaw, brought this action against Lloyd E. Tilbury and Helen L. Tilbury; that defendants represented themselves to be physicians and that they could and would cure the said child from an infection that had set in on the bone about two or three inches above the child's left ankle; that plaintiff, believing such representations to be true, placed said child under the care and treatment of the defendants, where she remained from July 13th to August 3d; that the defendants and their agents, servants, and employees were guilty of gross negligence and malpractice, in that they did not follow or pursue a recognized universal system and standard method of curing the minor of her disease; that they used other and different methods of treatment which caused the infection to spread to the entire front bone of the left leg; that they failed and neglected to use and exercise reasonable and ordinary care, diligence, and skill in curing said infection; that said child did not recover under such treatment, but the front bone of said left leg became infected so that on August 13, 1927, said child was operated upon; that as a direct and proximate result of their gross carelessness, recklessness, and negligence, and by reason of their failure to use ordinary care and diligence in the treatment of said minor child, she was continually confined in a hospital from August 13, 1927, to November 25, 1927, and has become and will remain an invalid, and has become a nervous wreck; that she will be a total invalid for two years and will never have the free and complete use of her left leg and will be permanently disabled for the rest of her natural life.

There are other matters charged and alleged in the complaint, but we have set out enough of the facts to pass on the demurrer. It will be noted that the complaint alleges the sickness of the daughter; that defendants are physicians; the placing of the child under their care; the treatment and negligence of the defendants; and the damages sustained.

[2] Appellants contend that because it is alleged in paragraph IV of the complaint that defendants "did represent to the plaintiffs herein that by a certain process known as 'radio treatment' they could and would cure," etc., they were limited to this treatment; that plaintiff's allegation that defendants were negligent in some manner in administering this treatment binds her to a contract and therefore no cause of action is stated. There are many allegations in the complaint which contain statements not pertinent to the issue, all of which were and are only to be treated as allegations of inducement. From the averments of the complaint it appears that the action is one sounding in tort, the gravamen of which is the alleged negligence and unskillful performance of the treatment of the child, and that whatever is alleged therein as to the engagement of the defendants as physicians to treat plaintiff, and as to representations made by defendants regarding the probable effect of said treatment, are to be considered as mere matters of inducement to the main cause of action and not as averments of the breach of a contractual relation forming the basis of the action. This is the holding in Hall v. Steele, 193 Cal. 602, 226 P. 854.

In the case of Basler v. Sacramento, etc., 166 Cal. 33, 134 P. 993, the court held that an action based upon the injury, and not upon the agreement of carriage, and allegations of the complaint setting up the contract of carriage must be construed as matters of inducement to show that the person injured was not a trespasser and that by reason of the relation of passenger and carrier a definite duty arose on the part of the latter. This case has been cited with approval many times. See Harding v. Liberty Hospital Corporation, 177 Cal. 520, 171 P. 98; Krebenios v. Lindauer, 175 Cal. 431, 433, 166 P. 17; Marty v. Somers, 35 Cal. App. 182, 169 P. 411.

Actions of this kind are not based upon the contract of employment. They sound in tort and are classed as actions ex delicto which grow out of the contract. In Wetzel v. Pius, 73 Cal. App. 104, 106, 248 P. 288, 289, a malpractice case, the court said: "Actions of this character are not based upon the contract of employment; they sound in tort, and are classed as actions ex delicto. In discussing a similar contention our Supreme Court [Denning v. State, 123 Cal. 316, 55 P. 1000] said: 'The contract of employment has nothing whatever to do with the liability except to create a duty on the part of the employer, a duty not expressed in the contract, and for the violation of which the contract of employment furnishes no rule or standard for the estimation of damages; nor is the action grounded upon the contract, but upon the duty springing from the relation created by it, viz., that of employer and employee, and under the old system of pleading was always classed as an action ex delicto.'" See Singley v. Bigelow, Executrix, etc. (Cal. App.) 291 P. 899. Authorities of other jurisdictions are in accordance with this holding. The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled.

[3, 4] The next point raised by appellants is that the attorney for respondent made certain remarks to the jury which tended to prejudice the jury as against appellants. While such remarks were not complimentary to the defendant and probably it would have been just as well if they had not been said, yet the record falls to disclose any objection on the part of the defendant or any request by the defendant to the court to instruct the jury to disregard the same. When circumstances of like character occur during a trial it then becomes the duty of the complaining party to make his objections thereto and ask the court to instruct the jury to disregard the same and a failure to so do will be treated as a waiver of any complaint by reason thereof. See Olsen v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 20, 26, 204 P. 393, and cases there cited. On the motion for a new trial appellants filed two affidavits asserting that the conduct of the jury prevented them from having a fair trial. Such misconduct consisted in one of the jurors falling asleep and continuing to sleep for several minutes during the trial. If one of the jurors fell asleep during the trial and it was noticed by appellant, it then became his duty to so notify his attorney who should call the court's attention thereto, and his failure to do so must be deemed a waiver of the objection. It does not behoove a litigant to observe an error being committed and sit idly by and not mention it to his attorney or the court. Should he do this he puts himself in the position of saying: "If I win I will say nothing; if I lose I will raise the error." This is not fair to the court and the litigant should not be permitted to take advantage thereof. Carey v. Gunnison (Iowa) 17 N. W. 881. Such error, if any, has been waived and merits no further consideration.

[5-7] The fourth objection goes to excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion and prejudice. Appellant contends that the fact that the jury awarded respondent $30,000 is in itself evidence of passion and prejudice. In raising this point the burden is on the appellant to show wherein the verdict was influenced by passion or prejudice, unless it is so flagrantly excessive that the award can be sustained on no other grounds than that it was the result of passion or prejudice on the part of the jury. Price v. Northern Electric Ry., 168 Cal. 173, 142 P. 91; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513. Bearing these cases in mind, the testimony shows that when plaintiff was ill, she was examined by a physician before being taken to the office of the appellants. This physician diagnosed the trouble as acute osteomyelitis. He described the disease as an inflammatory condition which has a seat in the marrow of the bone, due to infection, and he recommended immediate hospitalization. She was then taken to the office of appellants. Lloyd E. Tilbury testified that his diagnosis showed the patient to be suffering from staphylococcal infection, accompanied by streptococcus hemolyticus, with some tubercular germs in the marrow of the bones and the spinal cord; that the streptococcus infection was a general infection all over the body; that he knew at the moment when he examined her that she was suffering with an infection of the marrow of the bone; that she suffered intense pain for some time; that she was irrational at times; and that she became weak and emaciated. Other testimony was to the effect that it became necessary to perform three operations, the major of which was the removal of a piece of the tibia half an inch wide and one-eighth inch thick from three inches below the knee to about two inches above the ankle joint; that two subsequent operations were necessary for the purpose of drainage and that it would be necessary to perform one and perhaps two more operations to effect a cure; that the leg would always bear a scar; that she would suffer some pain on the change of weather; and that she would always be weak in her leg so that she could not pursue her dancing. Dr. Patton testified that when he examined her at the Orthopaedic Hospital on August 14th he found her in such a condition that it was a question whether her life could be saved; that she then had osteomyelitis of such a long standing that she was practically demented. He described her pain as being as "severe as anybody can have."

All these facts were before the trial judge and jury and were again presented to the court on a motion for a new trial. The trial court did not deem the judgment excessive. We see nothing in the record which would lead this court to say that the jury acted under passion and prejudice and nothing to indicate that the judgment is so grossly disproportionate to any reasonable limit of compensation, as warranted by the facts, as to shock the sense of justice and raise a presumption that the judgment was based on passion and prejudice rather than sober judgment. The trial judge was at liberty to interpose his judgment against that of the jury. This he refused to do. As to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment, we find ample testimony to justify the verdict.

[8, 9] It is next objected that the trial court erred in overruling appellants' objection to certain testimony consisting of hypothetical questions offered by plaintiff. In stating a hypothetical question the better rule is that it must conform to the testimony. Where the witness answers a question which is not founded on all of the facts of the case, the answer goes to the weight of the witness' evidence rather than to its competency and materiality. Reardon v. Richmond Land Co., 21 Cal. App. 357, 131 P. 894; McCollum v. Barr, 38 Cal. App. 411, 428, 176 P. 463; Perkins v. Sunset Telephone & Telegraph Co., 155 Cal. 712, 103 P. 190.

[10, 11] The appellants contend that the witnesses, offered as experts, were not qualified as such to answer the hypothetical questions as to the proper methods of treatment, not using these methods themselves, and knowing nothing concerning them. The appellant Lloyd E. Tilbury testified that he was an osteopathic physician and that he had perfected what he termed a diagnostic machine which he used for the purpose of diagnosing the patient's illness. After ascertaining the nature of the disease his patient was suffering from, he would treat the disease with another machine known to him as the "radio method." Such machines were only known to Dr. Tilbury and were his own invention not in general use, nor accepted by any of the schools of medical practice or drugless healing. The qualifying questions were sufficient to establish the competency of the several medical doctors offered as witnesses by the plaintiff by reason of the fact that their education and experience was such as to qualify them to testify as expert allopathic physicians and surgeons. The basis of the objection to their competency as witnesses concerning the method of treatment as administered by Dr. Tilbury goes to the treatment of respondent's ailment by appellants' radio methods, about which they testified they knew nothing, such methods not being recognized by the allopathic school of medicine.

These objections to the testimony went to the weight, rather than to the competency of the evidence. Simply because a person claims to have some new process or method of healing peculiar to himself is no reason why other persons who do not claim such process or method are not, from education and practice, competent to judge whether the treatment administered was negligently or carelessly done. If we should hold otherwise, it would open the door to all sorts of nonprofessional persons who would undertake to treat all kinds of diseases and disorders, and no evidence could be brought to establish the negligence of such treatment. The practitioner knowing that no such person could be found to testify against him with regard to such negligence, the injured person would be without remedy, and this cannot be the law. This view is also expressed in Longan v. Weltmer, 180 Mo. 322, 79 S. W. 655, 64 L. R. A. 969, 103 Am. St. Rep. 573. The value of an opinion of an expert witness depends on his intelligence, knowledge and experience and his testimony is a guidance for the jury. What weight, if any, they will give to such testimony is entirely with them.

[12, 13] Dr. Diebold, who qualified as an osteopathic physician, testified that the methods used by the defendant were unknown to the practice of osteopathy and that a physician who did use such methods did not use ordinary care and diligence. This, like the answers of the allopathic testimony, went to the weight of the evidence, rather than to its competency, and it was for the jury to decide whose testimony they would rely upon. We might go one step farther and say that the opinion of an expert that the treatment must have been improper, based on the result of recovery, is evidence on which the jury may find negligence. Sawyer v. Berthold, 116 Minn. 441, 134 N. W. 120; Reardon v. Richmond, etc., 21 Cal. App. 357, 359, 131 P. 894.

[14, 15] Much stress is laid to the fact that the form of the questions was such as to usurp the prerogative of the court and the jury as to negligence. In answering defendants' contention, it must be understood that the defendants were not treating the plaintiff by the methods of the osteopathic school of treatment, but by the "radio method," a method of Dr. Tilbury's invention, a method of an unknown quantity. When one, with his own inventions, holds himself out as a healer of diseases and accepts employment as such, he must be held to the duty of reasonable skill in the practice of his profession, and when he seeks fields of experimentation he will be held accountable for any damages proximately caused by the unskillful treatment of his patients.

[16, 17] This court passes no judgment on the theory of his profession, the source from whence it came, nor the appliances with which he works. With these we have no concern, but rather look to the results. The law holds him responsible if he does his work unskillfully, although he does the best he can. He assumes the risk of the quality and accuracy of his genius or inventions. On the same principle one who holds himself out as a medical expert and accepts employment as a healer of diseases, but who relies for diagnosis and remedies on some mechanical invention of his own, which invention is unknown to all schools of medical science, in like manner takes the risk of the quality and accuracy of such mechanical invention. If these move so imperfectly or inaccurately that he fails to treat the patients with reasonable skill, he is liable for the consequences. The law takes cognizance of the question: Did the practitioner render the services he undertook in a reasonable manner? That question as applied to the appellant Lloyd E. Tilbury, the jury, on sufficient proofs, we believe, have answered in the negative.

[18] While it is true that the physicians who testified on the part of the plaintiff did not claim or pretend to know anything about the practice of the "radio method," they were nevertheless competent, from education and experience, to testify as to whether the treatment which plaintiff underwent was proper. Simply because a person claims, or pretends to have invented a machine for diagnostic and curative purposes which is not known or recognized by any school of medical science, which machine possesses certain powers of healing peculiarly within the knowledge of the inventor, is no reason why other persons who know nothing of the workings of such machine but who have knowledge acquired from education, experience and practice, are not competent to judge whether the treatment administered is negligently or carelessly done. Otherwise as we have heretofore indicated, any nonprofessional person might undertake to treat certain disorders, and if appellants' position be correct in law, it matters not how carelessly or negligently his acts were performed, because no one could be obtained of the same pretensions to testify with respect to such treatment and the injured person would be without remedy. This contention we think untenable and has been so held by other jurisdictions.

[19, 20] It is claimed by defendant that the court erred in rendering judgment against the defendant Helen L. Tilbury, wife of defendant Lloyd E. Tilbury. The testimony discloses that she is not a physician; that she was not employed to care for the sick child and that she never prescribed or treated respondent's child. The evidence does disclose that her relations with the subject-matter were in the nature of assisting her husband in making the diagnosis and in the treatment. She acted more in the capacity of a nurse under her husband's instructions. Respondents claim that because the evidence discloses that she was a part owner in the business and hospital operated by both defendants, she is liable. There are no allegations in the complaint of any damages arising from the hospital services. The suit is one of malpractice and not based on hospitalization. The business itself could hold no license nor be permitted to practice the medical profession. We recognize the law to be that any one who holds himself out as a physician, whether one or not, is liable for his tortious acts, but in the instant case nothing of the kind was done by the appellant Helen L. Tilbury. In this case Helen L. Tilbury was nothing more than an assistant to the appellant Lloyd E. Tilbury in the practice of his profession, and we are of the opinion that she, not being made a party by reason of any allegations as to being his assistant or employee, and the case being for malpractice, the judgment should be reversed as to her. We fail to find any error in the record which would warrant a reversal of the judgment except as to Helen L. Tilbury.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed as to Lloyd E. Tilbury, and reversed as to Helen L. Tilbury.

CLAY v. MARTIN et al.

Civ. 6848.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Aug. 7, 1931.

1. Bills and notes ⇨523.

In action on note, finding that plaintiff was not owner or holder of note held supported.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1071(5).

Whether finding that plaintiff came into possession of note after maturity and without valuable consideration was supported held immaterial, where plaintiff admitted that he knew everything about note.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carl L. Stutsman, Judge.

Action by Thomas L. Clay against R. M. Martin and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

L. A. Trevor and Clay & Handy, all of Los Angeles, and Thomas L. Clay, of Los Angeles, in pro per., for appellant.

George M. Pierson and Milan E. Ryan, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

ARCHBALD, Justice pro tem.

Defendant Martin was the payee of a promissory note for $3,500 made by his codefendants, payment of which was thereafter guaranteed in writing by Martin and the same was deposited with the Peoples National Bank of Los Angeles as collateral security for a debt owing by him to the bank. Plaintiff brought suit on the note and guaranty. Defendant Martin alone was served and the action was apparently dismissed as to his codefendants. The case was tried before the court, a jury having been waived. From a judgment in favor of said defendants plaintiff has appealed.

The execution of the note and guaranty is admitted by the answer of defendant Martin, which denies, however, that plaintiff is the owner and holder of the note and sets out as separate defenses that the note was given as additional security for a loan then due said bank, which loan was paid in full, and other facts which tended to charge plaintiff with knowledge of any infirmities in the note.

It is appellant's contention that the third, eighth, and ninth findings of the court are not supported by the evidence. Such findings are as follows: "3rd. That it is not true that plaintiff was on the 10th day of June, 1928, the owner and holder of said note, or that he has been so at all times since said date, or that he was the owner or holder at the filing of this action, or at the date of the trial, or at all. * * * 8th. That plaintiff knew all of the facts and circumstances surrounding the giving and acceptance of the said note herein sued upon, and that plaintiff accepted the said note with full knowledge of the purpose for which it was given, and that said plaintiff was not an innocent purchaser for value, or in due course, or a bona fide holder at all. 9th. That said note came into the possession of plaintiff at a time long after the same became due and without any valuable consideration."

Plaintiff introduced in evidence what is denominated "General Pledge Agreement (collateral security not described)," proved to have been signed by Martin at the time he gave the bank a note representing his indebtedness to it and deposited some mining stock as collateral security therefor. A year or more thereafter the note sued on here was deposited as collateral security to a renewal note. Plaintiff testified that he could not remember the exact date he first saw such note, but that it was in his office in the possession of O. O. Moreland, apparently the cashier of the bank, who at that time asked plaintiff "to take for collection as attorney" the note of defendants to which the note sued on was collateral, and that it remained in his possession from about June 10, 1928. Apparently the assignment of the principal note was to plaintiff's secretary, F. M. MacDole, for the purpose of collection. Asked as to when such secretary's name was placed on the note in question here, plaintiff replied:

"Well, it was right at the time of the sale to Moreland. I have forgotten those dates.

"Q. That wasn't placed on there until there was an attempted sale made of this note? A. It wasn't placed on there until there was a sale made of the note.

"Q. You call it a sale, and I say an attempted sale. A. Well, I say a sale.

"Q. Then you don't know that date? A. Yes, I can get it. I have it in my file. * * *

"Q. When you say a sale, what do you mean, Mr. Clay? A. I mean that that note was advertised, together with other personal property, for sale; notice to the man who pledged it, Mr. Martin.

"Q. Where was it published, Mr. Clay; where was any notice of sale published? A. Well, I will have to look at the affidavit of the man that did it; I don't know.

"Q. You don't know? A. No, I don't know only his affidavit.

"Q. So when you say a sale was made it is a conclusion. You conclude everything was all correct.

"Mr. Trevor: Objected to as argument.

"The Court: Sustained.

"Mr. Pierson: Perhaps it is argument, but I wanted to show that this witness didn't know whether it was a sale or not, although he testified it was a sale.

"The Court: Well, he has testified to all the facts and I can determine what Mr. Clay may know about it.

"Q. Now Mr. Moreland has endorsed this as cashier of the Peoples National Bank, and he was cashier of the Peoples National Bank at that time. A. Yes, I know he was at that time.

"Q. Then later on endorsed it below the signature of F. M. MacDole? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. How did he happen to endorse it again? A. When he transferred it to me.

"Q. When he transferred it to you? A. Yes.

"Q. That was after the so called sale?

"The Court: That is when you paid the $5.00." (Mr. Clay in an offer to stipulate, which was apparently not accepted, had stated to the court that MacDole sold the note under the provisions of the collateral agreement to Moreland for $5.00.) "A. I didn't pay $5.00; I paid $500 for it.

"Q. You knew Mr. Moreland had only paid $5.00 for it? A. I did.

"Mr. Pierson: Oh, I think that is all.

"Mr. Trevor: We rest, your honor. That is our case."

The case was later reopened by plaintiff and the collateral agreement mentioned was introduced.

The defendant testified that the note to which the note sued on here was collateral was "paid, satisfied and discharged." It might be inferred from the evidence that suit was brought on the principal note, judgment rendered and satisfied, but just when all this was done is not clear from the record before us. The defendant testified, "I think it is about six months ago," but the evidence does not show closer than such guess, and "about six months" could be stretched without using any imagination to a period of time that might antedate the "sale" testified to by plaintiff, as that date was not fixed so that we can tell when it occurred, and presumably the trial court had the same trouble.

[1, 2] We have quoted liberally from the record to show that the court might well have concluded either that there was no sale by the bank, the real owner, or that any sale was after the satisfaction of the principal note; and as the note sued on came into the hands of plaintiff long after maturity, he would be charged with notice of any infirmity either in his title or in the note itself. Therefore we cannot say that the conclusion of the court in its third finding is not supported by the evidence, regardless of the statement by the trial judge as to the applicability of the pledge agreement introduced in evidence. The other findings questioned go merely to charge the plaintiff with knowledge of infirmities in the note, and plaintiff frankly stated in effect that he knew everything about it, so we do not see where he can complain, although the evidence clearly shows that it came into his possession long after maturity, and it would therefore seem to be immaterial whether or not the ninth finding is supported by the evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

"I leave to Phoebe Boatright everything I have at my death and I appoint her Executrix without bonds.

"Mary B. Ehle
"Arietta Estelle Coffin
"Ora Lee Boatright"

Contestants, who are nieces and nephews and the heirs at law of testatrix, filed a contest against the probate of said will, alleging therein as grounds for said contest: (1) Testamentary incapacity; (2) undue influence of Phoebe Boatright; (3) deceit and fraud of Phoebe Boatright.

The proponent answered, denying the alleged grounds of contest, and the issues thus formed were submitted to a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of contestants upon all of said alleged grounds. Appellant moved for a new trial and for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, which motions were denied. From the order denying the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict and from the judgment, proponent prosecutes this appeal.

The facts surrounding the execution of this will are substantially as follows: The testatrix, at the date of the execution of this will, was ninety-one years of age, and was feeble in mind and body. Dr. Hiram Ehle was her only child, and for many years had provided for her care and support. He was a practicing physician of Susanville, Cal., and was sixty-eight years of age at the date of his death, which occurred on the 28th day of October, 1928. Some eight years before his death he had placed the testatrix with appellant, who lived in Susanville, paying her for the care and support of his mother $60 per month during all of that time. Testatrix had no means of her own, and was entirely dependent upon her said son for her means of subsistence.

Dr. Ehle had a cousin named Alice Barber, who was a niece of the testatrix, who died in San Jose, Cal., on October 16, 1928, and who had left a will devising to Dr. Ehle 75 acres of orchard land of the value of about $45,000. Dr. Ehle left Susanville to attend the funeral of his said cousin, but, becoming ill while on his way, was forced to stop in San Jose, where he died on the 28th day of October, 1928. He also, some years prior to his death, had made a will in favor of his said cousin, leaving all of his property, amounting to several thousand dollars in value, to her, with a proviso that, if his death preceded that of his mother, from the funds bequeathed his mother should be kept and cared for in like manner in which she was then being cared for.

The evidence as to the testamentary capacity of the testatrix at the date of the execution of the will is conflicting. Respondents produced several witnesses who testified that the mind of the testatrix was unsound. Among them was Dr. Martin, who testified that he had known the testatrix for about eight years, and that during that time he on several occasions had been called to attend her professionally, that he last saw her about February 8, 1929. At this time she was in bed, was very feeble, practically blind, living the past, and that she was of unsound mind, totally incompetent to form any opinion as to the value of property, that she would not know the nature and extent of property if it were told to her, and that this condition of her mind had existed for more than a year before that time. Another witness produced by respondent was Dr. Coll, who testified that he went to see the testatrix about the 8th of February, 1929, for the purpose of ascertaining her state of mind. He found her in bed, that she was old, senile, and very weak mentally, with no co-ordinating mentality, lying lost in the past, with no thought of the future, that she did not have sufficient mental capacity to know the value of any property that she might possess, and that this condition had existed for a year and maybe longer.

Respondents also produced three witnesses, intimate acquaintances of the testatrix, who testified that the mind of the testatrix was unsound. On the other hand, appellant produced four or five witnesses, who were intimate acquaintances of the testatrix, who testified that the mind of the testatrix at the date of the execution of the will was sound, and among these witnesses was Dr. Collings, who attended her professionally from about October 10, 1928, until July 21, 1929, and whose testimony was to the effect that during all that time her mind was sound.

[1,2] There was received in evidence, without objection, the record of the Superior Court of Lassen county, showing that on February 8, 1929, the Superior Court of that county appointed a guardian for the person and estate of testatrix upon the ground that she was mentally incompetent to care for herself and her property. The judgment in this incompetency proceeding was evidence of the mental condition of the testatrix on the date of its rendition. Estate of Johnson, 200 Cal. 290, 252 P. 1049. And while of itself it may not establish the want of capacity sufficient for making a will, it is certainly evidence proper to be considered on the issue of testamentary capacity at the time of the appointment of a guardian. And, where there is testimony tending to show that the mental condition of the person has not changed between the date of the act in question and the appointment of a guardian, although later in time, the testimony is admissible on the issue of capacity when the act was done. Estate of Loveland, 162 Cal. 595, 123 P. 801. It is the settled law of California that an adjudication of the incompetency of a testator is evidence of his incapacity to make a valid will. Hellman Commercial T. & S. Bank v. Holden, 206 Cal. 592, 275 P. 794.

The testimony of the two doctors produced by respondents tended to show that the mental condition of the testatrix, as it existed at the date of the judgment declaring her incompetency, had not changed between that time and the date of the execution of the will, something over three months before.

Testatrix was not informed of the death of her son, Dr. Ehle, and died without knowledge of that fact. At the time she executed her will to appellant she was ignorant of the fact that she had inherited through her said son his estate, including that which had been willed to him by her said niece, aggregating $55,000. These facts, according to the evidence of appellant, were known to her at the date of the execution of the will, and yet she admits that she did not disclose them to the testatrix, knowing that the testatrix was entirely ignorant of their existence, although appellant claims that prior to the execution of the will she informed the testatrix, immediately after the said niece's death that she (the testatrix) had fallen heir, through the death of said niece, to a lot of money, but that the testatrix made no inquiry as to the amount or value of the money or property to which she had fallen heir.

[3] A testator is of sound and disposing mind and memory if, at the time of making his will, he has sufficient mental capacity to be able to understand the nature of the act he is doing, to understand and recollect the nature and situation of his property, and to remember, and understand, his relation to the persons who have claims upon his bounty and whose interests are affected by the provisions of the instrument. Estate of Sexton, 199 Cal. 759, 251 P. 778; Estate of Ivey, 94 Cal. App. 576, 271 P. 559.

Testatrix believed that her son, Dr. Ehle, was living at the date of the execution of the will, and with that belief existing in her mind she willed all of her property to appellant, who was no blood relation, although testatrix was devoted to her said son and there is no reason why she should have disinherited him.

[4] While a person has a legal right to make an unnatural will, the fact that it is so may be considered with the other evidence of mental unsoundness in determining the mental capacity of the testator (Estate of Johnson, 72 Cal. App. 663, 237 P. 816), and such a fact has weight in determining whether a testator was mentally competent at the time of executing the will (Estate of Martin, 170 Cal. 657, 151 P. 138; In re Wilson, 117 Cal. 262, 49 P. 172, 711; Estate of Gallo, 61 Cal. App. 163, 214 P. 496).

The will was executed on November 2, 1928. Appellant's version of how it came to be made was as follows: "I said 'one thing I want you to do, Mrs. Ehle, before you die, and that is to will me your education' and she said, 'that is impossible.' 'I would if I could,' but she says, 'I tell you what I might do, I might will you something to get an education because you never get too old to learn' and I said 'Will you do that for me?' and she said, 'Yes, I will.' I said, 'You will have to have that in black and white' and she said 'If I am in my right mind when I die I will write that out for you.' I said 'Are you in your right mind now?' and she said, 'I think so.' I said, 'You mean that?' and she said, 'I do. You have done more for me than anyone else. None of the rest of them take care of me.' I says, 'Well, if you mean that I am going to see an attorney,' and she says, 'All right, go on.'"

Appellant then called on R. M. Hardy, and was informed by him that he could typewrite a will, but that it would be better for testatrix to write it out herself. "He said 'you go back and let her write it out any way she wants to.' He said, 'I leave everything I have to Mrs. Boatright, something like that.' He said, 'I will come down and see if it is all right.'" On her way back she asked Mrs. Coffin to come down and be present, as Hardy had told her she had to have a witness. When appellant got back home she said to the testatrix: "I have seen a lawyer. He told me for you to write that out yourself. Can you do that?" and she said 'I think I can.' A table was sitting by the bed with papers and books and pen and ink and I said 'You write it any way you want to. If you want me to have that, I leave everything to Phoebe Boatright' and she said, 'that will be all right.' When she got down to executrix, she said something about executor without bonds, and Mrs. Coffin spoke up and says 'She is a lady executrix' and she hesitated about that. I spelled it with one 'E' and she said 'two E?' and I looked it up and it was all right. She wrote it all down, ever word. When it come to the part to sign her name she hesitated about her full name or initials—Mrs. Coffin said, 'It would be Mary B. Ehle, wasn't that your maiden name?' and she said 'Yes' and wrote it that way."

Appellant then took the will back to Hardy, and he informed her that the will was not dated and that he would call later to have it corrected. Later in the day Hardy called and had testatrix insert the date. At that time Hardy asked her if she realized that she had fallen heir to money and she said "Yes," and then he asked her if she wanted appellant to have it and she said she did.

The testatrix for a period of eight years prior to executing the will had lived in the home of appellant, had been cared for in a manner that had gained the friendship and confidence of this aged woman. During the latter part of that period the testatrix had become almost blind, had become partly bed-ridden; the twilight of extreme old age was gradually enveloping her, rendering her weak in body and mind. There was evidence to the effect that what mind remained to her was centered in the past, with no thought of the future, and that she had become wholly dependent upon appellant.

In the Estate of Graves, 202 Cal. 258, 259 P. 935, 936, Mr. Chief Justice Waste used the following language, which can appropriately be applied to the facts of this case: "Three well-established facts, among others, which are recognized as being indicative of undue influence, or a subversion of a decedent's volition, stand out clearly in the record: The relations between appellant and the decedent afforded to appellant an opportunity to control the testamentary act; the decedent's condition was such as to permit of a subversion of her freedom of will; the appellant was active in procuring the instrument to be executed. In addition, appellant unduly profited as beneficiary under the will. While none of these circumstances, standing alone, has the effect of creating a presumption against the validity of the instrument, their probative force, in combination, is to impose upon the proponent the obligation of presenting evidence of volition, and to make the question as to undue influence one of fact for the jury. * * * Appellant correctly contends that mere proof of opportunity to influence the mind of the testatrix, even though shown to be coupled with interest, or a motive to do so, does not sustain a finding of undue influence, in the absence of testimony showing that there was pressure operating directly on her testamentary act. * * * But in this case it clearly appears that the appellant took an active part in securing the execution of the will at a time when there existed a confidential relation between himself and Mrs. Graves. The rule is well settled that: "Where one who unduly profits by the will as a beneficiary thereunder sustains a confidential relation to the testator, and has actively participated in procuring the execution of the will, the burden is on him to show that the will was not induced by coercion or fraud" (citing authorities), and that "a presumption of undue influence arises from proof of the existence of a confidential relation between the testator and such a beneficiary, coupled with activity on the part of the latter in the preparation of the will." (Estate of Higgins, 156 Cal. 261, 104 P. 6). Estate of Relph, 192 Cal. 451, 465, 221 P. 361, 367."

[5, 6] Appellant contends that the court erred in admitting the testimony of respondents' witnesses, who gave their opinions regarding the mental sanity of the testatrix, because these witnesses had not qualified themselves as intimate acquaintances. The determination of the question whether or not a witness has shown himself to be an "intimate acquaintance" is committed in the first place to the sound discretion of the trial court. It is only upon a clear showing of abuse of such discretion that the ruling thereon will be disturbed on appeal. Estate of Relph, 192 Cal. 451, 221 P. 361; Huyck v. Rennie, 151 Cal. 411, 90 P. 929. From an examination of the record we think the trial court was well within its rights in admitting the testimony of these witnesses, and that there was no abuse of discretion in so doing.

Other alleged errors are claimed to have been committed by the trial court which we do not deem it necessary to consider.

[7, 8] We are of the opinion that there was substantial evidence to support the verdict of the jury, and, such being the case, it will not be disturbed on appeal. Estate of Snowball, 157 Cal. 301, 107 P. 598; In re Estate of Russell, 189 Cal. 759, 210 P. 249.

The order denying the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict and the judgment are affirmed.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. GRACE S. S. CO.
Civ. 6626.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 21, 1931.

1. Municipal corporations ☞857.

Evidence sustained finding that employment of municipal pilot to shift ship to another berth in Los Angeles port was compulsory.

Evidence was that "the rules and regulations governing the port of Los Angeles" contained a provision which by its terms in effect required that the ship, "on entering or leaving, or moving from point to point within, the port of Los Angeles, must be piloted by a municipal pilot."

2. Municipal corporations ☞849.

Shipowner held not liable for compulsory municipal pilot's negligence in shifting ship to another berth, resulting in damage to wharves.

3. Appeal and error ☞1010(1).

Whether pilot, officers, and crew were negligent in shifting ship, was fact question, upon which trial court's findings, sustained by substantial evidence, were conclusive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. T. Price, Judge.

Action by the City of Los Angeles against the Grace Steamship Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Erwin P. Werner, City Atty., Frederick Von Schrader, and Clyde M. Leach, Asst. City

Attys., and Joseph T. Watson, Deputy City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

O'Melveny, Tuller & Myers, Albert Parker, H. R. Snyder, and Warren S. Pallette, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J.

It appears that the defendant is the owner of a tank steamship which at the time in question was berthed in the port of Los Angeles, which harbor was under the direct control of the harbor department of the plaintiff, and that the action of the defendant in shifting the position of said ship from the berth then occupied by it to another berth, which at that time was vacant and open to occupancy, resulted in damage to one of the wharves owned by the plaintiff. In an action subsequently brought by the plaintiff against the defendant for such damage, judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant, from which the plaintiff appeals to this court.

Appellant attacks the findings of fact made by the trial court to the effect that in compliance with compulsory requirements of the rules governing the port of Los Angeles, the pilot, who was supplied by the plaintiff at the request of the defendant, was in the employ of the plaintiff, but was in charge of the ship of the defendant continuously during the time that the change in the respective positions of the ship was being accomplished; and that the damage to the wharf of the plaintiff "was caused by the negligence of said compulsory pilot in directing the navigation of said tank steamship * * * and not * * * in any manner by the negligence or defection from duty of any of the officers or crew of the said tank steamship. * * *

[1] As to that part of the specifications of error of plaintiff which relates to the compulsion of the defendant to employ a pilot furnished by the plaintiff, the record herein satisfactorily sustains the conclusions expressed in said findings, in that the "rules and regulations governing the port of Los Angeles" which were admitted in evidence contain a provision which by its terms in effect required that the ship of the defendant on "entering or leaving, or moving from point to point within, the port of Los Angeles, must be piloted by a municipal pilot."

[2] The contention of appellant, to wit, that because the master of the vessel ordinarily is the supreme authority thereon and has power to displace or discharge anyone engaged in assisting in the operation thereof, the negligence, if any, of the compulsory pilot in the instant matter is chargeable to the owner of the vessel, cannot be sustained. Homer Ramsdell Transp. Co. v. La Compagnie Generale Transatlantique, 182 U. S. 406, 21 S. Ct. 831, 45 L. Ed. 1155. See, also, Dampskibssels- skabet Atalanta A/S v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 31 F.(2d) 961; The West Nohno (D. C.) 29 F.(2d) 950; The Hathor (D. C.) 167 F. 194.

[3] As to whether the pilot was guilty of negligence in directing the movement of the ship was a question of fact to be determined by the trial court. Its finding thereon, if sustained by substantial evidence, is conclusive. Likewise as to the negligence of the officers and the crew of the ship at the time in question. No useful purpose would be subserved by a narration herein of the evidence upon which the trial court was warranted in reaching its several conclusions regarding the facts in the case. It is sufficient to state that the evidence was substantial in its nature and thereby met the legal requirements.

No other question presented by appellant requires discussion by this court.

The judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 7897.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 20, 1931.

1. Wills ⌘105.

That testatrix used corporate legatee's common, rather than true or official, name could not defeat intention expressed in will, where legatee's identity was established (Civ. Code, §§ 604a, 1340).

2. Religious societies ⌘16.

Religious corporations held expressly authorized by statute to receive bequests and devises (Civ. Code, §§ 604a, 1275).

3. Religious societies ⌘16.

Respecting religious corporations' capacity to receive bequests and devises, presumption, in absence of contrary evidence, is that binding legal requirements at time of incorporation were fully complied with (Civ. Code, §§ 593, 594, 604a, 1275; Const. art. 12, § 1).

4. Religious societies ⌘2.

Constitutional provision authorizing alteration or repeal of laws concerning corporations justifies statute providing that religious corporations may receive bequests and devises (Civ. Code, § 604a; Const. art. 12, § 1).

That foreign religious corporation at time testatrix died had not filed in California copy of articles of incorporation did not prevent it from accepting legacy (Civ. Code, § 604a).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry R. Archbald, Judge.

Proceeding wherein, by virtue of an order or judgment, a portion of the estate of Marie C. Brehm, deceased, was distributed to the Presbytery of Los Angeles, a religious corporation, and to each of certain other religious corporations as legatees either specifically mentioned or sufficiently described in the deceased's will. Affirmed.

Earle Stuart Rhode and E. S. Green, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. Vernon Green, of Pasadena, and Walter M. Campbell, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J.

This is an appeal from an order or judgment by which a portion of the estate of the decedent was distributed to each of certain corporations either specifically mentioned or sufficiently described as a legatee by the provisions of the last will of the deceased.

That part of the will which is questioned by appellant was as follows:

"After funeral expenses are paid whatsoever property remains, is to go to the following Boards of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A.

"One fourth to the Woman's Board of National Missions.

"One fourth to the Board of World Missions.

"One fourth to the Mission work for Mexicans in Los Angeles Presbytery."

It is contended by appellant that the findings of fact made by the trial court are not justified by the evidence. Without here setting forth in full the findings to which objection is made, it may suffice to state generally that, in substance, they were that each of the corporations either mentioned or described in the will was a religious corporation duly organized and existing; and that where, in the will, either of such corporations was misnamed, its identity as the corporation intended by the testatrix to take the legacy by her bequeathed to it was satisfactorily established by the evidence.

From the evidence adduced at the hearing, it appeared that the will was holographic in character; that the testatrix was an officer as well as a member of the Presbyterian church; that for several years she had served such church as a lecturer; from which it may be deduced that she was much interested along lines of Christian endeavor, indicated by the several legacies which are the subject of attack by appellant. It was also shown that a part of the work of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., consisted in each of such mentioned activities; in other words, that each of them was a corporation subsidiary to the parent organization, known as the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America, and that, although each of such legatees had an official name as provided in its charter, nevertheless it also had another name by which, if not actually so designated, at least it was frequently so described and recognized.

[1] The mere fact that in drafting her will and in designating the several beneficiaries thereunder the testatrix used the name by which the corporation legatee was ordinarily and commonly described, rather than the true or official name of such legatee, cannot defeat the wishes of the testatrix in that regard. Where, by competent evidence, the identity of the legatee is made to appear, the authorities are numerous in the declaration of the law that the intention of the testatrix as expressed in her will must prevail. Section 1340, Civ. Code; In re Gibson, 75 Cal. 329, 17 P. 438; Estate of Dol, 182 Cal. 159, 187 P. 428; Estate of Moeller, 199 Cal. 705, 251 P. 311; and, see, Gilmer v. Stone, 120 U. S. 586, 7 S. Ct. 689, 30 L. Ed. 734. It therefore follows that the fact that "the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America," "the Woman's Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America," "the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America," and the "Los Angeles Presbytery," which conducts "a Mission for Mexicans," were and each of them was misnamed by the testatrix in her attempted designation of each of them as a legatee under the provisions of her will, cannot of itself have the effect of defeating the ascertained wish and direction in the will of the testatrix in that regard. An examination of the record herein discloses the situation that the evidence produced by the respondent was ample to justify the findings of fact to which appellant has here objected.

[2] Appellant further contends that "the decision of the trial court is against the law," in that it is in violation of the provisions of section 1275 of the Civil Code. The basis of the objection thus presented by appellant is that by the terms of the statute to which reference has been had neither of the corporation beneficiaries under the will was qualified to accept a devise or bequest. However, on reading the statute it will be noted that, although by its general provisions it is possible that the position assumed by appellant might have some merit, in effect the inhibitory language of the statute is modified by the exception that corporations of the particular class or classes therein legislated against are "capable by law of taking the property so disposed of," if "expressly authorized by statute" so to do. Turning then to section 604a of the Civil Code, it will be found that a corporation of the kind represented by each of the legatees herein interested is "expressly authorized by statute" to "receive bequests and devises for its own use, or upon trusts, to the same extent as a natural person."

[3, 4] The further suggestion by appellant that, in order that either of the corporations herein interested may be legally qualified to accept a devise or a bequest under a will, it must first file its certificate of incorporation and of the election of its directors, attested by the signatures of its presiding officer and acting secretary, evidently has application to corporations of the kinds or classes referred to in section 604a, "organized or formed" after the enactment of said statute, and not to those organizations of the same character which were authorized to incorporate and which actually did incorporate under the provisions of the law (and especially those of sections 593 and 594 of the Civil Code), which were in effect prior to the enactment of section 604a. At least, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary (which is the instant situation), the presumption is that as to each of the corporations whose capacity to take property under the provisions of a will here is questioned, all binding legal requirements in force at the time of its creation were fully complied with; and by the express terms of section 604a its benefits accrued to "every such corporation heretofore organized or formed, or hereafter organized pursuant to the provisions of this section * * *"; which class of legislation is authorized by the provisions of section 1, article 12 of the Constitution, which, in substance, is that all laws of the state which concern corporations may at any time be altered or repealed by legislative act.

[5] Appellant predicates further alleged error on the fact that as to one of the corporations here in question (it being a foreign corporation), because of the presently asserted fact (and not because of any evidence thereof adduced on the hearing) that both at the time the will was made and at the time of the decease of the testatrix said corporation had not filed in this state a copy of its articles of incorporation, it was thereby prevented from accepting the legacy bequeathed to it. However, since the basic point is ruled adversely to such contention in each of the cases of Estate of Rawitzer, 175 Cal. 585, 166 P.

581, and Estate of Wellings, 197 Cal. 189, 240 P. 21, it is clear that appellant's contention in that regard cannot be upheld by this court.

For the reason that the finding of fact by the trial court that each of the corporations herein interested was "a religious corporation," which finding was fairly sustained by competent evidence to that effect, and because included within the purpose of each of said corporations, as set forth in its articles of incorporation, is a statement of similar import, it follows that the objection next presented by appellant, to the effect that, neither of such corporations being "a religious corporation," neither of them is legally qualified to take under the will, cannot be sustained. Moreover, the provisions of section 604a, Civil Code, apply to "any church," etc., or "any community or other council, or other organization of any such religious society."

The judgment is affirmed.

Action by F. J. Ring against the Los Angeles Railway Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Thomas P. White, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

GRIFFIN, Justice pro tem.

This action was brought by respondent to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by reason of a collision between an automobile driven by himself and a street car alleged to have been negligently operated by the appellant on Grand avenue at its intersection with Twelfth street in the city of Los Angeles. The answer of appellant denied the negligence charged and specifically alleged contributory negligence on the part of respondent. Upon the issues thus framed the cause was tried before a jury and resulted in a verdict in favor of respondent in the sum of $6,000.

Appellant contends that the jury was not warranted in concluding that it was negligent, and that there is no evidence in the case which would warrant a conclusion that respondent was not himself guilty of contributory negligence.

A map received in evidence and made a part of the record on appeal fixes the width of Grand avenue at fifty-six feet and that it runs in a general northerly and southerly direction. Twelfth street is shown to be forty feet wide and intersecting Grand avenue at right angles. The record further establishes the fact that this intersection is in a business district as defined by a city ordinance of the city of Los Angeles, No. 50,515 (N. S.), regulating traffic of street cars in said city, and also as defined by section 28½ of the California Vehicle Act (as added by St. 1929, p. 510, § 7). It is referred to in the evidence as a "blind intersection."

Just prior to the accident respondent was driving a Ford roadster in a westerly direction on Twelfth street approaching Grand avenue. The street car of appellant was being driven northerly on Grand avenue. As the street car approached the point of the accident traveling at a fairly good rate of speed, respondent, driving the Ford with two companions seated with him, was about to cross the intersection. The evidence as to the speed of the street car and the automobile, and the relative distances of each as they approached the intersection, is so much in conflict that it is necessary to review some of it here.

Respondent testified that on the afternoon of July 22, 1926, at about 6 o'clock, he and two friends were returning to work and were traveling from fifteen to twenty miles an hour as they approached Grand avenue; that they came almost to a complete stop at the gully at the east side of the intersection where he shifted to low gear and proceeded into the intersection at possibly five to eight miles per hour; that as he approached Grand avenue he looked to the right and to the left and noticed the street car about in the middle of the block to his left; that he proceeded in low gear as far as the car track when the north-bound car collided with him; that his brakes were in good condition; that he estimated the speed of the street car as it approached him to be about twenty-five miles an hour or more; that the second time he saw the street car was when he was about seven and one-half feet east of the track, starting to cross; that the street car was then about fifty or more feet from him; that it did not slacken its speed until after it had struck his automobile. On cross-examination he testified that: "At this particular time, on this day, I don't know the different distances that I could stop my car in going at different rates of speed. I made no effort to stop, as it was not for me to try to stop. I say, it was not up to me to try to stop." He further testified that as he reached the gully, and before he started to cross the track he extended his left arm, indicating a left-hand turn. This evidence was corroborated by the driver of another car approaching closely behind him, except that this witness testified that in his opinion the street car was traveling about eighteen or twenty miles an hour.

The testimony of this last witness, however, was apparently impeached by a statement which he made at the time of the accident to one of the investigators of appellant, wherein he said that the Ford was traveling at a speed of from eighteen to twenty miles an hour and that it didn't slow down for Grand avenue but pulled onto the street car tracks directly in front of the north-bound car, and that the street car was traveling about fifteen miles an hour. He could not explain why the driver of the automobile pulled directly in front of the street car, but stated he believed he was equally to blame. When presented with this previously signed statement he accounted for this apparent difference by stating that he had signed the statement without reading it, and that had he known what was in it he would not have signed it.

Another witness, riding with respondent, testified that he saw the street car down the track about one hundred or one hundred and twenty-five feet, going twenty-five miles an hour when the Ford entered the gully on Grand avenue. When he next saw it, it was but ten or fifteen feet south of the Ford. He estimated its speed at that time to be twenty miles per hour, possibly faster.

The other witness, riding with respondent, stated that he was reading a newspaper as they approached the car track; that he looked up and saw the car coming; "It did not bother me and I returned to reading the paper. * * * I went back to reading the newspaper with confidence that the driver of the automobile would be able to cross the intersection in safety."

Ordinance No. 50,515 (N. S.) was received in evidence. This ordinance makes it a misdemeanor for the operator of any street car to drive the car faster than fifteen miles per hour in a business district.

A traffic officer testified that the street car did not come to a stop for a distance of one hundred twenty feet from the center of the intersection.

Appellant's witness Hickox testified that the street car and automobile were traveling about the same speed, to wit, eighteen or twenty miles an hour, and that the street car brakes were applied just before the collision; that it moved about thirty feet from the point of impact, which point was ten feet north of the button in the center of the intersection.

The motorman testified the street car was going twelve miles an hour when it entered the intersection at Twelfth street; that he first saw the Ford when it was forty-five feet from the intersection; that it was traveling from fifteen to eighteen miles an hour; that he rang his bell and applied his emergency brake at a point when the automobile was five feet from the east rail of the car track; that at that time the street car was five feet south of that point and the driver of the Ford made no attempt to stop; that he could stop the street car traveling at fifteen miles an hour in a distance of from sixty-five to eighty feet; that he made no stop at Twelfth street and Grand avenue to take on passengers; that he didn't notice the Ford at the time it came to the gully because there was other traffic on the street and he was watching that. Two passengers on the street car corroborated the testimony of the motorman.

A service man from the Ford agency testified that he had experience in driving and stopping cars as a test to determine what space it required to stop a car going at a given speed, and that a Ford roadster such as respondent's car, on dry pavement with brakes in good condition and going at eight miles an hour should stop in approximately three feet.

[1, 2] The violation of the ordinance above referred to would be negligence per se. Whether this negligence was the proximate cause of the injuries to respondent was a question for the jury. Having so found, it is sufficient to support the verdict rendered.

[3] On the question of the contributory negligence of respondent the evidence is conflicting and much could be said in favor of appellant's contention that respondent was negligent. Can this court say, from any fact left in doubt or from any deduction or inference to be drawn from the evidence, that as a matter of law contributory negligence has been established? Johnson v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 154 Cal. 285, 97 P. 520; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513.

The determination of this question necessarily involves consideration of the evidence. When the evidence is such that the court is impelled to say that it is not in conflict on the facts and that from these facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that inference points unerringly to the negligence of respondent, then, and then only, does the law step in and forbid a recovery.

[4, 5] In the case of Commonwealth Bonding & Casualty Ins. Co. v. Pacific Electric Railway Co., 42 Cal. App. 573, 184 P. 29, the facts were similar to the facts presented in this case. We may adopt as part of this opinion the reasoning therein set forth and the law as therein applied. If the jury accepted the testimony of the witnesses for respondent, as they fairly could, it is evident that the element of miscalculation on the part of the driver of the automobile was in underestimating the speed of the approaching street car when he determined to pass in front of it. To what extent was he entitled to rely upon the presumption that the street car company's servant was observing the speed limit in justification for his mistake? Clearly not to the extent of shutting his eyes and crossing blindly in front of a moving car. Adopting the most favorable evidence, this driver did not do that. He used his eyes and exercised his judgment and thought that the rate of speed was reasonable; and in view of the distance to be traveled by the street car it would not prevent him from crossing in safety. We may anticipate that this would have been the result if the appellant's street car had been traveling within the limits prescribed by law. Upon this theory and under these circumstances we think the jury would be justified in concluding that the driver of the automobile supplemented his own judgment of the speed of the street car with the presumption that the law was being obeyed. This he had a right to do. Although, as already stated, a person may not willfully close his eyes to danger on the assumption that another will act with care and prudence in observance of the law, yet he cannot be deemed negligent when, if a reasonable use of his faculties does not warn him to the contrary, he rests upon this assumption. Harris v. Johnson, 174 Cal. 55, 161 P. 1155, L. R. A. 1917C, 477, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 560; Mann v. Scott, 180 Cal. 550, 182 P. 281; Medlin v. Spazier, 23 Cal. App. 242, 137 P. 1078; Clark v. Bennett, 123 Cal. 275, 55 P. 908; Scott v. San Bernardino Traction Co., 152 Cal. 604, 93 P. 677.

[6-8] The fact that a person voluntarily assumes a certain degree of risk is not conclusive of negligence. In these days of rapid transit and congested traffic every person who crosses a busy street or drives an automobile takes chances. The question is, are these chances greater than is reasonably necessary to meet the ordinary requirements of business or even pleasure? When the facts under consideration are such as to give rise to an honest difference of opinion between intelligent people the question is one for the jury. We think this is such a case. Commonwealth Bonding & Casualty Ins. Co. v. Pacific Electric Co., supra.

the same time, since the automobile driver can give way and the street car cannot, and while a motorman of a street car has a right to assume that the driver of an automobile will stop or turn to one side or the other so as to avoid collision, still, when the conduct of the driver of the automobile is such as would lead a reasonable man in the position of the motorman to apprehend or fear that the driver would not stop or turn to one side to avoid a collision, then it becomes the duty of the motorman to use ordinary care to avoid injuring the driver of the automobile in the latter's perilous position; and if the motorman observed the perilous position of the plaintiff Ring and failed to use ordinary care to avoid striking the automobile of the plaintiff Ring when the latter was in a perilous position, and as a result thereof the plaintiff sustained injury, then I instruct you that he is entitled to recover."

Appellant contends that the last portion of this instruction is an attempt on the part of the court to state the doctrine of the last clear chance rule and that it lacks several elements of this doctrine. If this instruction is an instruction based on this doctrine, appellant's contention finds support in the case of Palmer v. Tschudy, 191 Cal. 696-700, 218 P. 36. All of appellant's and respondent's instructions offered on the doctrine of the last clear chance rule were refused by the court.

Assuming that the above instruction does not contain all of the elements necessary to correctly set forth the doctrine of the last clear chance, we cannot perceive that the elimination of these elements constituted error, or if error, that it was prejudicial to the rights of appellant. As stated, the instruction correctly states the rule applying to a case where the motorman sees that the automobile is in a place of peril and could well have been followed by the declaration that if the motorman, in the exercise of ordinary care, should see the perilous situation of an automobile, but does not, he is nevertheless as negligent as if he does see it and fails to perform his duty in the premises. Taylor v. Pacific Electric Co., 172 Cal. 638-651, 158 P. 119.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

SPENCE, J.

Upon a trial by the court sitting without a jury, plaintiff recovered judgment in the sum of $2,509.94, with interest, for goods alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendant by plaintiff's assignor. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that the findings are not supported by the evidence. In our opinion this contention must be sustained, but we do not deem it necessary to discuss all of the various claims of insufficiency. Respondent's right to recover as the alleged assignee of the seller of the goods was dependent upon allegation and proof of an assignment. An assignment was alleged and made an issue by the pleadings, but the record fails to disclose any evidence to support the finding that such assignment had been made. Respondent argues that "the finding as to the assignment is a technicality not involving a substantial right of appellant." We do not believe that it may be so considered, for where an action is brought by an alleged assignee, the allegation of the complaint relating to the assignment must be proved as formally as any other material allegation. Brown v. Curtis, 128 Cal. 193, 60 P. 773; Ford v. Bushard, 116 Cal. 273, 48 P. 119; Read v. Buffum, 79 Cal. 77, 21 P. 555, 12 Am. St. Rep. 131.

[3, 4] It is further contended that the findings do not support the judgment, and we believe that this contention must likewise be sustained. The complaint was in the customary form for goods alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendant by plaintiff's assignor. The evidence showed and the court found that only about one-half of the goods ordered had been delivered to defendant, but judgment was entered for the amount which the court found to be the full contract price for all the goods. The findings do not support the judgment, as it does not appear nor did the court find that title to the undelivered goods had passed to the defendant. As to the undelivered goods to which title had not passed, the seller's remedy, if any, was by way of an action to recover the damages prescribed by section 3311 of the Civil Code and not by way of an action for goods sold and delivered. 22 Cal. Jur. 1077, § 134; Gopcevic v. California Packing Corporation, 64 Cal. App. 132, 220 P. 1078.

1. Appeal and error ⇐757(3).

Upon question whether evidence sustains findings, briefs must show reviewing court, either by quotation or statement of substance, evidence supporting or showing lack of support of assailed findings (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, and § 953c et seq.; Rules for Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, rule 8).

Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, and § 953c et seq. provides that, in filing briefs in appeal thereunder, parties must print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court, and Rules for Supreme and District Courts of Appeal, rule 8, provides that, where the parts of the typewritten record relied upon on appeal are required to be printed in the briefs, it shall be sufficient to state therein the substance of the record, parenthetically referring to the line and page of the typewritten transcript for verification.

2. Appeal and error ⇨756.

Matter from record may properly be reproduced in body of brief, supplement or appendix not being necessary (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, and § 953c et seq.; Rules for Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, rule 8).

3. Appeal and error ⇨757(3).

Reviewing court will not search record to ascertain if testimony unincorporated in appellant's briefs is sufficient to support verdict (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, and § 953c et seq.; Rules for Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, rule 8).

4. Appeal and error ⇨901.

Generally, appellate court must affirm judgments, if possible, since appellant has burden to show error.

5. Appeal and error ⇨767(1).

Respondent's failure, on question whether evidence sustained findings, to incorporate in brief specific testimony, either by quotation or statement of substance, required vacating order submitting cause for decision on merits, and striking respondent's brief from files, with leave to file substitute brief (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, and § 953c et seq.; Rules for Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, rule 8).

Respondent's brief, with a few possible exceptions, presented general matter only, that is, showed no specific testimony, either by quotation or in substance, but stated conclusions of the author of the brief, such as the statement that a named person "had full charge of the undertaking establishment," supported by references to four places in the typewritten record.

WORKS, P. J.

This appeal is prosecuted under what is known as the alternative method, provided for by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure and by several other sections which follow it. Section 953c provides, in part: "In filing briefs in said appeal the parties must, however, print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court." Rule VIII of the Rules for Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal contains the following: "Where the parts of the typewritten record relied upon on appeal are required to be printed in the briefs (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c et seq.), it shall be sufficient to state therein the substance of such record, parenthetically referring to the line and page of the typewritten transcript for verification. * * *"

[1] The principal questions in the present case are whether the evidence is sufficient to support certain findings of the trial court. In such a case we have the right to expect that the briefs will show us, either by quotation or by statement of substance, the evidence which supports or shows the lack of support of the assailed findings. Instead of this desideratum, let us observe what has been presented to us.

The offenses against statute and rule of court do not appear in the opening brief of appellants. These parties have inserted an appendix to their brief, and in it we find over thirteen pages of testimony, quoted directly from the typewritten record. Various portions of this matter in the appendix are referred to in the argument which precedes it. Here appears, then, a satisfactory observance of statute and rule.

[2] We are in deep waters, however, when we take up respondent's brief. It contains no supplement or appendix, although, of course, this is not necessary, as matter from the record may properly be reproduced in the main body of a brief. But respondent does not even adopt this latter method. Counsel makes in the brief at least twenty-three statements in support of each of which citations of places in the record are appended. With the possible exception of four of these statements—and these four are somewhat in doubt—they all present general matter only, that is, they show no specific testimony, either by quotation or in substance, but state conclusions of the author of the brief. We shall now set down a few of these statements, without explaining what relation they bear to a decision of the cause on the merits, as no such explanation is at present necessary. One statement: "Leslie Renaker had full charge of the undertaking establishment." In support of this conclusion four places in the typewritten record are pointed to. Another statement: "J. W. Burns did not contract that respondent's services were to be included in this compensation." This is followed by two citations from the record. Another: "Respondent was treated as an employee by C. Taylor Renaker and Leslie Renaker and they received the full value of her services." This statement is followed by six citations from the transcript. Again: "Respondent entered into an agreement under which she was to render services of a definite nature at a compensation of $100.00 per month." Four citations of the record appear here. These quotations and remarks will give some idea of the extent to which respondent has transgressed the provisions of the statute and of the rule of court.

The reply brief of appellants shows some very slight departures from the statute and rule, but they are so few and so trivial as to require but this brief notice.

This court has long been harassed by both minor and major violations of its rules of court. We have formerly been lenient as to these matters, but the evil seems to grow under this benevolent lack of regimen. We have lately, therefore, enforced the penalties incurred by a violation of the rules except in particular cases in which there has seemed to be some excuse for the dereliction, and the other courts of review of the state, apparently, have also become more severe in such cases. It seems that, in the matter of obedience to the rules of court, we should make strenuous endeavor to see to it that many of the members of the bar who are not now doing so shall resume the practice of the law, for rules of court, generally speaking, have the force of law, and a knowledge of their purport is as necessary to the practitioner at the bar as is his knowledge of the law itself, properly so called.

It is possible, although we do not decide, that because of the failure of respondent to observe the rule of court and statute above mentioned we have the power to disregard her brief, except that small portion of it which states a few rules of law, with citations of authority, and decide whether the evidence quoted in the appendix to the brief of appellants, alone, supports the assailed findings of the trial court. Bearing somewhat, but perhaps remotely, upon this question is the following portion of rule V of the Rules for Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal: "If the respondent shall not file his points and authorities within the time allowed therefor, the cause may be submitted for decision upon the appellant's brief, in which case the court may, in its discretion, decide the case upon the statement of facts contained in such brief." In legal effect, it may possibly be said that upon the question whether the findings are supported by the evidence respondent has filed no brief. If that can be said, rule V may apply.

[3] There is no doubt that such a course as that just suggested may be taken in cases in which appellants have failed to incorporate in their briefs the parts of the record upon which they rely. In such cases "an appellate court will not search the record and ascertain if the testimony is sufficient to support the verdict. * * *" Brown v. Brown, 104 Cal. App. 480, 285 P. 1086, 1090. See, also, People v. Ferugia, 95 Cal. App. 711, 273 P. 99; Palmer v. Medico Dental Bldg. Corp., 105 Cal. App. 503, 288 P. 80.

[4, 5] The case of a respondent violating, even flagrantly, the rule as to reproduction of the record in his brief may occupy a different situation, for, generally speaking, at least, it is incumbent upon an appellate court to affirm judgments, if possible, this rule being a concomitant to the one that the burden to show error is upon the appellant. We have seen no case in which such extreme action as totally disregarding a respondent's brief and deciding the case without reference to it has been taken. We shall not now decide whether that course may be taken, but we do think the order which we are about to make is proper. Certainly, some penalty must be exacted under the statute and the rule when the offense is as extreme as it is here.

The order heretofore made, submitting the cause for decision on the merits, is hereby vacated. Respondent's brief is stricken from the files, with leave, if respondent be so advised, to file a substitute brief within twenty days from the filing of this opinion, appellants to file a new reply brief within fifteen days thereafter if they be so advised. The cause will be resubmitted for decision on the merits after the new briefs have been filed, or after the time provided therefor has expired, without such filing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Action by Martin Vertson against the City of Los Angeles and others, in which the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company intervened. Verdict for plaintiff, and, from an order granting a new trial, plaintiff and intervener appeal.

Edward C. Mills and Harold J. Hunter, both of Los Angeles, for appellant United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co.

JENNINGS, J.

This action was instituted to recover damages from the city of Los Angeles and the department of water and power of said city for personal injuries.

The United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, compensation insurance carrier for Francisco and Ellington, plaintiff's employers, who were independent contractors with said city of Los Angeles, obtained permission to intervene in the action and filed a complaint in intervention seeking to recover from the city of Los Angeles and its department of water and power certain sums of money theretofore paid by said insurance carrier to plaintiff under the terms of the insurance contract made by said insurance carrier with plaintiff's employers and a larger sum which it alleged it would be compelled to pay to said plaintiff in the future because of the injuries suffered by plaintiff which it was alleged had rendered him permanently and totally disabled for the remainder of his life.

Upon the conclusion of the trial a verdict was returned in favor of plaintiff. The defendants moved for a new trial which was granted. Plaintiff and the intervener appeal from the order granting a new trial.

The following facts are alleged in the complaint, and at the trial evidence tending to support them was presented to the court. For some time prior to July 15, 1926, respondents owned and operated a system for the manufacture and distribution of electric current. As a part of this system, respondent the department of water and power of the city of Los Angeles maintained and operated an electric power line along the east side of Bernal avenue in the city of Los Angeles. This power line was constructed in the year 1923. On poles 40 feet in length set approximately 7 feet in the ground were strung two 4,600-volt primary power wires, and approximately 10 feet from the top of the poles and the same distance from the power wires were cross-arms, carrying telephone wires. Between the cross-arms carrying the power wires and those carrying the telephone wires were cross-arms at right angles to them which carried service wires to residences in the vicinity. The power line extended from a substation on Mateo street in the city of Los Angeles a distance of about 1½ miles from the place of the accident. In the substation there was an instrument termed a circuit breaker which was so constructed and arranged as to operate in such manner as to de-energize the power wires, in case they should come together or a short circuit should be caused by some outside agency coming in contact with them. This circuit breaker worked automatically.

On July 15, 1926, Francisco & Ellington, independent contractors with the respondent city of Los Angeles, were constructing a storm drain on Bernal avenue in the city of Los Angeles. In the construction of the storm drain, the contractors used a large drag-line machine for the laying of concrete pipe in the drain. The pipe was in sections, each section weighing about 4 tons. The drag-line machine had attached to it and as a part of it a steel boom or crane 40 feet in length, attached to which there was a steel cable having grab hooks at its end. In laying the sections of pipe, the machine was so operated that the boom was swung around so as to attach the hook at the end of the cable to the pipe and swing over the ditch and lower the pipe to men working in the ditch.

On July 15, 1926, Martin Vertson, appellant herein, an employee of Francisco & Ellington, was working in the storm drain, laying pipe. While he was thus engaged the power wires of respondents fell and coming in contact with him inflicted upon him painful and serious burns.

[1, 2] The trial resulted in a verdict in the sum of $15,000 in favor of appellant. A motion for a new trial was made by respondents on the following grounds: (1) Accident or surprise, (2) newly discovered evidence, (3) excessive damages, (4) insufficiency of the evidence, and (5) errors in law. The order granting a new trial was general and did not specify on what ground it was granted. It must be presumed therefore that it was not based on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence. Section 657, Code Civ. Proc. With the exception of this ground the court's order should be affirmed, if, upon examination of the entire record, it appears that a new trial should have been granted on any ground specified in the motion. Cahill v. E. B. & A. L. Stone Co., 167 Cal. 126, 129, 138 P. 712; Mercantile Trust Co. v. Sunset, etc., Co., 176 Cal. 451, 168 P. 1033; Phillips v. Powell (Cal. Sup.) 290 P. 441.

Respondents herein rely upon only three grounds, to wit: Newly discovered evidence, excessive damages, and errors in law. We may therefore properly confine our attention to them. Furthermore, it may be remarked that the voluminous record fails to disclose any irregularity in the proceedings of the court, jury, or adverse party, or any order of the court or abuse of discretion by which either party was prevented from having a fair trial, or that there was any misconduct on the part of the jury, or that respondents suffered from any accident or surprise which could not have been guarded against by the use of ordinary prudence.

[3-5] In support of their motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, respondents presented the affidavits of 13 persons. Of these, but two contain the statement that the affiant actually saw the boom of the trench machine strike the power wires. Five other affidavits contain statements that affiant in each instance saw the boom of the trench machine in proximity to the wires. This is significant, since respondents, during the trial of the action, strenuously maintained as their principal defense that the boom of the drag-line machine operated by the contractors then engaged in constructing the storm drain for the city of Los Angeles had come in contact with the power wires, causing them to short circuit and fall. Two affidavits are made by individuals who state that they are employees of respondent the department of water and power of the city of Los Angeles.

One of these affidavits states that the affiant, for two months prior to the accident which caused plaintiff's injuries and for a like period thereafter, had been kept busy repairing power wires along Bernal avenue, which had been struck and damaged by the boom of the trench machine of Francisco & Ellington. The second affidavit states that the affiant had inspected the power line on Bernal avenue three days prior to the accident, and found that it was in good safe condition; and, further, that affiant knew that the power line from the time of its construction in 1923 had been maintained in good condition and was in good condition on the date of the accident. Of the remaining four affidavits one is the affidavit of a photographer who states that on the day following the accident he took two photographs of the power line and drain and trench machine, which were attached to the affidavit. Three remaining affidavits are made by individuals employed by respondent the department of water and power of the city of Los Angeles to investigate the accident and secure the names and addresses of persons who might have witnessed it. The affidavits of these investigators have an important bearing on the question of diligence, since subdivision 4 of section 657, Code of Civil Procedure, reads as follows: "Newly discovered evidence, material for the party making the application, which he could not, with reasonable diligence, have discovered and produced at the trial."

It is therefore only such newly discovered evidence which could not with reasonable diligence have been discovered and produced at the trial that entitles the party aggrieved to a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. It is to be remembered that the accident occurred on July 15, 1926, and that the trial which resulted in a verdict for appellant was begun on August 1, 1928, and continued from day to day until it was finally concluded on August 8, 1928, when the jury returned its verdict. This was more than two years subsequent to the happening of the accident. Further, it is to be noted that the trial wherein a verdict was rendered was the second trial of the action, a prior trial during the month of June, 1928, having resulted in a disagreement of the jury. It is therefore highly significant that for a period of more than two years following the accident, during which two trials of the action were had, evidence bearing on the important feature of the boom of the trench machine coming in contact with the power wires should not have been discovered, but that within ten days subsequent to the date upon which an adverse verdict was returned it should come to light. Despite the emphatic avowals of diligent search for witnesses contained in the affidavits of the gentlemen who conducted the investigation of the accident for respondents, the bald facts indicate surprising lack of diligence. During the hearing of the motion for a new trial the trial court made the pertinent observation that the court was amazed at the number of affidavits presented and their contents and expressed its inability to understand that counsel for respondents should not have discovered the evidence contained in the affidavits prior to the trials of the action and particularly prior to the second trial.

There is no showing whatever that the testimony of the two employees of the department of water and power of the city of Los Angeles who made affidavits relative to their inspection of the power line and their declarations that it had been maintained in good condition since its construction and was in safe condition a few days prior to the accident could not have been produced at the trial.

The claim of newly discovered evidence is not looked upon with favor by the courts (People v. Byrne, 160 Cal. 217, 225, 116 P. 521; Guderitz v. Boadway Bros., 39 Cal. App. 48, 52, 177 P. 859), and strict showing of diligence is required (Pollard v. Rebman, 162 Cal. 633, 636, 124 P. 235; People v. Byrne, supra). Under the circumstances herein appearing, it is a fair conclusion that the court did not grant the motion on the ground of newly discovered evidence. If the court did grant the motion on this ground, we are of the opinion that it abused the discretion vested in it in such matters in view of respondents' failure to make proper showing of diligence.

[6, 7] It is contended that the court may have granted the motion for a new trial on the ground that the damages awarded by the jury were excessive. It appears that, during the trial, the court, over the objection of respondents, permitted appellant to exhibit to the jury deep scars upon his body caused by the burns which he suffered as a result of the electric power wires coming in contact with his person. It is said that this exhibition may well have excited the sympathy of the jury and aroused in their minds a prejudice against respondents which is reflected in the verdict. As to this point, the important question is whether, bearing in mind the injuries sustained, the verdict is so large as to indicate that it was given as a result of passion or prejudice. It is elementary that in cases of this character damages are properly awarded for the purpose of compensating the injured party for the injuries sustained. The uncontradicted evidence presented by appellant shows that he suffered third-degree burns involving a large area on the left side of the head which eventually sloughed off, that the left ear was completely burned off and the bone was exposed over the mastoid down into the neck; that he received a deep burn on the left side of the neck and another on the right shoulder involving the right upper arm with the muscles sloughed off down to the large bone in the upper arm; that there was a large burned area about 14 inches long and from 8 to 10 inches wide in the lower back which sloughed off down to the bones of the lower part of his back; that as a result of the injuries sustained by him he became totally deaf in the left ear and has a constant loud roaring noise in the left ear due to injury to the internal ear; that his vision is seriously impaired; that he has marked weakness and limited motion in his right arm. It appears that subsequent to the date of his injuries he was confined in a hospital for about ten months, during which time approximately 26 skin-graft operations were performed. The physician who cared for him was of the opinion that appellant is totally and permanently disabled, and stated that appellant is the most extensively burned case that he had ever seen recover, and that he suffered a very great deal because of the extensively burned areas on various parts of his body, rendering it necessary for him to lie on one of them during all of the time he was in the hospital. The bare recital of the unusually painful and serious injuries sustained by appellant and the results of these injuries produces certain conviction that the damages awarded by the jury were not excessive, that they could not have been awarded as a result of passion, sympathy, or prejudice, and leads irresistibly to the conclusion that the trial court could not, without seriously abusing the discretion vested in it, have granted the motion for a new trial on the ground that the damages awarded were excessive.

[8, 9] It is finally urged that the motion for a new trial may have been granted because of errors of law committed by the court during the trial of the action. The errors which it is contended were committed are the following: First, that the trial court improperly gave to the jury instructions defining the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur and relating thereto; second, that the court improperly denied a motion for a nonsuit made by respondents upon the close of appellant's case; and, third, that the court improperly denied the motion of respondents for a directed verdict at the conclusion of the trial.

With reference to the first of the three alleged errors, it is contended that the complaint sets out a cause of action for the recovery of damages for personal injuries wherein are contained allegations of specific negligence in the maintenance and operation of the power line, and it is said that, this being true, appellant was held to proof of the specific negligence charged, and that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is not applicable, and that the court erred in giving instructions relative to the doctrine.

That portion of the complaint wherein are contained allegations charging respondents with negligence is as follows: "That the defendants and each of them carelessly, negligently and unlawfully constructed and maintained said power line and the fastenings of the wires thereto to the cross-bars, and the cross-bars to the poles upon which the said power line was suspended, and that at the time of the plaintiff's injuries the defendants, and each of them, were negligently, carelessly and unlawfully maintaining and operating said described power lines so that on the 15th day of July, 1926, the wires thereof, a short distance from the cross-bars on the said described Pole 3, broke and fell on, upon and against the plaintiff who was at said time and place working in the said storm drain, and that the said wires discharged fierce, seething flames of electricity which came in contact with the body of the plaintiff causing the injuries hereinafter described."

It is to be observed that it is therein alleged that respondents carelessly and negligently constructed and maintained the power line and the fastenings of the wires thereto to crossbars and crossbars to poles upon which the power line was suspended, and that this declaration is followed by a general allegation that respondents were negligently and carelessly maintaining and operating the power line at the time of the accident so that the wires broke and fell upon the appellant, causing injuries thereafter described. In Connor v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 189 Cal. 1, 207 P. 378, 26 A. L. R. 1462, it is said that the general rule relative to the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is that, where a plaintiff in his complaint gives the explanation of the cause of the accident alleging specifically the negligent acts or omissions complained of instead of relying upon a general allegation of negligence, the doctrine does not apply. The decision in Marovich v. Central Cal. T. Co., 191 Cal. 295, 216 P. 595, is to the same effect. In the latter case it is said that, where a plaintiff in his complaint makes no general allegation of negligence or no allegation of general negligence, instructions applying the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur should not be given, since the plaintiff is held to proof of the specific negligent acts alleged. In Burke v. Dillingham, 84 Cal. App. 736, 258 P. 627, it is said that the general rule with respect to the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is subject to the limitation that, where negligence is alleged generally and specific acts of negligence are also alleged, the plaintiff is entitled to have an instruction relative to the doctrine given, even where the allegations appear in the same count. This declaration finds support in the decisions in Roberts v. Sierra Ry. Co., 14 Cal. App. 180, 111 P. 519, 527, and Bourguignon v. Peninsular Ry. Co., 40 Cal. App. 689, 181 P. 669, cited by the court as sustaining authorities. However, it would appear that appellant was entitled to the instruction defining the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur under the general rule above stated, for analysis of the language of the complaint hereinabove quoted indicates an attempt on the part of the pleader to allege negligence generally without describing specifically acts or omissions complained of as negligent. The language relied upon by respondents as containing specific allegations of negligence is as follows: "That the defendants and each of them carelessly, negligently and unlawfully constructed and maintained said power line and the fastenings of the wires thereto to the cross-bars, and the cross-bars to the poles upon which the said power line was suspended." This amounts to no more than a general allegation that respondents negligently constructed and maintained the power line and its various instrumentalities consisting of wires, fastenings of wires to crossbars and crossbars to poles. There is no attempt to plead any particular act or omission, as for instance that the crossbars carrying the power wires were insecurely attached to the poles or that the power wires were insecurely attached to the cross-arms. Since this is the case, the general rule hereinabove noted would appear to be applicable, and the trial court committed no error in giving instructions relating to the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. Diller v. Northern California Power Co., 162 Cal. 531, 123 P. 359, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 908.

[10] The contention that the trial court committed error in denying respondents' motion for a nonsuit at the close of appellant's case is closely related to the matter discussed in the preceding paragraph. Appellant in his case in chief introduced evidence which established the happening of the accident and the injuries sustained by him as a result of the accident, and, it being stipulated that respondents maintained and operated the power line, rested. Respondents thereupon moved for a nonsuit on the ground that, the complaint having specifically alleged negligence, appellant was required to offer proof tending to show the specific acts of negligence alleged. The motion was properly denied, and no error was committed thereby, for there are no specific allegations of particular acts or omissions claimed to have been negligent; hence it was sufficient for appellant to prove merely the happening of the accident and the injuries sustained by him, and it was then incumbent upon respondents to offer proof tending to show that, in spite of the presumption of negligence raised by the falling of the wires of a power line under the exclusive control of respondents, there was in fact no act committed and no failure to perform any act required that would constitute negligence on the part of respondents.

[11, 12] It is contended that the trial court committed error in denying defendants' motion for a directed verdict at the conclusion of the trial. The rule with respect to granting motions of this character is well settled in California. If no evidence is produced upon which a jury could properly find a verdict for the party upon whom rests the onus of proof, the court should direct a verdict for the opposite party. Bohn v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 5 Cal. App. 622, 91 P. 115. The determination of whether the court erred in denying a motion for a directed verdict necessarily involves a consideration of the evidence produced at the trial. After appellant had rested and the court had denied a motion for a nonsuit, respondents produced the testimony of a number of witnesses tending to show that the power line had been properly constructed and properly maintained and operated. Evidence was also presented tending to show that the boom of the trench machine operated by the contractors constructing the storm drain had come in contact with the power wires and that they thereupon fell, striking appellant. The intervener and the appellant in rebuttal produced the testimony of witnesses tending to show that the boom of the trench machine did not prior to the accident come in contact with the power wires. The evidence on this point was obviously in conflict, and there were presented questions of fact for the determination of the jury.

[13] Respondents' evidence tending to show proper construction and careful maintenance of the power line and the various instrumentalities connected with it, including the circuit breaker, was evidence whose effect would be to overcome the presumption of negligence which arose from the happening of the accident. It was for the jury to determine whether such evidence was sufficient to overcome the presumption. Brown v. Davis, 84 Cal. App. 180, 257 P. 877; Ireland v. Marsden (Cal. App.) 291 P. 912.

Under the circumstances herein appearing, it seems clear that the motion for a directed verdict in respondents' favor was properly denied.

[14] It follows, therefore, that there was not, in our opinion, any legal showing made by respondents sufficient to justify the trial court in granting the motion for a new trial. It is true that the trial court is vested with extensive discretion in the consideration and determination of motions of this character. Nevertheless, the power of the court is not unlimited, and if, upon full consideration of the record, it appears that the court erred in the application of the legal principles applicable to a cause in granting a motion for a new trial, such action will be corrected on appeal as readily as if the motion had been overruled. Estate of Baird, 198 Cal. 490, 507, 246 P. 324.

For the reasons hereinabove set forth the order of the court granting a new trial is reversed.

BARNARD, P. J.

In this case, a judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, and after a motion for a new trial had been denied, an appeal was taken which is still pending. An undertaking was filed for the purpose of staying execution pending the appeal. The sureties being excepted to, one of them failed to appear at the time and place fixed for their justification. The attorneys for the respective parties then entered into a stipulation that a new undertaking might be filed within five days thereafter, and the sureties might justify within twenty days; it being stipulated that the sureties to the new undertaking would also be excepted to. A new undertaking was not filed within five days, but on the seventh day one was filed. At the time fixed for the sureties on this second bond to justify, the attorneys for the plaintiff objected to the new undertaking as being insufficient in form, which objection was sustained by the court. On the following day the defendant filed a third undertaking which, it is conceded, is satisfactory in form, and on the same day gave notice to the plaintiff that the same was filed. Two days later counsel for plaintiff gave notice of a motion to strike the last undertaking from the files, and also of a motion for the issuance of an execution. These motions were heard on December 6, 1928, and the court struck from the files the plaintiff's motion to strike the third undertaking, but granted the motion for the issuance of an execution. The defendant has appealed from the order for the issuance of an execution and from the whole thereof.

The main point raised by appellant is that the court erred in granting the motion for the issuance of an execution, for the reason that at the time this order was made a good and sufficient undertaking for the purpose of staying an execution was on file. It is contended that whatever the effect of the first undertaking filed, that effect was waived by the stipulation of counsel that a second undertaking might be filed. It is conceded that the second undertaking was not filed within the time mentioned in the stipulation, and also conceded that it was not sufficient in form. It is then contended that under the rule laid down in Bradley Co. v. Mulcrevy, 166 Cal. 326, 136 P. 60, 62, the first undertaking was void, and therefore the third had the effect of staying an execution, since the Code fixes no time within which an undertaking to stay execution must be filed.

Section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that whenever an appeal is perfected in accordance with the provisions of certain preceding sections, including section 942, all further proceedings in the court below upon the judgment appealed from is stayed. Section 948 of this Code gives to the adverse party the right to object to the sufficiency of the sureties on the undertaking mentioned in section 942, and then provides that unless the sureties on such undertaking or other sureties justify within the time named, "execution of the judgment, order, or decree appealed from is no longer stayed." In Hill v. Finnigan, 54 Cal. 493, the court said: "But section 948 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that unless the sureties upon the stay-undertaking, or others in their stead, shall justify, 'execution of the judgment * * * is no longer stayed.' After a careful consideration of the different sections of the Code, we are convinced that they contemplate but one proceeding to stay the execution below, and that the failure of the sureties to justify, leaves the plaintiff in a position to enforce the execution of his judgment—a position the advantages of which he cannot be deprived by any further act of appellant in the Court below. Otherwise a series of pretended efforts to justify might lead to great delay in setting aside the stay, without respondent being afforded any real security for the payment of his judgment in case it should be affirmed."

⇨For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

In Lee Chuck v. Quan Wo Chong Co., 81 Cal. 222, 22 P. 594, 596, 15 Am. St. Rep. 50, the court said:

"Section 946 provides that whenever an appeal is perfected as provided in the preceding sections proceedings shall be stayed. This must be so, without reference to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the sureties. It is only necessary, under these sections, that a bond be given at the proper time and in due form.

"If the sureties are insufficient, pecuniarily, the opposite party has his remedy under section 948. He may, as provided in that section, except to the sureties at any time within 30 days after the filing of the undertaking; and, unless they, or other sureties, justify, as therein provided, within 20 days after the appellant has been served with notice of such exceptions, 'execution of the judgment, order, or decree appealed from is no longer stayed.' That is, the proceedings are stayed until the necessary exceptions are made, and time given for the sureties to justify, and no longer."

The fact that the Code contemplates but one proceeding in the court below for the purpose of staying execution was again referred to by the Supreme Court in Tompkins v. Montgomery, 116 Cal. 120, 47 P. 1006. In Bradley Co. v. Mulcrevy, supra, the Supreme Court again sets forth this rule, stating the reasons therefor; the court saying: "Where a bond sufficient in form is filed, but the sureties are in fact insufficient, the undertaking does, until the sureties, after exception, have failed to justify, operate as a stay. During the intervening time, which may extend to 50 days (Code Civ. Proc. § 948), the respondent has been prevented from enforcing his judgment, although he may not have had adequate security, or perhaps any substantial security. If, upon the failure of the sureties to justify, the appellant could file a new stay bond, the same condition might again arise, and it would be possible, by a series of successive bonds executed by insufficient sureties who would fail to qualify, to obtain all the benefits of a stay without furnishing to the respondent the security contemplated by the Code. These are the considerations which led the court in Hill v. Finnigan, supra, to the conclusion that the appellant was not authorized, except upon order of the appellate court, to file a second staybond where the sureties upon a first had failed to justify."

The court then differentiates the facts in that case from those existing in Hill v. Finnigan, pointing out the difference between a case where a bond is filed, sufficient in form, but where the sureties fail to justify, the bond actually operating as a stay for a time, and a case where the original undertaking is so deficient in form as not to comply with the statute. It is held that such a bond, so deficient in form, is entirely void and never has the effect of staying an execution at all. In such a case, it is then held that another undertaking may be filed at any time before the judgment has been enforced, since the Code fixes no time within which an undertaking to stay execution must be filed.

[1-3] We understand these cases as establishing the rule that where an undertaking is filed which is sufficient in form to operate as a stay of execution, pending the justification of the sureties thereon, but where those sureties, or other sureties, fail to justify in accordance with the provisions of section 948 of the Code of Civil Procedure, this constitutes the one proceeding to stay the execution which is contemplated by the Code, and a second undertaking may not be thereafter filed or a second proceeding had in the court below. A different situation is presented where the first undertaking is void because of its form, without reference to the justification of its sureties. In the case before us, we find no deficiency in form in the first undertaking filed, and none is pointed out to us. It is conceded that one of the signers of this undertaking failed to justify thereon. While it is suggested that the form of this bond is not sufficient because the wives of the sureties did not sign the undertaking, it neither appears that either of the signers was married, nor, if so, that he was not in a position to justify without her signature. This suggestion goes to the sufficiency of the sureties and not to the form of the bond. Nor do we think the stipulation of the parties that a new undertaking might be filed within five days after one of the sureties on the first undertaking failed to appear, is conclusive under the facts existing. It appears that such a new undertaking was not filed until after the five days had expired, and that when filed it was deficient in form, as is now conceded by appellant. Appellant is not relying upon that second undertaking, but upon a third bond filed still later. Assuming that a bond, sufficient in form, and filed in accordance with the terms of the stipulation, would have been effective to stay execution, the stipulation did not have the effect of permitting an undertaking to be filed at any time in the future, irrespective of the stipulation, or of the statutes. No sufficient bond was filed in accordance with the stipulation, and we think the question of the effectiveness of the undertaking which was later filed, upon which appellant relies, depends upon the statutes. We conclude that the first undertaking being sufficient in form and actually staying execution for a time, and the sureties thereon, after being excepted to, failing to justify in accordance with the statute and no other sureties justifying within that time, the appellant could take no further proceedings in the court below to effect a stay of execution. As has been pointed out in the cases cited, a contrary rule would enable an appellant, by a series of successive bonds executed by insufficient sureties, to stay an execution without furnishing to the respondent the security provided for in the Code.

[4] The only other point raised by appellant is that the court erred in denying her motion to strike the plaintiff's motion for the issuance of execution. In support of this point, it is urged that counsel for the plaintiff had not complied with rule 20 of the Judicial Council Rules, effective August 1, 1928, in that he had not served and filed with said motion a memorandum of his points and authorities. The record neither shows any such motion made by appellant, any ruling thereon by the trial court, nor any appeal from such a ruling. Neither, it may be observed, does it show any compliance by the appellant with the rule of the judicial council referred to. In any event, the issuance of an execution is a matter that may be done by the court without a motion, unless the same is stayed by a sufficient undertaking, in accordance with the provisions of the Code. The only real question here presented is whether, under the facts existing, the third undertaking filed had the effect of staying the execution. For the reasons given, we think this must be answered in the negative.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Assignment of newly discovered evidence as ground for new trial could not be considered, where no error was pointed out under such specifications (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 657-659).

6. Evidence ⇨383(3).

Testimony in deposition of defendant introduced in evidence by plaintiffs as testimony of adverse party held not binding on plaintiffs (Code Civ. Proc. § 2035).

7. New trial ⇨70.

In action for death of one struck by automobile on stepping off truck, granting new trial for insufficiency of evidence held not abuse of discretion.

8. New trial ⇨71.

Trial court must grant new trial whenever in its opinion evidence is insufficient to justify verdict, although there is some conflict in evidence.

9. Appeal and error ⇨979(2).

If there is any appreciable conflict in testimony, discretion of trial court in granting new trial is not reviewable.

10. Appeal and error ⇨977(3).

Action of trial court in granting new trial will not be disturbed unless it is apparent that there has been abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Joseph P. Sproul, Judge.

Separate actions by Luvada R. Lewis and another and by the City of Los Angeles against the Southern California Edison Company and another. The actions were consolidated for trial and for appeal. Judgment for plaintiffs. From an order granting defendants new trial, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Root, Bettin & Painter, Vernon Bettin, D. Howard Painter, Conant Wait, Kenneth Rhodes, Jess E. Stephens, and Frederick Von Schrader, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

GRIFFIN, Justice pro tem.

The above-entitled action, Luvada R. Lewis and Mary Lewis v. Southern California Edison Company, a corporation, and Harry Plohr, was an action brought by appellants for the wrongful death of Henry E. Lewis, husband of Luvada R. Lewis, and father of Mary Lewis. The action entitled City of Los Angeles v. Southern California Edison Company, a corporation, and Harry Plohr, was an action brought by the city of Los Angeles against respondents under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Law (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended) to recover a lien on any judgment rendered in favor of appellants Luvada R. Lewis and Mary Lewis by reason of an award granted under the Workmen's Compensation Law because of the death of deceased in the course of his employment by the city of Los Angeles. The two actions were consolidated for trial in the superior court, and a stipulation was entered into by and between the respective parties hereto that the same be consolidated on appeal.

On the 25th day of February, 1927, the deceased, Henry E. Lewis, was employed by the engineering department of the city of Los Angeles as a swamper on a certain garbage truck being operated in a northerly direction on North Doheny drive in the city of Los Angeles. In the performance of his duties he rode on the left running board of the truck and would step down from the running board with a tub in his hand into which he emptied pails of garbage which were placed along the curb. The crew on the truck on which deceased was working on the morning of the accident consisted of Clarence H. Wade, the driver, and Mora Higgins, another swamper who was operating on the right-hand side of the truck. The running boards of the truck were from twelve to eighteen inches from the ground.

North Doheny drive is a public highway in the city of Los Angeles. At the point where the accident occurred and for about two blocks in both directions it is concrete paved, has a grade of approximately 9 per cent., from curb to curb is thirty feet wide, and at the point of the accident was covered with a small amount of loose sand and gravel. On the morning in question, passenger automobiles were parked on the east and west sides of the street. The cars on the west side were headed down grade in a southerly direction with the right front wheels against the curb and the right rear wheels about two feet from the curb. The cars on the east side of the street were parked parallel to the curb with the right front and right rear wheels about the same distance from the curb. The space between these parked cars was approximately sixteen feet. The garbage truck was approximately six feet wide measured from hub cap to hub cap. The driver's seat was partially inclosed with a cab. A Ford automobile of the type driven by Mr. Plohr for the Southern California Edison Company, was approximately six feet wide. The total available clearance for the two cars to pass at the point of the accident was therefore approximately four feet.

On the morning of the accident the truck on which deceased was working was proceeding in a northerly direction on North Doheny drive. Prior to the accident, the respondent, Harry Plohr, passed the truck from the rear on the left-hand side and proceeded in a northerly direction to a point north of the scene of the accident, turned around and started down North Doheny drive in a southerly direction. In the meantime the truck was moving northerly at the rate of about four miles per hour. The deceased was standing on the left running board of the garbage truck at the time Mr. Plohr passed him going north. When the Ford, returning in a southerly direction, reached a point somewhere between eighty and ninety feet north of the scene of the accident, deceased stepped off the running board of the truck on to the center line of the street facing in a westerly direction, turned slightly to the south to reach for his tub, which was hanging from the side of the truck, and in so doing was placed in such a position that his back was toward the north. Respondent's automobile which was being driven at a speed of approximately thirty miles per hour entered the space between the truck and the cars parked on the west side of the street, struck deceased on the right leg, and hurled him about ten or twelve feet. Mr. Plohr applied his brakes immediately after the impact and slid in a southerly direction for approximately seventy-two feet, finally coming to a full stop with his right front wheel over the west curb of the street, his tires leaving a solid skid mark for that entire distance. He gave no warning of his approach, nor did he attempt to slacken his speed before negotiating the narrow passageway between the truck and the cars parked along the west side of the street. Deceased suffered a concussion of the brain, from which he died.

At the time of the accident deceased was earning about $35 per week and had an expectancy of life of approximately twenty-one years. His widow and daughter sought to recover the sum of $25,000 damages for his wrongful death. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the appellants Luvada R. Lewis and Mary Lewis for the sum of $7,500. By reason of the stipulation entered into by the respective parties, the city of Los Angeles was given a lien on said judgment in the sum of $4,836.90.

Under all the grounds set forth in section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure, except that of "accident or surprise, which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against," the respondents filed notices of intention to move for a new trial in both actions. These motions were granted by the court "on all grounds stated in the notice of intention to move for a new trial." Appellants are appealing from the order granting the new trial.

Respondents pleaded, as a defense to each of the actions, contributory negligence on the part of the deceased. Their notices of intention to move for new trial stated the following grounds: "1. Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. 2. That the verdict is against the law. 3. That the verdict is against the evidence. 4. That the verdict is against the law and the evidence. 5. Errors of law occurring at the trial and excepted to by said defendants. 6. Excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice. 7. Newly discovered evidence material for the defendants which it could not with reasonable diligence have discovered and produced at the trial. 8. Irregularity in the proceedings of the adverse parties, to-wit: the plaintiffs, by which the defendants were prevented from having a fair trial. 9. Misconduct of the jury."

[1, 2] After the hearing on the motion, the minutes of the court disclose the following order: "Motion for new trial on the part of the defendants, having heretofore been heard and submitted, it is ordered that the said motion be granted on all the grounds stated in the notice of intention to move for a new trial." (Italics ours.)

One of the contentions of appellants is that the court erred in granting the motion for new trial. They contend that the order above set out granting a new trial was a general one and did not specify that it was granted on the grounds that the evidence was insufficient to justify and sustain the verdict; therefore, under the amendment of 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 141, amending section 657 Code Civ. Proc. by adding the last clause thereto), it must be presumed on this appeal that the order was not based on that ground. It is clear from the above amendment that we are precluded from considering the question of whether or not the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict, if the order granting the new trial was a general order, unless the evidence was insufficient in law and without material conflict in any material point. Biaggi v. Ramont, 189 Cal. 675-677, 209 P. 892; Yoakam v. Hogan, 198 Cal. 16, 243 P. 21; Wilkinson v. United Railroads, 195 Cal. 185, 232 P. 131; Tasker v. Cochrane, 94 Cal. App. 361, 271 P. 503, 504. In Tasker v. Cochrane, supra, defendant's motion for new trial contained similar specifications of error separately stated. The order of the court granting a new trial was in these words: "The motion for new trial having heretofore been submitted, the court at this time grants the motion for a new trial." In that case it was held that such an order was general and failed to specify the ground. In the case before us the order specifies the grounds by reference to the notice of intention to move for new trial which does set forth the grounds in detail and which notice is made a part of the record.

We are of the opinion that such an order is not a general order, but that it can be determined therefrom on appeal, that the order granting a new trial was granted also on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict. Randall v. Duff, 79 Cal. 115-123, 19 P. 532, 21 P. 610, 3 L. R. A. 754, 756.

Appellants further contend that in granting the motion for new trial the court abused its discretion for the reason that the evidence relative to the negligence of the respondent was conclusive and was undisputed, and the verdict rendered was the only verdict which could have been rendered on the facts submitted to the jury.

[3-5] No affidavits were filed by respondent in support of its motion based on the first four grounds mentioned in section 657, Code of Civil Procedure, and, no error under these specifications having been pointed out, they will be disregarded. Sections 658, 659, Code Civ. Proc. Hence the only grounds upon which the motion could have been properly granted, which this court will consider, are (a) excessive damages, (b) error in law occurring at the trial, (c) insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, (d) that the verdict is against the law.

[6] From a reading of the reporter's transcript it appears that most of the important and material facts were undisputed. The evidence produced in the deposition of the defendant Plohr introduced in evidence by appellants under section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, did tend to contradict some of the material points as to the speed of his car and his actions. Appellants contend that, as the deposition of this defendant was received in evidence on their motion under section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, they were not bound by such evidence. The case of Schwarz v. Schwarz, 93 Cal. App. 252, 269 P. 755, 757, supports this contention. The court there said: "The conflict arose in the testimony of the defendant, who was called by the plaintiff under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As to such testimony the plaintiff was not bound, but, in any event, the conflict should be disregarded." Graham v. Ordway, 40 Cal. App. 758-764, 182 P. 73; Weir v. New York Life Ins. Co., 91 Cal. App. 222, 266 P. 996.

[7] Wade, the driver of the garbage truck, was the only witness that testified as to the speed of defendant's car. He estimated the speed to be thirty miles per hour. He further testified that deceased stepped off the running board when defendant's car was from eight to ten feet from him; later he testified it was fifteen feet. Then he visited the scene of the accident and returned to the stand and changed his testimony, stating that the distance was about ninety feet. He further testified that the left wheels of the truck were a foot east of the center of the street, and on a previous occasion testified they were but four inches east of it and stated that it was only an estimate.

The only other eyewitness to the accident was Higgins, the other workman, who was on the right or easterly side of the truck picking up garbage from the right-hand curb. He had just stepped off the truck when deceased was hit. He admitted he did not see the collision or impact.

The witness Plohr did not testify at the trial. The defense apparently believed they might rely upon his deposition, which was offered in evidence by plaintiffs, under section 2055, to establish their claim. In his deposition he stated: "Well the truck started to pull away from the curb and just when I got to where the truck was, the whole front of the truck had been pulled out from the rear of another machine that was parked in front of, and I managed to get—it was quite narrow and there was a space about two feet between the corner of the truck and the other side, and it was about six inches from my fender to their cars, and just as I passed the front of this truck, this fellow jumped off of the truck and he made about two steps and he jumped off so fast that it just happened in an instant, my left fender hit him." He testified further that he was going about twenty miles per hour and that as he approached the truck he blew his horn once or twice.

Anthony Miller, a witness for the defense, testified that Wade did not know that deceased had been struck until he (Miller) had called to him a second time to stop, that one of his men had been hit, and also that Wade told him then that he did not see the collision and did not know how it happened.

Mark M. Christianson, testifying for the defense, stated that Wade had told him that he did not see the collision and did not know the man had been struck.

Maytor Hoppenyan, who lived across the street from the point of the accident, testifying for the defense, stated that both Wade and Higgins told him at the time that they did not know how it occurred, as they did not see it. He testified that the body of deceased was lying on the west side of the street about halfway between the center of the road and the curb, which would be in the path of defendant's car, and that by reason of the gravel on the pavement the length of the skid marks was no indication of the rate of speed.

From the analysis of the evidence it will be observed that Mr. Wade was the only one who claimed to have seen the approach of respondent Plohr, and that Wade was engaged in the act of driving the truck, seated in a seat where his vision was so obstructed by the cab of the truck that it would appear unlikely that he was able to see the deceased stationed on the running board back of him. Accordingly, in the final analysis of its decision on the question of the granting of the motion for new trial, the court, after having seen and heard this witness testify and after a calm and dispassionate consideration of his evidence, which he repeatedly corrected and contradicted, and which was impeached by at least three witnesses, felt that its weight was not sufficiently convincing upon material questions to justify the verdict of the jury.

In weighing the evidence on a motion for new trial the trial court may have been justified in believing the deceased guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, even considering the surrounding circumstances and the evidence of Wade himself.

"Q. And what did he start to do after he (Lewis) got down from the truck? A. He reached for a tub, hanging on the left-hand side, just back of the cab.

"Q. How far from the truck was he when he was struck by this southbound automobile? A. Just on the ground.

"Q. Just stepped off? A. Yes, to get his tub.

"Q. Where is this tub located? A. Hanging on the same side he was on.

"Q. Was your truck moving at the time? A. Yes, moving slowly and in low gear. We drive very slowly, picking up as we go.

"Q. He stepped off the running board to take the tub when the automobile struck him? A. Say, he got off the truck like this, and here is the tub, like this, and the fellow hit him, like this, and that threw him like that.

"Q. Now, when Mr. Lewis got down from the truck onto the street, what was the position of his foot in relation to the center of the street? A. Well, I would say on the mark, on the center of the street.

"Q. And just as he stepped off, he was struck, wasn't he? A. Yes.

"Q. As a matter of fact, he stepped off within two or three feet—of the front end of the automobile, didn't he; is that right? A. When he stepped off—

"Q. Answer my question, please, if he did not step off within two or three feet of the front end of the Ford automobile, and then he was struck. A. Yes."

The foregoing testimony of Mr. Wade corroborates the testimony of Mr. Plohr on this point. The record shows that the witness Wade demonstrated to the court and jury the manner in which the deceased acted at the time and place of the accident. The court therefore was able to determine a fact that is not before this court.

[8-10] The rule is firmly established that the trial court is, not only authorized, but that it is its duty to grant a new trial whenever in its opinion the evidence upon which the former decision was made was insufficient to justify the decision. Its action in granting a new trial upon this ground is so far a matter within its discretion that, if there is any appreciable conflict in the evidence, it is not open to review in this court. Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 29 P. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124; Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 411, 35 P. 1024; Harrison v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 156, 47 P. 1019.

Upon the question as to whether deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, there was apparently some conflict in the evidence. This, however, was not sufficient to prevent the trial court from granting a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence. It is established by numerous decisions in this state that, although there may be some conflict in the testimony, it is the duty of the trial court to grant a new trial on such grounds whenever the judge is convinced that the verdict is clearly against the weight of the evidence, and his action in that regard will not be disturbed unless it is apparent that there has been an abuse of the discretion confided to him. Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 102, 78 P. 337; Bates v. Howard, 105 Cal. 173-178, 38 P. 715; Mock v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 139 Cal. 616, 73 P. 455. The record on this appeal affords no basis for any claim that there was any such abuse of discretion in this case.

We are aware of the decision in the case of State Compensation Ins. Fund v. J. W. Scamell et al., 73 Cal. App. 285, 238 P. 780, upon which respondents rely, which holds that one engaged in work upon the streets, such as a street sweeper, may assume that a driver will give a signal or warning so that an accident may be avoided, and that the workman's rights cannot be determined by the same rules applicable to pedestrians generally, and modifies the stop look and listen rule accordingly. We believe such rules do not apply if the workman, as in this case indicated, without notice, suddenly jumps from the left running board of the garbage truck in front of the approaching car.

The last ground is that the verdict is against the law. The instructions given and those refused are made a part of the record on appeal. Our attention has not been called to any error that would justify us in holding that the verdict was contrary to, or in conflict with, the instructions given the jury by the court. It is clear that the order granting a new trial on this ground cannot be sustained.

It is therefore manifest that, regardless of other reasons that may exist, the order granting a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict must be, and is, affirmed.

We concur: BARNARD, P. J.; JENNINGS, J.

Action by Louie Hynding against the Home Accident Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

BARNARD, P. J.

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and from an order striking out certain portions of the defendant's answer. Plaintiff was injured through the negligence of one S. K. Tucker in driving an automobile. Tucker was insured against such a liability by the defendant insurance company. In an action brought against Tucker this plaintiff recovered a judgment for $2,019.48, which has not been paid. It is conceded that Tucker is insolvent, and, after demand made, plaintiff brought this action for the purpose of securing payment of the judgment. The policy issued by the defendant contained a provision virtually in the language of our statute (Stats. 1919, p. 776), and reading as follows:

"D. Insolvency of Assured.—The insolvency or bankruptcy of the Assured shall not release the Company from the payment of damages for injuries sustained or loss occasioned during the life of this Policy and resulting from accidents covered by the Policy; and in case judgment shall be secured against the Assured by the injured person or his heirs or personal representatives in case death resulted from the accident, an action may be brought by such injured person, or his heirs or personal representatives, in case the accident resulted in his death, to recover on the Policy the amount of such judgment, not exceeding the amount of the Policy and subject to all its other terms, conditions and limitations; provided, however, that where two or more persons are injured in an accident covered by the Policy the Company may settle and pay any claim asserted, whether reduced to judgment or not, and such payments shall be accounted in diminution of the Company's total liability on account of such accident, and payment so made aggregating the full amount of the Policy shall extinguish all liability thereunder to said claimants and all other persons on account of such accidents."

The policy also contained the following provisions:

"E. Reporting Accidents, Claims and Suits.—Upon the occurrence of an accident covered by this Policy the Assured shall give immediate written notice thereof, with the fullest information obtainable at the time, to the Company or to its duly authorized agent. If a claim is made on account of such accident the Assured shall give like notice thereof with full particulars. If suit is brought to enforce such claim, the Assured shall immediately forward to the company every summons or other process as soon as the same shall have been served upon him. The Assured shall at all times render to the Company all cooperation and assistance (except in a pecuniary way) within his power.

"F. Co-operation of Assured.—The Assured, whenever requested by the Company, shall aid in securing information and evidence and the attendance of witnesses, and in effecting settlements and in prosecuting appeals; but the Assured shall not voluntarily assume any liability, either before or after an accident, nor shall he (without the written consent of the Company previously given) incur any expense or settle any claim except at his own cost nor interfere in any negotiations for settlement or in any legal proceeding conducted by the Company on account of any claim; except that the Assured may provide at the time of the accident (and at the cost of the Company) such immediate surgical relief as is imperative."

In its answer, as a defense to the action, the defendant alleged that Tucker had reported this accident to the company with a statement of his version of the facts, which, if true, would tend to show that he was free from blame; that he had failed, neglected, and refused to co-operate with the defendant in obtaining further information and in obtaining the attendance of witnesses at the trial of the former action, although requested so to do; that he was notified that the trial was set and requested to appear and testify, and his expenses were offered him, but he failed and refused to attend; and that at the time of trial a request for a continuance was refused. Upon motion of the plaintiff, the above defense was struck out. Thereafter the action proceeded to trial, resulting in a judgment for the plaintiff, followed by this appeal.

[1] The main point raised by the appellant is that the court erred in striking out its defense of lack of co-operation on the part of the insured. In other words, the question presented is whether, under our statute, the fact that an insured violates the provisions of such a policy, requiring him to assist the insurance company in any suit brought against him, will defeat the rights of an injured party who has secured a judgment against the insured, and who is suing the insurance carrier under the right of action given by the statute.

So far as we are aware, this question has not been directly settled in this state. The appellant argues that the co-operation clause in the policy was binding on the insured himself, and cites Bryson v. International Indemnity Company, 88 Cal. App. 100, 262 P. 790, in support of the proposition that the injured party has identically the same rights as the insured, and no more. While language was used in that case to the effect that under certain circumstances the injured person would have the rights the insured would have had if he had paid the judgment, the only thing there held was that a class of persons not covered by the policy could not recover under it. While this case supports the proposition that the terms of such a policy may limit the persons covered thereby, it does not hold that, when a third person is covered by the terms of the policy, his rights may be defeated by an act of the insured subsequent to the injury. The appellant also cites Pigg v. International Indemnity Company, 86 Cal. App. 671, 261 P. 486, in which the court held that the evidence was sufficient to show that the insured had not violated a co-operation clause in the policy similar to the one now before us. While it is argued that this inferentially supports appellant's position, since the facts in that case were a sufficient answer to the contention made, it was unnecessary for the court to go further. Appellant also relies on Metropolitan Casualty Insurance Co. of New York v. Colthurst (C. C. A.) 36 F.(2d) 559, and Royal Indemnity Company v. Morris (C. C. A.) 37 F.(2d) 90. Both of these cases rely largely upon certain New York cases which arose under a statute materially different from our own, as pointed out in Malmgren v. Southwestern A. Ins. Co., 201 Cal. 29, 255 P. 512, 513. While these cases support appellant's position, we feel they are not controlling. As we said in Bachman v. Independence Indemnity Co., (Cal. App.) 297 P. 110, 116: "We have concluded that the construction placed on this statute by the Circuit Court of Appeals does not conform to that of the courts of California." While, under the New York statute, a cause of action does not accrue to the injured person until an execution is issued upon the judgment and has been returned unsatisfied by reason of insolvency or bankruptcy, under an additional provision contained in our statute insolvency is not a necessary condition to such an action, which may be brought after a judgment has been obtained against the insured. Marple v. American Automobile Ins. Co., 82 Cal. App. 137, 255 P. 260; Pigg v. International Indemnity Co., supra.

In Malmgren v. Southwestern A. Ins. Co., supra, the court said:

"The provisions of the statutes, as above quoted, are, as a proposition of law, a part of every policy of indemnity issued by a company or corporation engaged in transacting the kind of indemnity insurance business which appellant was authorized by the law of the state to transact. It was a contractual relation created by statute which insured to the benefit of any and every person who might be negligently injured by the assured as completely as if such injured person had been specifically named in the policy. * * *

"The statute of this state, which is the final word on this issue, does not make the return of the execution unsatisfied a prerequisite to the commencement of an action upon the policy. The statute of the state of New York has such a provision, and appellant had caused to be incorporated in its policy the language of the New York statute verbatim. The substantive law of this state cannot be enlarged, circumvented, defeated, or modified by any provision which the insurer may have elected to place in its contract in derogation of or in conflict therewith. The statute is founded upon principles of public policy, and an anomalous situation would be created if the rights of third parties, for whose protection the law was adopted, could be hindered, delayed, or defeated by the private agreements of two of the parties to a tripartite contract. If appellant's contention be sound, then it could, with equal justification, require the question of the assured's bankruptcy to be adjudicated by a competent tribunal before it would be obliged to recognize his insolvency or bankruptcy, or impose other conditions precedent to the injured person's right of action in derogation of express provisions of the law's mandate. We see no merit in the contention. Schoenfeld v. New Jersey Fidelity & Plate Glass Ins. Co., 203 App. Div. 796, 197 N. Y. S. 606, relied upon as an authority in the instant case, is merely declaratory of the New York statute (Consol. Laws N. Y. c. 28, § 109), which provides that a cause of action does not accrue to the injured person until an execution issued upon the judgment against the assured has been returned unsatisfied by reason of insolvency or bankruptcy. No such language or language equivalent thereto is found in the statute of this state and neither appellant nor this court is given authority to interpolate the provision of the New York law into a California statute. The clause in the statute which provides that an 'action may be brought against the company, on the policy and subject to its terms and limitations, by such injured person,' was not intended to defeat its purpose upon the theory that an action brought 'on the policy' binds the injured person to a repudiation or waiver of the benefits of the statute expressly adopted for his protection, but it clearly has reference to those matters concerning which the insurer and assured could legally contract."

In Bachman v. Independence Indemnity Co., supra, we said:

"In the jurisdictions which do not recognize the right of an injured person to bring an action on the insurance policy to collect the amount of a judgment rendered against the insured for damages suffered at his hands, the policy is regarded and treated as a private contract of indemnity between the insurer and insured in which no other person may become interested. In the jurisdictions recognizing such a right of action the policy is regarded as a contract between the insurer and the insured for their benefit and for the benefit of an unknown third person who becomes known and identified upon being injured by the insured. The language of our statute authorizing the injured person to file suit against the insurance carrier, after recovery of a judgment against the insured, would indicate that the Legislature intended to adopt the latter rule in California. It would seem a strange and useless proceeding on the part of the Legislature to give to the injured the right to sue the insurer if a recovery in such an action could be defeated by the insurance company and the insured without the knowledge or consent of or any act on the part of the injured person. * * *

"We are of the opinion that after the happening of an accident coming within the coverage provisions of a policy of insurance, such as we are considering, neither the insurer nor the insured can, by any voluntary act, defeat the statutory right given to the injured person to bring an action on the policy after judgment recovered against the insured without some act or omission on the part of the injured which will relieve the insurer from liability. Of course, collusion or fraud between the insured and the injured to the damage of the insurer, when proven in a proper action, would furnish grounds for the release of the insurer. To adopt any other rule would permit the insurer and insured to revoke or cancel the policy or release the insurer's liability at will after the accident and thus defeat the purpose of the statute, giving the one injured a cause of action against the insurer to enforce his judgment."

As we understand the appellant's contention, it is that the provision of the statute that such an action may be brought subject to the "terms and limitations" of the policy makes the co-operation clause thereof binding on the respondent. In the Malmgren Case it was said that this wording of the statute could not be used to defeat its purpose, but that it had reference to those matters concerning which the insurer and the insured could legally contract. It was also said that the rights of third parties, for whose protection this law was adopted, could not be defeated by the private agreement of two of the parties to a triparty contract. The question now confronts us whether this agreement as to co-operation on the part of the insured was intended to bind the third party, and, if so, whether such an agreement is one that the insurer and insured may legally make. If the rights of such a third party cannot be defeated by a private agreement between the other two parties, can they be defeated by these parties thus privately agreeing that they shall be defeated, after they have arisen through the injury to the third party, by the failure of one of these parties to assist the other in the controversy which has arisen between them and the third party? If this can be done, it not only opens the door to collusion, but defeats the whole purpose of the statute by making the rights of the third party dependent upon what his adversary may do after the very injury has occurred for which the statute was designed to furnish him protection. From its very nature, this co-operation clause is one that applies to the insured but not to the injured party. It is neither possible for him to comply with it, nor to compel the insured to comply with it. It provides for an action which is adverse to him. It seems idle to say that in respect thereto he steps into the shoes of the insured. He is not claiming under an assignment of the insured's interest, but under an independent right given by the statute. While it may be said that his right does not fully accrue until judgment is obtained against the insured, in a very real sense his claim is initiated by the injury which gives rise to a potential liability on the part of the insurance carrier, and to potential rights in the injured person, which should not be defeated by the subsequent acts of another party who may happen to be also insured.

[2] It seems to be appellant's theory that such an insurance policy is a contract entirely between the insurer and the insured, but this contract is also for the benefit of a third party who does not become known until after the injury. While it is a general rule that the rights of a party for whose benefit a contract is made must be measured by the terms of the agreement between the principal parties, and while that rule may apply here up to the time of the injury, the rights of the third party which then arise are controlled also by the statute. After the injury, the third party for whose benefit the contract was also made becomes known, and he then has independent rights. We think that these rights do not depend upon the subsequent actions of the insured, who happens to be also protected by the policy. For himself, the insured may settle, waive his claim, or defeat the same by his own acts, but we think he may neither defeat the rights already accrued to the injured party by his subsequent act or failure to act, nor by any agreement that any such subsequent action shall have that effect. We conclude that this agreement for the co-operation of the insured was not binding upon the respondent, such a result being one for which the original parties could not legally contract.

[3] Only one other point is raised. The complaint contains allegations to the effect that, after judgment in the former action, a writ of execution was issued by the court and returned by the sheriff as unsatisfied; this return being filed with the clerk. The answer denied these allegations upon information and belief. These denials were struck out by the court, and this action is assigned as error. A denial of these matters which were of record, on information and belief, is not sufficient. Kruger v. California Highway Indemnity Exchange, 201 Cal. 672, 258 P. 602. In any event, these denials were properly stricken. Marple v. American Automobile Insurance Company, supra; Pigg v. International Indemnity Company, supra; Malmgren v. Southwestern Automobile Insurance Company, supra.

For the reasons given, the order and judgment appealed from are affirmed.

BARNARD, P. J.

The petitioner filed in the Superior Court a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the city council of the city of Oceanside to call a recall election. The petitioner recites that he, and other qualified electors, prepared and circulated a petition for the recall of H. D. Brodie and E. A. Walsh as trustees and members of the city council of the city named. It is alleged that the petition was signed by qualified voters of said city in excess of 25 per cent. of the entire vote cast in said city at the next preceding regular municipal election; that the petition was filed with the city clerk on June 27, 1930; that on July 9, 1930, the city clerk reported said petition to the city council as having an insufficient number of signatures thereon; that the city council on July 9, 1930, passed a motion referring the petitions back to the petitioners so that they might be amended within ten days; that on July 11, 1930, a supplemental or amended petition was filed with the city clerk; and that on July 23, 1930, the city clerk certified the original petition as having a sufficient number of signatures. It is also alleged that a demand had been made upon the city council to call an election, but that such demand had been refused. An answer was filed by the respondents, and at the hearing permission was given to amend the petition so as to allege that two separate petitions for recall had been filed, one directed against Brodie and the other against Walsh. At the conclusion of the petitioner's evidence, a motion for a nonsuit was made and granted and a judgment entered denying the application for a writ. From this order and judgment this appeal is taken.

The two petitions for recall were admitted in evidence, and, under stipulation, the original petitions have been transferred to this court for our inspection. The petitioner herein testified that he signed both petitions for recall; that each of said petitions were read to him before signing; and that the same were signed in the presence of the circulator, Katherine M. Clark. Katherine M. Clark testified that this petitioner signed the two petitions for recall in her presence, and that she read the petitions to him at the time he signed. The city clerk of Oceanside testified that the petitions were filed, that he reported to the city council that the signatures on the two petitions were insufficient, and that the city council passed a motion that these petitions be referred back to the petitioners so that they might be amended within the ten-day period provided by law.

[1] The appellant contends that the two petitions for recall are prima facie evidence of petitioner's right to have a recall ordered, and that the evidence shows a substantial compliance with the requirements of law. It is settled that, where a petition is filed which substantially conforms to the provisions of the statute, and which is properly certified by the clerk as containing the sufficient number of signatures, the city council has no discretion as to the calling of an election. Martin v. Board of Trustees, 96 Cal. App. 705, 274 P. 1015. We think, however, that in a number of respects the evidence here fails to show a compliance with the law governing such proceedings. Stats. (Ex. Sess.) 1911, p. 128.

[2, 3] The law provides that within ten days from the date of filing such a petition the clerk shall examine and compare the signatures thereon with the records of registration, and that he shall attach to the petition his certificate showing the result of his examination. It also provides that, if by the clerk's certificate the petition is shown to be insufficient, additional papers may be filed within ten days from the date of such certificate. No certificate of insufficiency appears on either of the petitions here involved. While the city council ordered the petitions returned for the purpose of being amended, and while another sheet with additional signatures was filed on July 11, 1930, we are unable to tell when the ten-day period started to run, if at all.

The law provides that all of the signatures need not be on the same paper, but it also provides that "each" paper shall have an affidavit by the circulator thereof showing, among other things, that the persons whose names appear had actually signed the same. In each of the petitions before us, as originally filed on June 27, there are fourteen sheets of paper pasted together end to end. At the top is a copy of the petition itself, followed by nine sheets of signatures. Then follows an affidavit by Katherine M. Clark to the effect that she is a qualified elector, that she circulated "the foregoing paper" and saw the signatures thereon written, and that each is the genuine signature of the person whose signature it purports to be and of a registered qualified elector of the city of Oceanside. Then follow three more sheets with a similar affidavit by one Rickard, as circulator, and then follow two more sheets with a similar affidavit by one Peters. The other petition is in similar form, except that the first circulator's affidavit seems to refer to eight pages, the second to four pages, and the third to two pages. The entire document is marked as filed in the office of the city clerk on June 27, and contains no certificate by the city clerk as to any insufficiency in the number of signers. At the end of the document is a certificate of the city clerk dated July 23, 1930, to the effect that he had examined the "foregoing petitions"; that he had compared the signatures thereon with the affidavits of registration; and that the "signatures on said petition, as amended, represent more than 25 per cent. of the total number of votes cast at the last general municipal election" in said city. With each original petition, but not attached thereto, is another sheet labeled "Supplemental Petition," containing additional names, and marked as filed in the office of the city clerk on July 11, 1930. No certificate of any kind whatever is attached to the supplemental petitions. If each of the fourteen pages in each of these petitions be considered as "each paper," there is no affidavit by a circulator on eleven of them. If the entire fourteen pages be considered as one paper, there is not "an affidavit" by the circulator, but three separate affidavits each apparently referring, not to the entire paper, but to a certain portion thereof only.

It further appears that Katherine M. Clark, who apparently circulated nine sheets of the one petition and eight sheets of the other, testified that she had a number of sheets with headings on, that is to say, with a copy of the petition at the head thereof; that none of the signers signed the petition without the heading being on that sheet; and that she then cut off the headings and pasted the sheets together. In Fox v. Board of Supervisors, 49 Cal. 563, the following language is used:

"The petition, signed by qualified electors of the county equal in number to at least one third of all the votes cast in the county at the last preceding general election,' is the first step required by the statute, for it is only 'after receiving such petition' that it becomes the duty of the Board to order the election. The petition presented to the Board must be that petition which was signed by the petitioners. Both signature and presentation are necessary. In this view the identity of the instrument presented as being that which came from the hands of the petitioners is indispensable. To say that, though the signers did not affix their names to the petition presented, they did affix them to another and similar petition not presented to the Board, is no answer; nor does it satisfy either the terms of the statute or its obvious policy, which was to shut the door against frauds which would inevitably occur if the practice of detaching signatures from one petition and attaching them to another were permitted. * * *

"If numerous petitions with similar headings be circulated for signatures, and if the headings from all the petitions except one be cut off, and all the names, without the knowledge or consent of the signers, be pasted to the one heading, and in that form presented to the Board, it is clear that the paper thus presented, was not 'signed' by those whose signatures were affixed to it by pasting. Whether they signed another paper with a similar heading, will rest entirely in parol, and can only be ascertained by oral proofs. If such proof will suffice as to a portion of the petitioners, it will be equally effective as to all. We might then have the case of a petition, never in fact signed by any one; and the omission could be supplied only by oral proof that the petitioners had signed other similar petitions. If a practice of this kind was tolerated, it would open the door to numerous frauds, and would result in substituting oral proof for that which the statute requires to be in writing."

In People v. Town of Berkeley, 102 Cal. 298, 36 P. 591, 593, 23 L. R. A. 838, the court said: "There are some conflicting authorities in other states, and counsel for appellant insist that the decision in the Fox Case should be overruled. It has, however, so far as we know, remained unquestioned in this state for nearly 20 years, and seems to be based on sound and convincing reasoning. It should therefore, in our opinion, be upheld and followed."

While the language in those cases was used concerning petitions for a somewhat different purpose than the petitions here involved, they were of a similar nature and for a generally similar purpose, and we think the legal principles governing are the same. To here hold otherwise would be to open the door to fraud and to make easily possible the use, on a petition for a recall, of lists of signatures that had been obtained for an entirely different purpose. The law governing petitions for recall is most liberal, and not only permits separate papers to be used, but as many as may be desired. However, the precautions provided for the purpose of insuring their genuineness, and that the signers thereof knew what they were signing and intended their signatures for the particular purpose in view, are simple, easily complied with, and must be held to be essential. In our opinion, a substantial compliance with the requirements of the statute is not here shown.

[4] The only other point raised by appellant is that the court erred in granting the motion for a nonsuit; it being insisted that the grounds for the motion were not stated. The motion was made as follows: "We move for a nonsuit at this time on the ground specified in our objections to the introduction of the petitions."

The record shows that shortly before the making of this motion an objection had been made to the introduction of the two petitions in evidence, consisting of seventeen objections, taking up more than three pages of the transcript, and including the errors heretofore referred to in this opinion. While it has been held that a motion for a nonsuit which fails to state the grounds thereof is not sufficient (Mattson v. Mattson, 181 Cal. 44, 183 P. 443), we are of the opinion that the grounds for this motion were sufficiently stated by reference, and that it was not necessary to again repeat what had so recently been stated. In addition, the order made and appealed from not only granted the motion for nonsuit, but went on to deny the application for a writ of mandate. The latter portion of the order was correct, in view of the petition itself and the other evidence before the court.

For the reasons stated, the order and judgment appealed from are affirmed.

Divorce ⇐ 238.

Court, in granting divorce to husband for wife's fault, may not compel husband to pay alimony to wife (Civ. Code, § 139).

Application of Emmett W. McKenna for writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the Sheriff of Los Angeles County, to secure release of petitioner on ground that court was without jurisdiction to punish him for contempt.

Petitioner discharged.

John J. Craig, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

E. A. Klein, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J.

This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus based principally upon the ground that the trial court was without jurisdiction to punish petitioner for contempt. The commitment was issued after the court had made two orders, one of which found the petitioner guilty of contempt of court for failure to pay alimony, and sentenced the petitioner to two days in the county jail, which order was afterward modified by the second order, and was made on application of petitioner, permitting him to pay $5 per month until he should have paid the sum of $60 ordered to be paid by him by an order made April 25, 1930, on which he had paid the sum of $10. Upon hearing of an order to show cause why plaintiff should not be punished for contempt, had on April 29, 1931, the court issued the commitment sentencing plaintiff to the county jail for two days.

The only judgment in this case ordering alimony is the judgment which was made by alteration of the original judgment, which alteration was made by stipulation entered into between the parties. The action was one for divorce, wherein the petitioner was granted a divorce from his wife on the ground of extreme cruelty. No order was made at that time providing for alimony and there were no children of the marriage. It was held in Lampson v. Lampson, 171 Cal. 332, 153 P. 238, and is provided in section 139 of the Civil Code, that the court has no jurisdiction to grant permanent support to a wife when the divorce is granted to the husband for the fault of the wife.

In this case the judgment was entered by consent, which provided for permanent support of the wife. The court was without jurisdiction to grant permanent support to the wife by reason of the fact that the divorce was not granted to her, but was granted to her husband for her fault, and jurisdiction cannot be conferred upon the court by consent or stipulation (Yore v. Superior Court, 108 Cal. 431, 41 P. 477), and the parties cannot make an effective waiver of such lack of jurisdiction by stipulation. Marin Municipal Water District v. North Coast Water Co., 178 Cal. 324, at page 328, 173 P. 469; In re McCarty, 154 Cal. 534, 98 P. 540.

The petitioner is ordered discharged.

CONREY, P. J. (concurring).

I concur in the judgment. It is clear, however, that the commitment under which the petitioner was placed in custody is not based upon the two orders mentioned in the opinion. The commitment is itself a copy of the order finding the defendant guilty of contempt and directing his imprisonment therefor. This commitment or order purports to find that the defendant is in contempt by reason of his failure to comply with a judgment entered on the 7th day of January, 1929, ordering that the plaintiff pay the defendant $60 per month. But said judgment contained no such order. It is conceded that the judgment of January 7th was an interlocutory decree, merely determining that the plaintiff husband was entitled to a divorce from the defendant, without making any provision for support of the wife. It appears that on February 29th, six weeks after the date of the interlocutory decree, the parties by stipulation prevailed upon the court to attempt to modify the interlocutory judgment by adding thereto an order that the plaintiff pay to the defendant the sum of $60 per month, "said payments to continue until defendant remarries." The provision in the said amendment to the decree, in accordance with the stipulation, that such payments should constitute a full and complete settlement of any and all property rights "now existing or which may hereafter exist between the parties hereto," is not sufficient to deprive said amendment of its true character, which is that of an attempt to require the payment of alimony. Considered in that aspect, the amendment was void, because there is no authority in law by which a court in granting a divorce to the husband for the fault of the wife may at the same time compel him to pay alimony to the wife. Lampson v. Lampson, 171 Cal. 332, 153 P. 238; McKannay v. McKannay, 68 Cal. App. 701, 705, 230 P. 214.

I agree that the petitioner should be discharged from custody.

JENNINGS, J.

Plaintiffs instituted the present action alleging in their complaint that they owned and held legal title to a large number of parcels of real property specifically described, and that defendants claimed some interest in said property adverse to plaintiffs' ownership, which claims of interest were alleged to be without legal right, constituting clouds upon the title of plaintiffs. Plaintiffs prayed to have their title quieted against defendants, and that it be decreed that they are the rightful owners of the land. Defendant Murray Innes answered the complaint, admitting that he claimed an interest in the real property described in plaintiffs' complaint by reason of the execution of a certain agreement between himself and plaintiffs whereby plaintiffs agreed to sell to him the land in question for a certain consideration, alleged that the agreement was in full force and effect, and that plaintiffs had failed, neglected, and refused to furnish a deed and certificate of title to the property, and prayed that the action be dismissed.

The trial of the action resulted in a judgment in favor of plaintiffs quieting the title of plaintiffs to the land described in the complaint. From the judgment so rendered, defendant prosecutes this appeal.

The sole question involved in this appeal relates to the sufficiency of the description of the real property contained in the agreement entered into between the parties on February 18, 1926. This description is as follows: "The ranch belonging to said first parties located at Sorrento, in the Soledad Valley, San Diego County, California, a portion of said ranch being located in the City Limits of the City of San Diego, said ranch containing approximately one thousand acres of land and being commonly known as the Baker Ranch."

[1, 2] It is the general rule that less strictness in the description of property is demanded in a contract than in a deed of conveyance. Wright v. Wilson (Cal. Sup.) 299 P. 521; Russell v. Ramm, 200 Cal. 348, 369, 254 P. 532; Johnson v. Schimpf, 197 Cal. 43, 48, 239 P. 401, 403. As was said in Johnson v. Schimpf, supra: "In the construction of executory contracts of sale of real estate, courts have been most liberal, and have sought, as far as consistent with established rules, to give effect to the intention of the parties in applying descriptions of property. The usual rigid construction given to deeds has not been adhered to in the character of contracts under consideration here. The description may be supplemented by extrinsic evidence showing its application to particular property to the exclusion of all other property. Parol evidence is ordinarily admissible to show what property the parties intended to convey, and it will be deemed that a contract adequately describes the property if it refers to something which is certain or provides a means of ascertaining and identifying the property which is the subject-matter of the contract. Preble v. Abrahams, 88 Cal. 245, 22 Am. St. Rep. 301, 26 P. 99; Marriner v. Dennison, 78 Cal. 202, 20 P. 386; Sparks v. Hess, 15 Cal. 186; Lange v. Waters, 156 Cal. 142, 19 Ann. Cas. 1207, 103 P. 889; Towle v. Carmelo L. & C. Co., 99 Cal. 397, 33 P. 1126; Carr v. Howell, 154 Cal. 372, 97 P. 885; Estate of Garnier, 147 Cal. 457, 82 P. 68; California Packing Corp. v. Grove, 51 Cal. App. 253, 196 P. 891."

[3] The test which is here to be applied, therefore, is whether the above-quoted language of the contract refers to something which is certain or provides a means of ascertaining and identifying the property which is the subject-matter of the contract.

It is to be observed that appellant's answer does not contain an allegation of extrinsic facts in aid of the description in the contract. The only allegation in the answer which in any manner attempts to do so reads as follows: "V. Defendant further alleges that the lands described in said contract herein referred to include with other lands, the lands described in Paragraph One of plaintiffs' complaint herein filed, and that said lands were shown and designated by the plaintiffs herein to this defendant at the time of the making of said contract and identified between the parties hereto."

It will be noted that it is therein alleged that the lands described in the contract include with other lands the real property described in respondents' complaint. So indefinite an allegation can hardly be said to furnish the proper aid contemplated in Marriner v. Dennison, 78 Cal. 202, 210, 20 P. 386. It is further alleged that, at the time the contract was entered into, the lands covered by the contract were shown and designated by respondents to appellant, and that they were at that time identified between the parties to the contract. It is apparent that the identification of the land at the time the parties entered into the agreement is the important factor here to be considered, and it was so recognized throughout the trial of the action.

With respect to this vital feature of the case, the evidence of respondents shows that, at the time the contract for the sale of the property was entered into, but one ranch line was pointed out to the appellant by respondent Grace Baker Diffendorf. Evidence was produced by appellant showing that the husband of Grace Baker Diffendorf on this same occasion pointed out to appellant boundary line of different tracts comprising the holdings of respondents and various other lines and natural features relating to the boundaries of the property, and endeavored in a general way to indicate the land. That whatever identification of the property as was there made was general and uncertain is indicated by the fact, appearing in evidence, that appellant, some time subsequent to the making of the agreement, discovered to his surprise that a tract comprising 320 acres formerly owned by him was included in what was described in the agreement as the "Baker ranch." It further appears from the evidence that respondents did not themselves know just what tracts they owned at the time of the making of the contract, and that the land described in the contract as the Baker ranch had been gradually formed by the acquisition by respondents and their father of a large number of separate tracts over a period of approximately thirty years. It further appears that not all of these various tracts are contiguous one to another; the most notable exception being the 320-acre tract heretofore referred to, which lies about half a mile from the main body of the land.

Under the state of facts disclosed by the record herein, and particularly those hereinabove mentioned, it would appear that the description of the land contained in the contract fails to meet the test laid down in Johnson v. Schimpf, supra, and that the trial court's conclusion that the contract was fatally uncertain is correct.

The judgment is affirmed.

BARNARD, P. J.

The defendant was charged with the crimes of incest and rape, in two counts of an information filed by the district attorney of Imperial county. The first count of the information charges the defendant with an act of intercourse with the prosecutrix, committed on January 15, 1931, alleging that the prosecutrix was "a female child of the age of 16 years, she * * * being then and there the daughter of the said defendant S. H. McCollum." The second count of the information is the conventional statutory rape charge, charging the offense to have been committed on January 15, 1931, and alleging the prosecutrix to have been "under the age of 18 years, and not then and there the wife of" said defendant. The defendant was tried by a jury, and only one act of intercourse, on January 15, 1931, was proved, although there was evidence of prior acts over a period of years. By the verdict of the jury the defendant was found guilty as charged in count I of the information, and found not guilty of rape as charged in count II thereof. Defendant's motion for a new trial was denied, and this appeal is from that order and from the judgment which followed.

The only point raised by appellant is that the verdicts of guilty as to the first count of the information and not guilty as to the second count are inconsistent, conflicting, and insufficient to support a conviction. It is claimed that the verdicts are inconsistent inasmuch as the elements of the two offenses are identical, in that they both depend upon one act of intercourse, and that the jury, by its verdict on the second count, found that the appellant had not committed the act of intercourse, and therefore that the essential element of the crime charged in the first count was not proved. In People v. Day, 199 Cal. 78, 248 P. 250, 252, the court said: "It may be conceded that, if the two counts stated precisely the same offense, an acquittal upon one count would operate as an acquittal upon the other count. If, however, the statute describing one offense prescribes as an essential element the statement of a fact not prescribed by the statute describing the other offense, and if in the statement of the transaction in the different counts that fact is included in the statement of the transaction based upon the statute requiring it, and omitted in the statement of the transaction based upon the statute not requiring it, the verdict of acquittal upon one of the counts is not necessarily an acquittal upon the other. In such a situation the jury may well find that the fact required as an essential element of one of the offenses is not true, and therefore be required to render a verdict of acquittal upon that count, but, since that fact is not an essential element to constitute the other offense, be justified in rendering a verdict of guilty as to that count. It is not the great similarity in most of the facts constituting separate offenses, but the presence of a fact necessary in one offense and absent in another, that determines whether offenses are separate."

[1-5] In the case before us the real question is whether the offenses charged in the two counts of the information are so identical that, in effect, the jury has found under one count that a certain act was done, and has found under another count that the same act was not done. We are not able to agree with the appellant that that situation appears. It may be generally said that an acquittal on a charge of statutory rape does not necessarily involve an acquittal upon a charge of incest, where both charges grow out of the same transaction, since certain elements of the respective crimes are different. Pen. Code, §§ 285, 261; Stewart v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 174, 32 S. W. 766, 60 Am. St. Rep. 35. While the first count of the information in this case alleged that the prosecutrix was of the age of 16 years, that allegation was surplusage and had nothing to do with the crime of incest charged in that count. Age is not an element of that crime. It is also to be noted that the first count had no allegation that the prosecutrix was not the wife of the defendant, such an allegation not being necessary in alleging the crime therein charged. Appellant urges that the allegation that the prosecutrix was the daughter of the defendant is equivalent to an allegation that she was not his wife, since such a marriage would itself be incestuous under section 59 of the Civil Code. This allegation was necessary to show the relationship existing, and it need not be distorted into one neither necessary nor intended. On the other hand, the second count contained both an allegation that the prosecutrix was not the wife of the defendant, and one that she was under the age of 18 years; both of these allegations, being necessary elements of the crime of statutory rape.

[6, 7] In People v. Andursky, 75 Cal. App. 16, 241 P. 591, the defendant was charged with the crime of rape in the first count of an information and with a violation of the Juvenile Court Law, growing out of the same incident, in a second count. He was found guilty on the first count and not guilty on the second. The verdicts were held inconsistent because the verdict of not guilty on the second count necessarily held that the act charged in the first count did not take place. It was pointed out by the court, however, that a verdict of not guilty on the first count and guilty on the second count would not necessarily have been inconsistent, as the second count included matters not included in the first. Appellant relies upon that case and argues that in finding him not guilty on the second count the jury necessarily found that the act of intercourse, being the same act of intercourse charged in the first count, did not take place. It does not certainly follow that the jury found that such an act of intercourse did not take place. To have found the defendant guilty of statutory rape as charged in the second count, it was necessary for the jury to also find that the prosecutrix was under the age of 18 years. No such a finding was necessary with respect to the first count. It may well be that the jury found that the prosecutrix was over the age of 18. Appellant points out that the prosecutrix testified that she was 16½ years of age. However, the prosecutrix was before them and the jury may not have believed her testimony. We think her testimony was not conclusive on the jury if, in their opinion, her appearance proved otherwise. Considering the verdicts alone, the most that may be said is that the jury found that all of the elements of statutory rape were not proved, and it may not be said that they found that one particular element, the act of intercourse, was not proved to have occurred. They may have found that it did occur, but under circumstances sufficient to bring it within the crime charged in the first count of the information. This view of the matter is strengthened by the fact that at the request of the defendant the court instructed the jury as follows: "With respect to these two charges, to-wit: the charges of rape and incest, you are instructed that under the law you cannot convict the defendant of both incest and rape under the evidence in this case. Should you find the defendant guilty of incest you must return a verdict of not guilty on the crime of rape, or, should you find the defendant guilty of rape, you must return a verdict of not guilty on the charge of incest."

We think the presence of this instruction does away with any inference or conjecture that the verdict certainly was based upon a finding that no act of intercourse took place on the date in question. Without approving this instruction as a correct statement of the law, we may say that under its terms the jury would have been justified in bringing in a verdict of not guilty on the second count even had they believed that all of the elements of statutory rape had been proved. In any event, with the difference in the elements of the crimes charged, as above pointed out, we conclude that the verdicts are not so inconsistent that an acquittal upon the second count operates as an acquittal on the first.

The defendant's guilt on the first count is overwhelmingly shown by the evidence, and the sufficiency of the evidence to support the conviction is not even questioned.

The order and judgment appealed from are affirmed.

BARNARD, P. J.

The defendant was charged in an information filed by the district attorney of Imperial county with a violation of section 288a of the Penal Code of the state of California. The information charges such an act as having been committed on the same day and slightly prior to the act charged in People v. McCollum (Cal. App.) 2 P.(2d) 432, an opinion in which has this day been filed. The two cases were consolidated for trial and the defendant was found guilty of the act here charged. By the judgment of the court the defendant's sentence on this charge was to run concurrently with the sentence in the other case. From this judgment the defendant has appealed.

The only point raised is that the record is devoid of evidence tending to corroborate the testimony of the prosecutrix to the effect that the act here involved was committed, and that under section 1111 of the Penal Code the evidence is not sufficient.

We are unable to find in the record any corroboration of the testimony of the prosecutrix, and for this reason the judgment appealed from is reversed.

The defendants appealed from a judgment rendered by the superior court of Los Angeles county in favor of the plaintiff for the possession of personal property.

Said judgment is based upon allegations of the complaint and findings of fact reciting merely that the plaintiff was the mortgagee and entitled to the immediate possession of the property described, and that the defendants were at all times in possession thereof; that the plaintiff had demanded possession, but that the defendants had refused to deliver the same. The appeal was taken upon the judgment roll.

Upon the record as presented it appears that the respondent claimed the right to possession of the property simply because he was the holder of a chattel mortgage lien thereon. It is not asserted that the mortgagors were chargeable with a breach of the conditions of the mortgage, nor does it appear that the obligation supporting it was due, nor that LAMBERSON, Justice pro tem.

By an order for distribution in the above-entitled cause, it was decreed that William M. McDole died intestate as to the residuary portion of his estate, and that the residue of the estate be distributed to his heirs at law. The appellants, Stubblefield Home and E. A. Reser, Francis M. Stubblefield and Cary M. Rader, trustees of the Stubblefield Home, question the correctness of the adjudication of the probate court. The facts are that William M. McDole died testate on March 25, 1925. His will was dated November 21, 1922, and provided for a bequest of $2,000 to his only sister, other nominal bequests to three brothers, and then provided as follows:

"Seventhly: I hereby will and bequeath to my brother, Henry McDole, the sum of Seventy-five Dollars per month during his natural life. The same to be paid to him on the first of each and every month out of my estate as long as he shall live.

"Eighthly: I hereby will and bequeath all the rest and remainder of my estate to the Stubblefield Home for the Aged, at Walla Walla, Washington."

By a codicil dated March 18, 1925, he bequeathed his household goods, furniture, and an automobile to his sister. The will was admitted to probate, after contest, and, in due course, the executor of the will presented his petition for distribution of the estate, to which various heirs objected upon the ground that the bequest made to the Stubblefield Home for the Aged at Walla Walla, Wash., was wholly invalid. An answer to the objections was filed by the three appellants, who describe themselves as trustees of the Stubblefield Home, a charitable institution, and by appellant Stubblefield Home. It appears that in 1902 one Joseph Stubblefield, a resident of the state of Oregon, died, leaving property both in Oregon and Washington. He left a will which had been deposited with his banker in Walla Walla, Wash., and which was admitted to probate in Walla Walla county in that state. No probate proceedings were had in Oregon. By clause 31 of his will the following provisions were made: "Thirty-first. I hereby bequeath and devise to R. M. Dorothy, E. A. Reser, of Umatilla county, state of Oregon, and C. M. Rader, of Walla Walla county, state of Washington, my executors, and the survivors or survivor of them and to their successors, hereinafter provided for as trustees, all the rest and residue of my estate, real and personal and mixed, of whatsoever kind and wheresoever situated in trust, to be devoted to, invested, and the income thereof to be expended by said trustees and their successors for the establishment, maintenance, and support of a home for the fatherless or motherless and indigent children, residents of the states of Oregon and Washington, and worthy elderly, indigent widows, residents of Oregon and Washington, and to their maintenance, and to the giving of a common-school education and to the teaching of some useful trade or occupation to the children inmates thereof. My said executors, as such trustees, and the survivors or survivor thereof, and their successors, shall have the sole and exclusive control and management of said home the amount of said income to be devoted to the maintenance, support, and education of children and the amount to be devoted to the support of widows shall wholly and entirely be within the discretion and judgment of said trustees and their successors. * * * It is my wish that said home be located at or near the city of Walla Walla, Washington, provided that within one year after the probate of my will there be donated to said trustees and to their successors the sum of ten thousand dollars, or its equivalent in value for the purpose of securing ground and the erection thereon of suitable buildings for such home. In case said sum or its equivalent in value be not so donated, then said home to be located at some other suitable place in either Washington or Oregon, to be selected by said trustees."

Under the laws of Washington, the executors, after the will had been admitted to probate, proceeded to manage and settle the estate without further intervention of the court. In 1904, the executors, as trustees, began the operation of an institution near the city of Walla Walla, the inmates of which averaged about twenty-five, and consisted of children and elderly indigent women. One of the trustees testified that parents of children sometimes contributed something to their maintenance in the home; that the title to the property used for the purposes of the home, and the funds thereof, stood in the names of the trustees, and the trustees signed checks as trustees under the last will and testament of Joseph Stubblefield, deceased. The institution itself was not incorporated and was variously known as Stubblefield Home, Stubblefield Home for Children, Stubblefield Home of Orphans and the Aged, Stubblefield Home for Old Women, Stubblefield Home for Old Folks, and Stubblefield Home for Old People. One witness described it as an institution for the care of indigent and aged women, and indigent and orphan children, and one of the trustees testified that he had heard all kinds of names applied to it. Another witness, who had a close acquaintance with the home, said that, so far as he knew, the institution had no definite name; that he did not recall ever hearing anybody refer to it as the Stubblefield Home for the Aged. The juvenile court of Walla Walla county sometimes committed dependent children to the home, and there were separate buildings provided for the children and for the elderly women who were inmates of the home.

After hearing of the petition for distribution, the probate court found that the bequest to the Stubblefield Home for the Aged is invalid and void; that the decedent intended to devise and bequeath the residue of his estate by the terms of his last will and testament as a gift to the Stubblefield Home for the Aged, but there was and is no such corporation or society in existence; that Stubblefield Home is not a person, corporation, or society having such rules, by-laws, or regulations requiring the estate referred to in the residuary clause of the will of William M. McDole, deceased, to be used exclusively for charitable purposes, but is merely the name of a home used by the trustees to carry out the private trust created under the terms of the last will and testament of Joseph L. Stubblefield, deceased; that there was no intention on the part of William M. McDole, deceased, to create any trust in favor of any beneficiary known as Stubblefield Home or Stubblefield Home for the Aged, or any trust at all, and concluded, as a matter of law, that the Stubblefield Home for the Aged is not a person, corporation, or society authorized by the laws of the state of California to take a gift by will. It was decreed that the residuary clause of the will is invalid, and that the heirs at law are entitled to the residue of the estate, subject to the other bequests made therein. For the purposes of the case it will be assumed, but not conceded, that the Stubblefield Home, as well as the persons who appear as trustees thereof, had a right to appear in the probate proceedings and to perfect an appeal from the decree of the probate court.

[1] Whether or not the lower court was correct in its conclusions as to the invalidity of the residuary clause of the will of William M. McDole is to be determined by the provisions of the laws of California. Appellants have stressed the decision of the Supreme Court of Washington in the case of Rader v. Stubblefield, 43 Wash. 336, 86 P. 560, 10 Ann. Cas. 20, as being a conclusive determination of the status of the Stubblefield Home. It appears from the decision in that case that, after the institution of probate proceedings in the state of Washington, a settlement was effected for a valuable consideration with the widow of Joseph L. Stubblefield; that thereafter, and while the widow was a resident of the state of Washington, and within the jurisdiction of the courts of that state, she attempted to institute probate proceedings in the county in the state of Oregon of which county her husband was a resident at the time of his death. The Supreme Court of Washington held that the trust declared by the will was valid under the laws of Washington, and expressed the belief that the Oregon courts would be of the same opinion, and held that the widow was estopped from denying the validity of the will or its trust provisions and should be enjoined from instituting or carrying on probate proceedings in the state of Oregon in contravention of her settlement with the executors of the estate. The court did not attempt or purport to establish the identity of the Stubblefield Home.

Section 1275 of the Civil Code of California provides, in substance, that a testamentary disposition may be made to any person capable by law of taking the property so disposed of, except that corporations other than counties, municipal corporations, and corporations formed for scientific, literary, or solely educational or hospital purposes, or primarily for the public preservation of forests and natural scenery, cannot take under a will, unless expressly authorized by statute; subject, however, to the provisions of section 1313. The latter section reads as follows: "No estate, real or personal, shall be bequeathed or devised to any charitable or benevolent society or corporation, or to any person or persons in trust for charitable uses, except the same be done by will duly executed at least thirty days before the decease of the testator; and if so made at least thirty days prior to such death, such devise or legacy and each of them shall be valid. * * *"

[2, 3] The disposition must be made to a person or entity capable of identification or of taking the property bequeathed or devised. The Stubblefield Home is not a society or a corporation. A society has been defined as a number of persons united together by mutual consent in order to deliberate, determine, and act jointly for some common purpose. The institution created under the Stubblefield will was governed entirely by the provisions of that will as applied by the trustees named therein, and there can be no claim that the inmates of the institution had anything to say about the organization, government, or control of the home. The trustees themselves did not constitute a society. If the bequest has any claim to validity, it must be upon the theory that there was a devise to a person or persons in trust for charitable uses.

[4, 5] The intent of the testator must be gathered from the wording of the will itself, and not from any outside evidence as to what his intention was, where there is no uncertainty or ambiguity in the language used by the testator. The words of a will are to be taken in their ordinary and grammatical sense, unless a clear intention to use them in another sense can be collected, and that other can be ascertained. Estate of Zilke (Cal. App.) 1 P. (2d) 475; Estate of Doane, 190 Cal. 412, 213 P. 53.

[6, 7] The bequest made under the will of McDole was directly to the Stubblefield Home for the Aged. The legal effect of the bequest is, as in the case of the Estate of Dol, 182 Cal. 159, 187 P. 428, to make the property the absolute property of the Stubblefield Home for the Aged, if it were an institution which could take and hold property. No declaration of a trust was made by the testator, and no intent was expressed to substitute another in the place of the Stubblefield Home. It was unquestionably the intention of the testator to give the property to the Stubblefield Home as an institution. He did not, by any expression in the will, endeavor to create a trust, and the trial court was fully warranted in concluding there was no intention on the part of the testator to create a trust in favor of a beneficiary known as the Stubblefield Home, or Stubblefield Home for the Aged. Brittenbaker v. Buck, 58 Cal. App. 738, 209 P. 264; Estate of Sutro, 155 Cal. 727, 102 P. 920. If a bequest is made for indefinite purposes, though part may be charitable, the whole bequest is void for uncertainty. Estate of Hinkley, 58 Cal. 509; Estate of Sutro, supra. In Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, page 1009, the author says: "The declaration of trust whether written or oral must be reasonably certain in its material terms; and this requisite of certainty includes the subject matter of property embraced within the trust, the beneficiaries or persons in whose behalf it is created, the nature and quantity of interest which they are to have, and the manner in which the trust is to be performed. If the language is so vague, general or equivocal that any of these necessary elements of the trust are left in real uncertainty, then the trust must fail."

The Stubblefield trust was created for the benefit of orphans and half orphans, for indigent children, and for worthy elderly indigent widows. It has been held that a devise "for an old men's home" does not cover "an old ladies' home." Green v. Old People's Home of Chicago, 269 Ill. 134, 109 N. E. 701. The provisions of the residuary clause of the McDole will having the effect of making an absolute unqualified gift, was the Stubblefield Home an entity which was capable of taking the property of decedent? In Estate of Glass, 164 Cal. 765, 130 P. 868, it was held that the estate of a deceased person is not a person or entity which can take under a will.

Appellants rely upon the case of Estate of Upham, 127 Cal. 90, 59 P. 315, 316, but that case is not in point, for the reason that the devise under consideration therein was directly to the "legally qualified and constituted trustees or managers of the Good Templars' Orphans' Home of Vallejo, said county of Solano, in trust for the use and benefit of the orphan children of said institution." Similar situations are found in Estate of Merchant, 143 Cal. 537, 77 P. 475; Estate of Irwin, 196 Cal. 366, 237 P. 1074; Estate of Graham, 63 Cal. App. 41, 218 P. 84, in each of which the bequest was to designated trustees.

The principles applicable to the situation now before us are fully expressed in Estate of Doane, 190 Cal. 412, 213 P. 53. In that case the will provided as follows: "All the rest and residue of my property of whatever nature and wheresoever located, I give, devise and bequeath to the National Bank & Trust Company of Pasadena, a national banking association, of Pasadena, California."

In holding that this provision of the will was invalid, the court spoke as follows:

"It is further contended by appellants that the National Bank & Trust Company of Pasadena has two legal capacities, one as an individual and one as a trustee, and in view of the presumption in favor of testacy, it is urged, parol proofs were admissible for the purpose of showing in which capacity the testator intended that the residuary legatee should take. This contention cannot be sustained, for the reason that there is no ambiguity or uncertainty in the language employed by the testator in disposing of the residue of his estate. While no particular form of expression is necessary for the creation of a trust, nevertheless some expression of intent to that end is requisite. Estate of Marti, 132 Cal. 666, 669, 61 P. 964, 64 P. 1071. In the present case there is nothing in the will in question which even hints at a restriction or limitation upon the residuary legatee. On the contrary, it affirmatively appears upon the face of the will that the residue is given, devised, and bequeathed, outright, to the National Bank & Trust Company of Pasadena, a national banking association of Pasadena, Cal. The bequest is absolute in terms. 'Where the language of the provisions of a will is plain and unambiguous the courts are not permitted to wrest it from its natural import in order to save it from condemnation.' Estate of Walkerly, 108 Cal. 627, 660, 49 Am. St. Rep. 97, 41 P. 772, 780.

"The decedent having made an invalid provision in clear, unequivocal language, the courts are without power to alter that language to express what may have been in the testator's mind but was not attempted to be expressed by him, however beneficent such unexpressed intent may have been. 'It may be said of all wills, that the testator's intent is to make a valid disposition of his property. * * * But a court is not therefore authorized to modify or vary the plain language of the testator, and thus create a new and valid will for him, even if it were certain that the testator would have adopted the interpretation of the court, had he known his own attempt was invalid.' Estate of Walkerly, supra, 108 Cal. 627, 659, 41 P. 772, 780, 49 Am. St. Rep. 97."

For the foregoing reasons, we are of the opinion that the decree appealed from should be affirmed, and it is so ordered. In view of this conclusion, we consider it unnecessary to discuss other questions raised in respondent's brief.

Whether statutory presumption that employer's negligence caused injury has been overcome is usually jury question (St. 1917, p. 857, § 29 (b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 494).

3. Judgment ⇨199(3).

If deceased employee's dependents rely wholly on statutory presumption of employer's negligence, and presumption is overcome by uncontradicted evidence, employer's motion for judgment notwithstanding verdict is properly granted (St. 1917, p. 857, § 29 (b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 494).

4. Master and servant ⇨367.

Salesman selling shares on commission, who furnished automobile and paid expenses, with time, place, and persons for interviewing being within salesman's discretion, held "independent contractor," not "employee" (Civ. Code, § 2009; St. 1917, p. 835, § 8, subd. b, and p. 857, § 29 (b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 494).

Since salesman, who for a time had employed other salesmen with whom he divided commissions received by him for selling shares of building-loan association, was independent contractor rather than employee within St. 1917, p. 857, § 29 (b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 494, establishing presumption of employer's negligence, there was no presumption that building-loan association's negligence caused injury, if any, to salesman, who, having started on automobile trip, was later found dead in automobile; the cause of death, according to coroner's certificate, being undeterminable, but probably heat prostration.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Employé" and "Independent Contractor," see Words and Phrases.]

5. Master and servant ⇨367.

That salesman on commission furnishes automobile and pays expenses does not necessarily make him independent contractor (Civ. Code, § 2009; St. 1917, p. 835, § 8, subd. b).

6. Master and servant ⇨367.

That employer may terminate employment for breach of agreement is not conclusive in determining whether salesman on commission is independent contractor or employee (Civ. Code, § 2009; St. 1917, p. 835, § 8, subd. b).

7. Master and servant ⇨405(2, 4).

To invoke Compensation Act, evidence must establish that deceased was employee, not independent contractor, and that death resulted from injury in course of employment (Civ. Code, § 2009; St. 1917, p. 835, § 8, subd. b, and p. 857, § 29 (b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 494).

8. Master and servant ⇨373.

When employee without acclimation is placed at work in locality where heat is intolerable to one not acclimated, death from sunstroke is compensable "injury" (St. 1917, p. 857, § 29 (b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 494).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Injury," see Words and Phrases.]

9. New trial ⇨71.

Judge, if convinced that verdict is clearly against weight of evidence, has duty to set verdict aside, notwithstanding testimony may be somewhat conflicting.

10. Master and servant ⇨403.

Statutory presumption that employer's negligence caused injury disappears when completely contradicted by evidence of party relying on presumption in absence of mistake or inadvertence (St. 1917, p. 857, § 29 (b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 494).

11. Master and servant ⇨403.

Statutory presumption that employer's negligence caused injury does not disappear notwithstanding contradiction, where contradictory evidence is offered by party against whom presumption was invoked (St. 1917, p. 857, § 29 (b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 494).

12. Master and servant ⇨416.

That commission on application under Compensation Act determined that employee was not injured held no defense to subsequent action against employer under statute (St. 1917, p. 857, § 29 (b), as amended by St. 1925, p. 494).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stephen G. Long, Judge.

Action by Alta I. Peters against the California Building-Loan Association. After a verdict for plaintiff, defendant's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict was granted, and from the judgment and an order denying plaintiff's motion to vacate the judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Doyle, Clark, Thomas & Johnson, of Long Beach, for appellant.

Hill, Morgan & Bledsoe and Flint & McKay, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

GRIFFIN, Justice pro tem.

This is an action brought by appellant against respondent under the provisions of section 29, subdivision b, of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1925, p. 494), which, in brief, provides that in the event an employer fails to insure, the employee, or in the case of death, his dependents, may bring an action for damages against the employer as though the act did not apply, with the provision that negligence of the employer shall be presumed in such case, and certain defenses otherwise applicable to an action at law for negligence are taken from the employer.

The evidence discloses certain facts most of which are uncontradicted. Appellant and K. S. Peters were married February 20, 1894, and continually lived together as husband and wife until his death on or about June 2, 1926. During the latter part of the year 1924, Peters called upon W. T. Moore, manager of the respondent association, and orally applied for a position whereby he could earn some money by selling shares of stock of the association. He inquired into its financial condition and agreed to accept the commissions which the company paid if he perfected any sales of their securities. He asked Moore especially not to make any definite or fast arrangement in connection with his work because of certain conditions which he was then laboring under and which might interfere. Because of this request, Moore told him that he did not need anything but the regular rules that they were offering, and that he was not bound to do anything definite other than to bring in subscriptions.

A license from the corporation commissioner to act as agent and solicitor for the association was secured by Peters, apparently with the approval, or at the request, of the association. The terms of the oral agreement between Peters and the association as to his employment were known only to Peters and Moore.

Respondent furnished Peters with business cards on which appeared the name of the association, the name K. S. Peters, together with the statement "with the California Building-Loan Association." They also furnished him with literature explaining the character and nature of the membership shares and the conditions under which they were to be sold. They instructed him that the only condition which the association imposed upon a salesman was that he must understand the conditions of sale and that if he or any other salesman misrepresented any of the shares to any purchaser, he (Moore), for the association, would ask the commissioner of corporations to cancel his license.

Peters was given the privilege of selling wherever and to whom he pleased without restriction except that the association reserved the right to refuse applicants for shares if they did not deem them responsible. He entered upon his duties soliciting and selling in various Southern California cities receiving his commissions on sales made. It was his habit to report to the association office Saturdays to receive his commission check and to attend meetings of the salesmen. Attendance at these meetings was not compulsory, but was for the mutual benefit of the salesmen in exchanging experiences and information. Neither he nor any other salesman was furnished with an automobile or any other transportation, nor did the company make payments for expenses in the way of gasoline, oil, or anything else. During the middle of the year 1925, Mr. Peters occupied an office in Long Beach from which he operated to take subscriptions. He maintained this office at his own expense and during this period employed other salesmen and split his commissions with them. He was not given any special assistance in his work, but occasionally when the office learned of a prospective buyer, he or some of the other salesmen would be told about him. Certain papers were sent out by the association to its membership on which they were asked to suggest other people who might be prospective buyers of shares. It was customary to turn these over to the salesman who had procured the recommending member.

The last time Mr. Moore saw Mr. Peters was near the middle of May, 1926. This was after Peters had returned from a trip to Death Valley. At that time he brought in some shares which he had sold in Death Valley, stating that he had thought it advisable to go out there to get some applications and asked if Moore would accept them. After some discussion they were accepted and Peters was paid his commission. Nothing was said about his going back to Death Valley, but about June 1, 1926, without the knowledge of Moore or the association, he again started to Death Valley Junction. He stayed all night at Barstow and was last seen alive early on the morning of June 2d. About six weeks later his body was found in his car in Death Valley twelve miles from Cave Springs and about three and one-half miles off the main road leading from Cave Springs to Death Valley Junction. At the place where the car turned off from the road there was a sign. This sign did not point in the direction in which this automobile went, but pointed in the opposite direction. At the place where the car was found there was no road, just a trail over the desert sand and just the track which had been made by deceased's automobile. Beyond where it stopped there were no tracks. There was evidence that the rear wheels of the car had been jacked up and rocks placed under them and that some one had been working around the car, sagebrush having been placed in the tracks. There was no habitation in this locality. The temperature at the time the body was found, July 12th at 10:30 a. m., was 140 degrees. The certificate of the coroner disclosed the following cause of death: "Exact cause undeterminable, too badly decomposed, probably heat prostration." The deceased was a large man fifty-four years of age, and just prior to his death was in good health, happy, and in good spirits.

No insurance was carried by the association on Mr. Peters under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The association had tried to obtain insurance upon him and the other salesmen but was unsuccessful, having been advised by its attorney that it could not be obtained for contract agents.

Before the case went to trial respondent asked for leave to file a supplemental and amended answer to the first amended complaint in which it was alleged that appellant had filed her application before the Division of Industrial Accidents and Safety under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act for the alleged injury sustained by Keith S. Peters, and that after a hearing and rehearing before the department it was determined by the department that the evidence was insufficient to establish that Keith S. Peters received an injury arising out of and in the course of any employment with respondent, or that his death was caused by injury, and it was alleged that such decision had become final and was an adjudication between the parties in respect to the matters at issue in this action. The court ruled that such allegations did not constitute a defense as a matter of law, and denied the application to file the same on that ground, but not because of any prejudice which might result to appellant.

The case went to trial before a jury; motion for nonsuit on behalf of respondent was denied; motion for directed verdict on behalf of respondent was denied; the cause was submitted to the jury, together with certain special interrogatories; the jury returned a general verdict for appellant, together with answers to the special interrogatories. Thereafter motion was made by respondent for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, which, after argument and submission, was granted by the court. Thereafter, appellant moved to set aside the judgment notwithstanding the verdict, under section 663, Code of Civil Procedure, but that motion was denied. Whereupon appellant appealed, both from the judgment and from the denial of her motion to vacate the judgment.

Appellant contends that the denial of her motion to vacate the judgment notwithstanding the verdict and enter a judgment in accordance with the verdict of the jury, should be reversed and the trial court ordered to enter judgment in accordance with the jury's verdict.

Respondent contends that the judgment of the court in directing a verdict in its favor is amply supported on each and all of five different theories or grounds: First, that the evidence was insufficient to show that the deceased, Keith S. Peters, was an employee of respondent, but on the contrary it establishes that he was an independent contractor; second, the evidence was insufficient to show that the deceased was injured at all, or that death resulted from injury; third, there is no evidence to show that Mr. Peters was in the course of his employment at the time of the injury; fourth, the evidence is insufficient to show that the injury arose other than by reason of hazard to which the common public was subjected; fifth, the presumption of negligence was rebutted, and in the absence of further affirmative proof by the plaintiff, no recovery could be justified.

The following interrogatories were submitted to the jury resulting in the following answers:

"Under the arrangement between Keith S. Peters and the defendant did Keith S. Peters have the right to go where and when he pleased and to exercise his own judgment and discretion as to the parties whom he should seek as purchasers or borrowers or to whom he might present propositions for the purchase of stock and certificates of the defendant or for lending money of the defendant? Answer: Yes."

"Has the defendant by a preponderance of the evidence shown that it had no knowledge that Keith S. Peters was going to Death Valley on or about June 1st, 1926? Answer: No."

"Has the plaintiff by a preponderance of the evidence shown that the injury causing the death of Keith S. Peters occurred in the course of his employment by the defendant? Answer: Yes."

"Has the defendant shown by a preponderance of the evidence that under the circumstances of the case it did what an ordinary prudent person would have done under such circumstances? Answer: No."

The Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, § 29, subdivision b, provides as follows: "In such action it shall be presumed that the injury to the employee was a direct result and grew out of the negligence of the employer, and the burden of proof shall rest upon the employer to rebut the presumption of negligence. In such proceeding it shall not be a defense to the employer that the employee may have been guilty of contributory negligence, or assumed the risk of the hazard complained of."

"A directed verdict is proper, unless there be substantial evidence tending to prove in favor of plaintiff all the controverted facts necessary to establish his case. In other words, a directed verdict is proper whenever, upon the whole evidence, the judge would be compelled to set a contrary verdict aside as unsupported by the evidence. To warrant a court in directing a verdict, it is not necessary that there should be an absence of conflict in the evidence; but, to deprive the court of the right to exercise this power, if there be a conflict, it must be a substantial one." Jacobson v. Railroad, 175 Cal. 468, 166 P. 3, 6.

[1-3] It is to be noted that the presumptions in favor of appellant are clearly specified and will stand as evidence until controverted and overcome by competent evidence. Whether or not these presumptions have been overcome and controverted is usually a question for the jury. Smellie v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. Sup.) 299 P. 529. If appellant relies wholly upon these presumptions, and the uncontradicted evidence offered clearly controverts and overcomes them, then the trial court was justified in granting respondent's motion for a verdict in its favor.

[4] In determining whether or not the trial court was justified in directing a judgment for respondent notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, this court must take into consideration the evidence taken before the trial court. The question is this: Was the trial court justified in holding that the evidence was insufficient to establish the fact that K. S. Peters was an employee of respondent, and does it establish the fact that he was an independent contractor? All of the evidence on this question has been fully considered. Its volume prohibits a complete statement of all of the facts and circumstances as gleaned from the evidence and as pointed out in the briefs of appellant and respondent.

"A servant is one who is employed to render personal service to his employer, otherwise than in the pursuit of an independent calling, and who in such service remains entirely under the control and direction of the latter who is called his master." Section 2009, Civ. Code.

Section 8, subdivision b, Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 835, § 8, subd. b) defines an independent contractor as follows: "The term 'independent contractor' shall be taken to mean, for the purposes of this act: Any person who renders service, other than manual labor, for a specified recompense for a specified result, under the control of his principal as to the result of his work only and not as to the means by which such result is accomplished."

The facts related in the case of Barton v. Studebaker Corp. of America, 46 Cal. App. 707, 189 P. 1025, 1028, are so similar, and the law as there applied is so applicable, to the facts in this case, that a restatement of those principles is deemed unnecessary. That was a case where a certain automobile salesman was paid on a commission basis only by the defendant corporation, for his services in bringing customers to the salesroom and disposing of automobiles owned by the corporation. To close the deal he would bring the customer to the salesroom in his car, paying his own operating expenses. While thus engaged an accident occurred which resulted in injury to one of his customers. The court there held that the salesman was an independent contractor within the meaning of section 2009, Civil Code.

The evidence disclosing the nature of the relationship between the California Building-Loan Association and Peters is undisputed, and it is clear therefrom that the relation of master and servant, within the legal definition of that relation as defined by the section of the code above mentioned, and section 8, subdivision b, Workmen's Compensation Act, did not exist between the respondent association and the deceased Peters at the time of his death, and it is also clear that Peters while engaged in the business of procuring applications for shares, was exercising an independent calling. He was, in other words, an independent contractor, and the association had no control over him as to the means by which he was to execute or perform the work which he assumed in his engagement with it.

"The real test as to whether a person is an independent contractor or a servant is whether the person alleged to be the master, under his arrangement with the other party, has or has not any authoritative control of the latter with respect to the manner in which the details of the work are to be performed, and therefore this test or element 'must, in the last analysis, always determine what was the essential nature of the relationship between the person who performed the given work and the person for whom it was performed.' Labatt on Master and Servant, § 18, p. 56." Barton v. Studebaker Corp. of America, supra; La Franchi v. Ind. Acc. Com. (Cal. App.) 298 P. 44.

[5] As evidence of the nature of the relationship existing between the association and Peters, there is the fact that Peters received no definite compensation, only commissions; that the automobile used by him in soliciting his customers was his own property; and that he paid the expense of its maintenance and care and for the gasoline necessary to run it, together with all his other expenses.

But more important than these considerations, which are not always in themselves determinative of the issue (Press Publishing Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 190 Cal. 114, 210 P. 820; Easton v. Ind. Acc. Com., 34 Cal. App. 321, 167 P. 288), and which really involve evidence only tending to show the relationship the probative value of which as disclosing the nature of the relationship must of course be measured by other considerations more directly addressed to the fact, is the fact, clearly and unquestionably established that his business under his engagement with the association was that of seeking and soliciting membership in the association for which he would receive his commission if the applicant was accepted by them, and the further fact that in prosecuting that work he was at liberty under his engagement with the association to go where and when he pleased and to exercise his own judgment and discretion as to the parties whom he should seek as purchasers or to whom he might present propositions for the sale and purchase of the association shares. He was, in other words, perfectly free to choose his own time, place, manner of transportation, and means of seeking and procuring applicants. There was nothing in his agreement with the association to prevent him from employing assistants to aid him in this work, paying them out of his own commissions for any customers they might bring to him, which, in fact, he did. In brief, he was perfectly free to prosecute the work he agreed by his contract to do for the association in any manner he saw fit, using such means or methods as to his judgment might seem the most effective for accomplishing the ends of the business. When a sale was made through him, and the applicant accepted by the association, he was paid the stipulated commission but received no compensation unless a sale was effected through him. He was as much engaged in business for himself when prosecuting the work called for by his contract with the association as is the contractor who engages to construct a building for a stipulated sum of money. And in this case the association could exercise no authoritative control over the work of Peters except perhaps the right to require him to carry out his instructions as to the representations he should make to prospective purchasers of the character and worth of the securities.

Appellant lays stress upon the fact that Peters' authority to act for the association was evidenced by a printed card of the latter and on which his name was printed. The character of the relation between Peters and the association was not stated on the card. This is only an evidentiary circumstance, and under some circumstances it might be of some value as proof of the nature of the relationship existing between the parties; but in this case it possesses no significance in view of the undisputed evidence disclosing the terms of the agreement. Naturally, whether a servant or an independent contractor, a party engaged to perform for another, acts or work requiring dealings with the public, would carry with him some evidence of his authority to do what he claimed the right to do. Barton v. Studebaker Corp. of America, supra.

We have not thought it necessary to review the many cases cited by appellant in support of her position as to the nature of the relationship existing between the association and Peters. She relies principally upon the holding in the case of Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corp. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 87 Cal. App. 290, 262 P. 38, which was a case where an employee of a society collected dues on a commission basis. In that case the record contained substantial evidence to support the finding that the manner in which the collector operated was subject to the direction of the board of trustees, and that the "determinative factor" of power or control lay with the latter, not only as to the result proposed to be obtained, but as well to the means and method by which such result was to be accomplished. She also cites Marks v. Hill, reported in volume 9, Ind. Acc. Com., Dec. 12/5, 1922; Cameron v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 83, 159 P. 149; Brown v. Ind. Acc. Com., 174 Cal. 457, 163 P. 664, in support of her contention.

[6] Evidence that the association might terminate the employment for breach of agreement at any time does tend to negative the independence of the employee, but it is not conclusive. Press Pub. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com., supra.

[7] Respondent contends the evidence is insufficient to show the deceased was injured at all, or that death resulted from injury. This question becomes unimportant unless deceased was found to be an employee, in which case the evidence must establish, first, an injury; secondly, that death was the result of the injury sustained in the course of the employment.

[8, 9] "When an employee, without acclimatization is placed at work in a locality in which the heat is intolerable to one not acclimated, the special exposure is in excess of the risk of the commonalty, and death from sunstroke is compensable." 27 Cal. Jur., § 79, p. 373; Stammler v. Cal. Highway Com., 9 Ind. Acc. Com. Dec. 275; Hanley v. Union Construction Co., 9 Ind. Acc. Com. Dec. 48. If, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence in this case, the jury had found that deceased so met his death, it would constitute an injury within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act. However, if the trial court was not satisfied with the verdict, and was convinced that it was clearly against the weight of the evidence, then it was its duty to set it aside, even though there may have been some conflict in the testimony. Dickey v. Davis, 39 Cal. 565; Bates v. Howard, 105 Cal. 173, 38 P. 715; Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96-103, 78 P. 337.

[10, 11] While it is true that appellant may be entitled to the presumption of negligence on the part of the employer, if the evidence supports the finding of an injury received arising out of the employment, this however, is not a conclusive presumption but disappears when contradicted or controverted by the evidence of the party relying upon the presumption if the circumstances are such as to afford no indication that the testimony was the product of mistake or inadvertence and the fact so proved is wholly irreconcilable with the presumption sought to be invoked, but this rule is not applicable where the presumption is contradicted by evidence of the party against whom it is invoked. Mar Shee v. Maryland Assur. Corp., 190 Cal. 1, 210 P. 269; Smellie v. So. Pac. Co., supra.

[12] For reasons heretofore stated, the question of the weight to be given this evidence becomes immaterial. The striking of respondent's answer setting up as a defense the actions of the commission was justified under the holding in the case of Marshall v. Foote, 81 Cal. App. 98-101-102, 252 P. 1075.

For the reasons above stated, we are of the opinion that the order of the trial court rendering a judgment in favor of the respondent notwithstanding the verdict, and the order of the court denying appellant's motion to vacate judgment, must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

We concur: MARKS, J.; JENNINGS, Acting P. J.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carl A. Stutsman, Judge.

Action by F. W. Becker against F. L. Stinemán and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Newlin & Ashburn and Clive W. Johnson, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Samuel J. Crawford, of Santa Monica, for respondent.

GRIFFIN, Justice pro tem.

This is an action for damages arising out of the sale of 8,500 shares of the capital stock of Coast Amusements, Inc., under circumstances more particularly described in this and in the companion case of Coast Amusements, Inc., v. F. L. Stinemán (Cal. App.) 2 P. (2d) 447, this day decided.

Respondent and appellants entered into a written agreement to operate a place of amusement at the Ocean Park Pier in Santa Monica. Appellants furnished certain materials, labor and cash. Subsequently they incorporated, each subscribing for certain shares of stock as follows: F. W. Becker, 3,500 shares; W. E. Knotts, 5,000 shares; F. L. Stineman, 5,000 shares; and Charles Paige, 6,500 shares—according to the interest each had, or was to have, in the business under some oral preorganization agreement. Respondent Becker did not sign the articles of incorporation.

After incorporation an application was made to the corporation commissioner for a permit to sell 20,000 shares of stock at a par value of $1 per share. This permit was granted on condition that the sale price would be for cash. The board of directors and officers included appellants and respondent. They proceeded to issue to themselves shares of stock in accordance with their respective interests as follows: F. L. Stineman, 4,000 shares; Charles Paige, 4,500 shares; F. W. Becker, 3,500 shares; W. E. Knotts, 5,000 shares; L. H. Hendricks, 1,500 shares—the consideration for the issuance of appellants' stock being cash and materials furnished and services performed prior to the incorporation and the granting of the permit. The books of the corporation do not show any money paid in by any of the incorporators.

It appears from the application to the corporation commissioner to sell stock that no mention was made that it was the intention of the applicants to issue stock to the incorporators in payment of moneys advanced, materials furnished, etc., consequently the permit provided "that the stock may be issued and disposed of for cash only." It was stipulated at the trial that all of the above-mentioned stock was issued in violation of the permit and was void ab initio.

Respondent contends that he was not present at the meeting in which appellants issued to themselves the shares of stock referred to but was out of the state and that he paid his $3,500 for the stock for which he had subscribed subsequent to the incorporation but prior to the issuance of the permit. He admits that he knew his money was to be used in purchasing materials for the erection and maintenance of the "Skooter."

On the 21st day of December, 1925, appellants traded their 8,500 shares to respondent Becker for real estate of the value of $8,500, Stineman turning 4,000 shares and Paige 4,500. The title to the real estate was taken in the names of appellants jointly. The real property was subsequently disposed of. The stock transferred to respondent was subsequently reissued by the corporation to respondent and his wife who enjoyed the dividends earned thereon to the extent of $1,997.50, voted the stock thus acquired and also that acquired by Becker under his subscription agreement. The corporation subsequently brought an action in the name of the corporation against appellants to compel them to pay for the stock for which they had subscribed, to wit: F. L. Stineman, 5,000 shares, and Charles Paige, 6,500 shares. Respondent was made manager by the new board of directors which consisted of himself, his wife, and Mr. Knotts, and his salary was fixed at $75 per week.

The record discloses that respondent was vice president of the corporation from its inception. He testified that he was not at the meeting at which the officers were elected, although the minutes of the meeting of August 15, 1925, show he was duly elected vice president and that he then nominated W. E. Knotts treasurer and subsequently nominated L. H. Hendricks secretary. At this meeting a motion was made that the corporation apply for the permit to sell the 20,000 shares of capital stock of the corporation.

Respondent testified that he did not take any part in the management or control of the company except that he greased the cars and assisted in the management one or two days a week from October, 1925, until January, 1926, and was paid 50 cents an hour for his services; that he did not know whether Mr. Paige or Mr. Stineman paid anything for their stock as there were no records kept by the corporation showing any payment or credits given them; that he was not allowed to see the books and didn't find out until February, 1926, that there were only books of operation kept and that there had been no books showing cash received or moneys disbursed. Such books as there were remained in the custody of Mr. Knotts, Hendricks, and Stineman. Mr. Stineman was signing the checks; that he did not know how much the skooter cost. Appellants testified that it cost $17,000. Respondent testified further that he was satisfied and that he did not intend to rescind the sale if appellants could satisfy the corporation commissioner as to the value of materials, etc., that were furnished to the corporation by appellants and make the stock issued valid under a proper permit.

In February, 1926, respondent discovered that the stock issued to Stineman and Paige was issued in violation of the permit and was consequently void. He then instituted this action to recover the value thereof. The court found for respondent and against appellants for the full value of said stock in the sum of $8,500, deducting therefrom the amount of dividends received by respondent during this period.

Appellants contend, first, that respondent was in pari delicto with them and therefore not entitled to any relief; and, second, that the transfer of the invalid stock operated as an equitable assignment of appellants' interest in or claim against the corporation.

[1] There is no doubt, under the stipulation and finding, that the stock issued is void; therefore, the consideration for the property exchanged failed. Respondent would therefore ordinarily be entitled to recover the property or its value.

The case cited by appellants, Michell v. Grass Valley Gold Mines Co., 206 Cal. 609, 275 P. 418, which was an action by certain directors against the corporation for the rescission of a deed wherein plaintiffs deeded certain mining property to the corporation in exchange for stock to be issued, believing, upon advice of counsel, that a permit so to do was not necessary, the court held, under the facts in that case and by reason of the participation of plaintiff in the control and management of the business, that it would be absurd to conclude that the landowners, directors of the corporation intended to perpetrate a fraud on themselves by directing the corporation to do so and so that it would render it inequitable to affirm the rescission and order a cancellation of the deed; that by reason of the participation of plaintiff in the enterprise from its inception, including especially his participation in the acceptance by the corporation of the terms of the promotion contract upon the issuance of stock, unlawfully, it would place him in pari delicto with the corporation under the doctrine of the case of Domenigoni v. Imperial Live Stock, etc., Co., 189 Cal. 467, 209 P. 36, and no relief should be accorded him on that ground alone. Several other reasons were assigned for denying plaintiff's right to rescind. If the facts as related by appellants were found to be true, we believe the case above recited would receive favorable application.

[2] The trial court found that the two appellants while directors of the company caused said permit to be requested and issued; that the 8,500 shares were issued by them to themselves in violation of the permit and that they knew at the time of the issuance that they were being issued in violation of the permit; that respondent had no knowledge of the business affairs or transactions of the company or that appellants had issued said shares of stock to themselves in violation of the permit; that respondent received nothing of value for the real property traded to the appellants and that the consideration failed. The evidence offered by appellants contradicts the testimony of respondent as to his participation in the organization and proceedings of the company, purchase of stock, and his knowledge of the various transactions. The record before us, however, is quite convincing in favor of appellants' contention. The court made a finding, apparently based on respondent's testimony, which, if true, will support its finding. This court cannot disturb such finding on appeal, therefore, it cannot be said that the actions of respondent are similar to the facts set forth in the case of Michell v. Grass Valley Gold Mines Co., supra. We cannot therefore hold that the parties were in pari delicto.

[3] The second point raised is that the assignment of the shares to respondent carried with it any right of action appellants might have against the corporation to reimburse them for the value of the stock which they issued without authority. We are of the opinion that an assignment of the shares under the circumstances here related did not carry an equitable assignment of such right. The evidence discloses that the amount paid into the corporation by appellants and the value of materials and labor furnished is not fixed, certain and definite. There was evidence that appellants had not paid in the full value of their stock in cash or its equivalent; therefore, if there was an equitable assignment of appellants' interest in a right of action against the corporation, respondent would not know and could not know the amount thereof.

If respondent did institute an action thereon against the corporation under such a claimed right it may develop that the actual amount paid in was much less than $8,500, therefore respondent would be forced to assume a loss of that difference. We see no merit in this contention. Under the authority cited (Klinker v. Guarantee Title Co. of Long Beach, 98 Cal. App. 469, 277 P. 177, 180), it was held that in an action to recover money paid for stock issued without a permit from the corporation commissioner "the void certificates of stock were not even choses in action, for, notwithstanding the alleged mistake of belief as to the validity of said certificates entertained by the appellants and acquiesced in by respondent corporation * * * the said certificates of stock would not have supported an action brought to recover money or value in the event of their transfer by the holder, because they were utterly worthless and invalid."

Based upon the findings of the court the evidence discloses facts similar to those in the case of Hemmon v. Amalgamated Copper Mines Co., 95 Cal. App. 400, 273 P. 74, which was an action to recover from defendants on certain promissory notes issued by them in violation of a permit of the corporation commissioner. Defendant claimed and cited authorities holding that while one who has received the benefit of an illegal private contract is estopped to plead its invalidity, such rule does not apply to contracts which are void as against public policy. The trial court there found that the respondent had no knowledge of the failure to obtain a permit, but it was argued that she must be presumed to have known the law and that the notes were void, and that having failed to demand proof of the existence of a permit respondent passively if not actually became a participant in violating the law. The court held that it was true that respondent must be presumed to have known the law requiring the possession of a permit as a prerequisite to the issuance and sale of securities, but it does not follow that she should be assumed to have known the fact that appellant had violated the law. Respondent was entitled to assume that the law had been complied with. In such a case the complaining party is protected, the prohibition being for his benefit and not being in pari delicto he is entitled to relief. 13 Cor. Jur., p. 501, § 443.

[4] It is the duty of the court in furtherance of justice to aid one not in pari delicto though to some extent involved in the illegality, but who, as here found, is comparatively the more innocent and to permit him to recover back the property or its value as the circumstances of the case may require. Hemmeon v. Amalgamated Mines Co., supra, 95 Cal. App. at page 402, 273 P. 74. No other points having been raised on appeal, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

COAST AMUSEMENTS, Inc., v. STINEMAN
Civ. 860.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Aug. 1, 1931.

1. Licenses ⇨39.

Where corporate stock was void as issued in violation of permit, corporation could not recover full price of stock, notwithstanding assignment.

The corporation contended that though stock issued and delivered was void, it having come into hands of innocent purchasers, corporation was estopped from denying its validity, and therefore original holders would be liable to corporation for value thereof.

2. Corporations ⇨90(6).

Evidence not showing value of stock would not support judgment for its value, there being no presumption that par value is market value.

3. Corporations ⇨90(1).

Corporation cannot maintain action on stock subscription agreement while incompetent to issue stock (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3814, §§ 12, 25).

4. Corporations ⇨89(1).

Under subscription agreement set out in articles of incorporation, persons named were bound to take stated amount of stock, but call or assessments was necessary to render them liable for price (Civ. Code, § 331 et seq.).

The agreement contained no promise to pay on demand or at any specified time the amount of the subscription, and though the agreement to subscribe and take the shares of stock set opposite their names bound persons named as stockholders in corporation, it did not bind them to pay for the stock otherwise than as assessments therefor might be legally made.

5. Corporations ⇨90(5).

In action for whole amount subscribed for stock, or for final installments, readiness and willingness to deliver stock certificates must be alleged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas H. Selvage, Judge.

Action by the Coast Amusements, Incorporated, against F. L. Stineman and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Newlin & Ashburn and Clive W. Johnson, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Samuel J. Crawford, of Santa Monica, for respondent.

GRIFFIN, P. J.

This is an action to recover the par value of 8,500 shares of respondent's stock alleged to have been subscribed for by appellants and for which they failed and refused to reimburse the company.

The court found that respondent was a corporation duly organized and existing under the laws of the state of California; that on or about July 7, 1925, appellants, together with W. E. Knotts, F. W. Becker, and L. H. Hendricks, entered into an oral agreement among themselves to form the respondent corporation and subscribe for certain stock, and pursuant thereto articles of incorporation were prepared and signed by appellants and W. E. Knotts in which articles they subscribed for the capital stock as follows: F. L. Stineman, 4,000 shares; Charles Paige, 4,500 shares; F. L. Stineman and Charles Paige jointly, 1,500 shares in the name of the High Boy Coaster Co.; F. W. Becker subscribed for 3,500 shares—all of the par value of one dollar each. That within thirty days thereafter the corporation was duly incorporated and a charter was granted by the secretary of the state of California, said corporation was duly organized, commenced the operation of its business and appellants became officers and directors thereof; that on August 15, 1925, an application was made to the corporation commissioner for a permit to issue the capital stock of said corporation and pursuant thereto a permit was regularly granted authorizing the corporation to issue 20,000 shares of its capital stock for cash so as to net the corporation the full amount of the selling price; that after granting said permit, appellants, without the knowledge or consent of the board of directors or officers of the corporation, issued to F. L. Stineman 4,000 shares, to F. L. Stineman and Charles Paige jointly, 1,500 shares of the capital stock, and that appellants did not pay for this stock at the time they accepted delivery thereof. (The court failed to find that appellant Charles Paige, individually, had issued to him 4,500 shares of stock for which he failed to pay.)

The court further found that thereafter appellants negotiated these shares of stock to F. W. Becker, an innocent purchaser who had no knowledge of the fact that this stock had been issued without cash having been paid therefor, and who was without knowledge of any infirmities pertaining to its issuance, as is more particularly related in the case of Becker v. Stineman et al. (Cal. App.) 2 P.(2d) 444, the opinion in which is this day filed.

The court further found that appellants had returned to the corporation the 1,500 shares of stock issued to themselves jointly. Judgment was entered against appellant Stineman for the sum of $4,000 and against appellant Charles Paige for the sum of $4,500, together with interest and costs.

Appellants contend that the evidence does not support the findings of the trial court. As an affirmative defense they contend that Knotts, Becker, and appellants entered into an agreement to construct the place of amusement, by the terms of which Becker was to furnish $3,500 in cash, and Knotts $5,000 in cash. Appellant Stineman was to contribute $5,000 towards the purchase of cars which were to be used by the corporation, and also to pay other small bills. Appellants contend this money, material, and services were furnished subsequent to the making of the agreement and prior to the issuance of the permit. Appellant Paige contends that he paid for $2,950 worth of steel that went into the construction of the place of amusement, $1,300 in cash towards the purchase of the cars, and in addition, paid certain small bills, waived his commission which he would ordinarily receive on the sale of the cars, and contributed approximately four or five weeks' time in supervising the construction of the ride. Appellant Stineman contends that he contributed $5,000 toward the purchase of the cars and paid other bills of the approximate amount of $500. And that by reason thereof they were entitled to receive as a credit the value of services performed, moneys paid and advanced, as well as the value of property furnished to the corporation. Appellants further contend that if the stock certificates previously issued by respondent to them were issued contrary to the terms of the permit and were void, then respondent corporation was in pari delicto with them and not entitled to any relief.

The place of amusement was substantially completed and ready for operation by the last of August, 1925. During the month of December, 1925, stock certificates were issued and delivered to all of the organizers in accordance with their joint subscriptions. On July 20, 1926, their permit to sell stock was suspended by the commissioner of corporations and the corporation has since been without authority to issue its capital stock.

Respondent contends that a recovery may be had on either of two theories: (1) That the stock issued and delivered was void, but having come into the hands of an innocent purchaser the corporation was estopped from denying its validity, therefore appellants would be liable to the corporation for the value thereof; (2) that if the stock was issued in violation of the permit and was void, appellants' subscriptions in the articles of incorporation, for the stock above subscribed, was an enforceable obligation on which the corporation could maintain an action recovering a judgment for the par value of the stock for which they had subscribed, and that as the permit required the payment to be made in cash no credit could be allowed as an offset against the judgment.

[1, 2] Answering respondent's first contention, the evidence conclusively establishes that the stock was issued in violation of the permit and accordingly void. In view of this fact and the facts stated in the companion case of Becker v. Stineman et al., we see little merit or justice to the claim which would permit respondent corporation to recover a judgment for the full price of stock issued which was void. The subsequent assignment thereof to Becker would not make this stock valid. The value of the stock issued was not proven by any evidence pointed out to this court. Therefore the evidence would not support a judgment for its value. There is no presumption that the par value of the stock is its market value. Castle v. Acme Ice Cream Co., (Cal. App.) 279 P. 1011.

[3] In answer to respondent's second contention, if the stock subscription specified in the articles of incorporation was an enforceable obligation, and the stock which was issued thereunder was void as contended, then respondent is not now in a position to deliver over to these appellants upon payment of this judgment the stock so subscribed for, by reason of the fact that the corporation commissioner has revoked their permit to now issue or sell stock in any form.

Section 12, California Corporate Securities Act, Deering's General Laws 1923, Act 3814 as amended, reads as follows: "Every security issued by any company, without a permit of the commissioner authorizing the same then in effect, shall be void," etc.

It would indeed be a curious anomaly if a corporation could maintain an action upon a stock subscription agreement, recover judgment thereon, and at the same time be legally incompetent to issue the stock. Section 25, California Corporate Securities Act, Deering's Gen'l Laws 1923, Act 3814.

[4] Appellants contend that if recovery was had upon the theory of an unpaid stock subscription that respondent has failed to allege or prove compliance with section 331 et seq., Civil Code.

The evidence discloses some written agreement entered into on the 1st day of July, 1925, between W. E. Knotts, F. W. Becker, F. L. Stineman, and Charles Paige specifying that the interests of the parties in the "Skooter" was to be paid as follows: W. E. Knotts, one-fourth interest or $5,000; Charles Paige, one-fourth interest or $5,000; F. L. Stineman, one-fourth interest or $5,000; F. W. Becker, three-sixteenths interest or $3,500; Charles Paige, one-sixteenth interest or $1,500; and that there was to be no more cost to any of the above mentioned parties for the completion of the skooter other than their initial payment; and that the board of directors would consist of the above mentioned, excluding Charles Paige who was to act as treasurer.

From the finding of the trial court the only right of recovery under a subscription agreement is the purported subscription agreement set forth in the articles of incorporation. Therefore it will not be necessary to consider the agreement above referred to, but in passing we might say that it lacks the necessary elements to make it an enforceable contract without proving compliance with section 331 et seq., Civil Code.

The only provision in the articles of incorporation relating to the subscription of stock reads as follows:

"That the amount of said capital stock which has been actually subscribed is twenty thousand ($20,000) dollars, and the following are the names of the persons by whom the same has been subscribed.

| Name of Subscriber | Number of Shares | Amount  |
|--------------------|------------------|---------|
| F. L. Stineman     | 5000             | $5,000 |
| Charles Paige      | 6500             | 6,500   |
| F. W. Becker       | 3500             | 3,500"  |

The articles of incorporation were signed by appellants and W. E. Knotts.

We are of the opinion that the terms above set out merely bind appellants to take the number of shares set opposite their names but contain no promise to pay on demand or at any specified time the amount of the subscription. Under an unbroken line of decisions a call or assessment under section 331 of the Civil Code was necessary in order to render the appellants liable. 1 Thompson on Corporations, § 1185; Ventura, etc., Ry. Co. v. Hartman, 116 Cal. 260, 48 P. 65; Marysville Electric Light, etc., Co. v. Johnson, 93 Cal. 538, 29 P. 126, 27 Am. St. Rep. 217; San Joaquin Land & Water Co. v. Beecher, 101 Cal. 70, 35 P. 349; Los Angeles Athletic Club v. Spires, 166 Cal. 173, 135 P. 298; Bell Development Co. v. Marshall, 35 Cal. App. 324, 169 P. 717. The agreement to subscribe and take the shares of stock set opposite their names bound them as stockholders in the corporation, but not to pay for the stock otherwise than as assessments therefor might be legally made. Cook on Stocks and Stockholders, § 105.

[5] It is not necessary to allege a tender of a stock certificate, but "a readiness and willingness, however, to deliver the certificates must be alleged in the complaint in actions for the whole amount subscribed, or to enforce payment of the final installment of the amount subscribed." 14 Cor. Jur. 658, § 1016; Walter A. Wood Harvester Co. v. Jefferson, 71 Minn. 367, 74 N. W. 149.

Respondent neither alleged nor proved compliance with section 331 et seq., Civil Code, nor alleged nor proved ability to issue valid stock on payment of the judgment.

Appellants filed a cross-complaint in the above entitled action seeking to recover from the corporation the value of labor and material contributed to the corporation prior to its incorporation, but during the trial of the case appellants dismissed their cross-complaints for reasons not stated in the record.

In the case of Klinker v. Guarantee Title Co. of Long Beach, 98 Cal. App. 469, 277 P. 177, an action to recover money paid to a corporation for stock issued in violation of a permit, it was held that upon payment of the money the obligation arose either to issue to plaintiff value received in the shape of valid stock, or lacking authority to do so, to return the money to him. This is supported by Natl. Stone Corp. v. Voorheis, 93 Cal. App. 738, 270 P. 286.

We believe the decision in Los Angeles Athletic Club v. Spires, supra, sufficiently supports appellants' contention. "The only question demanding consideration that is presented by this appeal may thus be stated: Where a stock subscription contract is silent upon the question, may the directors of the corporation, upon call or demand, enforce against the subscriber the full payment of the subscription and enforce his delinquency by an action in assumpsit, as could unquestionably be done at common law, or do the sections of the Civil Code, 331 et seq., enter into and become a part of such contract, with the result that calls or assessments for unpaid subscriptions can be made only upon the terms and in the manner and form in those sections prescribed? This precise question has never before been presented to this court for decision. We are of the opinion that the sections referred to do enter into and become a part of the subscriber's contract, with the result that, in the absence of provision to the contrary therein, calls or assessments by the corporation for unpaid subscriptions can be made only upon the terms and in the manner and form in those sections prescribed. A careful consideration of the opinions of this court relied upon by appellant satisfies us that there is nothing therein inconsistent with this conclusion. It is still, of course, permissible for the subscriber, by terms expressed in his contract of subscription, to modify or waive the provisions of the Code clearly designed for his benefit, but unless the subscriber has done so he will be held to have entered into the subscription contract in contemplation of the protection which the Code provisions afford him."

For reasons above stated the judgment is reversed.

BARNARD, P. J.

The defendant was charged with the crime of making, drawing, uttering, and delivering a check upon a bank without sufficient funds to meet the same, the information containing three counts. In the first count it is charged that the defendant on or about the 15th day of May, 1930, in the county of Fresno, committed a felony in that he, with intent to defraud Arthur R. Lindburg, Inc., a corporation, and also the Fresno Branch of the Bank of America, made, drew, uttered, and delivered to Arthur R. Lindburg, Inc., a check, drawn upon the Fresno Branch of the Bank of America, knowing at the time that he did not have sufficient funds in or credit with said bank to meet said check. The other two counts relate to other checks given in the month of June, 1930. The defendant was acquitted on counts 2 and 3 and found guilty as charged in count 1 of the information. This appeal is from the judgment, and from the order denying a motion for a new trial.

[1-3] The first ground urged for a reversal is that the trial court erred in admitting into evidence what purported to be the original ledger sheet of the bank named, showing the defendant's account at that bank for the months of May and June, 1930. According to this ledger sheet, defendant's account with the bank was opened on May 28, 1930. The assistant cashier of this bank appeared as a witness and testified that this ledger sheet was compiled by another person in the bank and that he would not say that it was done under his personal direction. Appellant urges that, under the circumstances, this ledger sheet constituted hearsay evidence and should not have been admitted. He relies on People v. Frey, 165 Cal. 140, 131 P. 127, and People v. Owens, 57 Cal. App. 84, 206 P. 473. In the Frey Case, aside from the defendant's confession, there was no evidence that the defendant had no funds or credit in the bank on which the check was drawn, that bank being out of the state, except that there was written across the face of the check "no account." There was no evidence that these words were written by any one connected with the bank or by any one who knew or could know the facts. It was held that the absence of some such proof was fatal. In the Owens Case, while it was shown that the bank records did not contain the name of the defendant as a depositor, there was no proof of any sort that the defendant did not have credit with the bank to meet the check. Neither of these cases settles the point now before us. The witness, through whom this ledger sheet was admitted into evidence, testified that he was an assistant cashier of the bank in question and had worked for them for twenty years. He testified that the ledger sheet in question "constitutes a record of the bank," and that he knew that it was true and correct, and also that he had examined the original account in the bank. The ledger sheet showed that the account of this defendant was opened on May 28, 1930. When asked if the ledger sheet was compiled under his direction he replied that it was "compiled at the direction of the officers of the bank, in that way it includes myself and others." We think that sufficient foundation was laid for the admission of the ledger sheet in evidence. People v. Kuder, 98 Cal. App. 206, 276 P. 578; People v. Woollacott, 80 Cal. App. 275, 251 P. 826. Even if the ledger sheet were improperly admitted, the error would be harmless, as there was other evidence of the essential facts. The assistant cashier of this bank testified that he had examined the defendant's account in the bank and knew that it was true and correct; that the defendant had no account in the bank on May 15, and none on May 19, the day when the check was presented for payment. He further testified that there was no credit arrangement between the bank and the defendant by means of which this check could be taken care of at any time, and that he had searched through the records of the bank and found no such credit arrangement. In addition, it was shown that payment of the check had been refused by the bank. We think that a lack of both funds and credit at this bank on the part of the defendant was sufficiently shown, both by the record of the bank and by the testimony of the assistant cashier, who testified that he had searched the records and knew that they were correct. People v. Weaver, 96 Cal. App. 1, 274 P. 361.

[4, 5] The only other point raised by the appellant is that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the verdict, in that the intent to defraud was not shown. Appellant testified that he was a dealer in secondhand cash registers and office equipment. The check involved in the first cause of action was given as a first payment upon an automobile. The check in the second cause of action was given some three weeks later to another automobile dealer, as the first payment on another automobile. The check involved in the third cause of action was given two days later to a garage, the nature of the transaction not appearing. In the transaction involved in the first cause of action, the appellant, as a first payment upon this automobile, gave the dealer $5 in cash and the check in question, signing a contract covering the balance. He also promised to bring in a cash register as additional security, which he later did. He first argues that an absence of criminal intent is shown by his giving this cash register as additional security on the balance of the contract. It may first be observed that this additional security was on the balance of the contract and had no relation to the check here in question, or to the first payment on the automobile. It is also the law that it is not necessary, in a case of this character, to show that the check as issued results in financial loss to the party to whom it is given. People v. Cortze (Cal. App.) 290 P. 1083; People v. Williams, 69 Cal. App. 169, 230 P. 667. As showing absence of criminal intent, the appellant also relies upon his testimony that, at the time the check was given, he told the employees of Arthur R. Lindburg, Inc., that he desired them to hold the check for a few days. However, two of the employees of this company who were present when the check was given testified positively that no such request was then made, although one of them testified that a day or two later appellant called him up on the telephone and asked him to hold the check. Nothing more is here presented than a conflict in the evidence. However, the fact that he phoned and asked them to hold the check indicates that he knew it was not good and could be considered in passing upon the question of his intent.

We think the evidence is sufficient in the respects questioned to sustain the verdict of the jury.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1002.

Conflicting evidence regarding facts of automobile collision were for jury, not for reviewing court.

2. Automobiles ⇨171(9).

Where motorist stopped at intersection and started to make left turn, colliding with another automobile within 35 feet of place where he stopped, motorist did not have duty to continuously give left turn signal for 50 feet back (St. 1923, p. 558, § 130, as amended by St. 1925, p. 413, § 15a).

Motorist did not have duty, under the circumstances, of continuously giving a left turn signal for distance of 50 feet back, since, under California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 558), § 130, as amended by St. 1925, p. 413, § 15a, when coming to the stop, it was the motorist's duty to hold his hand down indicating a stop, and, when he commenced to make the turn, it was his duty to hold his hand straight out to indicate a left-hand turn, and the motorist could not have given the left-hand turn signal before coming to the stop, without disobeying the statutory provision requiring a stop signal, since he could not give both signals at the same time.

3. Automobiles ⇨244(31).

Finding that motorist involved in automobile accident occurring at 3 a. m. was not intoxicated held not erroneous under evidence that motorist had four drinks between 8 p. m. and 11 p. m. on preceding evening.

The plaintiffs commenced separate actions against the defendant to recover damages caused by the collision of two automobiles. The defendant answered, and thereafter both actions were consolidated for the purposes of the trial. In each action judgment went for the defendant and the plaintiffs have appealed.

[1] At about 3 o'clock in the morning, on January 1, 1930, the defendant was driving a Ford automobile north on Sixty-Fourth avenue in Oakland and Ralph Wood was driving a Buick automobile east on Foothill boulevard. The automobiles collided in the intersection. As to how the accident occurred the testimony is distinctly conflicting. The defendant introduced evidence: That before entering Foothill boulevard he came to a full stop at the stop sign which is located at the southeast corner of the intersections; that he had a red courtesy light on the left side of his car, which was lighted at the time of the accident; that as he started to leave the stop sign his car was in low gear and that just before he was hit he shifted into second; that before he entered the intersection he looked in all directions and that he saw the Buick nearly a block and a half away; that as he started up he gave the signal for making a left-hand turn; that he continued to give that signal with his hand extending directly to the left until he had to put his hand on his wheel to make the turn; and that during all of that time his hand was out on the left-hand side of his car. The speed limit in that neighborhood was twenty miles per hour, but the defendant introduced evidence that the Buick was traveling over thirty-five miles per hour immediately before the accident. As to nearly every one of these facts the plaintiff introduced at least some evidence conflicting with the evidence given by the defendant, but the conflicts in the evidence were for the jury and not for a court of review.

[2] The plaintiffs earnestly press the point that for a distance of fifty feet back the defendant did not continuously give the signal of his intention to make a turn to the left. The distance that intervened between the point where the defendant came to a stop and the point where the accident occurred was about thirty-five feet, and during that time defendant was giving the signal. If the defendant stopped exactly at the stop sign, then it would appear that he did not have his hand extended directly out while traveling the last fifty feet. However, it is likewise apparent that when he was coming to a stop it was his duty to hold his hand down indicating a stop, and, when he commenced to make the turn, it was his duty to hold his hand straight out to indicate a left-hand turn. California Vehicle Act, § 130, as amended by St. 1925, p. 413, § 15a. He could not do both at one and the same time. It is patent that these two calls of the statute, under the facts of this case, are conflicting. If the jury believed the testimony given by the defendant, it was justified in assuming that the defendant made a substantial compliance with the terms of the statute. Moreover, it is absurd to maintain that the defendant under the circumstances, for the full space of fifty feet, should have given the signal. Having come to a stop, it would have been necessary for him to back up fifteen feet and then commencing to give the signal drive forward for the distance of fifty feet. Then as he drove forward he must stop again and so on ad infinitum.

[3, 4] The plaintiffs also claim that the defendant was intoxicated. The evidence on that subject is that between 8 o'clock and 11 o'clock on the evening before the accident the defendant had four drinks. The accident occurred at 3 o'clock next morning. At the time of the accident it does not appear that he was under the influence of intoxicating liquor. We may not say that the jury erred when it declined to find to the contrary. The plaintiffs also assert that misconduct occurred on the part of the defendant in the trial of the action. The incident arose as follows: After the jury had been selected one of the attorneys for the plaintiffs made an opening statement. When he took his seat one of the attorneys for the defendant immediately arose and proceeded to make the opening statement for the defendant. Toward the close of the latter statement counsel stated:

"We will also show you that at the Highland Hospital, I believe before all of them, that Mr. Wood, the driver of this car in which the plaintiffs were riding said not once but many, many times that the accident was all his fault and that he didn't see—

"Mr. Hildebrand (interrupting): Such testimony would be hearsay as far as the plaintiffs are concerned and we object to any statement of counsel as obvious hearsay. * * *

"The Court: I don't know—the evidence will be offered, but in any event at this time I will advise the jury that they are not to take as evidence any statement made by counsel at this time." Thereafter during the course of the trial the defendant attempted to introduce the declarations so claimed to have been made by Mr. Wood. The plaintiffs objected that the declarations were hearsay. The court sustained the objections. Moreover, the court gave instructions fully cautioning the jury that the verdict of the jury must rest on evidence admitted, not on questions, objections to which were sustained, and not on statements of counsel. The plaintiffs claim that they were entitled to a fair trial. No one would claim to the contrary. However, a most cursory reading of the record discloses that they had an eminently fair trial.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

115 Cal.App. 672
BERGERON et al. v. EMPLOYERS' FIRE
INS. CO.
Civ. 325.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

July 27, 1931.

1. Appeal and error ⇨673(2).

In action on fire policy, court could not consider claim that notice to insured to submit to examination was insufficient; notice not being before court, and court below having found insured was duly notified.

2. Insurance ⇨612(2).

Insured, if properly notified pursuant to fire policy clause, must submit to examination under oath as condition precedent to action.

3. Insurance ⇨548.

Insurer having, pursuant to fire policy, duly notified insured to submit to examination under oath, insured must, though excused by illness from attending at time and place set, offer to submit to examination as soon as able.

That insured was justified by her illness in not submitting to examination at place and time named in notice was not sufficient excuse for not submitting to such examination at some other time and, if necessary, at some other place.

4. Insurance ⇨548.

Fire insurer, having duly notified insured to submit to examination under oath and not knowing any reason for nonappearance, would not be required to give further notice or take further steps to secure examination.

5. Insurance ⇨548.

Findings that insured, at time set by notice to submit to examination under oath, was ill and shortly thereafter removed to other city because of illness, held insufficient, without more, to excuse compliance with fire policy.

This was so since, in absence of facts showing that insured's disability continued to time of trial, or that in some way burden of making new demand was shifted to insurer, there would be no sufficient excuse for noncompliance with policy provision requiring insured to submit to examination under oath as often as required.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; E. F. Brittan, Judge.

Action by Lyman Bergeron and another against the Employers' Fire Insurance Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals.

Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

BARNARD, P. J.

The defendant insurance company issued to one Nettie E. Ratchford a policy of fire insurance covering certain property in Taft, Cal. The plaintiffs herein held a mortgage on the property, and a mortgage clause in their favor was attached to the policy. The insured property was destroyed by fire on February 7, 1928, while the policy was in force. Subsequently, Nettie E. Ratchford conveyed the property to the plaintiffs and assigned to them all of her rights under the insurance policy. This action was brought to recover for the loss sustained. The policy contained the following provisions:

"The insured * * * shall submit to examination under oath, as often as required.

"No suit or action on this policy for the recovery of any claim shall be sustained until after full compliance by the insured with all of the foregoing requirements. * * *

In its answer the defendant alleged as follows: "That said Nettie E. Ratchford failed and/or refused to submit to said examination under oath or to any examination under oath and said Nettie E. Ratchford did not appear at the time and place specified for said examination under oath nor give any excuse for her nonappearance; that said Nettie E. Ratchford never since nor before nor at any time has offered to submit to any examination under oath."

The action was tried before the court without a jury, and judgment was given for the plaintiff, based upon findings of fact. This appeal comes before us upon the judgment roll alone.

The court found that the insurance policy in question contained the provisions above quoted, and also that the said Nettie E. Ratchford was duly notified in writing that she was required to submit to an examination under oath at the city hall in Taft, Cal., on July 14, 1928. The court also found as follows: "That said Nettie E. Ratchford on and prior to the 14th day of July, 1928, was ill and unable to get out of bed; and was unable to attend to her business affairs because of her illness; that said Nettie E. Ratchford was justified by her illness in not submitting to the examination as was required by said defendant company on the 14th day of July, 1928, and that shortly after said date, the said Nettie E. Ratchford was obliged, because of her illness, to, and did leave the City of Taft, California, and go to the City of Ventura, California and remain there because of her health." No other findings in reference to the point in issue were made. The only point raised by appellant is that these findings do not support the judgment, in that they do not show that Nettie E. Ratchford submitted herself to examination under oath when required to do so, and that they do not show a reasonable excuse for her failure to comply with that provision of the policy.

[1-5] Respondents, while conceding that Nettie E. Ratchford did not submit herself to an examination under oath, and while admitting the validity of the provisions for examination contained in the policy, seek to justify the failure of the insured in this respect, upon two grounds. It is first claimed that the notice itself was insufficient, as it did not specify the person before whom the examination would be held. Even if such a requirement were assumed, the notice is not before us and the court found that the insured was duly notified. This contention need not be further considered. The main reliance of respondents is placed upon the contention that the time and place set for the examination were not reasonable as to the assured, in view of her illness at that time, and that this illness excused her from appearing. Respondents devote most of their argument to the discussion of whether the particular time and place set were reasonable so far as the insured is concerned, in view of her illness. However, the real question presented is not as to the reasonableness of the time and place set, but is whether an insured, after receiving such a notice, may ignore the matter entirely, and, without either notifying the company of the reason for his nonappearance or offering to submit to an examination at some other time and place, proceed to trial, with nothing further being done in reference to the desired examination. In other words, the question is whether the court's findings that Nettie E. Ratchford was on and prior to that particular day ill and unable to get out of bed and unable to attend to her business affairs, and that shortly after that day she was obliged, because of her illness, to move to Ventura and remain there because of her health, are alone sufficient to excuse compliance with the insurance contract and to sustain the judgment. We think this must be answered in the negative.

It is settled in this state that an insured, if required to do so by a proper notice, shall submit to an examination under oath, and that this is a condition precedent to any right of action. Hickman v. London Assurance Corporation, 184 Cal. 524, 195 P. 45, 49, 18 A. L. R. 742. In that case the court said: "The demand was made upon him by virtue of the stipulation in the contract and by the stipulation alone must his refusal be judged. The stipulation constituted a promissory warranty under which appellants had the right to demand compliance by respondent 'as often as required,' and the performance of such stipulation was a condition precedent to any right of action. No question was raised as to the sufficiency of the demand, or, aside from the claim of privilege, as to the reasonableness of the time and place designated in the demand. The obligation to perform the warranty was as binding on respondent as his obligation to pay the premiums on the policies. The respondent did not fulfill his obligation, and stands here as having recovered a judgment upon an express contract one of the conditions of which he has failed to perform; in other words, when he commenced this suit he was without a cause of action."

The respondents rely upon the cases of Phillips v. Protection Insurance Co., 14 Mo. 220; Pierce v. Globe & Rutgers Fire Insurance Co., 107 Wash. 501, 182 P. 586; Pearlstine v. Westchester Fire Insurance Co., 70 S. C. 75, 49 S. E. 4; and Central National Fire Insurance Co. v. Black (C. C. A.) 220 F. 8, as sustaining their position. None of these cases have that effect. In the Phillips Case a notice to appear for examination was served on the assured just as he was leaving home for the purpose of taking his sick child beyond the range of a cholera epidemic, which was then raging near the scene of the fire. Subsequently, however, and before suit was filed, the insured returned and offered to submit to examination, which offer was refused by the company. In the Pierce Case, even if it were conceded to be authority in this state, the place set for the examination was held as unreasonable, as not being the place where the fire occurred. In the Pearlstine Case it was held that the assured was not excused from appearing for an examination because he had fled the country to avoid arrest. The case of Central Fire Insurance Co. v. Black has no bearing upon the question before us on this appeal.

Conceding that the illness of this assured excused her attendance for examination at the particular time and place set, the fact remains that the appellant had done all that it was required to do to set in motion the policy provisions for an examination of the insured under oath, and it was then incumbent upon the insured to endeavor to comply with the contract as soon as she was able to do so, by offering to submit to such an examination at a later time. That she was justified by her illness in not submitting to an examination at the place and time named, is not a sufficient excuse for not submitting to such an examination at some other time, and if necessary, at some other place. No reason appears why she could not have been examined at Ventura, had she been willing. She could not ignore the notice and proceed to trial in disregard of the plain provisions of her contract. Not knowing of the existence of any reason for her nonappearance at the place and time set, the appellant would not be called upon to give a further notice, or to take further steps to secure the desired examination. In the absence of facts showing that her disability continued to the time of trial, or that in some way the burden of making a new demand was shifted to appellant, the respondents have not brought themselves within the established rules. We conclude that the findings of the court, standing alone, are not sufficient to excuse compliance with the contract and to sustain the judgment.

While the court found that the insured executed a conveyance of the property on July 18, 1928, four days after the time set for her examination, which might indicate that a complete disability was not continuous, the evidence not being before us, we are unable to tell what the facts are in that regard, and for that reason we think the case should be retried.

The judgment is reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

MEYER et al. v. JOHNSON et al.
Civ. 6751.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

1. Insurance ⇨448.

When beneficiary under life insurance policy murders insured, beneficiary cannot recover on policy.

2. Insurance ⇨448.

When beneficiary under life policy murders insured, proceeds of policy become part of insured's estate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clair S. Tappaan, Judge.

Action by Mary Meyer, as administratrix of the estate of Hazel Edna Johnson, deceased, and another, against Granville William Johnson and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed.

Laird L. Neal and Burke, Catlin & Burke, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Meserve, Mumper, Hughes & Robertson, of Los Angeles, for respondent New York Life Ins. Co.

WORKS, P. J.

The complaint in this action purports to state two causes of action, each designed to recover on one of two policies of life insurance. We shall treat the controversy, in our discussion of it, as if there were but one cause of action, as the questions presented by the appeal are identical as to each of the two alleged causes.

Among other things, it is alleged in the pleading of plaintiffs that Mary Meyer is administratrix of the estate of Hazel Edna Johnson, deceased, and the guardian of Robert William Paul, all as stated in the title to the action; that Robert Paul is a minor, the only living child and heir at law of Hazel Johnson; that on or about April 21, 1926, there was issued by defendant life insurance company and delivered to Hazel Johnson and defendant Granville William Johnson, her husband, a policy of insurance on the life of Hazel payable to Granville; that on or about May 2, 1926, Granville did unlawfully and feloniously kill and murder Hazel; that he was arrested, tried and convicted of the murder, in Arizona; and that judgment of death was pronounced by the court against him. Judgment is prayed in the complaint here that the face of the policy and interest thereon be by defendant life insurance company paid to the estate of Hazel, for the benefit of the plaintiff Paul.

Defendant life insurance company interposed an answer to the complaint, in which it pleaded both defensive and affirmative matter.

At the trial objection was made to the reception of evidence to support the allegations of the complaint on the ground that the pleading did not state a cause of action. The objection was sustained and judgment went for defendants. The plaintiffs appeal.

[1] When the beneficiary under a life insurance policy murders the insured he cannot recover on the instrument. This rule is based upon public policy and is supported by a multitude of cases extending over a widespread jurisdiction, so much so that it is unnecessary to refer to any of them.

[2] The question presented for our decision is whether the avails of the policies here in question have become, because of the murder of the insured by the beneficiary, a part of her estate, and therefore, ultimately, the property of the minor Paul, her sole heir; it being conceded in the briefs that he is not an heir of the beneficiary. The authorities on one side of this question are quite numerous and thoroughly convincing. It can hardly be said that any cases cited by respondent really oppose them. The authorities first mentioned support the sensible view that the fund here in question is a part of Hazel Edna Johnson's estate. It is contended that those cited by respondent take the very unsatisfactory view that the fund goes to the heirs of her murderer, despite the fact that it can never become a part of his estate. It is to be observed here that it appears from remarks in the briefs that the sentence of death passed upon Johnson was commuted to life imprisonment and that he is now confined in a penitentiary in Arizona.

We shall cite but a few of the authorities to the effect that the proceeds of the insurance policy here in question are rightfully a part of the estate of Hazel Johnson, deceased. It is said in 29 Cyc., at pages 156, 157, in an article entitled "Mutual Benefit Insurance," "In case the designation of a beneficiary proves for any reason to be ineffectual, the fund does not as a rule revert to the society," and the text then shows to whom the fund does go under certain varying conditions. It is stated, for instance, that where the beneficiary was eligible at the time of his designation but "since became ineligible or disqualified and so not entitled to take the benefit at the time of the member's death," some other person will take. To this portion of the text is appended the following note: "If the beneficiary murders the member, and so loses his rights as such * * * the fund may be recovered by such other persons (clearly the heirs of the insured) as would take had no beneficiary been designated." To this statement are cited two cases, one of which is Schmidt v. Northern Life Association, 112 Iowa, 41, 83 N. W. 800, 51 L. R. A. 141, 84 Am. St. Rep. 323. This case upholds the rule as stated in the note in 29 Cyc. and gives most excellent reason for it. The second case cited in the note in 29 Cyc. is Supreme Lodge, etc., v. Menkhause, 209 Ill. 277, 70 N. E. 567, 65 L. R. A. 508, 101 Am. St. Rep. 239. This decision also deserves a careful reading as supporting the contention made by appellants. A short but lucid and convincing opinion in support of the view of appellants is to be found also in Anderson v. Life Ins. Co. of Virginia, 152 N. C. 1, 67 S. E. 53. Another valuable case is Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Weightman, 61 Okl. 106, 160 P. 629, L. R. A. 1917B, 1210. Not only is this so because the opinion rendered by the court sustains the contention of appellants, but also because the court cites several text-writers and several other decisions to the same effect. See, also, Sharpless v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W., 135 Minn. 35, 159 N. W. 1086, L. R. A. 1917B, 670, and the note appended to the report last mentioned.

It is difficult to see how this line of cases can be overcome and how the public policy which seems to shine through them can be shown not to exist, but let us now turn to the cases cited by respondent. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 6 S. Ct. 877, 880, 29 L. Ed. 997, is not in point. In that case the only question decided was that the trial court had erred in excluding certain evidence which was material to a determination of the point as to whether an assignee of the beneficiary had murdered the insured. Because of the exclusion of this evidence the cause was sent back for a new trial. There is, however, some obiter in the opinion which leans toward the contention of respondents. Of this we shall make some mention for the reason that it has been given a fictitious value in one or two other cases. The opinion was rendered upon writ of error and related to an action brought in New York by the administratrix of a deceased insured who was murdered by or at the instance of an assignee of the insurance policy upon the former's life. The defendant in this action was the insurance company, and by the action it was attempted to procure judgment for the avails of the policy. In the course of the opinion Justice Field said (the individual named in the quotation having been the murderer of the insured): "The assignment conveying to Hunter the whole interest of the assured, his representatives alone would have a valid claim under it, if the policy were not void in its inception." This language is obiter for the reason that the evidence which was ruled out by the trial court, the reversal having been ordered because thereof, was properly admissible whether that court were finally to decide that the "valid claim" could be made only by the personal representatives of the insured or by those of the murderer. It was therefore necessary to go no further than to say that the evidence was admissible, especially as the order made was for a reversal and for a new trial. The refused evidence went only to the question whether Hunter was the murderer of the assured.

The obiter in Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, supra, is quoted in Spicer v. New York L. Ins. Co. (C. C. A.) 268 F. 500, 501. In the last-mentioned case the court also, following certain other cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, says: "The liability imposed on the insurer by the policy is purely contractual. That instrument is the measure of the rights of everybody under it. It furnishes no support for a recovery against the insurer by one in whose behalf or favor the insurer has promised to pay nothing in the event of the death of one of the insured, leaving the other surviving." We think this language can have no application here. In the case cited the policy was one insuring the lives of both husband and wife, the amount named in the instrument to be paid to either spouse upon the decease of the other. The husband murdered the wife, and the federal court held that the personal representatives of the wife could not recover, for the reason stated in the above quotation, declaring, incidentally, that the murderer, who was under life imprisonment because of the murder, had no interest in the instrument. We are not concerned with the question whether the language quoted from the opinion affords support for the conclusion reached by it, but we are amply satisfied that it has no bearing whatever upon the case now before us.

We have also examined Goldstein v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co., 225 App. Div. 642, 234 N. Y. S. 250, cited by respondent, but see nothing in the opinion there rendered which can be of assistance to us.

As we have already observed, a murderer of a person whose life is insured, the murderer being the beneficiary under the insurance policy, cannot make a valid claim upon it. This rule is announced even in the cases cited by respondent. The rule is no violation of the provision of American codes to the effect that the commission of crime shall not result in the corruption of heritable blood. In the interest of the common welfare and in the maintenance of a just and enlightened public policy it merely prevents the perpetrator of the most hideous of crimes from profiting by his felonious conduct. This public policy surely extends further than we have indicated heretofore. If the rule were that the personal representatives of murderously inclined beneficiaries might take money made bloody by the slaying of those inclined to generosity, how many individuals who now walk the streets might ride in Rolls-Royces or emulate the eagle in his dizzy flight? By such a rule many a beneficiary, aged or infirm, and contemplating a young and healthful assured, would be tempted to commit a crime which would enrich his heirs, although it were too late to enrich himself. Indeed, many a man has committed atrocious crimes for the benefit of his children.

In some of the earlier cases like the present some of the insurance companies attempted to void policies when those who were assured had been murdered by those they had named as beneficiaries. So far as we have discovered these attempts have been uniformly frustrated, and it has been decided that the avails of the policies must be paid to some one. It is horrifying to think that the money could be paid to the representatives of murderers. It is soothing to think that it can go to the heirs of the murdered. At any rate, we think it is the law that these latter should receive it.

Judgment reversed.

Action by Chas. L. Conte against Janis Busby, also known as Claire O'Brien, also known as Mabel O'Brien, also known as Marciea Janis Wells, and another. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Russell P. Tyler, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Byrne & Lamson, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued on a common count for money had and received in the sum of $1,015.20. The cause was tried without a jury. Judgment went for plaintiff against defendant Busby for $145, and for the other defendant for its costs. Plaintiff appeals upon typewritten transcripts.

On April 15, 1929, plaintiff sold to defendant Busby his leasehold interest, together with the furnishings and equipment of certain premises to be used as a house of prostitution. In payment Busby gave plaintiff a postdated draft for $1,015.20 drawn in her favor by Wm. Cavalier & Co. upon Logan & Bryan. Plaintiff accepted the draft and paid Busby the sum of $145, representing the difference between the agreed purchase price of the property and the face of the draft. Before the draft became legally presentable for payment, defendant Busby stopped payment and claimed the property purchased did not meet representations. She thereafter obtained possession of the draft from plaintiff on the promise that she would have it paid and accompanied plaintiff to the office of her codefendant, where she presented the draft with instructions to disregard her former protest and to pay the money to her. Plaintiff made no objection to these instructions, but did inquire if the money could be paid to him, and was informed: "Yes, if Mrs. Busby says so." Later in the same day Mrs. Busby returned alone and received payment for the full amount of the draft. Plaintiff's testimony differed in some respects from what has been stated, but there is ample evidence in the record to sustain the findings of the trial court, and it would serve no purpose to repeat that testimony here.

[1-3] The case is controlled by the general principle that, where a part of a consideration for one or more objects is void, the whole contract is void. Civ. Code, § 1608. The trial court found that the indorsement by Busby of the draft was in consideration of and for the purpose of enabling her to conduct a house of prostitution, which is declared an unlawful act. Pen. Code, § 316. This assignment, or indorsement, was therefore void, and was unenforceable in the hands of the appellant as he took it with full knowledge of the unlawful consideration. "A void contract, a contract against public policy or against the mandate of the statute, may not be made the foundation of any action, either in law or in equity. Estate of Groome, 94 Cal. 69, 29 P. 487; Buck v. Eureka, 109 Cal. 504, 42 P. 243, 30 L. R. A. 409." Chateau v. Singla, 114 Cal. 91, 94, 45 P. 1015, 1016, 33 L. R. A. 750, 55 Am. St. Rep. 63. See Haruko Takeuchi v. Schmuck, 206 Cal. 782, 786, 276 P. 345, 346, where many cases are cited to the same point, and where the Supreme Court says that this rule is enforced from a regard for the interest of the public "whose welfare demands that certain transactions be discouraged."

The debatable point raised on this appeal is whether respondents may avail themselves of this defense, not having specially pleaded it. Appellant cites Sharon v. Sharon, 68 Cal. 29, 8 P. 614, and similar cases holding that, unless the illegality appears on the face of the instrument, or is brought out without objection, evidence is not admissible to prove it, unless the defense has been specially pleaded. Respondent relies on the rule that, where the defendant does not set up the defense of illegality, "but that the case made by the plaintiff or the defendant shows illegality, it becomes the duty of the court sua sponte to refuse to entertain the action." Dean v. Mc Nerney, 91 Cal. App. 206, 208, 266 P. 975, 976. In the early case of Valentine v. Stewart, 15 Cal. 387, 405, the Supreme Court says: "If, from the plaintiff's own stating or otherwise, the cause of action appears to arise ex turpi causa, or the transgression of a positive law of this country, there the Court says he has no right to be assisted. It is upon that ground the Court goes, not for the sake of the defendant, but because they will not lend their aid to such a plaintiff." To the same effect are: Kreamer v. Earl, 91 Cal. 112, 117, 27 P. 735; De Leonis v. Walsh, 140 Cal. 175, 182, 73 P. 813; Domenigoni v. Imperial Live Stock, etc., Co., 189 Cal. 467, 476, 209 P. 36.

Though he does not concede the rule of these cases, appellant voices the objection that all the evidence of the illegality of the transaction was improperly admitted. The record shows that he made no objection to the testimony on the ground that the defense was not pleaded, but that he objected solely on the ground that it was not competent nor material in relation to the case of Wm. Cavalier & Co. The objection was overruled at the time with leave to appellant to move to strike it out and to argue the point. The record does not disclose that the motion to strike was later brought to the attention of the court or that a ruling was made upon it, though, at the close of the case, appellant asked leave to submit authorities on "the point of law as to consideration."

[4, 5] The grounds urged in the objection—that the evidence of illegality was not available to the third party—are not good. 6 Cal. Jur., p. 150, N-6. If the motion to strike the testimony on the grounds now urged—the failure to plead the defense—was not made or was not urged, the failure to do so under the circumstances was a waiver of any objection to the admission of the testimony. #### WORKS, P. J.

Defendant was convicted upon a charge of violating the provisions of section 288 of the Penal Code, denouncing the commission of lewd and lascivious acts upon the persons of children under the age of fourteen. Defendant's victim was a girl nearly twelve years of age. He himself was forty-nine. The cause was tried without a jury. Defendant appeals from the judgment of conviction and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The sole point made by appellant is that the evidence was insufficient to support the judgment; this contention, in turn, being based upon the assertion that the girl contradicted herself in her testimony to such an extent as to render it worthless. Upon reading the brief of appellant alone, we were much inclined to the belief that the point is without merit, but, particularly, as the charge against appellant was of so serious a nature we have read the entire transcript of the testimony. From the perusal we are bound to say that the evidence in support of the judgment is most ample. We are so well satisfied with this view that it would be a useless task and a waste of time to quote from the record. To do so would make a long opinion, whereas we are wholly content to write a short one.

Judgment and order affirmed.

FINNEY, Justice pro tem.

The appellant, Harold Vincent, was convicted of robbery in the second degree and sentenced to serve the term prescribed by law in the state penitentiary at San Quentin. Judgment was pronounced on April 6, 1931, and on the same day defendant gave oral notice of appeal from the "judgment of conviction." On April 8, 1931, written notice of appeal was filed, stating that the defendant appealed from the judgment and from the order of the court denying his motion for a new trial. The motion for a new trial was dated March 30, 1931, and was filed the following day. The motion stated, among other things, that the defendant "moves the above-named court for a new trial under section 1181 of the Penal Code and all subdivisions thereunder and amendments thereto and more especially under subdivisions 4, 5, 6, and 7," and "that since the rendition of said verdict against said defendant, said defendant has discovered new evidence material to defendant's case, which, if produced at the trial of the case, would have resulted in a different verdict." The motion for a new trial was denied April 6, 1931. An application for a transcript of the phonographic reporter's notes was filed April 8, 1931, but this instrument does not contain any statement of the grounds of the appeal nor the points upon which the appellant relies, as required under section 7, rule II, of the Rules of the Judicial Council for the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal, adopted June 1, 1928, and the Attorney General moves to dismiss this appeal on that ground.

[1, 2] The provisions of section 7, rule II, of the Rules of the Judicial Council provide that, in a criminal case, "the appellant must, within five days after giving notice of the appeal, file with the clerk and present an application to the trial court, stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which the appellant relies, and designate what portions of the phonographic reporter's notes it will be necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points relied upon. If such application is not filed within said time, the appeal shall be dismissed." This provision is mandatory, and it has been held that, where no such application has been presented or filed, the appeal must be dismissed. See People v. Rutledge (Cal. App.) 300 P. 828, and cases therein referred to. It has also been held that an application filed and presented to the trial court for an order directing the reporter "to make a transcript of the testimony taken at the trial of said cause, to be used on appeal," which did not state the grounds of appeal or the points on which appellant relies, is insufficient. People v. Flaherty, 61 Cal. App. 775, 215 P. 699; People v. Pierce, 89 Cal. App. 290, 264 P. 519.

WHITING FINANCE CO. v. HOPKINS et al.
Civ. 7698.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 3, 1931.

[3] The application for the reporter's transcript, in the case at bar, was filed and presented to the trial court in due season and designates with great particularity the portions of the reporter's notes necessary to be transcribed, but it contains no statement of the grounds of the appeal or the points upon which the appellant relies. In this application demand is also made for a transcript of "the whole and entire phonographic notes taken by the phonographic reporter from the hearing of the motion for a new trial, together with all documents presented, heard, read and introduced upon said motion in the above-entitled cause, and the whole thereof." We do not regard this reference to the motion for a new trial as a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the rule under consideration, even if the reporter had incorporated in his transcript the motion for a new trial and the grounds stated therein upon which the motion was made.

A motion for a new trial is required to be set forth in the clerk's transcript, if anywhere (section 1, rule II, Rules of Judicial Council), and it was not contemplated, under the rules referred to, that a mere reference thereto in the application for the reporter's transcript or incorporation thereof in the reporter's transcript would suffice for the statement of the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which appellant relies. In fact, the two may differ greatly. In a motion for a new trial it is common practice to incorporate all the statutory grounds upon which a new trial may be based, whether they are relied upon or not. On the appeal many of these grounds are waived or not urged at all by the appellant. He is required to place in his application for the reporter's transcript a statement showing the grounds of his appeal and the points upon which he relies. This is required in order to economize the time of the court in searching the record and to show good faith on the part of the appellant in taking the appeal. But in his notice of motion for a new trial no such requirement is placed upon him. In such a notice he may include whatever he chooses to place there, and one will not answer the purpose of the other.

[4] The application for the reporter's transcript in this case is deficient in that it contains no statement of the grounds of the appeal or the points upon which the appellant relies, and, inasmuch as the filing of an application containing such a statement is made a necessary prerequisite to the prosecution of an appeal from a judgment of conviction, the court is without jurisdiction to consider the appeal herein.

The appeal is therefore dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action by the Whiting Finance Company against Ed. W. Hopkins and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Victor Ford Collins, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and Gordon Boller, Dep. Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents County of Los Angeles, Ed. W. Hopkins, and W. O. Welch.

Erwin P. Werner, City Atty., of Los Angeles, for respondent City of Los Angeles.

MURPHEY, Justice pro tem.

This action is predicated upon a stipulated statement of facts, from which the following, pertinent to the issues involved in this action, are taken:

Plaintiff, an investment company, was assessed in 1924 for city and county taxes in the city of Los Angeles and the county of Los Angeles in the sum of \$463,573.91 as solvent credits. Against this amount, a deduction in the sum of \$142,175.15 on account of debts was allowed. Appellant claimed that it was entitled to a further deduction of \$350,000 arising out of the following transactions: On February 25, 1924, the appellant purchased \$300,000 worth of Liberty bonds from the Security Trust & Savings Bank, giving in payment therefor its thirty-day promissory note bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. On the same day, the appellant purchased from the American Bank \$50,000 in United States treasury certificates bearing interest at  $4\frac{1}{4}$  per cent. per annum, giving in payment therefor its thirty-day promissory note bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. These transactions were both subsequently closed on the 10th day of March, 1924, the certificates sold and the indebtedness to the banks liquidated. This transaction, appellant contends, was declared to the assessor, respondent herein. It does not appear from the record or from the stipulation of facts by whom or in what manner such declaration was made. The assessor refused to allow credit for such indebtedness. The court adopted as its findings the stipulation of facts agreed upon by the parties, and in addition thereto found that all of said indebtedness which the assessor refused to allow as offset against plaintiff's solvent credits was incurred solely for the purpose of evading payment of taxes justly due on the property of plaintiff, and for no other purpose. The appellant was obligated in these transactions to pay 7 per cent. and 6 per cent. interest per annum respectively on these obligations, and in return received tax-exempt government securities bearing interest at the rate of  $4\frac{1}{4}$  per cent. per annum.

It is the contention of appellant that there is no evidence to sustain the additional findings of fact of the trial court hereinbefore set out; that the findings are a mere surmise of the court, and furthermore, that even if it had been proved and found that these indebtednesses were actually created by appellant for the purpose of reducing its taxes, that nevertheless such fact would not be material, relying in support of this statement upon its construction of the conclusions of the New York case of People v. Ryan, 88 N. Y. 142, 42 Am. Rep. 239, and the assertion that this question has never been passed upon in this state. In the New York case, the court said: "We are referred to no statute which prohibits a property owner from choosing between the embarrassment of a debt and submission to a burden, justly indeed imposed on all, and which, if he escapes, must altogether fall upon his neighbors. The assessors, therefore, exceeded their necessary duty when, by inquisition, they so pressed the relator as to call from him a disavowal of that purpose and his innocence of intention to circumvent 'the tax laws.' The argument of the appellants is, in effect, to show that this was an ingenious falsehood. It touches, however, not the fact of an indebtedness, but the motive which led to its creation. The statute concerns itself only with the debt. It makes the 'taxable personal property' of an individual, so much only of that species of his estate as remains 'after deducting the just debts owing by him.'"

[1] In stating that this question has never been passed upon by the courts of this state, counsel for appellant entirely overlooked the case of Whiting Finance Co. v. Hopkins, 199 Cal. 429, 249 P. 853, 856, wherein the activities of this same corporation as appellant were concerned, and wherein the facts in substance and effect were identical with the situation involved in this litigation. In that case, the Supreme Court said: "It appears therefrom that the plaintiff, on February 17, 1923, opened a savings account with the Security Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles and deposited therein the sum of $1. On March 1, 1923, the plaintiff negotiated a loan of $175,000 from the commercial department of the same bank, and on the same day deposited said sum so borrowed in its said savings account in said bank. On March 7, 1923, the plaintiff withdrew from its said savings account the whole of said sum and repaid its loan thereof to the bank. The board of equalization of the county of Los Angeles, upon an investigation of the foregoing facts, held under the provisions of section 3673 of the Political Code, determined that the foregoing series of transactions on the part of the plaintiff had been undertaken for the purpose of evading taxation, and it accordingly acted * * * by ordering the plaintiff's assessment raised so as to make it conform to the true value of its assessable property. * * * We are of the opinion that the trial court committed no error in its ruling upon this phase of the plaintiff's case. The weight of authority, in our opinion, as well as the dictates of decency, honor, and loyalty, uphold the right of boards of equalization to fully inquire into transactions of this character with a view to preventing the evasion of taxation by individuals or corporations seeking by these and similar methods so to do."

The facts of this case tend more strongly to support the position taken by respondents than do the facts in the case just quoted between the same parties. The record shows that appellant is a finance company dealing in automobile conditional sales contracts. Practically its entire assets consist of solvent credits. Just before the tax date, under the procedure already detailed, appellant incurred debts in an amount sufficient, if effective for the purpose, to wipe out entirely the tax upon such credits. It was no part of appellant's business to deal in stocks and bonds. Its sole business was automobile sales contracts. Nevertheless it incurred debts in the sum of \$350,000 in order to purchase government securities. On February 25, 1924, just a week prior to 12 o'clock a. m. of March 3, 1924, appellant, by two transactions, incurred debts in order to purchase \$300,000 of tax exempt bonds and \$50,000 of tax exempt United States certificates. The notes were given to run only thirty days. They paid respectively 7 per cent. and 6 per cent. interest on these obligations. In adjusting the matter, the period of interest payment and the consequent loss sustained thereby was cut to the lowest possible minimum, to wit, fifteen days. The purchased certificates were sold and the notes paid off within fifteen days, when but half their time had run. In other words, the securities were bought a week before tax day, and sold the Monday following. The transaction involved an immediate financial loss and net cost to appellant of  $2\frac{3}{4}$  per cent. on \$300,000 and  $1\frac{1}{4}$  per cent. on \$50,000. It is perfectly apparent from this recitation of the facts, as they appeared not only to the city and county assessor and the board of equalization of Los Angeles county, but also to the judge of the superior court who tried the case, that the purpose of this transaction was not a business transaction with a view to financial profits, such as usually actuate business men in such transactions, nor was the purpose a patriotic one such as was evidenced by loyal citizens during war time, nor was the purpose to bear its proportion of the burden of taxation in support of municipal and county government. We do not see any escape from the conclusion reached by these officers that this transaction was intended to be merely a temporary deal conceived and executed with the purpose and intent of evading its just tax responsibility. Appellant concedes that the assessor, board of equalization, and the trial court believed that this indebtedness was created with the motive of evading taxation. We are of the opinion that their belief is predicated upon and amply supported by a recital of the facts hereinabove set out.

[2] While in the New York case, supra, the view seems to be that neither the assessor, the board of equalization, nor the court can investigate an attempted patent fraud of this character, it nevertheless is not the rule in this state, nor have the courts in this or other jurisdictions felt that their eyes must remain closed and their powers to function stand helpless and paralyzed to render nugatory and ineffectual such fraudulent purposes as are evidenced by the manipulations in the instant case. In Holly Springs Savings & Insurance Co. v. Supervisors, 52 Miss. 281, 24 Am. Rep. 668, the court said: "The question presented is, therefore, whether a banking institution can avoid taxation by an investment of its means in the non-taxable securities of the government, where it is admitted and satisfactorily established that such investment was neither intended to be permanent nor to continue until the interest or the will of its managers should dictate a change, but with the sole intention of escaping taxation, and with the predetermined purpose of reconverting its means as soon as practicable after the day of assessment.

* * * The court below did not err in holding the capital stock of plaintiff in error to be taxable under the state of facts disclosed by the record. * * * It is argued that the savings institution was only bound by law to make out and deliver a list 'of all taxable property of which it was possessed on the 1st day of January preceding,' and that if on said day it was possessed of no property taxable by law, it cannot be made to pay taxes, and that the state cannot inquire by what means it dispossessed itself of the property, or what are its intentions with regard to repossessing itself of it. There are, we think, two satisfactory answers to this reasoning. In the first place, it proceeds upon a too literal interpretation of the statute; and, in the second place, it overlooks the principle that fraud vitiates everything into which it enters, and nullifies the advantages which fair dealing would have conferred. When the state imposes the burden of taxation upon the property possessed by the citizen, it means both that of which he is the open holder and that which he has secreted and concealed. His cunning may in practice defeat the imposition upon the latter, but it is legally no less liable to the burden, and, when discovered, the duty will be exacted, no matter what the shifts and devices which may have been resorted to in order to escape."

In the case of Jones v. Seward County, 10 Neb. 154, 4 N. W. 946, 947, the court says: "The court below found that the plaintiff did not purchase the bonds in question in good faith. Is this finding sustained by the evidence? We think it is. The plaintiff does not claim that the money was intended by him to remain invested in bonds. On the contrary, it appears from his own testimony that the investment was merely temporary. It is evident that the investment, if such it can be called, was not made for profit, although there was a small profit. * * * But it is said fraud is never presumed, but must be proved. This is true. But in what manner is it to be proved? Judge Story says: 'Fraud, indeed, in the sense of a court of equity, properly includes all acts, omissions and concealments which involve a breach of legal or equitable duty, trust or confidence, justly reposed, and are injurious to another, or by which an undue and unconscientious advantage is taken of another.' Story's Eq. Jur. § 187. And, in speaking of the proof, it is said: 'On the other hand, neither of these courts insists upon positive and express proofs of fraud, but each deduces them from circumstances affording strong presumptions.' Id. § 190. In but few instances, comparatively, can fraudulent intent be shown by direct testimony, and, therefore, is generally established by circumstantial evidence, and in our opinion the testimony establishes the fact that the bonds in question were purchased by the plaintiff, not with the design of making a permanent investment, but for the sole purpose of evading taxation. * * * When a change is thus made for the sole purpose of defrauding the government of its just dues, and to enable a party to escape the payment of his just proportion of the taxes imposed by law, he cannot shelter himself behind such temporary change in the character of his funds to escape taxation."

To the same effect are the cases of In re People's Bank of Vermont, 203 Ill. 300, 67 N. E. 777; Poppleton v. Yamhill County, 8 Or. 337; Mitchell v. Leavenworth County Commissioners, 91 U. S. 206, 23 L. Ed. 302, in which case the Supreme Court of Kansas dismissed the appeal (9 Kan. 344) saying that "a court of justice, sitting as a court of equity, will not lend its aid for the accomplishment of any such purpose." Mitchell appealed to the United States Supreme Court, which said: "We think the decision in this case was correct. United States notes are exempt from taxation by or under state or municipal authority; but a court of equity will not knowingly use its extraordinary powers to promote any such scheme as this plaintiff devised to escape his proportionate share of the burdens of taxation." See, also, Dixon County v. Halstead, 23 Neb. 697, 37 N. W. 621; Senour v. Matchett, 140 Ind. 636, 40 N. E. 122.

[3] The trial court, so far as disclosed by the record, based its decision solely, and this is evidenced by the foregoing discussion and we believe correctly, upon the ground of fraudulent evasion of tax obligation to the municipality and county government in the city of Los Angeles and in the county of Los Angeles. Respondent discusses several other points in support of the conclusions reached by the trial court, all of which appellant contends were not presented to that tribunal. It is not clear from the record just what matters were called to the attention of the trial court. These points, briefly stated, are, first, that appellant did not entitle itself to the deductions which it herein claims by declaring in its property statements to the assessor its alleged deductible debts. Such a declaration by the property owner under oath in its property statement is a condition precedent to any right to a deduction of debts in the assessment of taxable credits. Pol. Code, § 3629, subd. 7; 3 Cooley on Taxation (4th Ed.) § 1159.

[4] Second, it does not appear that appellant's notes to the two banks were issued to residents of the state, such that if still held by the banks on the tax date, they would be legally deductible from appellant's taxable credits. Third, appellant did own taxable credits. The valuation of such credits, whether by the process originally fixing that value, or of fixing it after first crediting against the same the amount of deductible debts, was a question of valuation purely, and, as such, was for the assessor and the board of equalization. It was not a question open to judicial review. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 162 Cal. 164, 121 P. 384, 9 A. L. R. 1277; Southern California Hardwood etc. Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 49 Cal. App. 712, 194 P. 62; Globe Grain & Milling Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 62 Cal. App. 297, 216 P. 631. These are all cases in which the point involving this subdivision was practically passed upon adversely to the contentions of appellant by the appellate court of this state.

We do not deem it necessary to discuss extensively the questions raised in points 1, 2, and 3, just outlined, as we deem the conclusion of the trial court on the sole point mentioned in its findings and judgment to be so manifestly a correct legal solution of the problems involved in this litigation, that any further discussion would be superfluous.

The judgment is affirmed.

CRAIG, J.

Certain real property in Los Angeles county held under lease by the appellant corporation, of which the individual appellants were directors, was acquired by them for the drilling of an oil well. The respondents purchased certificates representing interests known as overriding royalties therein. The well was not completed, demand for a return of the moneys paid for said certificates was refused, and in an action therefor judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, from which the defendants appealed.

Following negotiations between appellant McCaslin and respondent O'Connell, in the presence of one Charles A. Draper, during which the former offered to sell certificates, each representing "a gross overriding royalty interest equal to one per cent (1%) of the gross proceeds received from the sale of any and all oil, gas or other hydrocarbon substances produced, saved or sold," to quote from the testimony, McCaslin agreed. "O'Connell if you won't mention a price and take five per centages, I will let you have them for $800 a per cent. * * * The money is going to be put in trust and can be spent only for drilling this well for the protection of investors, and in the event the well is not drilled the money will be returned to the investors. * * * I kept the lease in my own hands. * * * You don't need to worry about this well going down. It is up to me to put down the well."

Thereupon, respondent O'Connell made and delivered to McCaslin his check: "Pay to the order of Union Drilling and Petroleum Co. $4,000.00 Four Thousand and no/100 Dollars. (Signed) G. O'Connell." Which was thereafter indorsed: "Pay to the order of H. E. MacAdams Union Drilling & Petroleum Co. W. E. McCaslin, Pres. E. B. Kenney, Secty. H. E. MacAdams." Respondent at the same time received from McCaslin five documents, each reciting that the "Union Drilling & Petroleum Company, a corporation, assignor herein, for and in consideration of the sum of ten dollars ($10.00) and other good and valuable consideration to it in hand paid by the assignee herein, Groover O'Connell and Maybel O'Connell, joint tenants, the assignee herein, a gross over-riding royalty interest equal to one per cent (1%) of the gross proceeds received from the sale of any and all oil, gas or other hydro-carbon substances produced, saved and sold from [lands described] * * * to be produced and saved under the terms of a certain oil and gas lease, executed by W. W. Bucknam, et al., as lessor, to Union Drilling & Petroleum Company, a California corporation, as lessee. * * * The assignor hereby warrants and declares that it is the owner of the royalty interest hereby assigned, and that it has not heretofore sold, mortgaged or otherwise encumbered same. In witness whereof, the said Union Drilling & Petroleum Company has hereunto affixed its corporate name and seal by its proper officers thereunto duly authorized, this 10th day of April, 1927, at Los Angeles, California. [Signed] Union Drilling & Petroleum Company, By W. E. McCaslin, President. E. B. Kenney, Secretary." The names of the assignees were then and there inserted by O'Connell, and it is not denied that said assignments had previously been in possession of one F. S. N. Parkinson. Respondent testified that Parkinson was present at the time of the assignments to respondent, and asked the latter's reason for inserting the names, to which O'Connell replied: "I am going to record them * * * tomorrow. * * * If they are as good as that check, they are worth recording." He further swore positively that MacAdams was at no time present, that he had no part in the transaction, and was not mentioned at any time, by any of the parties. In response to repeated inquiries by respondent, McCaslin about three months thereafter admitted: "We decided not to drill it. * * * It don't look good over on that side now. * * * Don't worry about your money. You will get your money back. I will attend to it right away. * * * I want to get this cleared up. The money is just as good as if you had it in your mind." However, respondent thereafter received a letter from the appellant corporation as follows: "We wish to inform you that this company received none of the money you paid for your interests. They were originally issued by us to H. E. McAdam pursuant to a contract between us for the drilling of the well and in consideration of work done by him thereunder. Mr. McAdam sold you these percents and we therefore suggest that you take the matter up with him."

[1] Notwithstanding the foregoing facts in the case, appellants advance the somewhat novel argument that "said certificates were not sold by the corporation, but on the contrary it delivered the same to MacAdams in compliance with its working agreement with him; * * * under this agreement it had agreed to execute and deliver to MacAdams assignments of per cents in the well as the work under the contract progressed. * * * It needs no legal authority to sustain the proposition that the title to these assignments became and was vested in MacAdams upon their delivery to Parkinson for him. In short, at the time of the sale to the plaintiffs, MacAdams was the owner of the certificates." Aside from an evasion of the consequences of admitted failure to obtain a permit from the commissioner of corporations, we are not advised as to the theory upon which appellants might escape responsibility for a sale of interests which they did not own. Whether the consideration was obtained through a violation of law or by misrepresentation to O'Connell as to ownership, respondents alleged both grounds for recovery of their money, and a judgment based upon either must be upheld if supported by substantial evidence. The trial court found that said defendant McCaslin represented and agreed that all moneys paid for said interests would be held by the company in trust for the sole purpose of drilling a well, and that, in the event of a failure to drill, said sum of $4,000 would be returned to respondents upon demand. The evidence herein recited was sufficient to warrant such findings, and the failure to drill or to refund the consideration is admitted.

[2, 3] Upon the same premise it is insisted that the transaction did not constitute a sale of an interest in securities within the purview of the Corporate Securities Act, Stats. 1925, p. 962, § 2, subds. 7 (b), 9. The act provides:

"Any instrument offered to the public by a 'company' evidencing or representing any right to participate or share in oil, gas or other hydrocarbon substances or other minerals of any sort, as yet undeveloped, or in the proceeds of sale thereof" is the legal definition of a "security."

"A 'sale,' within the meaning of this act, includes every contract, by which, for a pecuniary consideration, called a price, one transfers to another an interest in property. * * *"

It is argued that the working agreement between MacAdams and the corporation under which said certificates were delivered to MacAdams and the latter became the owner thereof was a contract for labor, and was not a sale. It is not apparent from the record why MacAdams did not retain the interests if in fact he had had them, but the evidence and findings that McCaslin and the corporation sold them to O'Connell and insisted that he make his check to the company refutes the asserted sale by MacAdams to O'Connell. That the interest held by the corporation was "property" is settled law. Terry v. Humphreys, 27 N. M. 564, 203 P. 539; Graciosa Oil Co. v. Santa Barbara County, 155 Cal. 140, 99 P. 483, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 211; Parker v. Riley, 250 U. S. 66, 39 S. Ct. 405, 63 L. Ed. 847. And the interest evidenced by the instruments sold by the company to O'Connell conveying the right to participate and share in undeveloped "oil, gas or other hydrocarbon substances produced, saved and sold" from any part of the realty under leasehold to said company, was no more nor less than a security within the specific definition of our statutes.

[4] Appellants assign as contradictory and irreconcilable findings of fact that the plaintiffs presented to the defendant company a check for $4,000, that they paid to the defendant company cash, lawful money of the United States, and that the moneys were had and received by the defendants from the plaintiffs.

It appears that by means of a check respondent converted $4,000 of the cash in his account at the bank into securities which proved to be of no value. The argument that a check is not cash is therefore inapplicable to the facts of the instant case. The corporation and its officers received the check and indorsed it. Its indorsement by MacAdams was not an incident of the transaction, nor was it known to O'Connell or material to the agreement of the parties.

[5-7] Error is assigned to the rendition of judgment against all of the defendants, but the argument and citation of authorities holding that where there are two or more joint tort-feasors and the tort is waived, or that, in an action for specific personal property, a different result is attained, are here untenable. The present action is based upon separate causes arising from the sale of interests without a permit from the commissioner of corporations, and for money had and received. Money paid by a purchaser for an interest under such void sale may be recovered in an action in assumpsit, as for money had and received. Smith v. Bach, 183 Cal. 259, 191 P. 14; Barrett v. Gore, 88 Cal. App. 372, 263 P. 564. And the corporation may be liable, although it neither authorized nor ratified the fraud. Chamberlain v. Southern California Edison Co., 167 Cal. 500, 140 P. 25; Boss v. Silent Drama Syndicate, 82 Cal. App. 109, 255 P. 225. As to officers of a corporation, it has been held generally that they do not incur liability simply by reason of their official character, but that if they commit a tort they are liable therefor; and it matters not what liability may attach to the corporation for the tort. It is said that this principle exists both in England and in this country as one founded upon the soundest legal analogies and the wisest public policy. Mayer v. Thompson-Hutchinson Bldg. Co., 104 Ala. 611, 16 So. 620, 28 L. R. A. 433, 53 Am. St. Rep. 88; Goodspeed v. E. Haddam Bank, 22 Conn. 530, 53 Am. Dec. 439; Donovan v. Purtell, 216 Ill. 629, 75 N. E. 334, 1 L. R. A. (N. "To permit an agent of a corporation, in carrying on its business, to inflict wrong and injuries upon others, and then shield himself from liability behind his vicarious character, would often both sanction and encourage the perpetration of flagrant and wanton injuries by agents of insolvent and irresponsible corporations. It would serve to stimulate the zeal of responsible and solvent agents of irresponsible and insolvent corporations in their efforts to repair the shattered fortunes of their failing principals upon the ruins of the rights of others." Nunnally v. Southern Iron Co., supra. The authorities are uniform in holding non-participants immune from liability, but the directors herein named who were respectively president and secretary of the appellant corporation are shown to have actively participated in the issuance of securities which were void from their inception. They bound their corporation to refund, in the event of a contingency, which transpired, the amount of respondents' outlay, by acts which they were individually bound to know were prohibited; and in the name of and for said corporation they obtained a valuable consideration for void evidences of a purported investment through which they hoped to profit at respondents' expense.

[8] It is contended that the trial court erred in sustaining objections to questions propounded by appellants as to conversations and occurrences tending to show that the money was paid to MacAdams for the purpose of drilling. It appears, however, that he was not present at the time of the purchase and payment by respondent to McCaslin, and that no drilling was done. Hence it is self-evident that the funds were not applied under the contract for the purposes contemplated by such purpose, and that the offered evidence was immaterial.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action by Mary Lois Dwyer and another against the Los Angeles Railway Corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Ed. Fitzpatrick and Culver & Nourse, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J.

Plaintiff Mrs. Dwyer was injured by collision with a street car of respondent under circumstances which may be described in general terms, as follows: At the corner of Seventh and Mateo streets, in the city of Los Angeles, the route of travel for the street cars of respondent makes a turn whereby north-bound cars on Mateo street, when they reach said intersection, turn to the left and then travel westward on Seventh street. From this, it results that persons intending to travel westward on Seventh street as passengers on respondent's cars are required to enter the cars at their stopping point at the southeast corner of the intersection, and at or near the point where the cars make their left turn. At the time of the accident in which Mrs. Dwyer (hereinafter called appellant) was injured, there were two lines of cars, one designated J cars and the other designated R cars (according to their respective routings), which regularly came to this intersection from the south. On the occasion of this accident, appellant had come to this corner for the purpose of becoming a passenger on a J car. The principal place of entry for passengers on these cars was at the rear end of the car, where the conductor has his principal station, but there is also a door at the front. For the purpose of more rapid disposal of the movement of passengers seeking to enter these cars during busy hours, respondent at such times kept at this corner an employee of the description commonly known as a "loader." It seems to be the particular business of this loader to stand near the front door of the car, at the place where the car stops, and there receive the fares of passengers who are then permitted to enter by the front door.

At the particular time of the accident in question, an R car had stopped at the intersection, and the loader was standing nearby, receiving fares. At the same time the J car, upon which appellant intended to become a passenger, was approaching from the south, but was distant "a block or so," probably less than the entire block, from the point where the R car had stopped. While the traffic situation was in the condition thus described, appellant stepped out to a place near the R car and near to the loader, for the purpose of handing to him her fare so that she would be ready to step into the J car upon its arrival. Manifestly this could not take place until the R car had moved forward on its way around the corner into Seventh street. At this instant, the R car did move forward, and in so moving the rear end of the car swung out to the east. In so doing, the side of the car, aptly described as the "rear overhang" thereof, struck appellant and knocked her down upon the street, and thereby caused the injuries of which she complains. The case went to trial on the second amended complaint and respondent's answer thereto. In said complaint, it was alleged that at the stated time and place the plaintiff "was holding herself in readiness and was about to become a passenger on one of defendant's street cars; that at that time and place the defendant carelessly, negligently and recklessly managed and operated one of its said street cars, and as a result," etc. Defendant in its answer denied that the plaintiff was holding herself in readiness or was about to become a passenger, and denied the allegations of negligence. Defendant also pleaded contributory negligence of the plaintiff. The judgment from which the plaintiff appeals was entered in accordance with the jury's verdict in favor of defendant.

[1] The evidence shows without dispute that appellant was not, and was not intending to be, a passenger on the car which hit her. There is no evidence of negligence in the operating of said car by either the conductor or motorman thereof, unless the mere happening of the accident would be such evidence. If there was any negligence with which respondent could be chargeable (unless with the exception above noted), it must have been negligence of the employee called the loader, and this must have consisted in his failure to perform some duty which his position imposed upon him with respect to appellant. If his duties were such that he was under obligation to look out for intending passengers and see that they did not stand too close to the cars as they swung out at the curb, and if he failed to use reasonable care in respect to that duty, and if as a result of such failure injury occurred to the intending passenger, then respondent would be chargeable with negligence in the transaction, and the jury was, in effect, so instructed. Appellant testified that she was employed in that neighborhood and had been taking this same car regularly for nearly a year before the accident; that she was watching the street car before she got out into the street, and that she knew that the rear overhang of the street car would jut out as it would go around the curve. This was evidence directly tending to support the plea of contributory negligence of the plaintiff in standing too near to the car. Without reviewing the evidence at length, it will suffice to say that the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict of the jury. If there is any reason for reversing the judgment, such reason or ground must be found in some error in the rulings of the court, or in its instructions to the jury. This brings us to the principal points relied upon in support of the appeal.

[2] Appellant's first point is that the court erred in sustaining defendant's demurrer to the amended complaint preceding the filing of the second amended complaint. The amended complaint in its first count was substantially like the second amended complaint, in that it proceeded upon the theory that the plaintiff was a passenger of the defendant, whereas the second count alleged the same facts of negligence, but omitted any statement concerning plaintiff's situation as a passenger. Assuming that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the amended complaint, it is sufficient to note that plaintiffs' case was presented to the jury on both theories, and the jury was instructed not only concerning respondent's duty to appellant as a passenger, if they should find she was a passenger, but also instructed concerning the rule of negligence applicable to the case, if appellant was not a passenger at the time of the accident. Therefore, the error was not prejudicial in its effect.

Next we have a group of points relied upon by appellant, concerned with the doctrine known as "res ipsa loquitur." The court in reading its instructions to the jury told them, among other things, that if they should find from the evidence that the relation of carrier and passenger existed between appellant and respondent at the time of the accident, "and that Mrs. Dwyer was injured by the operation of one of the defendant's cars while such relationship existed, the burden is cast upon the defendant to explain the manner in which the accident happened, that is, to show that the injury was occasioned by an inevitable casualty or some other cause which common care or foresight could not prevent or by the contributory negligence of the plaintiff herself." The court took an overnight recess before completing the announcement of its instructions to the jury, and, after the recess, withdrew the instruction last above mentioned. In that connection, the court then said to the jury: "You are instructed that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not apply to this case. Res ipsa loquitur means, 'the thing speaks for itself'; and where applicable it would be sufficient for the plaintiff to show by a preponderance of the evidence the relationship of passenger and carrier and the injury to plaintiff while a passenger. In such case an inference of negligence on the part of the defendant would arise and defendant would be required to meet this inference. But here the plaintiff pleaded and offered proof as to the manner in which defendant was alleged to be negligent, therefore the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur cannot apply. Therefore, unless you find from the evidence that defendant's negligence was the sole proximate cause of injury to the plaintiff, your verdict should be for the defendant. If you find from the evidence that defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of injury to the plaintiff and the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, your verdict shall be for the plaintiff. Therefore the following instruction heretofore read to you is withdrawn, cancelled and obliterated, and you are to disregard it entirely as though you had never heard it: (quoting the cancelled instruction)."

[3-5] I think that the record does not satisfactorily support the suggestion made by the trial court in its later instruction that the stated doctrine did not apply to the case because the plaintiff pleaded and offered proof of the manner in which the defendant was alleged to be negligent. Seney v. Pickwick Stages, 82 Cal. App. 226, 229, 255 P. 279. But this does not settle the question. We still have to consider whether (assuming that the relation of carrier and passenger existed) the mere happening of the accident and injury was sufficient to raise an inference of negligence on the part of the defendant. The precise question before us does not appear to have been determined in this state, in relation to passengers preparing to enter street cars, although the rule as between street railways and pedestrians in general has been settled. In Wood v. Los Angeles Railway Corp., 172 Cal. 15, 155 P. 68, the court quoted with approval a decision wherein the Supreme Court of Kentucky (Louisville Ry. Co. v. Ray [Ky.] 124 S. W. 313) said that, although it is the duty of those in charge of a street car to keep a lookout so as to avoid injuring those who may be crossing or upon the street in front of the moving car, this rule has never been so extended as to require the employees in charge of the car to keep a lookout at corners and curves so as to prevent others using the street from colliding with the rear end of the car. But the plaintiff in the Wood Case was not a passenger, and the question whether the same rule would apply as against a passenger was not suggested. In a note found in Ann. Cas. 1916E, page 680, a number of decisions are cited to the effect that the rule that a street railway company is under no duty to keep a lookout to prevent persons from coming in contact with the rear end of a car rounding a curve applies to those leaving a car and to those intending to become passengers. In Miller v. Public Service R. Co., 86 N. J. Law, 631, 92 A. 343, L. R. A. 1915C, 605, the court said: "The rule approved by the weight of authority is that, in view of the well-known fact that in rounding a curve the rear end of a street car will swing beyond the track, and overlap the street to a greater extent than the front, the motorman may rightfully assume that an adult person, standing near the track, who is apparently able to see, hear, and move, and, having notice of the approach of a street car, and of the existence of the curve, will draw back far enough to avoid being struck by the rear of the car as it swings around the curve in the usual and expected manner, and therefore no legal duty is imposed upon the motorman to warn such a person against the possible danger of a collision with the rear, because of the swing, if he remains in the same position"—citing authorities.

I think that the foregoing is a correct statement of the law as applied to the duties of a motorman. I see no reason why the same rule should not apply with respect to the duties of an employee stationed on the street for the mere purpose of receiving fares and permitting passengers to enter the cars after the fares have been paid. In this case, there is no direct evidence that the so-called "loader" had any other duty. It may be assumed that if there had been evidence tending to prove that the so-called loader saw that the plaintiff was standing in a position where the car in its turning would hit her, and if, so seeing, he had failed to use reasonable care to give the plaintiff warning of her danger, the defendant would have been chargeable with his negligence in that particular. But this would be direct evidence of negligence and would not come within the scope of the rule of res ipsa loquitur. I am of the opinion that there was no error in the instructions of the court upon the subject here in question. The evidence fails to show even the general fact that the accident was caused by some fault in the operation of the car. In a somewhat analogous case in respect to the condition of the evidence, it was held that the court erred in giving an instruction which applied the res ipsa loquitur rule to the case. Ginocchio v. San Francisco, 57 Cal. App. 150, 206 P. 763.

We have examined the additional criticisms made by appellant to certain instructions to the jury, and find that no prejudicial error in said instructions has been shown. We are further of the opinion that the point that there was a conflict between two of the instructions is not well taken; and that the instruction beginning at line 20, page 111, reporter's transcript, fully and fairly states the conditions under which the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, if the jury should find that the relation of carrier and passenger existed. Other instructions properly stated the rule of negligence applicable to the case, if the relation of passenger and carrier did not exist.

The judgment is affirmed.

HOUSER, J.

I concur. Although I am in accord with the judgment indicated in the opinion prepared and signed by Presiding Justice CONREY, reasoning from the authorities and general principles applicable to the facts of the case, I am unable to unreservedly subscribe to the "ratiocination" by which he is led to his conclusion.

Since it is possible that within the admitted facts of this case the jury might have determined that at the time when plaintiff sustained the injury of which she here complains she was a passenger of the defendant (Hart v. Fresno Traction Co., 175 Cal. 489, 167 P. 885; Nilson v. Oakland Traction Co., 10 Cal. App. 103, 101 P. 413), and assuming that such a conclusion had been so reached, inevitably it would follow that plaintiff was then entitled to such care on the part of the defendant to prevent her from being injured as is ordinarily legally required of a carrier toward its passengers. In other words, according to the statutory provisions of this state (section 2100, Civ. Code), the carrier was obliged to use the "utmost care and diligence" for the safe carriage of the passenger. In that connection, if after having reached the conclusion that as between plaintiff and the defendant the relationship of carrier and passenger existed, in the absence of any showing that the accident occurred by reason of inevitable casualty or some other cause which human care and foresight could not have prevented, or by the contributory negligence of plaintiff, it then became the further duty of the jury to determine whether "the utmost care and diligence" for the safe carriage of plaintiff had been exercised by the defendant, which duty necessarily included a consideration by the jury not only of the particular acts and conduct shown to have been performed by the motorman, the conductor, or the loader of the car of the defendant, but as well what particular act or thing (if any) omitted to be done by them, or by either of them, reasonably might have been performed by them or either of them, which would have constituted a compliance by the defendant with the statutory requirement that it use the utmost care and diligence to see that plaintiff sustained no injury during the time that the relationship of passenger and carrier existed between plaintiff and the defendant.

As is succinctly stated in 4 Cal. Jur. 980, where many authorities are cited in its support: "It has been long and continuously settled that, in an action by a passenger against a carrier for injuries received a prima facie case is established when the plaintiff shows that he was injured while being carried as a passenger by the defendant, and that the injury was caused by the manner in which the defendant used or directed some agency or instrumentality under its control. This rule has been announced by the cases again and again. The occurrence of the accident raises a presumption of negligence which throws upon the carrier the burden of showing that the injury was sustained without any negligence on its part; that is, that the injury was occasioned by inevitable casualty or some other cause which human care and foresight could not prevent or by contributory negligence of the plaintiff, unless the proof on the part of the plaintiff himself tends to show that the injury was occasioned by one of these causes. This rule is known as the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur."

Relying upon the accuracy of the foregoing statement of the law, to my mind it would seem inescapable that plaintiff was entitled to have given to the jury the instruction which was requested by her but refused by the trial court, and to which attention has been directed by Presiding Justice CONREY.

Neither "inevitable casualty" nor any cause "which human care and foresight could not prevent" was attempted to be shown by the defendant. For aught that appears, the "utmost care and diligence" required by the carrier for the safe carriage of the passenger was not exercised by the defendant, from which it would follow that at least a prima facie case of plain neglect of duty on the part of the defendant had been established, and that, in the absence of a showing from the entire evidence in the case that plaintiff had been guilty of contributory negligence, she would be entitled to be compensated by a judgment for whatever damages she sustained.

Considering such evidence as is set forth in the opinion of Presiding Justice CONREY, it unquestionably appears that for a long time preceding the happening of the accident plaintiff was most familiar with the entire situation; that is to say, she habitually boarded a street car at the place where the accident occurred; she knew that in following its regular route the R car turned the corner at that point, and that in so doing its rear end or "overhang" necessarily projected into the street considerably farther than it did when the car was not so engaged, and that if she maintained a position within the range of the "overhang," necessarily she would come into collision with the car, from which happening an injury might result to her. Nevertheless, with such knowledge on her part, at least partly because of the fact that she neglected to protect herself from being injured, the accident of which she here complains occurred. To my mind, it shows a clear case of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, which has the legal effect of precluding the recovery of a judgment for damages against the defendant. Townsend v. Houston Electric Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 154 S. W. 629.

My ultimate conclusion is that although error was committed by the trial court in its refusal to give to the jury the instruction to which attention has been directed, because of the fact that such error did not result in a miscarriage of justice, the judgment should be affirmed. CRAIG, J.

The defendant S. N. Clark appealed from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, respondent here, in an action upon a promissory note executed in the name of Clark-Parker Company by S. N. Clark.

The subject-matter of this action consisted of a promissory note in the sum of $10,000, due 180 days from its date, and signed in the firm name by appellant. To the complaint based thereon Clark filed an individual answer and counterclaim, denying liability and demanding, as a "further, separate and distinct defense thereto," compensation for work, labor, and services alleged to have been performed by him for the plaintiff about three years prior to the date of the note. An answer to the defendant's affirmative defense was entered at the instance of the plaintiff, who thereafter moved to strike out the counterclaim of S. N. Clark upon the ground that an individual claim did not constitute a legal set-off against a suit upon a joint obligation. Said motion was granted, and a motion by the defendant Clark to file an amended answer setting forth the same counter charges by more specific allegations was denied. Error is assigned to the rulings last mentioned.

[1] It appears that defendants were sued jointly, but that the promissory note as pleaded bore the individual signatures of the company and of appellant. It is contended that, as originally pleaded, the note sued upon created a joint and several liability, entitling one of the defendants to interpose a counterclaim. But, if none existed in fact, the individual defendant must concededly still be relegated to his proper legal recourse as if no suit were pending. No action against him in which to counterplead existed. The note in question could not have been executed by a fictitious firm. It was signed in the name of the company by S. N. Clark, and upon discovery of such fact the trial judge authorized an insertion of the insignia of agency to conform thereto, by amendment of the complaint. Hence it is plain that by no method of pleading could the plaintiff have maintained a cause of action upon a several liability of Clark, and that the counterclaim was groundless. That an individual demand may not properly be interposed to a joint action against two defendants is settled law. Code Civ. Proc. § 438; Roberts v. Donovan, 70 Cal. 108, 9 P. 180, 11 P. 599; McDonald v. Poole, 113 Cal. 437, 45 P. 702; Kales v. Houghton, 190 Cal. 294, 212 P. 21.

[2-4] It is further argued that the plaintiff delayed in moving to strike out such counterclaim, rendering it guilty of laches tantamount to an estoppel; and also that an amended answer, and a counterclaim showing that appellant's liability was several, should have been accepted by the court and filed. For the reasons herein stated, the complaint as framed, in accordance with the facts, did not present issues susceptible to a counterclaim. And it does not lie with the defense to reconstruct or alter by answer issues presented by the plaintiff. Jurisdictional questions are not waived by delay in making the motion. Bulkley v. Bulkley, 6 Abb. Prac. (N. Y.) 307; Twine v. Carey, 2 Okl. 249, 37 P. 1096. Nor is the vacating of void proceedings governed by the rule relating to motions of a dilatory nature. Peterson v. Metrop. Nat. Bank, 88 Ill. App. 190. Since the counterclaim could be afforded no jurisdictional cognizance in such a case, its exclusion before trial was timely.

The judgment is affirmed.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 3, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 1, 1931.

1. Evidence ⇨588.

Court trying case must weigh and consider all testimony, and, discarding that unworthy of credence, attempt to reconcile whatever conflict remains.

2. Negligence ⇨97.

Comparative negligence principle is not recognized in California.

3. Automobiles ⇨244(36).

In action by passengers in one of two automobiles colliding when meeting on highway, evidence supported judgment that proximate cause of collision was concurrent negligence of both drivers.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1).

Trial court's finding of whether negligence of two defendants is concurrent is conclusive if supported by evidence.

5. Negligence ⇨56(1).

Independent negligence of one defendant constitutes "sole proximate cause of injuries" if such negligence was so disconnected as to make it plain that damage was in no way natural consequence of negligence of person urging nonliability.

PARKER, Justice pro tem.

The above actions grew out of an automobile accident which occurred in San Mateo county. Inasmuch as both cases involved the same accident and the witnesses were the same in each, there was an order of consolidation in the court below. The cases were tried together and the appeals are presented through one bill of exceptions, under stipulation.

The accident referred to was a collision between the Ford car driven by defendant Silva and a Studebaker car driven by the defendant Harris. The plaintiffs were passengers in the Harris car. The cases were tried by the court, sitting without a jury. There is no serious question involving claimed errors in the admission or rejection of testimony; no claim of contributory negligence, nor any point raised as to the amount of damages awarded. The fact of the collision is conceded and appellants practically admit that one of the two defendants was guilty of negligence proximately causing the accident. As is quite frequently the case, each defendant attempts to absolve himself and fasten the entire blame upon the other. It is needless to add, as in all such cases, there is presented a wide field for argument, the main theme of which is physical facts and the so-called immutable laws of physics. Contentions based on these foundations are usually not convincing, strange as it may seem, for the simple reason that in partisan presentation there is an ever-present temptation to forget essential facts which do not fit in. For instance, where it is argued that, where there is a contact of two bodies in a given position, the direction of the applied force will control the position of the bodies after the impact, any rule or law, in the abstract, will be found of little value when we have the additional factors of each body in motion and controlled by independent agencies. Experience has shown the futility of attempted demonstration in accident cases; there are too many varying factors. Among these variants we may class indefinite rate of speed, condition of the highway, judgment or lack thereof in the drivers, a direct blow or a glancing one, and the balance or equilibrium of each car at the time of impact. Therefore we deem it unimportant to catalog the contentions of the respective parties or to detail the arguments of each.

[1] The trial court found that the accident, with its resultant injuries and damage to plaintiffs, was proximately caused by the concurrent negligence of both defendants. If there is sufficient evidence, competent and free from legal objection, to support this conclusion, our inquiry on this subject ends. We may repeat that the Silva car was a Ford and the Harris car a Studebaker. Throughout the entire case these cars were referred to by name, and hereinafter we will follow the same plan. The accident occurred on the morning of January 1st at or about the hour of 2 a. m., and all of the parties had been observing the time-honored custom of greeting the arrival of the New Year. The scene of the accident was the state highway between San Mateo and San Francisco. The highway at this point is quite wide and is divided into four lanes of traffic—the outer two lanes being eight and one-half feet in width and designated as slow traffic lanes, and the inner two lanes, one on each side of the center of the highway, being nine and one-half feet in width and designated fast traffic lanes. The Studebaker was going in a southerly direction and the Ford was traveling in a northerly direction. There had been a rain in the evening, and at the time of the accident there was still a light downfall. The highway was wet. In this connection we may note that the slow lanes were concrete surface and the fast lanes asphalt. The record further indicates that in wet weather the asphalt was very slippery. As to the foregoing, all parties seem to be in harmony, but from this point they at once enter the field of controversy. It is argued that, inasmuch as the testimony of the parties to the accident is so in conflict, it follows one must be deliberately falsifying, and that, after determining which one is guilty, his testimony should be entirely disregarded and count for naught. This is not necessarily true. Without attempting any extended analysis, it may be safely said that we often meet with witnesses honestly stating as true facts which are not in accord with the actual happening. It would take us through all of the ramifications of metaphysics and psychiatry were we to go further into the discussion on this point. And even where it is shown that a witness willfully testifies falsely as to a material fact, it does not follow that his entire testimony must be distrusted, though the court has the discretion so to do. The true theory is that it is the duty of the court to weigh and consider all of the testimony adduced, and, discarding that which in its opinion is unworthy of credence, attempt to reconcile whatever conflict remains. In the instant case the defendant Silva and the person who was with him in the Ford at the time of the accident both claim that the Ford was on the extreme east side of the highway, in the slow lane, going north at a speed of not more than fifteen miles per hour; that suddenly out of the darkness, coming apparently from nowhere, without warning signal or lights apparent, the Studebaker collided with the Ford. The defendant Harris claims that he was driving the Studebaker on the west side of the center line, in the fast lane, going south; that his speed was approximately thirty miles per hour, and that suddenly in front of him, proceeding directly toward him and in the same lane, the Ford appeared; that he did not see the lights of the Ford until it was within twenty-five feet or less and he was unable to escape.

However, the trial court had other testimony and other evidence before it which did tend, in a measure, to explain this conflict, and, without detailing the testimony of each witness, the record as a whole supports a finding of the following facts, in addition to those facts already stated on which there is no disagreement: That the Studebaker was driving south on a wet and slippery pavement at a speed between thirty-two and thirty-five miles per hour; that there was another car, referred to as a Chevrolet, proceeding in the same direction and some short distance ahead of the Studebaker; that the Studebaker followed along behind the Chevrolet for a little distance and then attempted to pass; that before such attempt both cars were traveling in the slow lane. In attempting to pass, the Studebaker was turned into the fast lane and had proceeded to a point where the hood of the Studebaker had reached the front part of the Chevrolet when the impact occurred. The falling mist and the wet condition of the pavement had obscured the painted lines marking off the center of the highway and the lanes, and the testimony of one member of the party in the Studebaker left it doubtful whether this car remained on the right side of the center line or traveled astride the line. The Ford car traveling north was, for a considerable or at least some distance, in the fast lane east of the center line. At a point a short distance from the point of collision the driver of the Ford turned his car in a westerly direction straddling the center line and continued this course up to the time of the accident. When a head-on collision seemed imminent, the driver of the Studebaker swerved to the right in an effort to avoid it. He had succeeded in getting the front part of his car over, but the left rear and the Ford came together. The point of impact was on the east side of the center.

[2] As the record discloses sufficient evidence to support the foregoing findings implied in the judgment, there is little room for argument as to the negligence of both parties. Primarily, and in the absence of other specifications of negligence, the court was warranted in finding lack of ordinary care manifested in an attempt to pass another vehicle on a rainy night at a speed of thirty-two miles per hour on a wet and slippery pavement, on a highway of traffic such as the record discloses was present on the night in question, it being shown that many cars were passing in both directions. And this becomes more apparent from the testimony of Harris, driver of the Studebaker, that he did not see the lights of the Ford until within twenty-five feet of it. And, the evidence supporting the conclusion that in thus making the turn to pass the Chevrolet the Studebaker did cross the center line, the negligence becomes definitely established. We find then the Studebaker proceeding on the highway partly on its right portion of the pavement and partly on the portion reserved for traffic approaching, the driver thereof charged with a knowledge that the portion wrongfully usurped was for the use of and then being used by cars coming in an opposite direction. At the same time we find the Ford in exactly the same situation. Manifestly, as a result of the combined negligence of both, the collision occurred. It is the common argument of each defendant that, if the other had not been negligent, no accident would have happened, and therefore each assigns the negligence of the other as the proximate cause. We can see no merit in these respective contentions. The question of comparative negligence is suggested, but deserves no further comment than to note the fact of its being presented. Conceding the negligence of one to have been greater negligence, still in this state the courts do not recognize the principle of law relating to comparative negligence that obtains in some of our sister states. Tucker v. United Railroads, 171 Cal. 702, 705, 154 P. 835, and cases therein cited.

[3-6] We are satisfied that the facts as disclosed warrant and support the judgment of the court below that the proximate cause of the collision was the concurrent negligence of both parties. The question of whether the negligence of two defendants is independent or concurrent is generally one for the trial court; and, if there be evidence to support it, the finding is conclusive on this court. Springer v. Pacific Fruit Exchange, 92 Cal. App. 732, 268 P. 951. In order that the independent negligence of one of the defendants might constitute the sole proximate cause of the injuries to plaintiff and displace the negligence of the other, it must appear from the evidence that such negligence was so disconnected in time and nature as to make it plain that the damage occasioned was in no way the natural or probable consequence of the negligence of him thus urging his nonliability. Springer v. Pacific Fruit Exchange, supra, 92 Cal. App. page 739, 268 P. 951. It is the unquestioned law of this state that, where one is injured by the concurring negligence of two persons, each is and both are the proximate cause of the injuries, and the injured party may recover from either or both at his election. And in the case just cited will be found a collection of authorities announcing this rule.

[7] "Whether or not the negligence of either driver was a proximate cause of the collision and resultant injuries and whether or not the negligence of each concurred with that of the other is a question of fact to be decided by the jury" or by the court where no jury is present, and where there is evidence to support the determination so made it cannot be disturbed, even though the facts would warrant a different conclusion. Dougherty v. Ellingson, 97 Cal. App. 87, 93, 275 P. 456. The law was enacted to prevent the kind of catastrophe which here happened. "Who may say, but the triers of fact, that if the law had been observed the injury would nevertheless have happened, or that the failure to comply with the law did not contribute proximately to the injury." Rabe v. Western Union Tel. Co., 198 Cal. 290, 296, 244 P. 1077, 1079. "It is the well-established law that the original wrongful act may be so continuous that the act of a third person precipitating the disaster will, in law be regarded, not as independent, but as conjoining with the original act to produce the accident." Rauch v. Southern Cal. Gas Co., 96 Cal. App. 250, 255, 273 P. 1111, 1113; Merrill v. Los Angeles Gas & Elec. Co., 158 Cal. 499, 111 P. 534, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134; Carroll v. Central Counties Gas Co.,

74 Cal. App. 303, 240 P. 53. And finally, where an injury results from two separate and distinct acts of negligence by different parties, operating and concurring simultaneously, both are proximate cause, and recovery may be had against either or both of the responsible parties.

[8-10] Appellant Silva complains of the action of the trial court in awarding plaintiff Fishman the sum of $20 as special damages on account of the loss of his glasses in the accident. The ground of complaint seems to be that in securing the new glasses Fishman did not exactly duplicate the old ones, but got a little stronger lens. Appellant seems content with merely stating his objection, urging no grounds in support thereof. Under the facts we think the award was properly made. Appellant Silva next contends that the trial court erred to his serious prejudice in excluding certain proffered testimony. This appellant at the trial produced a witness named Frey who testified that he was a garage man and mechanic; that he had much experience in repairing wrecked cars and particularly in towing in wrecks from this highway, having brought in as many as twenty a week; that this experience ran over a period of nine years in that locality. With this background it was sought by this appellant to qualify the witness as an expert to testify as to his opinion concerning the probable course the respective cars would take after the impact. The court sustained the objections of all other parties to the action on the grounds that it was not a proper subject for expert testimony; that no proper foundation had been laid; and that the hypothetical question sought to be propounded did not embrace an accurate statement either of the facts as adduced or any appropriate or possible theory that might be sustained from the facts in evidence. The fact that the witness had dragged in wrecks off the highway in no way qualified him. The questions under investigation were not the subject of expert testimony, as it is obvious that no expert outside of the so-called psychiatrist can even venture an opinion as to what two different people might do in the management of a car in an emergency. Having before it all of the evidence as to the location of the cars after the accident and before, and having likewise before it photographic exhibits showing the condition of each car after the accident, it would seem strange if the power or duty of the court to determine the issues presented must be supplanted by the opinion of some gentleman whose sole qualification appears to be that he had towed wrecks off the highway for nine years. We do not feel that this claim of error deserves citation to support our conclusion.

Other minor errors are complained of which in no way could have affected the determination reached. These claimed errors are few in number and urged more or less perfunctorily, and, even if it be conceded that these errors occurred at the trial, no possible miscarriage of justice could have resulted therefrom, nor, indeed, would anything prejudicial to the right of complaining party ensue.

The judgment against each appellant is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by Birdene Wieck, a minor, by W. A. Wieck, guardian ad litem, against William Hockett and H. Hamaguchi. From an adverse judgment, defendant last named appeals.

Affirmed.

B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, and Barry J. Colding, Theodore Hale, and Carroll B. Crawford, all of San Francisco (M. Tellefson, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

F. M. Ostrander, of Merced, for respondents.

PRESTON, P. J.

This is an appeal by the defendant H. Hamaguchi from a judgment entered against him upon a verdict of the jury in the sum of $3,750 in a case for personal injuries.

Plaintiffs Birdene Wieck, a minor, and W. A. Wieck, her father, brought this action for damages against defendants, William Hockett and H. Hamaguchi, charging that Birdene Wieck was severely and permanently injured by reason of the negligent operation by said defendants of their respective automobiles. No judgment was entered against William Hockett.

The answer of H. Hamaguchi denies any negligence on his part, and, as a separate defense, alleges negligence on the part of plaintiff, constituting the sole and proximate cause of her injuries.

The accident occurred on the 27th day of November, 1928, at about 11 o'clock in the morning at the intersection of Walnut avenue and Sultana drive situate about one mile east of the town of Livingston, in Merced county. Walnut avenue and Sultana drive, including the intersection thereof, are dirt roads about 40 feet in width between the property lines. Walnut avenue, which runs east and west, had been graded and smoothed off just before the accident, so that practically the entire width of the road could be traveled with an automobile. Sultana drive runs north and south.

The evidence is conflicting as to whether Sultana drive was only a one-way road or whether the entire width could be traveled. However, the whole of the intersection was traversable. There was also evidence that on two corners there were grapevines, and on the other corner there was a bamboo windbreak 7 or 8 feet high.

The defendant Hamaguchi drove his Essex touring car in a northerly direction on Sultana drive. William Hockett, with whom plaintiff was riding as a guest, was driving his Chevrolet car in a westerly direction on Walnut avenue. The two machines collided in the intersection and just northwest of the center thereof. The Chevrolet turned upside down at a point about 20 feet westerly from the point of impact, pinning the plaintiff underneath the car, and inflicting the injuries of which she complains.

The Essex car came to a stop in approximately the same distance, and was about three feet south of the other car.

[1] Hamaguchi testified to facts, which, if believed by the jury, would show that the collision was due solely to the negligence of Hockett, the driver of the Chevrolet, and Hockett, on the other hand, testified to facts showing that H. Hamaguchi was entirely responsible for the collision. Under such circumstances, and when the verdict is attacked for insufficiency of evidence, as it is in this case, our power begins and ends with the inquiry whether there is substantial evidence, contradicted or uncontradicted, which in and of itself will support the conclusion reached by the jury.

We must assume that the jury resolved the conflict against H. Hamaguchi. We have examined the entire testimony with care, and after such examination feel fully satisfied that the record contains ample competent evidence to support the verdict of the jury. The jury, however, might well have found from the entire evidence that both Hockett and Hamaguchi were guilty of actionable negligence.

[2] Appellant contends that plaintiff and her counsel were guilty of prejudicial misconduct at the trial in asserting that plaintiff had been examined by a doctor at the request of the defendant's insurance company. This contention is based upon the following proceedings which took place during the direct examination of plaintiff by her own counsel:

"Q. And where did you go when you got to Livingston? A. Dr. Rookledge's office.

"Q. What was done there, if anything? A. Well, he put my arm in a sling, he did not do hardly anything, he did take X-rays and then he put my arm in a sling, and then I was taken to Merced.

"Q. What doctor took care of you there? A. Dr. Kylberg.

"Q. Now, you saw Dr. Rookledge immediately after the accident, and then Dr. Kylberg set your arm at the hospital, did you see any other doctor? A. Yes, Dr. Zirker and Mr. Hamaguchi's Insurance Company's doctor.

"Mr. Hale (attorney for defendant Hamaguchi): Now, one moment, we move that be stricken out, how did she know that?

"Witness answering: A. Well, it was at your request that I went to this doctor, and you stated in your office that it was for the insurance company that you were having the examination.

"Mr. Hale: I move that be stricken out, your Honor, that has nothing to do with this defendant, and we move the jury be instructed to disregard it, that statement, that was purely an interpolation on the part of this witness, no doubt by the instructions of someone.

"Mr. Ostrander, attorney for plaintiff: Now, if the Court please, she states that she went to see the Insurance Company doctor at Mr. Hale's request.

"Mr. Hale: Now, I move that any further discussion of this point cease right here, and that the jury be instructed to disregard that part of her testimony, and that that part be stricken out. * * *

After some further colloquy between the court and counsel, Mr. Ostrander said: "I have no objection if the court desires to strike that portion of the answer, that that is a conclusion that the insurance company doctor, at Mr. Hale's suggestion; that she went to this doctor, I think though, that is material and relevant.

"Mr. Hale: At Mr. Hamaguchi's suggestion, I was his attorney, acting for him and requested her to go to the doctor.

"The Court: All right, that is before the Court. Let the rest of it go out. Any statement in reference to an insurance company, let that be stricken from the record and the jury will not regard any testimony that is ordered stricken out by the Court. * * *

"Mr. Hale: The title of the case is 'Birdene Wieck, a minor, by W. A. Wieck, guardian ad litem, and W. A. Wieck, versus William Hockett and H. Hamaguchi.'

"The Court: Call it to the attention of the jury, the parties who are before the Court.

"Mr. Ostrander: Birdene Wieck, a minor, by W. A. Wieck, guardian ad litem; and W. A. Wieck, versus William Hockett and H. Hamaguchi.

"The Court: Ladies and gentlemen of the jury, now, those are the parties before this court, and no others, Birdene Wieck, a minor, by W. A. Wieck, her guardian ad litem, and W. A. Wieck, they are the plaintiffs in the case, against William Hockett and H. Hamaguchi, those two parties are the defendants, and there are no others, and any reference that may be made to any other parties here, you are not to take into consideration at all in your verdict whatever. You are to determine who is responsible for this accident at the time, as between these parties that are before the Court here now, and nobody else, and on stipulation of counsel, this reference that was made by the witness here, to the statement of Mr. Hale, counsel for the defendant, that he wanted her to be examined by a doctor for the insurance company—is that it—I have forgotten the exact language—

"Mr. Ostrander: Yes.

"The Court: Let that go out, forget that such statement was ever made."

The question that brought from the witness the answer complained of was entirely proper, and the answer was an attempt by a fifteen year old girl, who was not at all familiar with court procedure, to identify the other doctor who had examined her and whose name she could not recall. Counsel for defendant brought from the witness the further objectionable remark. The witness undoubtedly thought that counsel was addressing her. The judge struck all remarks from the record, and at the same time admonished the jury in the plain and unequivocal language above set forth. There is absolutely nothing in the record from which it could be inferred or insinuated that plaintiff's counsel did not ask said question in the utmost good faith, or that he attempted in any way to get before the jury the fact, if it be a fact, that the defendant was insured. His entire conduct appears to have been eminently fair and proper. The trial court denied a motion for a new trial based, among other things, upon this same alleged misconduct, and in so doing must have concluded that the witness' remarks were not prejudicial.

In Lafargue v. United Railroads of S. F., 183 Cal. 720, 192 P. 538, 540, the Supreme Court said: "The trial court denied a motion for a new trial based upon the ground, among others, of misconduct of plaintiff's attorney. In doing this the court must be deemed to have concluded that no prejudice was suffered by defendant by reason of any of the matters to which we have referred. * * * The trial judge is in a much better position than an appellate court to determine whether the verdict in a case is probably due wholly or in part to such alleged misconduct as we have here, and his conclusion in the matter should not be disturbed unless, under all the circumstances appearing, it is plainly wrong." See Mangino v. Bonslett (Cal. App.) 292 P. 1006.

The remarks of plaintiff were improper, but we cannot assume that a jury will deliberately disregard their oaths and an instruction of the court so plain and explicit as the one given by the learned trial court in this case and assume prejudicial error from the mere fact that the plaintiff, a child, while a witness in her own behalf, in an attempt to identify one of the physicians who had examined her, stated that "he was H. Hamaguchi's Insurance doctor," etc. There is no showing or even a suspicion that she had been prompted to make the remarks complained of, or that there was any intention on her part or that of her counsel to intentionally get the question of H. Hamaguchi's insurance before the jury.

[3-5] Appellant next contends that the verdict was excessive. The motion for a new trial was also made upon the following grounds:

"10. Excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of prejudice;

"11. Excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion." Subdivision 5, § 657, Code Civ. Proc.

"The rule is well established that the amount of damages in this kind of an action is committed, first, to the sound discretion of the jury, and next to the discretion of the judge of the trial court, who, in ruling upon the motion for a new trial, may consider the evidence anew, determine anew the facts, and set aside the verdict if it is not just. Upon appeal, the decision of the trial court and the jury on the subject cannot be set aside unless the verdict is so plainly 'and outrageously excessive as to suggest, at first blush, passion or prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury.'" Reneau v. Hirsch, 88 Cal. App. 1, 262 P. 1100, 1102, and cases there cited; Michener v. Hutton, 203 Cal. 604, 265 P. 238, 59 A. L. R. 480; Sundberg v. Ringel, 100 Cal. App. 545, 280 P. 557; and Levy v. Berner (Cal. App.) 293 P. 896.

We have carefully examined the entire record, including the evidence, and there is nothing in the record to show or suggest that the verdict was not the result of the fair and honest judgment of the jury. At the time of the accident, plaintiff was a girl 15 years of age, in good health. She was pinned underneath the Chevrolet car, and, when extricated, was unconscious. She received a fracture of the neck of the humerus and suffered a permanent limitation of motion in her right arm and shoulder. This injury was attended with excruciating pain and suffering which lasted several months. At the time of the trial, one shoulder was larger than the other. The arm was in what is known as an airplane cast for more than two months. We think when the extent and character of the injuries received by the plaintiff and the pain and suffering endured by her are all considered, the award of damages made by the jury and sustained by the trial court is not at all disproportionate to the compensation really warranted by the facts.

[6] Appellant also complains of certain instructions given by the court to the jury. We have examined all of the instructions complained of and find no merit whatever in any of the points urged. It is certainly a well-settled rule of law, which needs no citation of authority, that all instructions must be taken as a whole, and, when that rule is applied in the case at bar, there is no error in the instructions. They are full and complete, and state the law applicable to the case clearly and concisely.

Other contentions made by appellant need no special consideration. We have examined the entire record with care, and find no merit whatever in the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

Motorcycle officer traveling 50 miles per hour while chasing hit-and-run driver held not contributorily negligent on colliding with motorist making left-hand turn at 15-mile intersection (St. 1923, pp. 556, 560, §§ 120, 132, 133).

ALLEN, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff sustained injuries by reason of a collision between a motorcycle driven by him and an automobile operated by defendant. The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and plaintiff had judgment. Defendant appeals.

Plaintiff was a traffic officer and deputy sheriff; was on duty and chasing a hit-and-run driver whose car had struck another automobile and injured the occupants. The motorcycle was equipped with a siren and both headlights and tail-light, which were all burning. The siren was being sounded at the time of the accident and had been for several minutes previous thereto. Plaintiff was traveling north and defendant south on Highland avenue in National City, and when defendant arrived at Sixth street he attempted to make a left-hand turn when the collision occurred. Plaintiff was traveling at a speed of 50 miles per hour or more. The crossing where the accident happened was in a 20-mile zone, as well as a 15-mile intersection. The accident happened on a Sunday afternoon on the main road between Tia Juana and San Diego, where traffic was exceptionally heavy.

The only question raised on appeal is whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. The sections of the California Vehicle Act (Acts 1923, p. 517), in force at the time of the accident and which are the law of the case, are:

"Sec. 120. When speed limit not applicable. The provisions of this act prescribing the speed for vehicles shall not apply to vehicles of any city, city and county, or county or of the State of California when such vehicles are being operated in the chase or apprehension of violators of the law, or of persons charged with or suspected of any such violation, nor to fire department vehicles when traveling in response to a fire alarm nor to ambulances or the vehicles of licensed physicians when actually traveling in response to emergency calls. * * *

"Sec. 132. Police and fire vehicles have right of way. Police and fire department vehicles shall have the right of way over all other vehicles but must be operated with due regard for the safety of all persons using the public highway. This provision shall not protect the driver of any such vehicle or his employer or principal from the consequence of the arbitrary exercise of such right of way.

"Sec. 133. What to do on approach of police or fire vehicle. Upon the approach of any police or fire department vehicle, it shall be the duty of the operator of any street car, upon the sounding of a signal by such police or fire department vehicle, to stop such street car forthwith, unless at the time such street car is crossing an intersection of the public highways, in which event it shall be operated so as to clear the intersection of the highways and then stopped, and every other vehicle shall immediately be moved to a position as near as possible and parallel to the right-hand curb, and shall remain there until the police or fire department apparatus has passed such vehicle."

These sections, read together, leave little doubt as to the rights of the parties. Balt-hasar v. Pac. Electric Ry. Co., 187 Cal. 302, 202 P. 37, 19 A. L. R. 452. Plaintiff had the right of way and was of a class of persons to whom the provisions as to speed were not applicable. The only duty left for the plaintiff to perform was to operate his motorcycle with due regard for the safety of the public, which means the exercise of reasonable care by him for the public safety.

In order to charge appellant with contributory negligence under the sections above quoted, defendant must show that plaintiff did not operate his motorcycle with reasonable care for the public safety. There is nothing in the evidence which would sustain this contention. Appellant cites no authorities, and we fail to find any which are in conflict herewith.

The only point relied upon for a reversal is the evidence that the plaintiff was traveling faster than 15 miles per hour in the intersection. Section 120 of the California Vehicle Act is decisive on this point. Having concluded that the provisions as to speed do not apply to those designated in section 120 of the act, it might be well to mention the absurdity of requiring peace officers to observe the arbitrary rules as to speed contained in the California Vehicle Act when pursuing criminals, who may be fleeing in high-powered cars at twice the permissible speed. The judgment of the trial court was correct.

MARKS, J.

This is an action brought by appellant for damages for personal injuries. He was struck by an automobile being driven by respondent at the intersection of Fifth and Robinson streets in the city of San Diego, at about 7:30 o'clock on the evening of Friday, May 13, 1927.

Fifth street runs north and south. It is fifty feet in width between curb lines, and has parallel street car tracks on each side of its center line. Robinson street intersects Fifth street at right angles, and is thirty-five feet in width between curb lines. Lanes for the use of pedestrians in crossing the intersection are established and painted on its four sides. An ordinance of the city of San Diego gives pedestrians in these lanes the right of way over vehicles crossing the intersections.

The trial court rendered judgment for respondent holding that appellant was guilty of contributory negligence. The finding of the trial court on this issue is as follows: "That the said plaintiff at the time and place of said accident failed to exercise due care and caution for his own safety and without regard for the safety of himself placed himself directly in the path of the automobile operated by the said defendant, Thelma L. Moss, and negligently ran in front of said approaching automobile; that the said recklessness, carelessness and negligence of said plaintiff then and there proximately caused and contributed to each and all of said injuries sustained by him." Appellant attacks this finding as not being supported by the evidence. No other question is presented on this appeal.

[1, 2] In determining whether or not this finding is supported by the evidence, it will be necessary to consider only that portion of the evidence tending to support it. This evidence discloses that the intersection was brightly illuminated with street lights, and that the lights of respondent's automobile were illuminated at the time of, and before, the accident. Appellant, a pedestrian, was walking east on the northerly sidewalk on Robinson street. Before stepping from the sidewalk, he looked toward the south and saw the headlights of respondent's car half a block or more south of the intersection. He went on his way across the intersection, and did not again look for approaching vehicular traffic until immediately before the collision. According to respondent's testimony, appellant stopped his progress across the street and stood at about the center of Fifth street between the inner rails of the street car tracks. She proceeded on her way into Robinson street, and, when she reached a point about halfway between the center of Robinson street and its northerly curb line, appellant, from the place where he had been standing between the tracks, started to run in a northeasterly direction across the easterly side of Fifth street. Respondent sounded her horn, applied her brakes, and swerved her car to her right. The impact occurred north of the northerly pedestrian lane line at a point about two-thirds of the way from the east street car track to the east curb line. The left front light of respondent's car came into contact with appellant, pushing him to the pavement and breaking his leg. Respondent had so reduced the speed of her car that it was almost at a standstill at the time of the impact. It was brought to a complete stop between one and five feet beyond the point of the collision.

We have concluded that the foregoing evidence is sufficient to support the finding that appellant was guilty of contributory negligence. It justifies a conclusion that without due care he left his position of safety between the street car tracks where he was standing when respondent was approaching the pedestrian lane used by him and ran in a north-easterly direction across the easterly half of Fifth street into a place of danger directly in the path of respondent's automobile. With this evidence before him the trial judge was justified in concluding that appellant was guilty of contributory negligence. Of course, appellant's evidence sharply contradicts that of respondent. The law makes the trial court the judge of the weight and the sufficiency of the evidence. It having adopted that of respondent as true, its conclusions are final and binding upon this court.

Judgment affirmed.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem.

On the 25th day of June, 1929, deceased executed an olographic will, naming respondents as executors thereof. Her death occurred on November 3, 1929. Thereafter her will was duly probated. On August 20, 1930, respondents filed their first and final account.

On the 8th day of September, 1930, the court made an order settling the said account and decreed distribution of the estate. From the order settling the final account, and from the decree of distribution, the contestant, Our Lady of Mercy Convent, has appealed.

The testatrix by her will bequeathed to a number of her friends various sums of money, articles of jewelry, and personal effects, and made ten of her friends her residuary legatees. Among other bequests that she made was the following: "5000.00 (Five Thousand Dollars) also Building and Loan stock to our Lady of Mercy Convent."

It was stipulated that at the date of her death she was the owner of five shares of the capital stock of the Merced Mutual Building & Loan Association. It was further stipulated that deceased, at the date of her death, was the owner of $13,000 on deposit with the following named building and loan associations, namely, the Pacific States Savings & Loan Company, the United States Building & Loan Association, the Mutual Building & Loan Association of Fresno, Cal., and the Fresno Guarantee Building & Loan Association, the said sum being evidenced by fully paid investment certificates; that the Pacific States Savings & Loan Company was a building and loan association; that each of said four last-named associations had issued and outstanding a guaranteed capital stock, but that deceased at the date of her death did not own any capital stock of said last-named four associations.

By its decree of distribution the trial court distributed the five shares of the capital stock of the Merced Mutual Building & Loan Association to appellant, but over the objections of appellant distributed the $13,000 evidenced by the said investment certificates to the legatees to whom were willed legacies in specified sums with remainder to the residuary legatees.

Appellant contends that by the use of the words, "also building and loan stock," the testator intended to will to it, not only the five shares of the stock of the Merced Mutual Building & Loan Association, but also the said investment certificates.

[1, 2] The matter presented for determination is, therefore, what was the intention of the deceased in using these words. This intention must be gathered from that which is expressed in the language of the will. Estate of Young, 123 Cal. 337, 55 P. 1011; In re Estate of Sessions, 171 Cal. 346, 153 P. 231.

The cardinal rule for the construction of wills is to ascertain the intention of the testator, and this is determined from the words of the will, considering the circumstances under which it was made, if there is any uncertainty in its language. In re Estate of Franck, 190 Cal. 23, 210 P. 417. In this case the court used the following language: "The will and its entire scheme, the property disposed of, the persons named as devisees and legatees, the words and the context should be considered together, and the words used in the will should be construed according to their surroundings."

[3] Appellant's main reliance in its contention that the testatrix intended, not only to will it the five shares of stock of the Merced Mutual Building & Loan Association, but also the investment securities, is based upon section 1327 of the Civil Code, which is as follows: "Technical words in a will are to be taken in their technical sense, unless the context clearly indicates a contrary intention, or unless it satisfactorily appears that the will was drawn solely by the testator, and that he was unacquainted with such technical sense."

Conceding that the word "stock" is a technical word as used in this will, there is nothing in the evidence indicating that the testatrix did not know the meaning of this word. On the contrary, it appears from a consideration of the entire will that she was a woman of intelligence and knew exactly what disposition she wished to make of her property. The fact that she also used the word "devise" in bequeathing her personal estate as indicating her ignorance of technical words is of little evidentiary value and does not destroy the prima facie presumption that she understood the technical meaning of the word "stock" as used by her in her said will.

The facts in the cases of Tomlinson v. Bury, 145 Mass. 346, 14 N. E. 137, 1 Am. St. Rep. 464, and Clark v. Atkins, 90 N. C. 629, 47 Am. Rep. 538, cited by appellant in support of its contention that stock should be construed as including investment certificates, are not similar to those in the instant case. In the first of these cases the testator willed all of his bank stock to his wife. He had, in fact, no bank stock, but did have deposits in various banks. Under these circumstances it was held that the intention of the testator was to bequeath the deposits to his wife.

In the other case the testatrix willed bank stock in the Citizens' National Bank. She had never owned shares of stock in that bank, but did have on deposit therein certain bonds. In this case it was held that, as the testatrix had no stock in the bank, she intended to will the bonds, but through inadvertence or mistake used the word "stock."

The case of Connecticut Trust & Savings Deposit Co. v. Chase et al., 75 Conn. 683, 55 A. 171, cited by respondents, is more nearly in point. The will in that case bequeathed all of the stock of testatrix in any and all corporations to certain persons. At the date of death of testatrix she owned, in addition to stocks, debenture certificates of a corporation issued for money borrowed, and convertible after ten years into shares of stock. It was held in this case that the debenture certificates were not stocks, and that the bequest of stocks did not include these certificates.

The only evidence offered by appellant tending to establish the fact that testatrix was unacquainted with the meaning of the word "stock" was the testimony of a bank official who testified that the patrons of his bank commonly referred to investment certificates, when speaking of them, as stock, and the testimony of a secretary of a building and loan association that his clients commonly referred to them as stock, but neither of them testified that testatrix was a patron or client of the bank or association of which he was an official, nor did either of them testify that he ever heard the testatrix speak of her investment certificates as stock.

The testatrix bequeathed by her will $20,500 in specific cash legacies. There is left for distribution, after deducting the expenses of administration, the sum of $30,064.70. If appellant's claim is upheld and the $13,000 investment certificates are ordered to be distributed to it, there would be left for distribution the sum of $18,429.70.

If the testatrix intended to bequeath the $13,000 investment certificates to appellant, then she performed an idle act in naming ten of her friends her residuary legatees, and, if the construction for which appellant contends is placed upon the will, the specific legacies will have to be reduced. On the other hand, by adopting the trial court's construction of the will, the specific legacies will be paid in full and the charitable provisions of the will carried out.

We are satisfied that the construction placed upon the will by the trial court should be upheld.

The order settling and allowing the first and final account and the decree of distribution are affirmed.

PRESTON, P. J.

This is an appeal from an order of the Superior Court settling the second annual account and report of D. W. Carmichael, as executor of the last will of Sarah Mildred Jones, deceased.

The appeal is by the Independence Indemnity Company, the surety upon the official bond of Carmichael, as executor of the last will of decedent.

The facts are briefly these: Sarah Mildred Jones died testate on February 12, 1925. Her will named D. W. Carmichael as executor and Lulu E. Parsons as executrix, but did not waive bonds. The Superior Court of Sacramento county, after proper proceedings had, admitted the will to probate, and named the said D. W. Carmichael as sole executor, and required that he give a bond in the sum of $50,000. Carmichael duly qualified as such executor, and the said appellant, Independence Indemnity Company, gave bond to the state of California, as provided by law, in the sum of $50,000, which bond was approved by the judge of the Superior Court, and letters testamentary were thereupon issued to Carmichael, and he proceeded to administer said estate. Notice to creditors was given, an inventory and appraisal filed, and such other steps as are usual in administering estates in California were taken. Among the assets of said estate were two promissory notes, each executed and delivered by Carmichael to said Sarah Mildred Jones in her lifetime—one in the sum of $2,500, dated February 5, 1925, due 90 days after date, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and the second note, dated January 2, 1924, executed and delivered by Carmichael and his wife, Myrtle R. Carmichael, for $50,000, due on or before three years after date, with interest at 6½ per cent. per annum, payable annually, upon the principal sum of which $12,000 had been paid prior to the death of Mrs. Jones.

Thus it will be seen that both notes became due after the death of Mrs. Jones. These notes were inventoried and appraised at their face value.

On July 24, 1926, Carmichael returned and filed his first report and account of his administration of said estate, which, after proper proceedings, was approved by the court on August 9, 1926. On March 10, 1930, appellant, Independence Indemnity Company, filed a petition in the Superior Court asking to be released from the bond of Carmichael as executor, and, in response to the citation issued on this petition, Carmichael filed his second account, which shows both notes above mentioned charged as property of the estate of decedent, in his hands as executor. Thereafter, on April 2, 1930, Carmichael tendered his resignation as executor. On May 16, 1930, the court made an order settling the said second account and revoking Carmichael's letters testamentary. Thereafter Donald McDougall, the public administrator of Sacramento county, was appointed administrator with the will annexed of said estate. No appeal was taken by Carmichael from the order settling said second account, and the appeal is as above stated by the surety on Carmichael's official bond.

Respondents contend, and the trial court held, that under section 1447 of the Code of Civil Procedure the appellant, who is Carmichael's surety, is liable to the estate for the payment of said notes.

Appellant, on the contrary, contends that it has shown that Carmichael was insolvent at the time he became executor, and continued to be insolvent during the entire term of his administration of said estate, and could not have paid said notes, and therefore his surety is not liable for the payment thereof.

[1] Under the early common law the naming of a debtor as an executor of the will of the creditor operated as a discharge of the debt, except when necessary to pay demands of creditors of the estate. The reason for this rule was that the testator, by making the debtor an executor, voluntarily destroyed the only remedy or means by which the debt could be collected. In the course of time the opposite of this rule became recognized as the common law in the United States, and placed an executor, who was a debtor of the testator, in a position almost as excessively burdensome as formerly it had been advantageous. Under this last rule, not only was the debt to the estate not considered waived or discharged, but it was taken as actually paid in cash, due at once on the appointment of the executor, so that he was held accountable for the money equivalent of his debt irrespective of whether it had in fact been paid or whether the executor was insolvent and could not pay it.

The theory underlying this doctrine is that, since the executor cannot demand payment of himself, nor sue himself, and since he is bound to account for his own debts, the conclusion is inevitable that the debt must be considered as assets in his hands as executor. 11 R. C. L. pp. 115 to 119.

Much controversy formerly existed in California and elsewhere as to the applicability and extent of these two common-law rules, and therefore the Legislature of this state in 1872, supposedly for the purpose of settling all such questions at rest, enacted section 1447, Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows: "The naming of a person as executor does not thereby discharge him from any just claim which the testator has against him, but the claim must be included in the inventory, and the executor is liable for the same, as for so much money in his hands, when the debt or demand becomes due."

Thus it will be seen that this section of the Code treats a debt or demand due from the executor from the time it becomes due as so much money in his hands as executor belonging to said estate.

In the early case of Treweek v. Howard, 105 Cal. 434, 39 P. 20, 23, the facts are very similar to those in the case at bar, and there the court, in discussing the meaning and extent of the surety's liability under section 1447 of the Code of Civil Procedure, said:

"Thus, it will be seen the law treats a debt or demand due from the executor, from the time it becomes due, as so much money in his hands.

"This debt was due, as is shown by the pleading, long before the death of the testator, and hence was properly included in the inventory as money in the hands of the executor.

"The law required him to so report it, and, had he failed to do so, and taken the oath required of him by section 1449, he would have been guilty of perjury.

"The sureties are presumed to have signed the bond in view of the law as it existed, and are as liable as they would have been had section 1447 been incorporated in the bond.

"This debt was as money in the hands of the executor, and as such was a part of the estate for the due administration of which the sureties became liable, just as they did for the residue thereof.

"The poverty or riches of their principal—the condition of the estate, where and how invested—were proper subjects of inquiry for the sureties in determining whether or not to become responsible, but cannot be urged as reasons to excuse them from the liability which they assumed.

"Nor can the representations of their principal as to his financial position, or his failure so to do, avail the sureties. Should such circumstances prevail to release sureties, it is apprehended few would be bound.

"The executor was liable, under the law, as for money in his hands, and the sureties must be presumed to have known it. Beyond this, and stripped of verbiage and accessories which cannot control in the decision, the simple fact remains that Bowman was insolvent, and the sureties were not aware of that fact nor of his indebtedness to the estate.

"The case serves to illustrate the wisdom of Solomon, where he says (Prov. xi, 15): 'He that is surety for a stranger shall smart for it, and he that hateth suretyship is sure.'"

The statute is considered again in the case of Minifie v. Rowley, 187 Cal. 481, 486, 202 P. 673, 675, and there the court said: "On June 3, 1915, defendant Forrest S. Rowley was appointed an executor of the will of Samuel Jones, the last surviving partner of the firm to which the debt herein sued upon is alleged to have been due. 'The naming of a person as executor does not thereby discharge him from any just claim which the testator has against him, but the claim must be included in the inventory, and the executor is liable for the same, as for so much money in his hands, when the debt or demand becomes due.' Code Civ. Proc., § 1447. As a necessary consequence, if defendant Forrest S. Rowley owed the $10,000 here in controversy on June 3, 1915, when he became executor, he became chargeable with that sum as for so much money in his hands and continued liable therefor, irrespective of the running of the period of the statute of limitations against the debt itself, by reason of the change in the character of his obligation due to his intervening fiduciary capacity. Treweek v. Howard, 105 Cal. 434, 39 P. 20."

Again, in the Estate of Clary, 203 Cal. 335, 264 P. 242, 244, the Supreme Court adopted the opinion of this court, in which it is said: "The proceedings had in the first instance, leading to the first appeal and the proceedings had in the appeal now before us, were and are both based upon section 1447 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under the terms of which all moneys due from the executor to a testator at the time the executor qualifies as such become assets of the estate of the testator in the hands of the executor, and hence renders the executor liable for the same as if so much money was in his hands."

The law seems well settled that the special restrictions placed upon executors under section 1447 are not made applicable to administrators. Sanchez v. Forster, 133 Cal. 614, 65 P. 1077; Estate of Walker, 125 Cal. 242, 57 P. 991, 73 Am. St. Rep. 40.

The true rule governing the liability of sureties of administrators in such case is declared in Lyon v. Osgood, 58 Vt. 707, 7 A. 5, and that decision has been approved by the Supreme Court of this state in the two cases above cited. See, also, section 1615, Code Civ. Proc.

The Legislature had the power to make a distinction between an administrator and an executor in the matter of their obligations to the estate. In appointing his debtor as his executor, the testator has reposed in him a peculiar trust which the Legislature has seen fit to provide shall not be abused by the fiduciary. An executor so trusted has an even greater obligation to make payment than has an administrator, who receives his appointment usually because of kinship to the decedent. The Legislature undoubtedly thought that, the greater the trust, the more strict should be the accountability. Neither an executor nor an administrator can sue himself. All resort to legal process for the collection of a debt due from an executor or administrator to the estate was cut off by his assuming such office. In the case of an executor, the beneficiaries of an estate are powerless to prevent his appointment. He has deprived them of the ordinary processes of the law for enforcing the payment of his debt, having voluntarily taken upon himself the right and duty to demand and receive and the corresponding duty of paying, the legal consequence of this position is that his own debt to the estate should be conclusively presumed to have been paid and discharged.

[2] It is argued on behalf of appellant that section 1447 merely makes the executor personally liable for the debt and not liable in his official capacity, and therefore his surety, being only for the purpose of indemnifying him in his official capacity, is not liable in this case because Carmichael was insolvent at all times during his administration of said estate. We are unable to agree with this interpretation.

It will be noted that this section refers first to the naming of a person as executor, and then says the executor (not the person named as executor) is liable for so much money in his hands. Therefore under section 1447, Code of Civil Procedure, the debt of the executor to his testator being deemed and considered "as for so much money in his hands, when the debt or demand becomes due," he is liable for the same as executor, and, if he fails to place the money in his hands as executor, he has not faithfully executed the duties of his trust according to law, and his sureties are liable, irrespective of whether he was solvent or insolvent.

We are not unmindful of the fact that a number of the courts of last resort, in other states, where a similar statute exists, have placed the same construction on their statute as that contended for in this case by appellant. Also that the highest courts of a great number of states, which have a like or similar statute to our own, have taken the Legislature at its word, and have held the executor for so much money in his hands as we have done in the case at bar, regardless of his solvency or insolvency, and have held bondsmen liable without any regard to the executor's ability to pay.

In states where the common law on the subject still obtains, the higher court's decisions are in hopeless conflict. We think our conclusion as to the intent and meaning of this statute is not only sustained by its plain and unambiguous language and by such cases as Treweek v. Howard, supra, and the other California cases above cited, but also by the fact that the Legislature of 1901 (St. 1901 p. 208) amended section 1447 by adding thereto the following: "Unless he proves that he had not, either at that time or at any time thereafter, any means wherewith to pay such debt or demand, or such part thereof as may remain unpaid, and that such inability did not arise from any fraud committed by him."

This amendment, along with others, was declared unconstitutional because of defective title and lack of publication, etc. See Lewis v. Dunne, 134 Cal. 291, 66 P. 478, 55 L. R. A. 833, 86 Am. St. Rep. 257. Several other attempts have since been made to amend said section without success.

In conclusion, we might add that the evidence in the case at bar is insufficient to show that Carmichael was unable to pay the notes in question. He admitted that he had $33,000 worth of assets applicable in satisfaction of the notes, and no effort was made to collect from Mrs. Carmichael, and absolutely no testimony that she was insolvent.

A careful consideration of both the law and the facts leads us to the conclusion that appellant is liable on Carmichael's bond as executor of the last will of Sarah Mildred Jones for the payment of said notes.

The order appealed from is therefore affirmed.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiff was injured by being struck by an automobile which was at the time being driven by one of the defendants but which was owned by the other defendant. The defendants answered and a trial was had before the trial court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and fixed his damages in the sum of $1,000. The plaintiff made a motion for a new trial and thereafter the trial court granted the motion on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict. From that order the defendants have appealed and have brought up typewritten transcripts.

The accident occurred in the city of Gilroy. Monterey street runs north and south and is a part of the highway leading from San Francisco to Los Angeles. Fifth street runs east and west. Its eastern end terminates in Monterey street. Fifth street is thirty feet wide and Monterey street is sixty feet wide. A button indicates the center of the intersection. The sidewalks of Fifth street if prolonged across Monterey street are indicated by lines marked on the pavement to indicate the crossings for pedestrians. On the night of December 26, 1929, at about 7:15 p. m., the plaintiff was in the act of crossing Monterey street and was walking toward the east. When he had passed the button the automobile came out of Fifth street, started to turn to the left into Monterey street, and, as it was doing so, it hit the plaintiff. During the trial the plaintiff took the stand as a witness in his own behalf. Among other things, he testified: "I had a little bundle in my hand (a little purchase that I had made) and I stepped off the curb, started to go across, and looked north and south as soon as I could see past the parked cars there and see that the pedestrian's way was clear. I looked frequently as I was passing along to see that the road was clear. I looked north and south and saw no one within approaching distance before I stepped into the pedestrian lane. I looked both ways north and south. As I started to go across on the pedestrian's crossing I slowed up a bit so that I could look past the parked cars both north and south. I didn't stop entirely. I simply slowed up and I looked north and south. There was no obstruction that interfered with my seeing to the south. Nor to the west. The west was behind me. I couldn't see out of the back of my head you know. I didn't look behind me." The plaintiff also called Raymond Taylor, one of the intimate friends of the plaintiff's son. That witness stood on the sidewalk on the west side of Monterey street talking to some acquaintance but with his eyes resting on the plaintiff as the plaintiff attempted to cross Monterey street. Among other things, he testified: "I saw the whole accident. Dr. Clark was about six feet past the button in the safety zone, where they turn at the intersection on a line with that button, six feet past it east, on the east side of Monterey street. When this car came around the corner it struck him on the right side, kind a from Dr. Clark's back. It must have struck him around the thigh from what I could see. When he got to the button in the center of the street he looked north and south to see if there were any cars coming. I noticed that. That was when he got there to the button, right in that little section where it is painted safety zone. * * * He stopped there right by the button and looked to see if there was any car coming south and north and there wasn't any car coming and he proceeded to cross, and this car came and struck Dr. Clark. It was the left side of the car that hit him—about one-third of the length of the bumper—from the left hand of the bumper. The doctor looked before he started to cross the intersection. I took particular notice and when he got to the button then he looked north and south. I guess I looked continuously while he was crossing because I saw him go right to here. I saw this car going around without stopping. There is an arterial sign there. I saw it coming this way. I could see it coming down here. The stop sign is even with the property line. I saw him coming down there, he didn't stop there." The plaintiff also called Oliver Baxter, who testified that he saw the plaintiff fall in the street. Among other things, he testified: "He was in the pedestrian's lane. He was on the east side of Monterey street. The impact was in the neighborhood of three or four feet east of the button."

[1, 2] The defendants make three points. In their first point they contend that the plaintiff failed to prove due care on his part and in their third point they contend that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. In support of these contentions they emphasize the testimony that the plaintiff did not look behind him. They cite White v. Davis, 103 Cal. App. 531, 542, 284 P. 1086, and California Jurisprudence, 1928 Supplement, page 186, § 82. Those authorities do not support their contention. It has been directly held that one lawfully passing over or along a street is not guilty of contributory negligence because he does not look behind him. Burk v. Extrafine Bread Bakery, 208 Cal. 105, 110, 280 P. 522. The second point made by the defendants is that there is no sound or legal basis for the jury to acquit the plaintiff of negligence and find the defendant guilty of negligence based on a fault common to both of them. In support of the point the defendants cite many statutory requirements that do not seem to have been involved. As to each of those requirements they claim that they committed no violation. However, they do not excuse themselves as to the case as made by the plaintiff. The city of Gilroy has an ordinance regulating traffic on the streets of that city. That ordinance was introduced in evidence. Section 8 of article III provides: "It shall be unlawful for the operator of any vehicle to drive into any crosswalk which is marked as provided in section 5 of this ordinance while there is in such cross-walk upon the half of the roadway upon which such vehicle is traveling any pedestrian engaged in crossing the roadway until such pedestrian shall have passed beyond the path of said vehicle." The evidence introduced by the plaintiff made out a prima facie case by reason of the violation of that portion of the ordinance. It is therefore patent that a primary liability was established against the defendant.

[3,4] From what we have said it is perfectly clear that the plaintiff introduced evidence showing that the defendants were guilty of negligence and that the case as it went to the jury did not show that the plaintiff was as a matter of law guilty of contributory negligence. There remains the question of damages. The jury awarded the plaintiff a verdict in the sum of $1,000. The defendants have quoted no evidence showing that said verdict was adequate. We must presume, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that the order appealed from was properly made and therefore that the nature of the injuries suffered by the plaintiff was such that in the opinion of the trial court $1,000 was inadequate.

We find no error in the record. The order appealed from is affirmed.

Evidence held to sustain court's finding that payee agreed to accept amount due on note in satisfaction of judgment for larger amount.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Henry M. Willis, Judge.

YORK, J.

Plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants on a promissory note, claiming a balance due thereon of $606, together with interest at 12 per cent. per annum from March 16, 1926, attorneys' fees, and costs. On June 18, 1928, a default judgment against the defendants was entered in the sum of $839, together with costs. This judgment became final without any appeal therefrom. Thereafter, upon grounds not shown in the record here, defendant Bennett moved to vacate the judgment against him, which motion was denied on October 16, 1928.

On October 19, 1928, defendant Bennett, in conference with the president of the plaintiff corporation, offered to pay the sum of $606 in settlement of the judgment; that he would pay $500 within ten days and the balance of $106 at a later date. This offer was accepted, it being understood that in consideration of such payment plaintiff would satisfy the judgment and the defendant would not proceed further with a motion to rehear the motion to set aside the default, or take an appeal therefrom. At this time Bennett paid $25 on account, by check on the face of which was written, "In settlement of judgment, Balance due $581.00." Thereupon he sought to borrow the balance of the $500 payment which he had agreed to make. He was able to secure a loan of $425 only, which amount on November 3, 1928, he paid to the plaintiff corporation, taking a receipt therefor "to apply on loan No. 27. Principal balance $156." It was further agreed that the plaintiff should wait for one year for payment of the $156.

On January 10, 1929, after motion duly made by defendant Bennett for that purpose, the trial court entered its order decreeing the satisfaction in full of the judgment here involved, upon payment to plaintiff or its attorney of the sum of $156. Plaintiff now appeals from said order.

No question is made of the fact that the controversy was still pending to an extent which would furnish a sufficient consideration for such an agreement of settlement.

Appellant maintains that the evidence does not disclose any agreement on the part of plaintiff to accept less than the full amount due; and that if such an agreement was made, it was conditional upon Bennett bringing in $475 on November 3d. We cannot agree with these contentions. From the evidence received at the hearing pursuant to which the court made the order from which plaintiff has appealed, the court was authorized to find that appellant agreed to accept the sum of $606 in satisfaction of the judgment. There was a conflict in this evidence, which the trial court resolved in favor of the defendants. We think that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the court's decision.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Action by William Harvey, upon whose death Oscar Schatte, executor of his last will and testament, was substituted as plaintiff, against D. B. JENNINGS, J.

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff, such injuries having been caused, so it is alleged, by the negligence of the defendant McJimsey in the operation of a certain automobile bus which was the property of defendant D. B. Maurice, doing business under the fictitious firm name of West Coast Rapid Transit Company. During the trial of the action it was stipulated that defendant McJimsey was the agent and employee of defendant D. B. Maurice, and it appears beyond question that he was acting in the scope of his employment at the time of the accident.

The accident occurred on April 6, 1928, on Hermosa avenue in the city of Hermosa Beach, Cal. Plaintiff was in the employ of a company which was doing certain street grading work in said city and with two other employees of said company was being transferred from the location of one piece of grading work to another in a Ford automobile. The Ford automobile was the property of an employee of the company which was doing the street grading work, and was being operated by the owner, who appears to have had some arrangement with his employer to convey employees of the company from one location to another. Another employee of the company occupied the front seat of the automobile with the driver and plaintiff was seated alone in the rear seat.

Hermosa avenue is the principal street in the city of Hermosa Beach and runs in a general northerly and southerly direction. In the center of this avenue there is an unpaved portion occupied by the tracks of the Pacific Electric Railway, over which no vehicular traffic can pass. Vehicles traveling south generally use the west side of the street and vehicles traveling north use the east side. However, the evidence discloses that the west side of the street is occasionally used by both southbound and northbound traffic. At the time of the accident the west side of the avenue was in a torn-up condition. Five feet of the pavement had been taken up to permit street improvements, leaving a shallow, sandy ditch about eighteen inches deep. According to the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses, the width of the pavement upon which vehicles could travel after the five-foot strip had been cut off was approximately sixteen or seventeen feet, and there was sufficient space to enable one vehicle to pass another thereon. The testimony of defendants' witnesses indicates that the pavement was narrower and would permit the operation of but one vehicle thereon with safety. The Ford automobile in which plaintiff was riding had been proceeding south from Twenty-Fifth street about the middle of the pavement on the west side of Hermosa avenue and was closely followed by the bus in the same relative position in the street. At a point about midway between Nineteenth and Eighteenth streets the driver of the Ford automobile perceived by the reflection in a rear-view mirror with which the Ford was equipped, that the bus was immediately in the rear of his automobile and, for the purpose of enabling the bus to pass his car, turned to his right for a distance of two feet. This movement brought the Ford automobile as close to the west edge of the pavement as the driver felt that he could go with safety. Shortly thereafter the bus collided with the left rear wheel of the Ford automobile, forcing the latter car into the ditch. The evidence appears to be undisputed that both cars were traveling at a moderate rate of speed at the time of the collision. The speed of the Ford was variously estimated at from twelve to eighteen miles per hour and that of the bus somewhat greater, but not to exceed twenty miles per hour.

The case was tried before a jury and resulted in a verdict of $4,000 in favor of plaintiff. From the judgment based thereon defendants prosecute this appeal.

[1] It is the contention of appellants that the trial court erred in giving to the jury two instructions. The first instruction of which appellant complains is as follows: "You are instructed that it was the duty of the driver of defendants' automobile bus on the occasion involved here, and he was bound to anticipate that he might overtake vehicles at any point on the street, and he must, in order to avoid a charge of negligence, keep a proper lookout for them, and keep his machine under such control as will enable him to avoid a collision with another vehicle using proper care and caution, and if the situation requires it he must slow up and stop. A failure, if any, on his part to use this care was negligence, and if this negligence, if any, was the sole proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff, then you will find damages in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants."

It is urged that the foregoing instruction is defective in that it assumes that the driver of the Ford automobile in which respondent was riding was using proper care and caution at the time of the collision and that it entirely disregards the defense of contributory negligence which was pleaded by appellants in the answer filed by them and as to which evidence was produced during the trial of the action.

The argument is made that the instruction in effect advised the jury that the driver of the automobile bus was bound to keep his machine under such control as would enable him to avoid a collision with another vehicle using care and caution, regardless of whether the driver of the other car at the time of the accident was using ordinary care to avoid a collision. This is said to have imposed an unwarranted burden upon appellants, and it is urged that the logical effect of the instruction is to nullify the well-established rule that the rights and duties of all persons using a public street are reciprocal. The suggested criticism of the instruction is answered by the reasoning of the court in the case of Nichols v. Nelson, 80 Cal. App. 590, 596, 252 P. 739, 743, where an instruction containing language identical with that which is here criticized was under discussion. In the above-cited case the jury were told that it is not enough for the driver of an automobile which has collided with a pedestrian to show simply that at the time of the accident he was operating his automobile at a lawful rate of speed, but that he still remains bound to anticipate that he may meet persons at any point of the street and that he must, in order to avoid a charge of negligence, keep a proper lookout for them and keep his machine under such control as will enable him to avoid collision with other persons using proper care and caution, and if the situation requires it, he must slow up and stop. The court in approving the instruction said that the use of the word "proper" to indicate the care required of the defendant meant no more than the exercise of that degree of care which a prudent man should use under the circumstances. With respect to the phrase "bound to anticipate" the court said that its effect was not, as claimed, to enlarge the degree of care required of the defendant. It was pointed out that the trial court had fully and fairly in numerous instructions advised the jury concerning the relative rights and duties of pedestrians and drivers of vehicles upon the public highway, and it was said that "where a court has thus properly charged a jury a subsequent charge to find for one or the other if proper care had not been exercised is not prejudicially erroneous." It is to be noted that, in the instant case, the jury received numerous instructions which most fully and fairly advised them concerning the relative rights and duties of the operators of the two automobiles concerned in the collision. In Ballos v. Natural, 93 Cal. App. 601, 269 P. 972, an instruction which placed upon the operator of an automobile the duty to anticipate that he might meet persons at any point upon the highway and that he must, in order to avoid the charge of negligence, keep a proper lookout for them and keep his machine under such control as would enable him to avoid a collision with other persons using proper care and caution, and if the situation requires must slow up and stop, received the approval of the court. A similar instruction was held correct in Meyers v. Bradford, 54 Cal. App. 157, 201 P. 471. In Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 340, 208 P. 125, the requirement that the operator of an automobile is bound to anticipate that he may meet persons at any point on the street and must, in order to avoid a charge of negligence, keep a proper lookout for them and keep his machine under such control as will enable him to avoid collision with another person using proper care and caution, and if the situation requires must slow up and stop, was unequivocally stated. The rule thus announced was approved in Potter v. Driver, 97 Cal. App. 311, 275 P. 526. Instructions embodying language similar to or identical with that which is here attacked were approved in the following decisions: Wright v. Salzberger & Sons, 81 Cal. App. 690, 254 P. 671; Putnam v. Pickwick Stages, Inc., 98 Cal. App. 268, 276 P. 1055.

[2-5] The instruction under discussion is further vigorously attacked as being an instruction directing a verdict for respondent without regard to the issue of contributory negligence on the part of respondent. It is the general rule that an instruction directing a verdict for a plaintiff in the event that the jury finds certain facts to be true must embrace all the factors necessary to show legal liability of the defendant and to warrant the direction contained therein that the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict. Nor is the error cured by the submission of other instructions which correctly state the law in the respects wherein the instruction attacked is defective. Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., 161 Cal. 176, 118 P. 700. But it is to be noted that the instruction in the instant case directed the jury that if the negligence of appellant, McJimsey, was the sole, proximate cause of respondent's injury, the jury should find damages against appellants. The word "sole" is defined in the Standard Dictionary as follows: "Being alone or the only one; existing or acting without another; only; individual." Webster's New International Dictionary defines the word "sole" as: "Being or acting without another; single, individual; only, as a sole heir. Alone, isolated, without company, solitary." Under the above-quoted definitions it is clear that the jury were in effect told that in order to find damages against appellants, it was necessary for them to find that the negligence of appellant, McJimsey, was the only proximate cause of respondent's injury. If therefore the jury followed the court's instruction, as we are entitled to assume, it must have found that the alleged negligence of respondent did not in fact contribute to the injury which he sustained as a result of the collision. The words and phrases used by the court in the instruction under consideration were used in their customary and conventional sense and it must be presumed that the jury so understood them. Nichols v. Nelson, supra. In Wright v. Salzberger & Sons, supra, page 698 of 81 Cal. App., 254 P. 671, an instruction that the defendant while operating an automobile on a public street was under the duty to keep such a lookout for other traffic and for pedestrians and other persons using the street as an ordinarily careful and prudent person would have done and that if the defendant failed to perform the duty thus defined and if the jury should find that such failure was the proximate cause of the injury the jury should find a verdict in plaintiff's favor was attacked as being a directed verdict against the defendant without a reservation regarding the defense of contributory negligence. It was held that the instruction was not subject to the complaint specified and that the giving of it was not erroneous. It is to be noted that the instruction in the case cited told the jury that if it should be found that defendants had failed to perform the duty described by the court and the jury should find that such failure was the proximate cause of the injury complained of the verdict should be for plaintiff. Obviously, the instruction was more susceptible of criticism than that of which complaint is here made, since in the former instruction the important limitation that the jury in order to return a verdict for plaintiff should find that defendant's negligence was the sole cause of the injury is lacking. In Hotel Ass'n v. Walter, 23 Neb. 280, 36 N. W. 561, 564, objection was made that an instruction wherein the jury was told that, if an accident occurred solely in consequence of defendant's negligence, defendant was liable for resulting injuries was misleading as failing to take into account the contributory negligence of plaintiff. The Supreme Court of Nebraska held that if the accident occurred solely in consequence of defendant's negligence, the plaintiff must have been free from contributory negligence and the jury must have so understood it. This we believe to be the proper construction of the language criticized in the instruction under consideration.

[6, 7] It is also contended that the trial court erred in giving the following instruction: "The Motor Vehicle Act, section 125 (a) provides: 'Any vehicle overtaking another vehicle proceeding in the same direction shall pass at least two feet to the left thereof, and shall not again be driven to the right side of the highway until reasonably clear of such overtaken vehicles.' The above section was in force at the time and place of the accident involved here, and if you find that the defendants violated the above section, or any provision thereof, then the violation of same was negligence as a matter of law, and if you find that this violation, if any, was the sole, proximate cause of any injury to plaintiff, then you will find damages in favor of the plaintiff and against defendants."

No complaint is made of the wording of this instruction or that it does not correctly state the rule with respect to the overtaking and passing of one vehicle on a highway by another vehicle, but it is contended that there is no evidence in the record which shows that the bus driven by appellant McJimsey ever attempted to pass the Ford automobile in which respondent was riding and it is therefore urged that the giving of the instruction was misleading and prejudicial to the rights of appellants. In Gregg v. McDonald, 73 Cal. App. 748, 239 P. 373, 376, the rule with respect to the giving of irrelevant instruction is stated as follows: "The trial court gave an instruction which was not warranted by the evidence. We agree with appellant that it was calculated to mislead the jurors and to affect their conclusion on the amount of damages to be awarded by them. We are satisfied, therefore, that the giving of it was prejudicial error necessitating a reversal of the judgment. The rule deducible from the authorities is this: Such instructions only should be given as are based upon legitimate evidence in the case. If an irrelevant instruction be given, and if it is unobjectionable as an abstract proposition of law, the giving of it is a mere technical, but not a reversible, error, if it is not calculated to mislead the jury. If, however, it is calculated to mislead the jury and to affect their conclusion upon the issue submitted to them, it is prejudicial and reversible error. Coughlin v. People, 18 Ill. 266, 68 Am. Dec. 541; Mendelsohn v. Anaheim Lighter Co., 40 Cal. 657; Perkins v. Eckert, 55 Cal. 400; People v. Roe, 189 Cal. 559, 209 P. 560."

Examination of the record discloses that the jury may fairly have drawn from the evidence presented to them the inference that the automobile bus was attempting to pass the Ford automobile at the time the collision occurred. It is therefore not open to doubt that the giving of the instruction was proper. Raymond v. Hill, 168 Cal. 473, 479, 143 P. 743; Waniorek v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 17 Cal. App. 121, 128, 118 P. 947.

Finally, even though it be conceded that the instruction complained of was entirely inapplicable, we are unable to discover from the record that the rights of appellants were in any way prejudiced thereby. Under such circumstances, the giving of the instruction does not constitute such error as to warrant reversal of the judgment. Wright v. Salzberger & Sons, supra; Lower v. Hughes, 80 Cal. App. 444, 448, 449, 251 P. 952; Marston v. Pickwick Stages, Inc., 78 Cal. App. 526, 532, 248 P. 930.

For the reasons herein set forth, the judgment is affirmed.

Maker of note secured by pledge of corporate stock held entitled to notice of time and place of sale of stock (Civ. Code, § 3002).

3. Corporations ⇨123(24).

Holder of note could not avoid duty of giving maker notice of time and place of sale of pledged stock by obtaining judgment on principal obligation and obtaining sale of stock under execution (Civ. Code, § 3002).

4. Pledges ⇨55.

In absence of agreement to contrary, holder of note secured by pledge may bring independent action to collect note.

5. Pledges ⇨25.

Prosecution of action on note to judgment does not extinguish lien on pledged property nor terminate relationship of pledgor and pledgee (Civ. Code, § 3002).

SPENCE, J.

In this action for conversion of certain capital stock, judgment was entered in favor of defendant, from which judgment plaintiff appeals.

On the trial no evidence was offered by defendant. There is no dispute regarding the facts hereinafter set forth, which facts were proved either by the uncontradicted testimony introduced by plaintiff or by stipulation. Plaintiff borrowed the sum of $500 from defendant, and as security for a promissory note in that amount delivered to defendant a certificate duly indorsed for 100 shares of the capital stock of Baird-Bailhache Company. The note bore the notation "100 shares Baird-Bailhache Co. stock attached." The stock was of the approximate value of $1,000. At the time of the transaction it was orally agreed by the parties that defendant would not sell the stock or take any action to recover the debt without notifying plaintiff. The note matured, and defendant, without notice to plaintiff, commenced an action on the note, and recovered judgment by default. No mention of the pledged property was made in this action. Thereafter, and without notice to and without the knowledge of plaintiff, defendant caused execution to be levied, and said stock was sold. Defendant purchased the stock on the execution sale for the sum of $5. Thereafter the balance due on the judgment amounting to $531.15 was paid by plaintiff to defendant, and a demand was made by plaintiff for the return of the stock, which was refused.

[1] The present case was tried on plaintiff's second amended complaint. The sufficiency of that complaint was passed upon in Baird v. Olskeski, 102 Cal. App. 452, 283 P. 321, which decision has become the law of the case. In our opinion, the undisputed facts proved upon the trial sustained the material allegations of that complaint. The trial court, however, apparently adopted respondent's contention that "the agreement alleged by plaintiff as to forbearance and special notice must be in writing." The findings were therefore against the execution of such an agreement and against the existence of any violation of any alleged agreement.

[2-5] Appellant contends that without regard to the oral agreement of the parties he was entitled to notice of time and place of the sale of the pledge, and in our opinion this contention must be sustained. It is admitted that there was no waiver of notice, and we may disregard the oral agreement and treat the case as one of an ordinary promissory note secured by pledged property. In such case the pledgor is entitled to notice of sale under section 3002 of the Civil Code, which provides: "A pledgee must give actual notice to the pledgor of the time and place at which the property pledged will be sold, at such a reasonable time before the sale as will enable the pledgor to attend." In the absence of any agreement to the contrary, the pledgee is within his rights in bringing an independent action to collect the note, but the prosecution of such action to judgment does not extinguish the lien upon the pledged property nor does it terminate the existing relationship of pledgor and pledgee. Commercial Savings Bank v. Hornberger, 140 Cal. 16, 73 P. 625; French v. McCarthy, 125 Cal. 508, 58 P. 154; Sonoma Valley Bank v. Hill, 59 Cal. 107. That relationship is in the nature of trust (English v. Culley, 85 Cal. App. 291, 259 P. 355), and, notwithstanding the judgment obtained upon the principal obligation, the rights and duties of the parties with respect to the pledged property remain the same. The pledgee is still entitled to notice of time and place of sale under section 3002 of the Civil Code, and the sale of the pledged property without compliance with the requirements of the law constitutes a conversion. 21 Cal. Jur. 343. In our opinion, the mere fact that the pledgee went through the formalities of a sale under execution does not relieve him of his duty to give to the pledgor the notice required by that section.

The judgment is reversed.

Reviewing court can grant new trial for excessive judgment for personal injuries only when judgment shocks sense of justice and raises presumption of prejudice or passion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Henry M. Willis, Judge.

Action by A. M. Ullman against the California Cab Company and others, including H. R. Lane. From an adverse judgment, the last-named defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Cooper & Collings, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J.

Defendant Lane appeals from a judgment rendered against him in favor of plaintiff in an action for personal injuries.

[1] The sole question presented by appellant is whether the amount of damages awarded to plaintiff is excessive; and the reason urged by appellant for a reversal of the judgment is that the decision of the court and the judgment based thereon are not sustained by the evidence.

As stated in the findings of fact made by the trial court: " * * * Plaintiff received a deep, jagged laceration about one inch in length in his forehead over his right eye, contusion of the right lower chest and forearm, and abrasions of the right ankle, from all of which plaintiff became sick, sore and disabled and suffered a permanent scar on his right forehead, to his damage in the sum of twenty-five hundred ($2500) dollars."

An examination of the record herein discloses the details from which the trial court was justified in finding that, as a result of the injuries particularly mentioned in said finding, "plaintiff became sick, sore and disabled. * * *

Included within such record is evidence to the effect that prior to the accident which resulted in the injuries to plaintiff his general physical condition was good; that after the accident plaintiff suffered pain for a period of about five weeks—intense pains in his side; dull and constant pain in his right forearm; sharp pains in his forehead; that at the time of trial, which was several months after the accident occurred, "there remains a pain about the center of the spine"; that plaintiff was "very restless, nervous, sleeping in a disturbed fashion," with pain in his back which he did not have before the accident; that for about five weeks he had pain in the back, along with pain in his side, following which such pains continued intermittently, that is, for several days he would be without pain and then with it for a day or so at a time; that on occasions when plaintiff experienced nervousness the large muscles "in the rear of the neck" would contract to such an extent as to become quite painful, lasting during the duration of the particular nervous disturbance; that plaintiff's head was bandaged for about four weeks, and his chest was strapped with adhesive tape after the accident for about two and a half weeks; that after the accident plaintiff was "in a terribly nervous condition"; that for days at a time he was "unable to attend to anything pertaining to business"; that on a great many occasions plaintiff found that "discussions, controversies or arguments, ordinarily incumbent upon the average business man engaged in any line of business, would at once upset (his) nervous system to such an extent that (he) would have pains in (his) stomach and would have to immediately discontinue such discussion or controversy or argument in order to secure any relief from his nervous attack"; and that, in time of continuance, such pains varied from several minutes to several hours. A physician testified, in substance, that the "nervousness from normal reaction, * * * would be caused from a collision" such as produced plaintiff's other physical injuries.

It thus appears that the evidence was amply sufficient to sustain the finding of fact to which attention has been directed.

[2] Where the ground urged for a new trial is that the judgment rendered was excessive in amount, an appellate tribunal is authorized to reverse the judgment only when it appears that the judgment was "so disproportionate to any reasonable limit of compensation warranted by the facts as to shock the sense of justice and raise a presumption that it (was) based on prejudice or passion." 20 Cal. Jur. 101, and authorities there cited. On consideration of the facts, this court is unable to say that such required condition here obtains.

It is ordered that the judgment be, and it is, affirmed.

ALLEN, Justice pro tem.

The plaintiff filed his second amended complaint in the court below alleging two causes of action, both in substance that in the month of October, 1929, one Edwin S. Pascoe was the owner of certain real property in Imperial county and entitled to the rents and profits thereof; that during the month of November, 1929, the defendant was appointed receiver in a certain mortgage foreclosure proceeding against the property; that during the month of October, 1929, one George Nowlin became indebted to Pascoe in the sum of $520 for pasturage removed from said premises during said month; that Nowlin paid said sum to the defendant receiver after his appointment; that thereafter about November 22, 1929, Pascoe assigned his rights in said sum to the plaintiff herein, who made demand for payment from said receiver, which was refused, whereupon plaintiff filed his complaint praying for judgment. To this complaint defendant filed a general and special demurrer which was by the court sustained without leave to amend. Thereupon judgment was entered for defendant, from which judgment plaintiff appeals.

The two points raised by the demurrer are: First, was the receiver in the mortgage action, and not plaintiff's assignor, entitled to the money set out in the complaint as part of the rents, issues, and profits of the real property therein involved?

[1] It is the law of this state that the mortgagee not in possession is not entitled to the rents, issues, and profits of the premises where the mortgagor remained in possession of the mortgaged premises. In the case of Simpson v. Ferguson, 112 Cal. 180, 188, 40 P. 104, 44 P. 484, 486, 53 Am. St. Rep. 201, it is stated: "The mortgagor being in possession of the land, and entitled as of right to the crops grown thereon, it was competent for him to sell or mortgage, or otherwise dispose of, them, and convey good title thereto, as against the mortgagee of the land or his assigns, at any time prior to the foreclosure of the latter's mortgage." In Binney v. San Dimas Lemon Association, 81 Cal. App. 213, 218, 253 P. 346, which case is similar to the one at bar, it is held that the receiver was not legally authorized to demand and receive the proceeds derived from the sale of fruit taken by the mortgagor from the mortgaged premises prior to the appointment of a receiver. Cases holding otherwise are not only contrary to the general weight of authority but in direct conflict with two cases decided by the Supreme Court of this state. Simpson v. Ferguson, supra; Garretson Invest. Co. v. Arndt, 144 Cal. 65, 77 P. 770.

3. Receivers ⇨174(1).

4. Receivers ⇨168.

[2] The complaint alleges the taking and disposing of the pasturage prior to the appointment of a receiver, which was required to be so alleged by plaintiff in order to state a cause of action.

[3] The next question raised in the appeal is: Has the plaintiff capacity to sue? In order to sue a receiver, permission must be had from the court making the appointment. It is alleged in the complaint that the cause of action was assigned to plaintiff, and that permission to sue the receiver was, before the filing of the complaint, first had and obtained. This would seem to the court to be sufficient. Permission was all that was required, and once obtained, plaintiff was then permitted to proceed with his action.

[4] This court fails to see any reason why a third person cannot sue for property wrongfully taken by a receiver, or wrongfully withheld. See Fidelity Savings & Loan Association v. Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank, 186 Cal. 689, 200 P. 631; 22 Cal. Jur., p. 497, § 84; 22 Cal. Jur. p. 523, § 114.

[5] It was incumbent on plaintiff to allege the ultimate facts of his cause of action, which facts, when proven, would entitle him to recover. This we think plaintiff did.

From the foregoing it must be held that the trial court was in error in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to overrule the demurrer and proceed accordingly.

Liggett & Liggett and Glen H. Munkelt, all of San Diego, for appellant.

ALLEN, Justice pro tem.

[1, 2] Plaintiff recovered judgment in conversion in the lower court. This action was originally commenced against James C. Byers, who was sheriff of San Diego county and who levied an attachment on the stock of goods in an action against C. X. Thompson. Plaintiff, who is the wife of C. X. Thompson, filed a third party claim. The attaching creditor filed with the sheriff an indemnifying bond and obtained judgment against C. X. Thompson. The sheriff sold the property under execution issued on the judgment. Subsequently James C. Byers died and appellant, who was appointed executrix of his estate, was substituted as party defendant in this action and appeals from the judgment. The first error relied upon is that the trial court erred in holding that plaintiff's failure to file and publish any certificate of carrying on business under a fictitious name was im-material as to her right to maintain the action. It is admitted that plaintiff was conducting business under the name of Home Specialty Company, and was retailing goods under such name. The court found that plaintiff had not, prior to the trial, nor at any time, published any certificate as required under section 2468 of the Civil Code. In an early case our Supreme Court held that section 2468 of the Civil Code, relative to the filing and publishing of fictitious names, did not apply to actions of tort. Ralph v. Lockwood, 61 Cal. 155. This case is cited in Reeves v. First National Bank, 20 Cal. App. 508, at page 512, 129 P. 800, 801, where it expressly says: "This action was one for tort, and hence does not fall within section 2468 of the Civil Code." Appellant urges with some eagerness that this cannot be the law because this section of the code has been amended since the rendition of the opinion in those cases by inserting the words "or transactions had" and cites cases from other jurisdictions supporting his contention. The cases cited do not bear out this contention. The case of Farquharson v. Wadkins, 54 Okl. 450, 153 P. at page 1160, 1161, is one brought for damages sustained by the partnership. Quoting from the decision: "They instituted the suit to recover damages for an injury claimed to have been sustained by them as partners under this fictitious name of the 'Elite Theater.'" And the court held that it was necessary for them to have filed and published notice of such partnership before suit could be maintained. This, we think, would not have precluded them from suing in tort under the individual names. In this case the suit was filed under the name of M. S. Thompson and not the Home Specialty Company, the fictitious name under which she transacted business. In further construing the word "transaction" it cannot be safely said that the plaintiff in this case had any transaction or transactions in a business nature with the sheriff of San Diego county. All she did when he levied on the property claimed by her was to tell him so in writing. We do not understand the word "transaction" to mean that one can commit a tort and then claim he has had a transaction with such person. A transaction must be something of a mutual nature and would not extend to torts. Had the word "transaction" been inserted in the statute for such cases as this as claimed by appellant the Legislature could and properly would have added "in all cases" to what it did say, or had it meant to include torts when it so amended such section, could have made it plain by saying "transactions and torts." This it did not do, and we cannot presume that it meant anything more than it said. We do not read into the section anything not contained therein.

[3, 4] Appellant next contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings.

The main contention of appellant is that plaintiff's only witness was C. X. Thompson, her husband, whose evidence was insufficient to overcome the presumption established by section 164 of the Civil Code that all property acquired by either spouse during marriage is community property. The testimony of C. X. Thompson is that plaintiff entered into the business in 1924 with her sole and separate property which she had before her marriage; that such property consisted of $1,200 in cash and a lot which she sold and put into the business; that she ordered the goods which were charged to her by the wholesalers; that she carried the bank account in her own name and drew checks thereon; that no community funds were invested in said business; that he never contributed any funds to the business; that an agreement was had between himself and his wife that it should be her sole and separate business; that at no time had he operated the same except at one time when his wife was called away by sickness; that he did not handle the funds of the business and had not worked for the Home Specialty Company. This uncontradicted evidence was sufficient to overcome the presumption of the statute. If believed by the court, one witness who is entitled to full credit is sufficient to prove any fact.

The complaint in this action was originally brought against James C. Byers and alleged that he was the sheriff of San Diego county and prayed for judgment against him individually. The answer justifies his acts on the ground that he acted in his official capacity by virtue of a valid writ of attachment. In the trial it was stipulated that he acted at all times in his official capacity.

[5] A sheriff may be sued in his individual capacity for torts committed by him in the course of his official duties, and defendant would be entitled to a finding on the fact unless such failure to so find would be prejudicial to the sheriff's rights. Finding No. 5 sets out that at the time of the levy of the attachment the defendant was acting as sheriff of San Diego county. In reading and construing the findings as a whole, we see nothing which would constitute such error as to warrant a reversal of the trial court.

[6] It is also contended that the judgment must be reversed because it does not appear that the claim against the Byers estate has ever been presented and disallowed by the executrix. Section 1502 of the Code of Civil Procedure is that: "If an action is pending against the decedent at the time of his death, the plaintiff must in like manner file his claim with the clerk, or present it to the executor or administrator for allowance or rejection, authenticated as required in other cases; and no recovery shall be had in the action unless proof be made of such filing or presentation." This section should be read in connection with section 1493 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is as follows: "All claims arising upon contracts, whether the same be due, not due, or contingent, and all claims for funeral expenses and expenses of the last sickness must be filed or presented within a time limited in the notice, and any claim not so filed or presented is barred forever; provided, however, that when it is made to appear by the affidavit of the claimant to the satisfaction of the court, or a judge thereof, that the claimant had no notice as provided in this chapter, by reason of being out of the state, it may be filed or presented at any time before a decree of distribution is entered," etc.

The claim in this action was one arising in tort. It follows that it was not necessary to prepare and file with the executrix for allowance or otherwise, any claim. There is no statute requiring the presentation of such a claim to the executrix. The case of Millar v. Millar, 51 Cal. App. 718, 728, 197 P. 811, fully answers this contention and is determinative thereof.

Some objections are made to the rulings of the trial court on the admission of testimony, but a close examination of the record does not disclose such errors as would justify a reversal of the cause.

The judgment of the trial court is therefore affirmed.

Joseph M. Wapner, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem.

Respondents brought this action to recover from defendant $1,323.50 upon written guaranty of appellant to pay same. Judgment went for respondents, from which appellant has appealed.

It appears from the evidence that respondents were copartners doing business under the name of the Star Plumbing & Hardware Company, and on July 7, 1926, they entered into a contract with L. C. Adams to do the plumbing work and furnish plumbing material for the construction of an apartment building. The contract price was fixed at $15,400, to be paid for as the work progressed, and said contract provided that, in the event of failure in payments, said company, at its option had the right to refuse to further proceed with the work.

Appellant was engaged in business as a broker, and as such secured a loan of $100,000 from the Western Loan & Building Company. He was the special agent of this company and was made trustee for the purpose of distributing this money in the construction of the said building. On October 6, 1926, respondents refused to proceed with the plumbing unless satisfactory arrangements were made regarding their payment for same. Respondents made demand on Adams for the money, but he informed them that he could not pay them, and at his request they accompanied him to appellant's office and informed him that they would not proceed with the work unless satisfactory arrangements were made for its payment. Appellant thereupon executed his written guaranty to pay them $1,495.40, of which $3,471.90 was later paid, leaving a balance of $1,233.50. The said written guaranty being as follows: "Western Loan Building Co., Los Angeles, Calif., Oct. 5, 1926. Gentlemen: You are hereby authorized to pay to the order Star Plumbing and Hardware Co., the sum of $1,795.40 for finish material and labor furnished and used in the construction of building situated on Lot 20 and 22, Block —, tract, Southern District, Agricultural Park, and charge same to my account, deducting the amount from the proceeds of your loan No. 16275 made to Lester Adams out of ——— payment, the work having thus far been approved. This order is irrevocable. L. C. Adams, owner and builder. L. C. Adams, architect, contractor. Accepted, and payment to be made (date) after final inspection of plumbing inspector. I guarantee payment to Star Plumbing & Hardware Co. S. E. Beach."

Appellant contends that the words, "I guarantee payment to Star Plumbing & Hardware Co.," were placed in said writing after appellant signed. There is, on the contrary, substantial evidence to the effect that these words were written in said instrument in his presence and before he signed it.

[1] Appellant also claims that in December, 1926, respondents entered into an agreement with other creditors of Adams, by which they agreed to accept reimbursement for all money owing them by Adams, out of funds and property that had been turned over by Adams to a committee of the creditors. That by signing this agreement respondents exonerated him from any guaranty he may have made. However, it appears that prior to signing said agreement appellant had furnished respondents with a written statement signed by him, to the effect that, by signing the said agreement, respondents did not waive any right accruing to them from said guaranty.

From the committee to whom the funds and property of Adams was turned over, respondents received $500, which was credited upon said guaranteed claims.

[2, 3] The next contention of appellant is that the said guaranty was without consideration. It is not necessary to the existence of a good consideration that a benefit should be conferred upon the promisor. It is enough that prejudice be suffered, or agreed to be suffered by the promisee. Section 1605, Civ. Code; Bacon v. Grosse, 165 Cal. 481, 132 P. 1027. Where services were performed for the benefit of a third party, in reliance that defendant would pay therefor, and defendant directly promised to pay, an original contract was thereby constituted with a sufficient consideration for its support. Meyers v. McKillop, 37 Cal. App. 144, 173 P. 773. The words "guaranty" or "guarantee" do not always import a contract of guaranty. These words are often used in the sense of promise or agreement importing an original obligation on the part of a person executing such contract. Meyer v. Moore, 72 Cal. App. 367, 237 P. 550; Ackley v. Prime, 99 Cal. App. 534, 278 P. 932.

[4] Respondents were unwilling to continue work on the building unless some satisfactory arrangements were made by which they would be assured of payment for same. They so notified Adams. He informed them that he had no money with which he could pay them, and at his request they accompanied him to appellant's office, and laid the matter before appellant. He was the agent of the financing company that had furnished the funds for constructing the building, and had charge of these funds. He told respondents to go ahead with the work, and that he would pay them for it, and thereupon signed the guaranty. When the circumstances leading up to the making of this guaranty are considered, the conclusion follows that the so-called guaranty of the appellant was an original undertaking on his part, and is supported by a sufficient consideration.

[5] Appellant filed a counterclaim in which he alleged that Ben Yankelewitch, one of the respondents, entered into an agreement in writing with appellant, by the terms of which they mutually agreed that, for all sums paid out by appellant for and on behalf of L. C. Adams, said respondents would reimburse appellant to the extent of one-half thereof, and that appellant had paid out on said agreement in excess of $10,000, and therefore said respondents became and are indebted to him in the sum of $5,000.

In support of his counterclaim the appellant offered in evidence a bond executed by the said Adams as principal, with himself and the said Ben Yankelewitch as sureties. This bond set forth that the said Adams had applied to said company for a loan of $100,000 for the construction of the aforesaid apartment building, and provided that said Adams should keep said building free and clear of all liens of laborers, materialmen, and others. Appellant testified that as such surety he had paid over $10,000, and that therefore respondent Ben Yankelewitch, as his cosurety, owed him $5,000. Appellant is contradicted in this testimony by his son, W. E. Beach, who testified on cross-examination that appellant had never paid anything to the laborers, materialmen, or others who furnished labor or material in the construction of said building, from his personal funds. However, it appears that this is an attempt to set off the individual debt of a partner, against an action upon a claim owing to the partnership.

Section 438 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "The counterclaim mentioned in section 437 must tend to diminish or defeat the plaintiff's recovery and must exist in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff between whom a several judgment might be had in the action."

In this state the common-law rule has been expressly enacted by section 2442 of the Civil Code (1923) which declares the liability of a copartner to be joint. Under the facts of this case a separate judgment could not be had against only one of the partners. Miner v. Rickey, 5 Cal. App. 451, 90 P. 718; Harrison v. McCormick, 69 Cal. 616, 11 P. 456.

In an action on a partnership demand, the defendant cannot set off an individual debt from one of the partners. McNutt v. Hannon, 183 Cal. 537, 191 P. 1108; Flynn v. Seale, 2 Cal. App. 665, 84 P. 263; 24 R. C. L. 869. A claim against one partner is not a good counterclaim in an action upon a claim due the firm. 25 Am. and Eng. Enc. of Law, 578.

We find no errors justifying a reversal of this case.

The judgment is affirmed.

FINNEY, Justice pro tem.

This is an action to recover a secret profit realized and retained by the defendant from a sale of real property negotiated by himself and the plaintiff. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant takes this appeal.

It is the theory of the plaintiff that he and the defendant were engaged in a joint adventure in negotiating the sale of certain real property which he held under option, which sale resulted in the profits retained by the defendant, and that he (the plaintiff) is entitled to recover one-half of such profits. Briefly the facts are these, as found by the court:

In the month of August, 1926, and during all the times in question, the plaintiff and defendant were licensed real estate salesmen, engaged in the real estate brokerage business and associated in the office of W. M. Garland & Co., in buying and selling real estate as salesmen; that on or about August 13, 1926, the plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement to work together in handling and selling certain real property belonging to one Macklin and commonly known as the Fedora Hotel, Los Angeles; that it was agreed between them that the plaintiff would obtain an option in writing from said Macklin to purchase said property for the sum of $50,000 net to the seller, and that they would work together to procure a purchaser for the property during the life of the option, at a price in excess of the amount to be paid to said Macklin, and that they would share alike in whatever proceeds arose from the sale of the property over and above the price to be paid Macklin, and any amount necessary to be paid to W. M. Garland & Co. as a commission. Thereafter, on or about August 15, 1926, the plaintiff obtained, in the name of his aunt, an exclusive thirty-day option, in writing, to purchase the property from Macklin for the sum of $50,000, to be paid $15,000 in cash, on delivery of deed and certificate of title and $35,000 on time, to be evidenced by a note secured by deed of trust on said property. Thereafter, on or about September 13, 1926, the defendant reported to plaintiff that he had procured a bona fide purchaser for said property, to wit, one Evelyn Davies, who would be willing to pay therefor the sum of $50,000, and the further sum of $1,250 to apply on a brokerage commission, the seller to pay the balance of said commission, to wit, $1,250, thus making a brokerage commission of $2,500 on the sale. Believing these representations to be true, the plaintiff was thereby induced to and he did exercise his option to purchase the property, and the deal for the same was closed on the basis of this offer, during the life of the option, and J. H. Macklin, the owner of the property, delivered his deed therefor to the purchaser, Evelyn Davies. Thereupon the plaintiff and defendant divided the ostensible profit or commission so made on the transaction, to wit, the sum of $2,500, each receiving one-half the balance thereof after paying $833.33 to W. M. Garland & Co.

The court further finds that shortly thereafter the plaintiff discovered that Evelyn Davies was not the bona fide purchaser of said property, but was in fact acting as a dummy for the defendant and one M. E. Hutton, Jr., in the purchase of said property, and that one-half of the money paid for the purchase of said property, including the ostensible profit or commission aforesaid, belonged to the defendant and was actually paid by him; that thereafter the property was sold in such a way that the defendant realized for himself a profit of $6,729.20 and secured a one-half beneficial interest in certain real property, commonly known as 422 South Alexandria avenue, Los Angeles, the title thereto being held by the Title Insurance & Trust Company, as legal owners, for the benefit of the defendant as to such interest. Thereafter, and on May 11, 1927, this suit was begun to recover one-half of said profits and beneficial interest and resulted in a judgment accordingly in favor of the plaintiff.

Appellant urges numerous reasons for a reversal of the judgment in this case, but all of such reasons relate to three principal objections which will be discussed in their order.

[1,2] First, appellant contends that the evidence fails to support finding number II which, in effect, finds that the appellant and respondent entered into a joint adventure whereby they agreed, each with the other, to work together in securing an option from J. H. Macklin on the property commonly known as the Fedora Hotel in Los Angeles, for the sum of $50,000, and in selling the same to a purchaser who would buy the property at a price in excess of the net price to be paid the seller, and that they would share alike in whatever proceeds arose from the sale of the property over and above the price to be paid the seller therefor and any amount necessary to be paid W. M. Garland & Co. Appellant further contends that the evidence fails to show any relationship between appellant and respondent, except that of coemployees engaged in business as real estate salesmen in the office of W. M. Garland & Co. at the time the sale in question was negotiated and consummated.

We think this objection is not well founded. The finding is made upon conflicting evidence in which the respondent testified, in substance, that he first talked to Mann about the Macklin properties about August 1, 1926, in the Garland office; that Macklin was willing to give him the exclusive right to sell his property and he suggested that Mann make a trip around to look over the properties of which Macklin had given him a list; that after making the trip and examining the property Mann suggested that respondent "get an option" on two or three of the best properties and, following that suggestion, on August 13, 1926, respondent secured an option on the Fedora Hotel. Respondent further testified, in the language of the bill of exceptions: "I was working on the basis that I had an option on this property and if he would produce a buyer I would split with him the profit over the option price, after we had satisfied the office with half the Realty Board commission; Mann and I had several conversations; the first occurred about a week after the option was obtained, about August 20th; Mann and I were by ourselves in the Garland office and I said, 'I have the option on the Fedora signed up' and showed him the option, and I said 'Now, if you will assist me in getting a buyer, I will split the profits with you on this particular deal'; he said that would be satisfactory; I couldn't quote his exact words; he told me he considered that a very steep figure on the property and that he thought there were profitable possibilities at that figure and he would be perfectly willing to go out and work on it on that basis and cooperate with me." Later, "I said to Mann, 'I want to be positive that you are actually selling this property because if you are not actually selling it, I want to turn it over on this other deal that I have just been offered'; he said there was no question about his selling it; I should have faith in him; he was not attempting to keep me out of the profit in the deal; he was merely selling it as a broker and all he expected was the commission; that he had worked very hard on it at my suggestion, and so he had; that talk was had about September 13th, the day the matter went into escrow." There is other testimony in the record to the same general effect. However, it is not necessary to quote further, as it is apparent from the quotation already made that there is evidence in the record to sustain the finding in question. A finding made by the trial court on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed if, as in this case, there is evidence to sustain the same. Fogg v. Perris Irr. Dist., 154 Cal. 209, 97 P. 316; Keyes v. Nims, 43 Cal. App. 1, 184 P. 695.

[3] The appellant also contends, in this connection, that there is a fatal variance between the allegations of the complaint and the proof on which is based the finding that the appellant and respondent entered into a joint adventure for the purpose of handling and selling the Fedora Hotel. At the close of the plaintiff's case, a motion was made on behalf of the plaintiff to amend the complaint to conform to the evidence, but, so far as the record shows, no such amendment was ever made. The objection here made is directed to parts of paragraphs I and III of the second amended complaint, which read as follows:

Paragraph I. "That the plaintiff and defendant on the 15th day of August, 1926, and at all times thereafter until a date subsequent to the 15th day of September, 1926, were engaged in the real estate business and associated in the same office in buying and selling real estate as agents and brokers."

And Paragraph III. "That after obtaining the said option and on or about the 20th day of August, 1926, plaintiff advised defendant that he (plaintiff) had obtained the said option and was then the owner thereof and had the legal right then to buy said property within the thirty-day period of said option, at and for the purchase price of fifty thousand dollars ($50,000) net, and plaintiff thereupon offered to defendant that they, plaintiff and defendant, enter into a partnership agreement for the handling and sale of said property, plaintiff and defendant to work jointly and severally, each for the other, and as agent of the other, in the selling of said property for the best obtainable price, it being then and there agreed between them that if either obtained a bona fide buyer for said property at a price in excess of the option price thereof above named, and the proposed sale was approved by the other, that then and in that event plaintiff would exercise his said option and elect to buy said property and become the purchaser thereof and obligate himself to pay the said purchase price. It was then and there specially agreed that all profits received from the sale of said property, or the purchase thereof, from the said owner above named, to the amount of twenty-five hundred dollars ($2,500), should be treated and disposed of as commissions on the sale of said property, and that said commissions should be divided one-third thereof to plaintiff, one-third thereof to defendant, and one-third thereof to the owner and operator of the real estate office in which plaintiff and defendant were then operating, working and having their place of business as such licensed real estate agents and brokers. It was then and there further agreed between plaintiff and defendant that each should in all respects fully advise the other of all knowledge which either obtained, and in all respects would deal fairly with the other and would make known to the other the truth of the facts with reference to any sale of said property which might be made within the life of said option."

It is contended by appellant that the quoted parts of the amended complaint allege a general partnership between the plaintiff and defendant as real estate agents and brokers in the handling and selling of real estate, whereas the proof purports to show only a joint adventure in a single transaction in the buying and selling of real estate, and the court has so found.

It may be doubted whether the allegations referred to constitute an allegation of a general partnership. But, whether they do or not, it is clear that the evidence offered was admissible under the allegations of the amended complaint. We are satisfied that the court drew the proper conclusion therefrom, if he believed the testimony of respondent, in the finding that the appellant and respondent entered into a joint adventure for the purpose of handling and selling the real estate in question.

[4-8] It is sometimes a difficult question whether a transaction constitutes a partnership or just a joint adventure. One of the principal distinctions between a partnership and a joint adventure lies in the fact that a partnership, ordinarily, is formed for the transaction of a general business of a particular kind, while a joint adventure relates to a single transaction of a particular kind, although it may continue for years. There are other more important distinctions, viz., a partner acts as a principal for himself and as agent for his copartners in the transaction of the partnership business, whereas, in a joint adventure, no one of the parties thereto can bind the joint adventure. On the other hand, the resemblance between a partnership and a joint adventure is so close that the rights, as between the adventurers, are practically governed by the same rules that govern partnerships. Accordingly, a joint adventurer has a right to, and may, sue for an accounting of profits, in accordance with the agreement therefor, and the obligations growing out of the agreement between the parties are governed by the same rules of law applicable to partnerships. Butler v. Union Trust Co., 178 Cal. 195, 172 P. 601; Keyes v. Nims, 43 Cal. App. 1, 184 P. 695. It is therefore immaterial, in so far as the rights and obligations of the parties herein involved are concerned, whether the relation created between the appellant and respondent is a partnership or a joint adventure, which we are inclined to believe it to be.

[9] Second, the appellant contends that the instrument procured from Macklin by respondent and under which he claimed the right to purchase the property in question, while referred to as an option to purchase, was merely an exclusive listing or right to handle and sell the property, which gave respondent no right to purchase the same.

The original instrument executed by Macklin and delivered to respondent covering the Fedora Hotel was lost or destroyed and no copy thereof was produced at the trial or offered in evidence. The court, however, made the following finding, as No. II of its findings, to wit: "That plaintiff, on or about the 15th day of August, 1926, obtained from one J. H. Macklin, the owner of certain property known as the Fedora Hotel, located at 325 East Second Street, Los Angeles, California, an exclusive thirty-day good and valid option to purchase said property from said J. H. Macklin for the sum of fifty thousand ($50,000.00) dollars net to said J. H. Macklin."

We have carefully examined the record and are satisfied that this finding is supported by the evidence and should not be disturbed by this court under the familiar rule above referred to. An option is an agreement by which an owner invests another with the exclusive right to buy certain property at a stipulated price, within a limited time. 6 Cal. Jur., p. 48, § 27. It is apparent that respondent held an option and right to purchase the property in question, and that such option was not merely a listing with authorization to sell the property as agent for the owner.

[10] Third, appellant contends that the judgment in this case cannot stand because neither of the parties to this action is licensed either as an individual real estate broker or as a partner or joint adventurer to transact business as a real estate broker or real estate salesman, as required by the terms of the Real Estate Brokers' Act (Stats. 1919, p. 1252, as amended by Stats. 1921, p. 1294, and Stats. 1923, p. 93, and Stats. 1925, p. 600).

The Real Estate Brokers' Act, so far as it need be referred to here, provides as follows:

"Section 1. It shall be unlawful for any person, copartnership or corporation to engage in the business, or act in the capacity of a real estate broker, or a real estate salesman within this state without first obtaining a license therefor.

"Sec. 2. A real estate broker within the meaning of this act is a person, copartnership or corporation who, for a compensation, sells, or offers for sale, buys, or offers to buy, or negotiates the purchase or sale or exchange of real estate, * * * for others as a whole or partial vocation. A real estate salesman within the meaning of this act is one who for a compensation is employed by a licensed broker to sell, or offer for sale, or to list, or to buy, or to offer to buy, or to negotiate the purchase or sale or exchange of real estate, or to solicit for prospective purchasers of real estate, * * * as a whole or partial vocation. The provisions of this act shall not apply to any person, copartnership or corporation who shall perform any of the acts aforesaid with reference to property owned by such person, copartnership or corporation. * * * One act, for a compensation of buying or selling real estate of or for another, or offering for another to buy or sell or exchange real estate, * * * shall constitute the person, copartnership or corporation making such offer, sale or purchase, * * * a real estate broker or salesman within the meaning of this act.

"Sec. 17. Any person or corporation acting as a real estate broker or real estate salesman within the meaning of this act without a license as herein provided shall, upon conviction thereof, if a person, be punished by a fine of not to exceed five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail for a term not to exceed six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court; or if a corporation, be punished by a fine of not to exceed five thousand dollars.

"Sec. 20. No person, copartnership or corporation engaged in the business or acting in the capacity of a real estate broker or a real estate salesman within this state shall bring or maintain any action in the courts of this state for the collection of compensation for the performance of any of the acts mentioned in section two hereof without alleging and proving that such person, copartnership or corporation was a duly licensed real estate broker or real estate salesman at the time the alleged cause of action arose."

Appellant has cited a number of authorities in support of his contention to the effect that a person, copartnership, or corporation, engaged in buying or selling real estate, as agent for the owner, for a compensation, must be licensed under the terms of the Real Estate Brokers' Act at the time of the transaction, in order to be able to maintain an action against any one for a brokerage commission. We have no doubt as to the correctness of these decisions when applied to the facts of these particular cases, but they have no application to the case at bar. Respondent was not dealing with Macklin as an agent in the sale of his property, but rather as a purchaser and owner of the property, and therefore the act in question had no application to him, as will more fully appear hereafter.

Respondent secured, in the name of his aunt, from the owner, J. H. Macklin, an exclusive thirty-day option to purchase the Fedora Hotel, for the sum of $50,000 net to the seller, payable on the terms stated in the option. The option was taken in the name of the respondent's aunt, whose property he had under his control, in order to protect any profit which might result from a sale of the property over and above the $50,000 to be paid to Macklin and the commission to be paid to Garland & Co., in accordance with the suggestion of the appellant. So far as shown by the evidence, respondent secured the option without assistance or contribution from his aunt. Respondent was, therefore, the equitable owner of the option, while his aunt held the naked legal title thereto, subject to his direction. Respondent exercised the option in favor of Evelyn Davies, who became the purchaser of the property from Macklin under the terms of the option. This was the equivalent of a purchase of the property from Macklin by respondent and a sale thereof by him to Davies. Respondent stood, in relation to this property, both as purchaser and seller. He was not the agent of Macklin, either in buying or selling the property, under the terms of his option.

In the case of Robinson v. Easton, Eldridge & Co., 93 Cal. 80, 28 P. 796, 797, 27 Am. St. Rep. 167, the Supreme Court construed an instrument similar in effect to the option here under consideration. The instrument referred to read as follows: "We hereby authorize Easton & Eldridge for us, and within five days from date hereof, and until this authority is canceled in writing by us, to sell for the sum of $10,000—net dollars—the following described property, situated in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, to-wit: All of block 935, outside lands,—and we will pay said Easton & Eldridge a commission of all over said sum of $10,000, net, for which they may sell said property with our consent.”

In construing this instrument, the court used language which is equally apt to the opinion we are considering. The court said: “The relation of the defendant to the plaintiffs was not that of a mere agent. While its authority to sell the land was derived from the plaintiffs, yet the sale was to be made for its own account and benefit, as well as for that of the plaintiffs. Although the authority to sell was not so coupled with an interest as to create in the defendant an interest in the land, or to prevent the plaintiffs from revoking the authority, yet by the terms of the authorization the defendant acquired such a right to a portion of the proceeds of sale as to enable it to make a contract of sale upon terms of its own choosing. The plaintiffs, in effect, gave to the defendant an option for five days to endeavor to sell the block of land for whatever sum it could obtain, and upon whatever terms it might make, provided they should receive therefor the sum of $10,000, and agreed that defendant should have whatever sum it could realize therefor above that amount. The relation thus created between them was rather that of a vendor and purchaser under a contract of sale than one of principal and agent, and a sale by the defendant thereunder was in the capacity of a vendor upon its own account, and not for the account of the plaintiffs. Inasmuch as the defendant was entitled to all the proceeds of the sale in excess of $10,000, it had the right to make the sale upon such terms as in its judgment would enable it to realize the highest price for the land. Upon a sale by it the plaintiffs were entitled to the immediate payment of the $10,000, but the defendant could sell the land either for cash or upon time, as it might choose, and its terms of sale did not require ratification by the plaintiffs.” See, also, Smith v. Blodget, 187 Cal. 236, 201 P. 584.

For reasons above stated and upon these authorities, we hold that the relation between Macklin and respondent, created by the option in the case at bar, was that of vendor and purchaser, rather than that of principal and agent. It follows, therefore, that respondent was not required by the Real Estate Brokers' Act to be licensed, either as a broker or salesman, in negotiating the sale under his option, being specifically exempted therefrom by section 2, which exempts the owner of real property from a compliance with the provisions of said act, in case of sales made by himself. Moreover, there was nothing in the act which prohibited the appellant, who was a duly licensed real estate salesman, from assisting the respondent, as owner, in negotiating the sale of the property under option, in the manner in which he did assist in that purpose. Furthermore, the object of the joint adventure, between appellant and respondent, was not to engage in the business of buying and selling real estate nor to act in the capacity of real estate brokers or salesmen for third persons, or for any one other than the respondent, who was acting in the capacity of owner of the property to be sold. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the joint adventure in this case did not come within the provisions of the act referred to, and consequently respondent was not required to secure a license as broker or salesman in this transaction.

[11-15] Joint adventurers in the purchase and sale of property must act in the highest good faith toward each other and may not make any secret profit out of the transaction not shared by the others. In this respect, each of the parties is agent and trustee of the others and he must account in accordance with the terms of the agreement between them. Munson v. Fishburn, 183 Cal. 206, 190 P. 808; Lomita Land & Water Co. v. Robinson, 154 Cal. 36, 97 P. 10, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1106; Menefee v. Oxnam, 42 Cal. App. 81, 183 P. 379. One party to a joint adventure may sue another at law for a breach of contract or for a share of profits, where the adventure has been closed and he is entitled to a certain sum as his share. Keyes v. Nims, supra. The appellant in this case, without the knowledge or consent of his coadventurer, bought, through a dummy, the property held under option by the respondent, his coadventurer, the sale of which property was the subject-matter of their joint adventure, and appellant then sold the same at a profit to himself of $6,729.20 in cash and an undivided half interest in certain real property commonly known as No. 422 South Alexandria avenue, Los Angeles. The sale to the dummy realized a profit of $2,500, which was divided between the joint adventurers and W. M. Garland & Co., as a commission, in accordance with the joint adventure agreement, but appellant refuses to divide with his coadventurer the secret profit which he realized on the resale of the property.

It is found that appellant knew that the property had a market value in excess of the price named in the option, and that he paid, out of his own moneys, one-half of the purchase price paid therefor by the dummy; and it is a fair inference from the findings that appellant knew, at the time of the sale to the dummy, of a purchaser who would pay a higher price for the property than was obtained from the dummy. It was the duty of appellant to obtain for the property the highest possible price for the benefit of the joint adventure, and, according to his agreement, to divide the profits share and share alike with his coadventurer, after payment of the agreed amount to W. M. Garland & Co. This division, which the appellant refuses to make, is required by the judgment of the court in this case, and we see no reason for disturbing the same.

Accordingly, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

1. Mines and minerals ⚡74.

In action against assignees of oil lease for breach of covenant to cover up sump holes on termination of lease, that holes were made by prior assignees of lease was no defense.

This was no defense, because the damage of which the lessors complained did not result as of the time when the sump holes were excavated, since manifestly they were necessary to the drilling and operation of an oil well, and therefore drilling the sump holes would be in compliance rather than violation of the implied terms of the lease, so that defendants could not claim that the damages sued for were sustained by the lessors by reason of acts of the prior assignees.

2. Mines and minerals ⚡74.

Assignees of oil lease held liable for breach of covenant to cover up sump holes "on expiration of lease," although not having expressly assumed covenant (Civ. Code, § 1462).

Assignees were liable because of privity of estate, since the obligation to cover up the sump holes "on the expiration of the lease" devolved upon the lessee or its assignees the instant the lease expired, or contemporaneously therewith, although the work could not be instantly executed. The covenant was made for the direct benefit of the property, and ran with the land, and upon assignees' acceptance of the assignment of the lease, there was an implied agreement created on the part of the assignees to be bound by the covenant.

C. A. Lindeman, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J.

It appears that plaintiffs, together with Stuart M. Salisbury and Lois C. Salisbury, were the owners of certain real property which, for the purpose of drilling and operating thereon for the production of petroleum, etc., they leased to the A. F. Gilmore Company, a corporation, and that thereafter, following several preceding assignments thereof, the said lease was assigned to defendants E. C. Joannes and Roy Maggart, doing business under the firm name of J. & M. Oil Company; that prior to such last-mentioned assignment, one of the former assignees had drilled an oil well on the leased property and in the course of production operations had excavated or constructed thereon several sump holes. It also appears that in pursuance of authority reserved to the lessors by the provisions of the lease, for a violation by the lessee or its assignee of some of its covenants, the lessors terminated the lease. With reference to the obligations of the lessee on the happening of such a contingency, the lease contained the following provision: "On the expiration of this lease, or sooner termination thereof, lessee shall quietly and peaceably surrender possession of the premises to the lessors, and shall, so far as possible, cover up all sump holes and excavations made by it, and restore the land as nearly as possible to the condition in which it was received."

For the failure of the last assignees of the lease, namely, Joannes and Maggart, doing business under the firm name of J. & M. Oil Company, to "cover up all sump holes," etc., the plaintiffs, who theretofore had become the sole owners of the leased property, brought an action for damages on account of such failure against the original lessee and each of the succeeding assignees of the lease, which action resulted in a money judgment being rendered against the defendants Joannes and Maggart, both individually and as copartners doing business under the firm name of J. & M. Oil Company; and from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

Since on the trial of the action no express assumption by the assignees of the lease of the covenants thereof, including the covenant to "cover up all sump holes," was shown to exist, appellants contend that on the expiration of the lease no duty devolved upon them to comply with the covenant in question. Considerable effort is expended by appellants in their attempt to establish as applicable herein the principle of law that in the situation presented by the facts no privity of contract existed between the lessors and the appellants as assignees of the lease, but that at most the legal relationship of such parties was represented by the connection known as privity of estate, and that the liability of the assignee attaches only as long as such relationship exists. In other words, as soon as the privity of estate ceased, contemporaneously therewith ceased the liability of the assignee for any damage which thereafter occurred to the lessor by virtue of the provisions contained in the lease. Appellants also produce authority to the effect that where the status known as privity of estate obtains between a lessor and an assignee of a lease, the latter incurs no liability arising from breaches of personal covenants of the lease, especially those breaches, if any, which occur prior to the assignment of the lease to the person whose liability is sought to be established. And in that connection appellants urge the point that since admittedly the excavations for the sump holes were made by assignees of the lease who in interest preceded the interest and ownership therein of appellants, the damage which resulted to plaintiffs by reason thereof was one for which appellants were in no wise liable.

[1] But assuming (if not conceding) the correctness of the abstract principles of law to which appellants have directed attention, it is apparent that neither of them exactly applies to the ultimate fact upon which the judgment herein depends; that is to say, on the expiration of the lease in question, failure of appellants to "cover up all sump holes." Unquestionably, it is true that the sump holes were excavated by an assignee of the lease who preceded appellants in interest in the lease; and if it could be said that the damage of which plaintiffs complain resulted as of the time when such sump holes were excavated, the legal principle that an assignee of a lease is liable for such damages only as were sustained by the lessor by reason of the acts and conduct of such assignee only, might well be worth serious consideration. But manifestly in the drilling and in the operation of an oil well, sump holes are as much a necessity as is a derrick or an engine; and considering the situation and intention of the parties in entering into a lease for the "drilling and operating for the production of petroleum," etc., at least in the construction itself of either a derrick, an engine, or a sump hole, no violation of the provisions of the lease would result, but to the contrary, either of such acts would be in compliance with the implied terms of the lease, and consequently no damage to the lessor would instantly occur; from which in the instant matter it would follow that no advantage may be taken by appellants of the fact that the sump holes in question were made by assignees of the lease who became such prior to the date of its assignment to appellants.

[2] Nor in point of either fact or law is the contention of appellants that the breach of the covenant of the lease occurred after its expiration, and consequently at a time when no privity of estate existed between the lessor and appellants, available as a defense of the latter. Strictly speaking, it is true that up to the time when the lease was terminated no breach of the covenant had occurred. The obligation on the part of the lessee and its assignees to "cover up all sump holes," etc., accrued only "on the expiration of the lease"; in other words, the duty to "cover up all sump holes" devolved upon the lessee or its assignees at the same instant of time that the lease expired, or contemporaneously therewith; and the fact that from a practical standpoint the work of filling the sump holes could not be instantly executed should not relieve appellants from performance. Concededly the relation of privity of estate existed between the lessor and appellants, and as the covenant in question was one which was "made for the direct benefit of the property" (section 1462, Civ. Code), it ran with the land. In such circumstances, even in the absence of an express assumption by appellants of the covenant "on the expiration of this lease, * * * to cover up all sump holes," etc., upon their acceptance of the assignment of the lease as made, an implied agreement was created on the part of such assignees to be bound by such covenant.

In the case of Washington Natural Gas Co. v. Johnson, 123 Pa. 576, 16 A. 799, 801, 10 Am. St. Rep. 553, it was held that an assignee of an oil lease who was in possession when the time for performance of the covenant contained in the lease arrived "was also liable because of the privity of estate which arose upon his acceptance of the assignment. Acquiring the leasehold estate by an assignment of the lease, he is fixed with notice of its covenants, and he takes the estate of his assignors cum onere." See, also, Hefner v. Light, Fuel & Power Co., 77 W. Va. 217, 87 S. E. 206.

[3] Appellants also urge that the trial court committed prejudicial error in that the evidence does not support certain findings of fact which for the first time are specified in their opening brief herein; but since the record on appeal is founded on a bill of exceptions in which no mention is made either of the asserted fact that any particular finding or findings made by the trial court was or were unsupported by the evidence, or of the particulars in which such evidence was lacking in that respect, the point presented by appellants may not be considered on this appeal. Section 648, Code Civ. Proc.; 2 Cal. Jur. 708, and authorities there cited.

The judgment is affirmed.

WULBERN v. GILROY EXPRESS et al.
Civ. 7627.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 21, 1931.

1. New trial ⚡66, 70.

If court was convinced that evidence was insufficient to warrant verdict for plaintiff or that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, court properly granted new trial (Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 6).

2. New trial ⚡159.

On motion for new trial, court may draw inferences from evidence opposed to those drawn by it on trial, provided they are not unreasonable.

3. New trial ⚡72.

If there is absence of evidence, or if from evidence there is lacking probative force to establish proposition of fact necessary to sustain verdict, court must grant new trial.

4. Appeal and error ⚡977(3).

Unless there is manifest abuse of discretion in granting new trial, appellate court will not interfere.

5. New trial ⚡71.

In automobile collision case, in which under evidence jury might have found plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence, court properly granted new trial after verdict for plaintiff (Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 6).

Presumption on appeal is in favor of order granting new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by John Kenneth Wulbern against the Gilroy Express and others. Verdict for plaintiff. From an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Franklin Swart, of Redwood City, for appellant.

Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, Owen D. Richardson, of San Jose, and Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WARD, Justice pro tem.

This is an action for personal injuries. The defendant in his answer pleaded contributory negligence. A jury rendered a verdict in the sum of $2,000 in favor of the plaintiff. The trial court granted a motion for a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of evidence to sustain the verdict. Plaintiff appealed from the order granting the motion for a new trial.

At about 11 o'clock p. m. on the night of the accident, a truck, with trailer attached, owned and operated by defendants, was proceeding in a southerly direction along the state highway near Belmont in San Mateo county. The highway at this point is an oiled macadam roadway of approximately twenty-five feet in width, with a two and a half foot shoulder on each side. Mechanical difficulty appearing, the driver parked the truck on the right side of the roadway. The tail-light on the trailer was burning. Plaintiff, operating a Ford coupé traveling at a speed of thirty-two miles an hour and in the same direction as the truck, saw the truck and trailer at least forty-five feet away. A traffic officer, experienced in operating Fords, who was well acquainted with the road and its condition on the night of the accident, testified that plaintiff's car at thirty-two miles an hour could be stopped in fifteen feet. The evidence is conflicting upon many essential facts: The exact spot the truck was parked; whether the driver was justified at all in parking under all the circumstances of what the defendants claimed inefficient mechanical condition of the truck; the number of lights on the truck; whether the Ford's right front headlight was out prior to the accident, etc.

[1-4] Assuming, but not deciding, that the defendant was negligent, there was ample evidence upon which the jury might have determined that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The evidence was conflicting to such an extent that the jury could have returned a verdict for the defendant. If the court was convinced that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant a verdict for the plaintiff or that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence which caused or contributed proximately to the accident, then the court properly granted the motion for a new trial. On a motion for a new trial the court "has power to draw inferences from the evidence opposed to those which were drawn by it upon the trial, provided they are not unreasonable." Mercantile Trust Co. of San Francisco v. Sunset Road Oil Co., 176 Cal. 451-456, 168 P. 1033, 1035. "Conflicting inferences, if reasonable, stand upon the same plane as conflicting evidence." Mercantile Trust Co. of San Francisco v. Sunset Road Oil Co., 176 Cal. 451-456, 168 P. 1033, supra. If it was the contributory negligence of plaintiff which caused the trial court to grant the motion for a new trial, then there was a full compliance with the provision of subdivision 6 of section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that the former verdict or decision may be vacated and that a new trial may be granted upon the ground of "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict." McNeely v. Hill, 52 Cal. App. 184, 185, 198 P. 427. If there be an absence of evidence, or if from the evidence received there is lacking probative force to establish a proposition of fact necessary to sustain a verdict of a jury, it is the duty of the court to grant a new trial. Estate of Bainbridge, 169 Cal. 166-169, 146 P. 427. Unless there is a manifest abuse of the discretion used by the trial court, appellate tribunals will not interfere. Campanella v. Campanella, 204 Cal. 515-522, 269 P. 433; Buck v. Borchers, 203 Cal. 211, 263 P. 226; Rosenberg v. Moore, 194 Cal. 393, 229 P. 34.

[5, 6] In the instant case there was no abuse of discretion. The trial court may well have concluded that the defendant was not negligent, or that, if plaintiff was driving with one front light out, it was negligence, or that, if both lights were on, plaintiff should have seen the truck and trailer ahead, and that in either instance plaintiff's negligence caused or contributed proximately to the accident. The cases cited by appellant and respondents reflect the view of the court upon the law and the facts of each case. The slightest variance in facts will sometimes necessitate a different opinion. A hard and fast rule cannot be made to fit the ever-changing facts and circumstances of each case. The only question here to be determined is whether or not there is manifest abuse of the discretion with which the trial court is empowered in ruling upon a motion for a new trial. In Scott v. Southern Pacific Co., 100 Cal. App. 634-637, 280 P. 996, 998, the court said: "And, if there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, the trial court will not be deemed to have abused its discretion when it has determined that the verdict or the finding is against the weight of the evidence, and that there should be a new trial. 'When the evidence is conflicting, the trial court is authorized to review it, and if, in its opinion, the verdict is against the weight of evidence, it is its duty to grant a new trial.' Merralls v. Southern Pacific Co., 182 Cal. 19, 186 P. 778; Biaggi v. Ramont, 189 Cal. 675, 209 P. 892; Soto v. Globe Grain & Milling Co., 55 Cal. App. 532, 203 P. 830. In considering the question of the correctness of the order the presumption on appeal is in favor of the order and against the verdict. Marr v. Whistler, 49 Cal. App. 364, 193 P. 600; Roberts v. Southern Pac. Co., 54 Cal. App. 315, 201 P. 958." In this case appellant has failed to convince us of an abuse of discretion by the trial court. The order granting the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

FOARD v. JOHNSON.
Civ. 7936.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.
Aug. 27, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 26, 1931.

Appeal and error ⇨1176(4).

Appellee's failure to take steps to have appellate court correct manifestly incorrect findings held to require reversal, with directions to correct findings (Code Civ. Proc. § 956a; Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, Rule 38).

Transcript showed without conflict that dates in findings as to when property involved in action to quiet title was acquired, and as to defendant-appellant's first knowledge of outstanding deed, were incorrect, and findings with such dates uncorrected did not sustain judgment for plaintiff-appellant. Notwithstanding appellee's knowledge of such condition of the findings, and that, if said condition was not corrected, reversal would be required, appellee made no effort to avail himself of benefit of court rule authorizing appellate court to correct findings, other than to suggest in his brief that appellate court had authority to make findings contrary to trial court's findings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Daniel Beecher, Judge.

Action by Martin Foard against J. M. C. Johnson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed, with directions.

J. E. Light, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George G. Bechtel, and Ernest L. English, both of Santa Monica, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J.

The defendant appeals from an adverse judgment in an action to quiet title to a lot situate in the city of Santa Monica. The appeal is taken on the judgment roll alone, the main ground urged for reversal being that the findings do not support the judgment, in that they show that plaintiff acquired the property with knowledge of the fact that defendant held an unrecorded deed thereto. The entire controversy on appeal arises over an apparent typographical error in the preparation of the findings, relating to the date of plaintiff's deed.

The complaint is in the usual form, alleging plaintiff's ownership in the lot, and that defendant claims an interest therein which is without legal right. The answer merely denies plaintiff's title, admits that defendant claims an interest in the lot, and denies that such interest is without right. The court found: (1) That prior to May 6, 1927, title to said lot was vested in one Marie Scherneckau. (2) That plaintiff acquired said lot "on the 6th day of May, 1928, by deed to him from Marie Scherneckau, an unmarried woman." (3) That said deed from Marie Scherneckau to plaintiff was filed for record "on May 9th, 1927," and recorded in Book 6890, etc. (4) That "on the 6th day of May, 1928, the plaintiff herein had no knowledge or notice of said outstanding deed executed by Marie Scherneckau in favor of J. M. C. Johnson (defendant herein) bearing date March 5, 1926, and the first knowledge or notice of said outstanding deed was on the 8th day of March, 1928." (5) That plaintiff "gave a consideration for said deed from Marie Scherneckau to him, and that said consideration was a valuable one." (All italics ours.)

Manifestly the findings in their present form are legally insufficient to support the judgment, for as will be seen, according to the dates set forth in findings 2 and 3, plaintiff acquired the property on May 6, 1928, by virtue of a deed recorded on May 9, 1927, a year prior to the date on which he acquired the property; and according to finding 4, on May 6, 1928, plaintiff had no knowledge of the existence of defendant's outstanding deed dated March 5, 1926, but did have knowledge of such deed on March 8, 1928. In other words, according to the dates set forth in the findings, plaintiff had knowledge of defendant's outstanding deed two months before he acquired the property. Obviously under such circumstances he was not entitled to judgment.

The appeal was not argued orally, and, after it was ordered submitted for decision, the clerk of the trial court, at our request, forwarded to the clerk of this court for inspection the reporter's transcript, duly certified by the phonographic reporter, but not signed by the trial judge; and it appears therefrom without conflict that plaintiff acquired the property on May 6, 1927, by deed to him from Marie Scherneckau and not on May 6, 1928, as set forth in the findings. In their brief counsel for plaintiff state that their stenographer was responsible for the erroneous dates in the findings, and that they were not aware of the errors until served with a copy of defendant's brief (June 3, 1929), and that it was then too late to have the same corrected by the trial judge who signed the findings because his term of office had expired.

Rule XXXVIII of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, adopted pursuant to section 956a of the Code of Civil Procedure, provided counsel for plaintiff with a complete and easy remedy to have the erroneous dates in the findings corrected by this court, without the necessity of remanding the cause to the trial court for such purpose; in which event the judgment would be affirmed. But despite the fact that they have been aware of the condition of the findings since June, 1929, and of the fact that such condition, if not corrected, would necessarily demand a reversal of the judgment, they have made no effort to avail themselves of the benefit of said rule, other than to suggest merely in their brief that under the provisions of said Code section the appellate court has the authority to make findings contrary to those made by the trial court. Under the circumstances above stated we do not feel called upon to assume such burden. The second and remaining point made against the findings by defendant is without merit.

Therefore, in accordance with the views above expressed, it is ordered that the judgment be, and the same is hereby, reversed, with directions to the trial court to correct findings numbered 2 and 4 so as to conform to the undisputed evidence, to-wit: By striking from finding No. 2 the year "1928" and inserting in lieu thereof the year "1927"; and by striking from finding No. 4 the date "6th day of May, 1928," and inserting in lieu thereof the date "6th day of May, 1927"; and thereupon to re-enter judgment in favor of plaintiff.

This action was brought by plaintiff against defendant to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract. The cause was tried by the court, sitting without a jury, and from an adverse judgment plaintiff prosecutes this appeal. The record is voluminous, and comes to us through a bill of exceptions. The contentions advanced cover almost the entire law of contracts, and appellant urges that the most fundamental principles governing were ignored to its prejudice. There is one important fact, however, upon which both parties agree. It is conceded that the contract in question was never fully performed. Appellant contends that the failure of performance was on the part of respondent, which failure excused further performance on the part of appellant; respondent, on the other hand, argues that the failure was on the side of appellant. And added to this feature of the case is the claim of respondent that the contract was abandoned by mutual consent. The findings of the trial court, upon which rest the judgment, were in favor of respondent.

The contract involved was entered into between the parties on October 31, 1918. By the terms thereof appellant agreed to manufacture tractors as speedily as possible and to deliver to respondent, as the same should be ordered, at least 70 per cent. of the tractor output of the factory, not exceeding five hundred tractors in one year. Respondent agreed to immediately place an order for ten tractors then being manufactured by appellant and to pay down the sum of $21,200, which amount was paid and receipt acknowledged. If appellant should make said tractors or proceed with the work thereon to the satisfaction of respondent, then the latter should from month to month thereafter place orders for more tractors and make payment of a similar sum for each ten tractors ordered. After April 1, 1919, respondent should place orders for and pay for ten tractors or more, and thereafter each tractor should be paid for as ordered. Respondent agreed to distribute the said tractors throughout the territory, advertise the same in trade journals, carry parts for the tractors, and further agreed to advance to appellant, as might be required, sufficient funds for material and labor sufficient for the manufacture and completion of not less than ten tractors at any one time, provided that at all times the appellant should have, to the satisfaction of respondent, well and truly proceeded with all diligence to the manufacture and completion of any orders for tractors placed and should on demand furnish a satisfactory statement of assets and liabilities. The appellant in said contract agreed to manufacture the tractors, using the best of materials and workmanship, and embodying therein all new and improved features as might from time to time be invented by appellant or its designing engineer. Appellant further agreed to manufacture and keep on hand in its factory sufficient repair parts to supply the respondent or its agents with such repair parts as might be necessary. The respondent was given the exclusive agency for the territory for a term of five years. It was mutually agreed that, as prices were revised, the selling price to respondent should not exceed 20 per cent. above the cost of manufacture. The contract further provided for arbitration in case of dispute. Here it might be noted, while on the subject of the contract, that there was an apparent ambiguity or uncertainty in that portion thereof providing: "If said party of the first part (appellant) shall make said tractors or proceed with the work thereon to the satisfaction of the party of the second part (respondent), said party of the second part shall from month to month hereafter place with the party of the first part orders for tractors * * * and shall make payment," etc. (Italics ours.) The trial court construed this provision to mean and intended to mean: "If said party * * * shall make said tractors and proceed with the work thereon," etc. (Italics ours.)

[1-5] A specific finding was made to the effect that the contract should be read as the parties so intended. Appellant contends that such a finding is erroneous for two reasons: First, that the pleadings contain no prayer for reformation; and, second, that the evidence does not support the finding. We are of the opinion that it was within the province of the trial court to construe the contract from a reading of the whole thereof, and, where any word or phrase was subject to different meanings, then such meaning should be given as would harmonize with the provisions of the instrument in its entirety, and, in arriving at a true construction of the instrument, all of the surrounding circumstances should be considered. It is obvious that the subject of the particular section under present consideration was the satisfaction of the respondent, and it might be noted that the term "satisfaction," broadly yet sufficiently defined in similar cases, means the absence of reasonable grounds for dissatisfaction. A strict interpretation of the disputed clause in the disjunctive would result in a construction that would bind respondent in the event that tractors were not being made, if there were no grounds for reasonable dissatisfaction as to the progress of the work; and likewise would respondent be held if tractors were actually being made and yet no effort at all being made to insure output. As will more fully appear hereinafter, such a construction would do violence to the general intent and purpose of the entire transaction. And there is almost an unanimity of holding to the effect that the terms "and" and "or" may be construed as interchangeable when necessary to effect the apparent meaning of the parties. Arnold v. Hopkins, 203 Cal. 563, 265 P. 223; Willis v. Robinson, 291 Mo. 650, 237 S. W. 1030, 1033; Poehlman v. Lelnweber, 288 Ill. 58, 122 N. E. 834; Kales v. Houghton, 190 Cal. 294-298, 212 P. 21. And the application of the rule announced will be apparent upon a review of the conditions surrounding the parties at the time the contract was executed.

The date of the contract is likewise significant, for many reasons. In October of 1918 the United States was at war, and the usual war-time conditions prevailed in every industry. Particularly was there an era of unprecedented prosperity in farming. All farm products were at the peak of price with the supply limited. Every acre of tillable land throughout the United States was being turned into productivity, with a constant and unsatisfied demand for farm machinery of every type. The appellant corporation was in the experimental stage of manufacturing a light farm tractor. The defendant was a distributor of automobiles, with branches throughout the state, and with a well-organized and successful outlet for distribution. A short time before the execution of the contract there had been a farm and tractor exhibition near Los Angeles. As a part of the exhibit was the tractor of appellant. One Bierlein, a visitor at the exhibition, noticed the tractor, and seemed pleased with its performance and hopeful of the possibilities offered in its promotion. Pursuing this interest, Bierlein made contract with the officials of appellant company, and obtained from it a contract and authority empowering him to secure capital for the manufacture and distribution of the tractors. Thereafter Bierlein began negotiations with defendant corporation, respondent herein, resulting in the contract before us.

The factory of appellant was hardly more than a workshop, experimental to a degree, poorly financed, and in no sense a going concern. The tractor itself was hardly more than a design, having given no definite evidence of its capability to perform satisfactorily under ordinary working conditions. The transaction on both sides, was really a venture, induced through then existing conditions and predicated upon expectancy rather than assurance. Respondent did advance the sum of $21,200 to start the factory, and appellant thereupon undertook the work of producing tractors. One tractor was delivered to respondent at its salesrooms in San Francisco and was put upon display. When a minor demonstration was had, the tractor not only failed to perform satisfactorily, but showed up defects in construction and material which destroyed confidence in its ability to ever perform, and which rendered more difficult any attempts at distribution. And here it might be further noted that, in all, four tractors were built before and after the alleged breach of the contract, and that the net achievement was the operation of two by using the other two as extra parts to make possible the unsatisfactory operation of the two which were used.

In the time intervening between the date of the contract and December 12th, there were many discussions between the principals to the contract. There was reasonable ground for respondent to believe that friction existed in the management of appellant corporation, hindering the output; and that the efficiency of the factory was thus impaired to an extent greatly impeding the output. Also the unsuitability of the tractor as a working machine had become more apparent. As a result, no orders were forthcoming from respondent, and the entire transaction seemed at a point where action of some sort appeared necessary.

On December 12, 1918, Homer Laughlin, Jr., president of appellant corporation, on behalf of said corporation, addressed and mailed to defendant corporation a letter. This letter reviews some of the difficulties encountered, and attempts explanation thereof. The following language is taken from this letter: "I, therefore, beg to assure you that we shall be pleased to continue the contract upon your placing immediately your order for the second batch of tractors together with the necessary funds therefor, or—we will mutually agree to cancel the contract delivering the remaining eight tractors of your first order before April 1st, 1919, and leaving you secured as before for their completion. In either case we need your immediate reply. If the contract is to be cancelled, new arrangements will have to be made immediately to continue our production. If by mutual consent we should cancel the contract I hope that it will be done with that respect and esteem and care for the interests of both parties with which we originally entered the contract. There is nothing herein contained that is for one minute to be construed as an acknowledgment that we are in any manner whatever at fault. Our offer to cancel is only for the purpose of an immediate conclusion. If for any reason our contract is not worth to you what it was at the time you signed it we shall find others who value it more highly." Appellant concedes this to be a direct and unequivocal offer of cancellation and abandonment. But, contends appellant, the offer was never accepted, and therefore no cancellation resulted.

[6] The trial court found that the offer was accepted, and that the contract was by mutual consent abandoned, rescinded, and canceled. The finding of the trial court, omitting that part thereof referring to the writing of the letter offering to cancel, is as follows: "That on receipt of said letter said offer to mutually cancel and abandon the contract was accepted by said defendant, and thereafter the said contract was mutually abandoned by both parties and the plaintiff made no further or other effort to furnish the said defendant any further or other tractors, and the said plaintiff and defendant did negotiate for the repayment to the said defendant of the said moneys advanced by it for the purchase of said original tractors, and said parties did reach an agreement to the effect that one of said tractors delivered to the defendant should be retained by it and that the proceeds of every other tractor which was thereafter manufactured and sold by the plaintiff should be paid to the defendant, and that the proceeds of the other tractors manufactured and sold by plaintiff be retained by the plaintiff until the defendant had been paid the amount advanced by it in the purchase of the said original ten tractors; that before this agreement was reached the San Francisco tractor had been returned by the defendant to the plaintiff's factory, and some time after the making of said agreement the said factory, without consulting said defendant, sold the said tractor and kept the proceeds thereof; that the Los Angeles tractor was retained by the said defendant; that the said defendant offered and tendered its return to the said plaintiff; that the said plaintiff never took possession of said tractor or received the same; that said plaintiff never carried out the said agreement to pay to the said defendant the purchase price of every other tractor sold by it; that plaintiff only manufactured two additional tractors besides the two delivered to said defendant, and did not pay to the said defendant the proceeds of the sale of either of said tractors or pay anything at all to the defendant."

[7] This finding has abundant evidentiary support in the record. As would be inferred, there is conflict in some instances, but this was a question for the trial court to determine where the truth might be. There is evidence that, upon receipt of the letter, defendant communicated by telephone with Laughlin, and did accept the offer of cancellation, and that Laughlin in reply merely said, "Thanks," evidently glad to be through with the matter.

[8] There is further evidence that, in subsequent negotiations with other parties, appellant conceded the cancellation of the contract with respondent. It is in evidence that, at the time of the execution of the original contract and the payment of the money by defendant, the appellant, to secure the defendant in its payment of some $21,000, had executed and delivered to defendant a deed of trust upon certain real property. After the notice of cancellation and the acceptance as herein detailed, and the failure of other negotiations, and after April of 1919, the defendant sought the repayment of the moneys advanced. No claim was then made by appellant of any breach of contract, but the cancellation of the contract was admitted and terms of repayment of the moneys advanced were sought. The deed of trust was foreclosed and the property sold, and still no claim by appellant that the amounts claimed were not due. In the time between the cancellation and the sale under the deed of trust, appellant sought to secure the aid of defendant in a distribution plan after manufacture by an independent concern; and still no claim of breach. All in all, the conduct of the parties amply demonstrates that all concerned considered the contract at an end. The factory went into the list of nonproducers, and nothing further seems to have been done with the tractor thereafter. The venture was, manifestly, a complete failure. The tractor as made was an almost total loss; the materials used in the manufacture would not stand up, the design was more theoretical than practical, and the expense of upkeep was prohibitive. It is true, as appellant points out, that there are some isolated facts which might be construed as inconsistent with a finding of abandonment or cancellation; on the other hand, these same facts might be explained from the circumstances existing. But, if not explained, the effect would simply be to create a conflicting factual condition with the power to determine resting with the trial judge, whose determination, if reasonably supported, would be final.

While we feel that the holding of a cancellation sufficiently disposes of the issues here presented, we may add, however, that the trial court found, too, that even before cancellation the contract had been breached by the appellant, and that by reason thereof respondent was excused from further performance. This finding likewise finds ample support in the record. We do not feel compelled to analyze every word of conflicting testimony, but our conclusion from a reading of the entire transcript is that the appellant's cause in the court below was absolutely without foundation of fact, and that the appeal prosecuted from the judgment is frivolous and without merit of any kind.

Appellant has taken detached portions of the testimony favorable to its contentions and surrounded these with abundance of citation of elementary principles. Where conflict appears, it has argued its own testimony, regardless of the trial court's findings. It is demonstrated by an overwhelming mass of evidence that appellant has suffered no loss through any act of respondent. Appellant sought to recover $750,000 as damages claimed for the breach of a contract which, from its very inception, was hardly more than an experiment, and after the experiment had failed. It seeks these damages after it had, in almost every particular, as found by the trial court, breached the contract, while the defendant was not in default; and seeks these damages in the face of a mutual cancellation and abandonment. The contract as executed could never have been performed as the conditions existed, and, at the time of mutual cancellation, all parties were fully aware of that fact: If appellant could prevail, it would make a wonderful success of an admitted failure, reversing the old idea of a Pyrrhic victory. Appellant complains of other errors of the trial court. Each of these claims is predicated upon rulings or orders affecting appellant's claim of damage.

[9, 10] Inasmuch as the trial court found that plaintiff was entitled to no damage by reason of the fact that defendant had not breached the contract, and that the same had been canceled by mutual consent, any error in computing damage becomes immaterial, as does any error in the restriction of a pleading or the refusal of permission to file additional or supplemental pleadings on the question of damages. Such other specifications of error as are urged center about the controversy in the main, and the foregoing disposes thereof.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action by Guiseppe Parrino against Theodore M. Rallis and L. Rallis. Judgment for plaintiff against Theodore M. Rallis. From judgment for L. Rallis, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Sylvester Andriano and William R. Lowery, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Hugh K. McKevitt and Holloway Jones, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The above action was brought upon a promissory note executed to plaintiff by defendants

T. M. Rallis and L. Rallis, his wife. The instrument, which was for $1,303, was dated August 2, 1926, and payable with interest on August 1, 1927. Some time before its date defendant T. M. Rallis became indebted for money loaned and services rendered by the plaintiff and others. The latter assigned their claims to the plaintiff, and the note was for the amount of the claims.

Defendant L. Rallis alleged "that neither at the time of the execution of said note nor at any other time was there any express agreement between the parties for a forbearance of the collection of the sum then owing to plaintiff; nor was there at any of said times any express agreement to extend the time of payment of said sum; nor was there any intention by the parties to make the forbearance of collection or the extension of time of payment any part of the consideration for the execution of said note by said defendant L. Rallis."

Defendant T. M. Rallis made no defense to the action.

The above allegations were found to be true, and judgment was accordingly entered against T. M. Rallis and in favor of L. Rallis, his wife. The plaintiff appealed from the latter portion of the judgment, and as grounds therefor it is contended that the court's finding, which followed the language of the above defense, is unsupported by the evidence.

[1-3] Forbearance is sufficient to constitute a valid consideration, although it must be under an agreement to forbear; mere forbearance alone being insufficient. In re Estate of Thomson, 165 Cal. 290, 131 P. 1045. And it is not necessary that one signing a note as an accommodation maker or as a surety derive any benefit therefrom so long as the payee of the note suffers a detriment. Westphal v. Nevills, 92 Cal. 545, 28 P. 678. While the record here discloses no evidence of an express agreement by the plaintiff to forbear, such an agreement might be implied from the taking of a note payable at a future time as this suspends action on the original debt. 8 Corp. Jur., Bills and Notes, p. 237; Gnarini v. Swiss American Bank, 162 Cal. 181, 121 P. 726. The court found, however, that there was no intention by the parties to make the forbearance of the collection, or the extension of time payment, any part of the consideration for the execution of said note by said L. Rallis, and concluded therefrom that there was no consideration for the execution of the note by her.

[4-7] A finding will not be disturbed if there is substantial evidence to support it (Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 228 P. 25), and this is true, though there be no conflict in the evidence, if different inferences may reasonably be drawn therefrom. Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 104 P. 308; MacDermot v. Hayes, 175 Cal. 95, 170 P. 616. It is undisputed that Mrs. Rallis was not indebted for any part of the claims against her husband, and that there was no agreement by her other than that contained in the note to pay the same. Further, the testimony shows that T. M. Rallis signed the note at a bank during the forenoon of the day it bears date, and that during the afternoon of the same day it was taken by plaintiff and one Damino to the store conducted by the defendants, both of the latter being present, and by Damino handed to Mrs. Rallis, the plaintiff at the same time stating that he wished her signature thereon merely as a matter of form. These facts fairly support the conclusion that the note, after being signed by T. M. Rallis at the bank, was then and there delivered to the plaintiff and accepted by him as the sole consideration for his implied promise to forbear; and that such acceptance was not conditional upon the execution of the note by Mrs. Rallis. This being true, and plaintiff's right of action on the original debt having been suspended by the acceptance of the note by T. M. Rallis, a subsequent promise to forbear, express or implied, would furnish no consideration for a promise by L. Rallis to pay the same. An agreement to do that which one is already bound to do does not constitute a consideration for a new promise (Ellison v. Jackson Water Co., 12 Cal. 553; Marinovich v. Kilburn, 153 Cal. 638, 96 P. 303); and we are satisfied that the finding together with the court's conclusion that there was no consideration for Mrs. Rallis' promise are fully supported by the evidence.

The portion of the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Appeals from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Separate actions by Sarah J. Maggart, and by Anna Devany, against Grant C. Bell were consolidated for trial and for appeal. From judgments for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Barry J. Colding and Theodore Hale, both of San Francisco, B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, and Carroll B. Crawford, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Eugene J. Mooslin, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SPENCE, J.

The above-entitled cases were consolidated for the purpose of trial and pursuant to stipulation and order were consolidated for the purpose of appeal. In the trial court judgments were entered upon the verdicts in favor of plaintiffs Sarah J. Maggart and Anna Devany in the sums of $5,000 and $4,000, respectively, for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant. From these judgments defendant appeals.

[1, 2] Appellant first contends that he was prevented from having a fair trial by reason of prejudicial conduct on the part of respondents' counsel in intimating to the jury that appellant was insured. We find no merit in this contention. After the court had propounded certain questions to the jurors, respondents' counsel asked, "Has anyone of you been employed by the Pacific Casualty Automobile Association?" Appellant objected to the question and the objection was overruled. It is not contended that such questions are improper when asked in good faith for the purpose of securing a jury free from bias and prejudice (Girard v. Irvine, 97 Cal. App. 377, 275 P. 840), but it is contended that this question was not asked in good faith. There is nothing in the record to justify this conclusion. It may be, as stated by appellant in his brief, that there was no association known as the Pacific Casualty Automobile Association licensed to do business in this state; but even assuming this to be true, appellant may have been insured in some company or association bearing a similar name. We are not convinced that this point is seriously urged as counsel for appellant offered no evidence with respect thereto in support of the motion for new trial, nor was any appearance made for the purpose of arguing said motion. It is not claimed that appellant was not in fact insured and so far as the record discloses counsel for respondents may have honestly believed that appellant was insured in an association bearing the name used and may have acted in entire good faith in propounding the question. Our attention is further called to the fact that on the third day of the trial and while appellant was on the witness stand the following occurred:

"The Court: Any questions you would like to ask, ladies and gentlemen?"

"A Juror: A. Are you fully covered against accident insurance?"

"The Court: You will get into trouble there, that has not anything to do with it, absolutely not. It does not make any difference if he has or has not. You are not to consider that at all. You are to decide this case without any reference to any insurance company. That would be contrary to your oaths of office. That makes no difference at all. You are to decide this case simply between the parties to the record, between the plaintiffs and the defendant. That has not anything to do with it. You have no right to even think of such a thing."

The question asked by the juror was obviously improper and although there was no objection from counsel the question remained unanswered due to the prompt and effective admonition given by the court in which the jury was advised that the subject of inquiry was entirely irrelevant. Under the circumstances, we cannot say that the trial court erred in concluding on motion for new trial that appellant had been accorded a fair trial and that the verdicts were not induced by any improper considerations. Richmond v. Moore, 103 Cal. App. 173, 284 P. 681; Girard v. Irvine, supra.

[3] Appellant further contends that even if appellant's negligence be conceded, the evidence shows that respondents and each of them were guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. In our opinion this contention is likewise without merit. The accident occurred after dark at about 8 o'clock on the evening of January 18, 1930, at the intersection of Geary street and Van Ness avenue in San Francisco. Prior to the accident respondents were walking in a northerly direction along the sidewalk on the west side of Van Ness avenue, and appellant was driving in the same direction on the east side of the street. Respondents were intending to cross from the southwest to the northwest corner of the intersection. Appellant was intending to turn to the left to proceed in a westerly direction on Geary street. Traffic at the Geary street intersection was directed by automatic "Stop" and "Go" signals. The traffic signals were against the northbound traffic when respondents and appellant reached the intersection. All awaited the change of signals and then proceeded on their intended courses. As appellant made the turn he was delayed while automobiles passed going south on Van Ness avenue and then he proceeded westward striking respondents at a point within two or three feet of the curb on the northwest corner of the intersection. No horn was sounded by appellant as he came from behind the southbound traffic, and he testified that he did not see respondents until he was within five feet of them.

[4-7] Under the evidence we believe that the issues of negligence and contributory negligence were properly submitted to the jury. In the absence of statute or ordinance to the contrary, the duties of the pedestrian and the driver to use ordinary care while on the highway are equal and reciprocal and the question whether either had failed to exercise such care is ordinarily one of fact and not of law. Filson v. Balkins, 206 Cal. 209, 273 P. 578; Burgesser v. Bullock's, 190 Cal. 673, 214 P. 649; Courviosier v. Burger, 61 Cal. App. 470, 215 P. 93. It is appellant's claim that respondents were guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in failing to see the automobile. One of respondents testified that she did not see the automobile before being struck, while the other testified that she saw the automobile just as she was struck. The testimony showed that they had looked in both directions before starting to cross the street and also while in the middle of the street and their failure to see the automobile in question may well have been attributable to the south-bound traffic which was between respondents and appellant during a portion of the time. The foregoing evidence clearly made the issues of contributory negligence a question of fact for the jury under the general rule, for although the pedestrian's duty to use ordinary care is a continuing duty, nevertheless that duty in the nature of things cannot be said to impose upon the pedestrian the duty to look continuously in all directions at all times. In commenting on Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 208 P. 125, the court said in Burgesser v. Bullock's, supra, at page 678 of 190 Cal., 214 P. 649, 652; "It is there pointed out that the question of whether or not a pedestrian is negligent is to be determined from all the facts and circumstances in evidence in the case, and whether or not it was the duty of the pedestrian to look in a given direction at a given time was a question for the jury."

We find no merit in the further contention that the damages were excessive. We do not deem it necessary to detail the evidence tending to show the amount of general and special damage sustained by respondents. We have reviewed this evidence, and if not incompetent as claimed by appellant, it is ample to sustain the awards. Appellant's attack is mainly based upon the claimed incompetency of the testimony of Dr. Waller, who expressed his opinion to the effect that respondents were unable to resume their work and probably would be permanently disabled to some extent. The circumstances giving rise to this contention are as follows: Dr. Nahman, who attended respondents for several weeks after the accident, was not called as a witness owing to his absence on an extended trip to Europe. In proof of the extent of their injuries, respondents offered their own testimony, including evidence of their condition before and after the accident, the evidence of Dr. Charmak, who treated them at the emergency hospital on the night of the accident, and the testimony of Dr. Waller, who examined them shortly before the trial. It is conceded that Dr. Waller's examination was made for the purpose of testifying at the trial and was not for the purpose of treatment. Appellant now contends that the opinion of Dr. Waller was based upon hearsay, in that it was based upon the records of Dr. Nahman as well as upon his own examination; but the record before us does not bear out this contention. It is apparent from a reading of the testimony that the trial court confined Dr. Waller to his own personal observation as a basis for his opinion and specifically advised the witness to eliminate from his consideration the report and findings of Dr. Nahman. It may be further noted that Dr. Waller answered no questions to which appellant interposed an objection, and that no motion was made by appellant to strike any portion of the alleged incompetent testimony. Going further, appellant argues that even if Dr. Waller's testimony was competent it was insufficient to prove that the ailments of which respondents complained were proximately caused by the injuries received in the accident. It appears that one of the main conditions common to both respondents and causing disability at the time of the trial was a dropsical condition or a condition similar thereto evidenced by pitting at the ankles, which condition appellant claims was not attributable to the accident. However, respondents testified as to their condition before the accident, and Dr. Waller testified that if this dropsical condition was present prior to the accident it would have manifested itself by a heart condition which was not present here. In answer to a further question he testified that even if respondents had been afflicted with dropsy prior to the accident the injuries would have aggravated that condition. There was ample evidence from which the jury could infer that this condition resulted from or at least was aggravated by the injuries sustained in the accident. In our opinion the entire attack upon the testimony relating to damages goes to the weight to be attached to the testimony and not to its competency or sufficiency.

The judgments appealed from are and each of them is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Aileen Fisher and husband against Thomas Pennington and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Rothchild & Golden and M. Mitchell Bourquin, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

WARD, Justice pro tem.

Defendants and appellants Pennington owned and operated an apartment house in San Francisco. Plaintiff and respondent Aileen Fisher paid one month's rent in advance for a furnished apartment. On the morning of the 13th day of March, 1929, plaintiff was occupying a bed in the furnished apartment when the door to which the bed was attached fell inward over the top of the bed, causing injuries to plaintiff. A jury returned a verdict against the defendant.

[1-8] The door was used as a partition between a room and a closet and was attached to the floor and the overhead wall. Its removal would have marred the appearance of the apartment to its detriment, and therefore may be considered part of the realty. The bed was connected to the door by small plates fastened by a few screws that could easily be removed. Section 660, Civil Code, provides as follows: "A thing is deemed to be affixed to land when it is attached to it by roots, as in the case of trees, vines, or shrubs; or imbedded in it, as in the case of walls; or permanently resting upon it, as in the case of buildings; or permanently attached to what is thus permanent, as by means of cement, plaster, nails, bolts, or screws." In this section "permanently attached to what is thus permanent" is the legal rule; "as by means of cement, plaster, nails, bolts, or screws" is merely illustrative. An article may be attached other than by the examples given. For instance, lumber may be attached by means of strips of hides; paper may be placed upon the walls by the use of some adhesive substance; mouldings may be made permanent by proper fittings without the use of nails or screws. The fact that a screw or nail fastens an article to the realty is not determinative of its permanent attachment to the realty. In Gosliner v. Briones, 187 Cal. 557, at page 559, 204 P. 19, 20, the court said: "This section of the code is simply a rule for general guidance, concerning itself more with ultimate than with probative facts. Whether or not in any case a building is 'permanently resting upon' the soil, so as to be deemed 'affixed to the land' within the meaning of the section, remains a question of fact to be determined upon the evidence of that case." The intent of the parties is the determining factor; the use made of the article is of importance in determining this intent. A bed ordinarily is not part of the realty, though it may be made such by permanently attaching it to the realty as by building it into the wall so that it would be immovable and its destruction would result in injury to the realty. The mere erection of a building upon land does not necessarily make it a fixture. Pennybecker v. McDougal, 48 Cal. 160. Whether any article attached to realty is a fixture is to be determined from the facts and circumstances of the particular case. Miller v. Waddingham, 91 Cal. 379, 27 P. 750, 13 L. R. A. 680. The bed in this case could have been removed without disfiguring the side of the door that ornamented the room. The marks resulting from the extraction of a few screws would have created but slight disfigurement to the closet side of the door. When all the attending circumstances and the intent of the parties is considered, there is no doubt that the bed was part of the furnishings of the apartment and therefore personalty. Respondents desired to contract for a furnished apartment. Appellant by acceptance of the rental contracted to supply the furniture. A necessary adjunct for living accommodations is a bed or some contrivance used in lieu thereof. Personal property, let to a hirer or renter, must be put into condition fit for its intended purpose or use. Civ. Code, § 1955.

Furniture supplied to the renter of a furnished apartment imposes on the owner a liability "for all damage caused to him by the defects or vices of the thing deposited." Civ. Code, § 1833. In the renting of a furnished apartment there is an implied warranty that the furniture is fit for use or occupation. The defendants had a superior knowledge of the operation of the door and bed. There is no evidence in this case from which a reasonable inference could be drawn that the collapse of the door was occasioned by the fault of the plaintiff or that the accident was the result of the wrongful use of the sleeping contrivance by the plaintiff. The case of Watwood v. Fosdick (Cal. Sup.) 297 P. 881, and the other cases cited by appellant are not in point. All of these cases cover the doctrine relative to realty disconnected with personalty. The renting of the bed, personal property, attached to the door, real property, presents a mixed contract of hiring of personalty and realty. If the article furnished or supplied is connected or attached with another article or contrivance only incidental to the use of the article furnished, then it is reasonable to conclude that the hirer or renter warrants, not only the article furnished, but the incidental articles connected therewith and necessary to its proper use.

[9, 10] Appellants could have furnished a bed disconnected with any part of the realty, but they chose to supply a bed attached to a door, and hence became responsible for the defects of the door. To the extent that the door was a necessary adjunct of the bed it may, so far as the facts of this case are concerned, be considered as personalty, that is, part of the furniture. A hotel keeper is required to keep the furniture in good repair and this irrespective whether the rental is for one day or one month. The same rule should and does apply to an apartment house keeper. 36 Cor. Jur. 48. Keepers of furnished apartments have the same lien upon baggage, etc., as the hotel keepers. See Civ. Code, §§ 1861a, 1862. Every person is responsible by his want of ordinary care in the management of his property for an injury sustained by the use of such property except in cases where the user has brought injury upon himself. See Civ.

Code, § 1714. By the rental contract plaintiffs were conveyed an estate in the demised premises and they were entitled to the use and enjoyment of their habitation. A tort-feasor is liable notwithstanding the existence of a contract. If the cause of action arises from a breach of duty growing out of a contract it is ex delicto.

In omitting to perform a duty imposed under the law, namely, to supply a bed safe to sleep in, appellant was guilty of negligence. It is not necessary in this case to invoke the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. What has been said herein answers appellants' criticisms of the court's instructions.

Judgment affirmed.

CRAIG, J.

In an action for damages against a hospital, two nurses, and a surgeon, in Ventura county, the jury were directed to return a verdict in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff appealed from the judgment.

From such argument in the briefs as is based upon evidence appearing in the record, as distinguished from statements of counsel, we assume that the contention as to its sufficiency to warrant submission of the case to the jury is founded principally upon negligence in failing to examine an ether machine used during an operation, and the fact that the patient's adenoids were removed after discovery that an excessive amount of ether had been administered.

It appears without contradiction that the hospital corporation was established and conducted as a charitable institution; that appellant employed the surgeon who performed the operation, and made independent arrangements for hospitalization. Witnesses for all of the parties were unanimous in their testimony that respondent Tillim did not furnish, assemble, inspect, or prepare the ether machine for use; that it was the duty of the anaesthetist to superintend such work and to test the machine before it was used; and that proper medical practice requires it of such attendant. Typical of the evidence in this respect is that of Dr. Thomas E. Cunnane, who swore: "I think the duties are completely separated. The surgeon is responsible for the operative work only,—the results of the operation; and the anaesthetist is responsible for the life of the patient so far as the anaesthetic is concerned."

[1] As soon as the respondent doctor approached the table and observed an excessive flow of anaesthetic he removed the tube, applied restorative methods, and removed the patient's adenoids. Appellant's own witness, an expert, when asked, "Dr. Bianchi, in your opinion, did the removal of the adenoids after this unfortunate incident assist the child or hurt the child at the time?" replied: "It may have assisted the child; * * * the removal of the adenoids might have helped to relieve the condition of the lungs." There is nothing in the record which is indicated nor which we have been able to find, to the contrary, or tending in any way to charge respondent Tillim with negligence or with the commission of any act detrimental to the best interests of the patient. The cardinal rule that in an action for damages the burden of proof rests upon the plaintiff, as in other cases, requires no citation of authority.

[2, 3] The original answer of the respondent corporation is incorporated in appellant's opening brief. It is not made a part of the record, and must be disregarded. Gallatin Irr. Co. v. Bristol, 163 Cal. 405, 126 P. 864, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 74. It is contended that it was error to permit the filing of an amended answer, that it was "irrelevant, incompetent and immaterial, and that it does not plead facts sufficient to constitute a defense." It joined issue upon the facts alleged by the plaintiff, and contrary to appellant's assertion, it was therein alleged "that said hospital was not conducted for profit." However, it is admitted that the amendments did not set forth any other or further defense than that originally pleaded, and we cannot say that the trial court abused its discretion in permitting the defendant to amend. Crosby v. Clark, 132 Cal. 1, 63 P. 1022.

[4, 5] It is also contended that evidence offered on behalf of the respondent corporation tending to show that it was a charitable institution, was contrary to the provisions of its general articles of incorporation, and was erroneously admitted. Authorities involving various commercial corporations are cited by appellant, but it is apparent from pertinent decisions that they have no application. This question was determined in Stewart v. California Medical Missionary & Benev. Ass'n, 178 Cal. 418, 176 P. 46, 47, wherein it was said: "The character of the institution is to be determined, not alone by the powers of the corporation as defined in its charter, but also by the manner of conducting the hospital." Objections to evidence offered by the plaintiff as tending to show that the hospital authorities exhibited a consciousness of commercial or profitable operation, in that it may have procured a policy of insurance against like casualties, were sustained. This evidence was properly excluded. Levy v. Superior Court, 74 Cal. App. 171, 239 P. 1100.

[6-8] It appears without contradiction that the hospital paid no compensation to its constituents for services, and that it paid no dividends; that it was conducted for the good of the community, by a charitable organization known as the Big Sisters League, with the intent and purpose that if there was a surplus over and above the expense of carrying it, such surplus would go to the said league. There is no evidence of a relaxation of reasonable diligence in the selection of attendants. As we have observed, the respondent physician employed by appellant was not employed by the corporation, and was not charged with supervision of its mechanical apparatus. We think the case is governed by rules announced in Burdell v. St. Luke's Hospital, 37 Cal. App. 310, 173 P. 1008, that: "Upon this showing the lower court was clearly correct in directing a verdict for defendant under the rule laid down in Thomas v. Germ. Gen., etc., Soc., 168 Cal. 183, 141 P. 1186, where it is said that: 'Where one accepts the benefit of a public or of a private charity he exempts by implied contract the benefactor from liability for the negligence of the servants in administering the charity, if the benefactor has used due care in the selection of those servants.' The fact that plaintiff paid the regular rates charged by the hospital for paying patients does not take the case out of the operation of this rule, for it is apparent that the rates were not charged with a view of making a profit from her, and the moneys received from paying patients were not in fact sufficient to meet even the ordinary operating expenses of the hospital, without considering any interest upon the amount invested in the buildings."

[9, 10] A trial court is invested with the authority and the duty to direct a verdict when there is no substantial conflict of evidence upon the essentials of the case. Estate of Sharon, 179 Cal. 447, 177 P. 283; Kohn v. National Film Corp., 60 Cal. App. 112, 212 P. 207. An order directing a verdict for either party will not warrant a reversal of the judgment unless it be made to appear that the court abused its discretion in such respect. In re Estate of Morey, 147 Cal. 495, 82 P. 57.

The judgment is affirmed.

MAYO v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

Civ. 7999.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 26, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 24, 1931. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Oct. 22, 1931.

1. Mandamus ⇨40.

Lower court, by writ of mandate, may be directed to require plaintiff to answer questions pertinent to issues which, theretofore, on taking of depositions, plaintiff had refused to answer.

2. Depositions ⇨71.

Defendant in divorce action held entitled to have plaintiff answer questions relating to source of plaintiff's information regarding defendant's alleged misconduct.

3. Witnesses ⇨16.

Affidavit on information and belief relative to materiality of books and papers without setting forth supporting facts held insufficient showing to justify subpoena duces tecum.

4. Discovery ⇨107.

Refusing to punish plaintiff for contempt for failing to produce books and papers for defendant's inspection held not abuse of discretion (Code Civ. Proc. § 1000).

Circumstances disclosed that defendant's application for order to obtain inspection was based solely on information and belief and contained no statement of facts showing either the basis for the belief or the materiality of the defense, and that defendant, through courtesy of plaintiff, had previously enjoyed ample opportunity to make full inspection of the identical books and papers which she again sought to inspect.

Application by Marguerite Maloney Mayo for writ of mandate prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Los Angeles, Honorable Douglas L. Edmonds, Judge, and others, to compel the respondent court to require a party plaintiff to answer certain questions on deposition.

Writ granted in part, and denied in part.

HOUSER, J.

[1] In this matter the first question with which this court is concerned, namely, on the taking by a notary public of the deposition of a party plaintiff to an action for a divorce, on the refusal of such party to answer certain questions pertinent to the issues raised by the pleadings therein, and on proper application by the defendant to the superior court for an order requiring such party plaintiff to answer such specific questions, followed by the refusal of said court to make such order—whether by means of its writ of mandate this court has the power to direct said lower court to require such party plaintiff to answer the particular questions which theretofore on the taking of such deposition he had refused to answer—in principle, if not directly, is answered in the affirmative by the decision in each of the cases of Crocker v. Conrey, 140 Cal. 213, 73 P. 1006, and Wissman v. Cabaniss, 34 Cal. App. 487, 168 P. 150.

[2] The second inquiry, to wit, whether on the taking of such deposition the specific questions which were asked of but denied answer by the party whose deposition was being taken were pertinent to the issues in the action, depends primarily upon a consideration of the issues therein involved.

From the petition presented herein it may be gleaned not only that the ground upon which the plaintiff sought a divorce from the defendant was that of extreme cruelty practiced by the defendant on the plaintiff, but that specific instances thereof were set forth in the complaint, which allegedly had the effect of causing plaintiff "grievous mental suffering." It appears that with but one exception none of the particular acts of the defendant of which complaint was made by the plaintiff took place within the immediate presence of the latter, but that, according both to the allegations of the complaint as well as to the answers which were made by the plaintiff to preliminary questions which were propounded to him at the time when his deposition was being taken, information concerning the conduct of the defendant at the times in question was conveyed to the plaintiff by third persons. The particular questions which the plaintiff refused to answer all related to the source of his information; that is to say, on being appropriately and respectively asked by counsel for the defendant as to the time when, the place where, and from whom, he had acquired the information relative to the alleged misconduct of the defendant, the plaintiff unqualifiedly refused to answer.

It is apparent that on the grounds indicated, before the plaintiff would have cause for complaint against the defendant it would be necessary not only that the actual commission by the defendant of the alleged acts which constituted her misconduct be established, but also that information thereof be conveyed to the plaintiff. Manifestly, if the charges regarding the misconduct of the defendant were maliciously false, or it appeared that they were inadvertently or mistakenly made, although the plaintiff might grievously suffer because of the circulation of such a story regarding his wife, nevertheless by reason thereof he could have no real cause for complaint against the innocent victim of the slander. On the other hand, although as a matter of fact it might appear that the defendant had been guilty of great misconduct, unless information thereof actually was conveyed to the plaintiff, it is equally clear that such misconduct could not have caused him any "grievous mental suffering." From which latter consideration it becomes plain that a subissue, as it were, was injected into the case, to wit, whether in reality, as stated by the plaintiff, the necessary information was conveyed to him. It is clear that the defendant should not be concluded as to such so-called subissue in the case merely by the naked statement or testimony given by the plaintiff to the effect that, at no definite time or place, some unnamed and unidentified person had told him regarding the alleged misconduct of the defendant; that by reason thereof he had believed the same, and as a consequence had endured "grievous mental suffering." In other words, assuming that on the trial of the action testimony of the import herein indicated were to be given by the plaintiff, it is clear that the defendant should have the right to test the accuracy or the truthfulness of such testimony not only by a liberal cross-examination of the plaintiff in that regard, but as well by any possible rebuttal evidence. If perchance it should be developed either that as a matter of fact no one had made any statement whatsoever to the plaintiff regarding the misconduct of the defendant, or that, having been informed thereof at a specified date, the plaintiff was in no wise affected thereby, but, to the contrary, assuming that his information regarding such misconduct was correct and complete in detail, nevertheless he had condoned the offense, it is apparent that the effect upon the cause of action in which "grievous mental suffering" was the basis very probably would be disastrous.

Applying the principles of law hereinbefore indicated to the facts, and on examination of the record herein, wherein are set forth the particular questions propounded to the plaintiff and which he refused to answer, this court is of the opinion that the plaintiff should be required to answer each of the questions which appear in paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 16, 17, 19, 22, and 25 of the "Affidavit supporting motion for show-cause order," as the same appears at page 20, et seq., of the instrument filed in this court on July 15, 1931, and indorsed, "Alternative Writ of Mandamus * * * Supplement to Petition for Writ of Mandamus"; but that, relating thereto, as to each and all of the other questions propounded to plaintiff, as the same appear in the instrument to which reference has been had, the plaintiff should not be required to answer.

[3] The third question which has been submitted to this court for its determination involves a point of law which affects the asserted right of the defendant to have produced by the plaintiff at the taking of his deposition certain books, papers, etc., which purportedly relate to the conduct of the private business of the plaintiff during the period of time which elapsed after the plaintiff and the defendant intermarried and preceding the time when the cross-complaint of the defendant was filed in the action.

An allegation contained in the complaint filed by the plaintiff is "that there is no community property belonging to the plaintiff and the defendant." The defendant filed a cross-complaint in the action in which is set forth an allegation "that there are large amounts of community property belonging to the parties * * * that much of said community property, as cross-plaintiff is advised and believes and therefore alleges, has been and is being fraudulently concealed from cross-plaintiff, with the intent to defraud her and deprive her of every right therein; and in this behalf cross-plaintiff alleges that cross-defendant has threatened and declared that he would place his property beyond the reach of cross-plaintiff and would so contrive and convey it that she could obtain nothing."

At the time when the order was made by the superior court for the taking of the deposition of the plaintiff, said court also caused to issue its subpoena duces tecum, addressed to the plaintiff, by which he was commanded to produce at the taking of his said deposition:

"The day book, cash book, journal and ledger for each of the years 1923 to 1931, inclusive;

"The stubs of plaintiff's and said corporation's check books for the years 1923 to 1931, inclusive, connected with checks drawn upon plaintiff's and said corporation's bank accounts in the following named banks: * * *

"The bank statements for each and every month, commencing January 1st, 1923, to the present time, covering plaintiff's and said corporation's accounts in each of said banks;

"The cancelled checks for each month commencing January 1st, 1923, to the present time, covering plaintiff's and said corporation's accounts in each of said banks;

"A certain audit dated about February, 1926, made by Gordon Robb, a certified public accountant, purporting to relate to plaintiff's and said corporation's said papers and books of account."

Preceding the issuance of such subpoena, and as a basis therefor, the defendant filed with the superior court her affidavit in which she set forth certain alleged facts which apparently were by her considered sufficient for the purpose of constituting a showing of the materiality of the books, papers, etc., which she desired the plaintiff to produce at the taking of his deposition. As far as concerns the question here involved, such affidavit was to the effect that, following the marriage of the plaintiff and the defendant, the plaintiff had engaged in various business activities and had realized therefrom a large profit which constituted community property of the plaintiff and the defendant; that according to the information and belief of the defendant, in connection with such business of the plaintiff, for the purpose of defrauding the defendant, the plaintiff installed and maintained a set of inaccurate, incorrect, false, and fraudulent books of account, and that as incidents thereof the plaintiff had executed a large number of checks on each of several different banks, which respective checks in the regular course of business were returned to the plaintiff by the bank on which they were drawn, together with a statement of the account between the plaintiff and such bank. Also, that at the instance of the plaintiff a certain named certified public accountant had prepared an audit of the business of the plaintiff "based upon said fraudulent entries, statements, cancelled checks and books of account, in so far as the same had accumulated up to the date of the making of such audit. * * *"

As has been hereinbefore indicated, on the taking of the deposition of the plaintiff he failed and refused to produce thereat any of the books or papers or other instruments specified in the subpoena duces tecum; whereupon the defendant caused the plaintiff to be cited as for contempt of court, which citation resulted in the discharge of the plaintiff. By the petition herein the defendant seeks to have issued out of this court its mandate "commanding the said Superior Court to require the said plaintiff, and requiring the said plaintiff, to produce said books and documents under said subpoena duces tecum and to answer said material questions at the continued taking of his said deposition, and to permit the said defendant, Marguerite Maloney Mayo, to have an inspection and audit of all of said books and papers. * * *

The direct question presented to this court is whether on the showing made by the affidavit of the defendant, the plaintiff was legally required to produce the books, papers, etc., specified in the subpoena duces tecum.

Without consideration of any other possible defect in any part of the proceedings leading up to the order of the discharge of the plaintiff, attention is again directed to the fact that the allegation of the defendant, as contained in her affidavit relative to the materiality of the books, papers, etc., of which she apparently desired an inspection at the taking of the deposition of the plaintiff, was made by her on her information and belief. No facts were set forth in support of such belief, as a matter of fact, the statement in said affidavit does not constitute an allegation of any alleged fact. It is:

"That defendant is informed and believes that on or about January 1st, 1926, and prior thereto, the plaintiff conceived of the possibility of his desiring to secure a divorce from the defendant, and the plaintiff thereupon undertook to commence a system of concealment of all of said property, and a system of falsifying his books of account for the purpose of furthering said concealment and that plaintiff established, on or about said date, a system of books of account consisting of a day book, cash book, journal and ledger for each of the years commencing, and dating back to and prior to January 1st, 1923; that defendant is informed and believes that said books of account contain only entries concerning plaintiff's earnings, profits, rents, and income from said community property aforesaid, and that said entries are fraudulent; * * * that defendant is informed and believes that each of said books of account are in the plaintiff's possession.

"That the defendant is informed and believes that said books of account are made up from stubs of plaintiff's check books for each of the years 1923 to 1931, inclusive. * * *

"That defendant is informed and believes that each of said stub entries in each of said check books relate to the plaintiff's costs and disbursements. * * *

"That defendant is informed and believes that plaintiff has in his possession bank statements covering each and every month commencing January 1st, 1923, from each of said banks. * * *

"That defendant is informed and believes that the plaintiff has cancelled checks in his possession. * * *

"That the defendant is further informed and believes that the plaintiff in furtherance of said plan of concealment caused to be made by Gordon Robb, a certified public accountant, a certain audit. * * *

In the case of Ex parte Clarke, 126 Cal. 235, 240, 58 P. 546, 548, 46 L. R. A. 835, 77 Am. St. Rep. 176, where the court was considering a situation similar to that presented to this court, it is said: "* * * In Morrison v. Sturges, 26 How. Prac. [N. Y.] 179, the court say: 'It is not enough that the party believes or is advised that the paper contains material evidence. Facts must be shown to support such belief.'" And in connection with its criticism of a general order for the production of documents, the court also said: "Moreover, it was, in effect, a general omnibus order for the production of all defendant's books, which has always been held to be unauthorized; for, while it named certain books, yet those constituted all of defendant's books, as appears from plaintiff's examination of petitioner as to what books the defendant had. Again, the order was in the nature of what Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, over a century ago, called 'a mere fishing bill,' and such bills have been universally condemned. It is quite evident that these books were not required to be produced for the direct purpose of introducing them in evidence. Plaintiff would not have offered them, or any part of them, in evidence, unless he found something in the part offered that was relevant and material in support of his side of the case; and, indeed, they would not have been otherwise admissible. He merely intended to draw his dragnet of inspection through all these books under the ostensible motive of trying to catch something which his witness had testified was not there. In the meantime all the private business of the defendant—all its dealings with persons other than plaintiff, its methods of conducting its affairs, perhaps its financial condition, and other matters vitally important to its welfare—would have been exposed. There is no warrant in the law for such a forcible wholesale violation of a person's privacy upon such a showing as was made in this case. A man does not lose all his civil rights because he is brought into court as a party to a suit. As was said by Lord Hatherley: 'A court is bound to protect the defendant against undue inquisition into its affairs' (7 Ch. App. 97, and notes); and it would be difficult to imagine a more striking instance of such 'undue inquisition' than an order compelling a defendant to produce for inspection all his books upon the mere suspicion—against positive evidence to the contrary—that they might possibly contain some evidence favorable to the plaintiff, and without pointing to any particular part of all these books over which this suspicion was supposed to hover."

In principle, to the same effect, see Kullman, Salz & Co. v. Superior Court, 15 Cal. App. 276, 114 P. 539; Hupp v. Superior Court, 22 Cal. App. 162, 133 P. 987; Funkenstein v. Superior Court, 23 Cal. App. 663, 139 P. 101; Shell Oil Co. v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 292 P. 531.

It therefore becomes clear that, if for no reason other than that the defendant failed to make a sufficient or proper showing regarding the materiality of the books, papers, etc., which she desired the plaintiff to produce at the taking of his deposition, the petition presented herein should be denied in that particular.

[4] In addition to the issuance of the subpoena duces tecum, to which attention has hereinbefore been directed, by means of which the defendant sought to obtain an inspection of the books, papers, etc., of the plaintiff, under the provisions of section 1000 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and other sections of said Code related thereto, on her affidavit which contained allegations identical with those hereinbefore set forth in connection with the application for and issuance of the said subpoena duces tecum, the defendant obtained from the superior court an order by which the plaintiff was directed to produce such books, papers, etc., and to permit the defendant to inspect the same. The plaintiff having failed to comply with such order, on application made by the defendant, the superior court issued its order by which—in effect—the plaintiff was required to show cause why he should not be punished as for contempt of court. It further appears that on the hearing of the order to show cause, by order of the superior court, the plaintiff was discharged.

By affidavit of the plaintiff, it appears that preceding the issuance by the superior court of its order by which the plaintiff was directed to permit inspection by the defendant of all such books, papers, etc., by and through the courtesy of the plaintiff, the defendant, by her counsel, had free access to such records, throughout a period of approximately two months, during all of which time, the said counsel of defendant made full and complete examination thereof.

In the case of Shell Oil Co. v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 292 P. 531, it is held that by the terms of section 1000 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which purports to authorize the inspection of records such as is desired by defendant herein, the superior court is vested with judicial discretion in passing upon any application for inspection thereof.

Taking into consideration the fact that the application made by the defendant to the superior court was based solely upon her information and belief; that it contained no statement of facts showing either the basis for the "belief" of the defendant, or the materiality of the defense of the defendant, or the establishment of any issue involved in her cross-complaint; and that theretofore she had enjoyed ample opportunity to make full and complete inspection of the identical books and papers which she again sought to inspect—it becomes clear that no abuse of discretion was displayed by the trial court in declining to punish plaintiff as for contempt of court because of his failure to again produce such records for inspection by the defendant. Shell Oil Co. v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 292 P. 531.

It is ordered that the mandate of this court issue to the respondent herein by which it shall be directed to require the plaintiff in the action between him and the defendant, to which reference has been had herein, to fully answer each of the questions to him heretofore propounded on the attempted taking of his deposition as the same are set forth in paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 16, 17, 19, 22, and 25 of the "Affidavit supporting motion for show-cause order," as the same appears at page 20, et seq., of the instrument filed in this court on July 15, 1931, and indorsed "Alternative Writ of Mandamus * * * Supplement to Petition for Writ of Mandamus." It is further ordered that as to all other matters and things, as to which complaint is made by the applicant herein and as to which she seeks a mandate from this court directed to the superior court, as aforesaid, the same be and each of them is denied, and as to them and each of them the alternative writ be and it is discharged.

LIDBERG v. E. T. LEITER & SON et al.

Civ. 7916.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

Aug. 26, 1931.

1. Master and servant ☞389.

Employer's lien for "expenditures for compensation," upon judgment recovered by employee against tort-feasor, does not cover portion of judgment covering physical pain and suffering (St. 1917, p. 854, § 26, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1213).

Such lien is a lien solely for "expenditures for compensation" which employer is required to make under award of accident commission.

2. Master and servant ☞389.

To determine portion of employee's judgment against tort-feasor to be subjected to employer's lien for expenditures for compensation, lien must be asserted before entry of Judgment or verdict (St. 1917, p. 854, § 26, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1213).

Such segregation of lienable portion of judgment from unlienable portion may be made, as in other classes of cases, by requiring jury, under proper instructions, to render verdict on special issues, as well as general verdict, or to answer special interrogatories which would enable court to ascertain amount of verdict attributable to elements of damage not compensable under act. When case is tried before court sitting without jury, or when verdict is general only, proper segregation would be within sound discretion of court, exercised in light of evidence in case. Such would also be case when court approves compromise and enters judgment in accordance therewith.

3. Judgment ⇄898(4).

In action by injured employee against tort-feasor, where employer's insurer failed to seek segregation of items of recovery subject to employer's lien, refusing insurer's motion to set aside satisfaction of judgment held not error; time for setting aside or modifying judgment, or appeal therefrom, having expired (St. 1917, p. 854, § 26, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1213).

Judgment had become final and time for appeal or to move to set it aside or modify it had long since expired, and insurer merely moved to set aside satisfaction of judgment allowing judgment to stand as entered, although judgment admittedly made no segregation of lienable items. Hence, to set aside satisfaction would be futile, and motion for lien was one that court could not grant because judgment was not in such form as would enable court to determine extent of lien, and there was no error in denial of motion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Action by Theodore N. Lidberg against E. T. NOURSE, P. J.

This is an appeal from an order denying the motion of the Zurich General Accident & Liability Insurance Company to set aside a satisfaction of judgment and consent thereto, and for a lien upon that judgment in favor of the insurance company.

The plaintiff Lidberg was injured while in the course of his employment as an interior decorator. In due course the industrial accident commission awarded him compensation amounting to $3,145.33, of which sum $2,291.30 was found to have been paid. Thereafter the plaintiff commenced this action against the defendants Leiter & Son and Western Asbestos Magnesite Company in tort for damages resulting from said injuries. Notice of this action was given to the employer and to his insurance carrier, the Zurich Company. The cause consumed four days of trial during which the attorney for the Zurich Company was continually present. At the end of the fourth day the matter was compromised and by written stipulation $10,000 was paid in full satisfaction of all claims arising out of the accident. Counsel for the Zurich Company sat in on all the negotiations leading to this settlement which were had in open court or in the judge's chambers. By the terms of the settlement the full sum of $10,000 was deposited in escrow subject to a number of conditions which are not of interest here, except the condition that plaintiff should commence a suit to quiet title to the fund against all parties to the suit and against the Zurich Company. Judgment was thereupon duly entered in accordance with this stipulation. At the same time this stipulation was filed the plaintiff requested the consent of the trial court to a satisfaction of the judgment. Such consent was given in writing by the trial court in the presence of all parties and satisfaction of the judgment was accordingly executed and filed. Thereafter the Zurich Company filed its notice of motion to set aside the satisfaction of the judgment upon the general grounds mentioned in section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, of inadvertence, error, and mistake. During the hearing upon that motion the foregoing facts were either shown by affidavit or, having occurred in the presence of the same trial judge, were agreed to in open court. The motion was denied upon the grounds that the Zurich Company had not moved within due season to attach its lien upon the judgment.

The order must be affirmed for two reasons.

[1, 2] First. The lien permitted by the terms of section 26 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Stats. 1917, pp. 831, 854, as amended Stats. 1927, p. 1213; Deering's Gen.

Laws Supp. 1925-1927, Act 4749) is a lien solely for the "expenditures for compensation" which the employer is required to make under an award of the accident commission, and this lien does not cover that portion of a verdict or judgment for damages in tort which covers the physical pain and suffering resulting from the injury. Ansbach v. Dept. of Ind. Rel., 99 Cal. App. 677, 680, 681, 279 P. 224. In order to determine the amount of the judgment which should be subjected to a lien for these expenditures, it is necessary that the lien claimant assert his right to a lien within such time that the jury in its verdict, or the court in its judgment, may judicially segregate the items. Ansbach v. Dept. Ind. Rel., supra; Jacobsen v. Ind. Acc. Comm. (Cal. Sup.) 299 P. 66, 69. In the Jacobsen Case the Supreme Court says: "If the employer has the statutory notice of the commencement of the action by his employee, and fails to assert and timely to apply for the allowance of his lien, he must be deemed to have waived his right to the same, and should be estopped by reason of such failure from thereafter asserting the right. Obviously the time to assert the right would be before satisfaction of the judgment."

The appellant argues that the statute is indefinite in this respect and does not prescribe the procedure by which these items should be segregated. The same argument was made in the Jacobsen Case and to that argument the Supreme Court says: "To the contrary, it is suggested that the jury might, as in other classes of cases, be required under proper instructions to render a verdict on the special issue as well as a general verdict or to answer special interrogatories which would enable the court to ascertain the amount of the verdict attributable to elements of damage not compensable under the act. When the case is tried before the court sitting without a jury, or when the verdict is general only, the proper segregation would be within the sound discretion of the court, exercised in the light of the evidence in the case. Such would also be the case when the court approves a compromise and enters judgment in accordance therewith."

To better understand the mind of the Supreme Court upon the question of the time when such a lien should be asserted, we should add that, in the Jacobsen Case, segregation was made in the judgment, and the employer was reimbursed for past expenditures, and that, after the entry and satisfaction of the judgment, he sought to impose a lien for additional expenditures for compensation which had been awarded by the accident commission. In holding that the right to this lien had been waived, the court says (page 69 of 299 P.): "It presented its application for a lien on the judgment to be rendered in the form of a stipulation for judgment, specifying therein the amount of its past expenditures only. If it desired to assert a lien for future expenditures, then was the time to do it. It failed then to assert its right, and must be deemed thereby to have waived it." (Emphasis ours.)

It will be noted that the rights of the employer as to past expenditures were fully protected in the Jacobsen Case by its assertion of a lien for that purpose prior to judgment. The law thus gives to the employer and to his insurance carrier a simple means of protection and, because of the necessity of segregating the lienable portion of the judgment or verdict from the unlienable, the proper time to assert such a lien is before the judgment or verdict is entered.

[3] Second. But, for another reason the order must be affirmed. The judgment has become final and the time for appeal or to move to set it aside or modify has long since expired. Appellant merely moved to set aside the satisfaction of the judgment, allowing the judgment to stand as entered. But admittedly the judgment made no segregation of the lienable items. It is too late now to modify that judgment. Hence, to set aside the satisfaction would be futile. The motion for a lien is one that the court could not grant because the judgment is not in such form as would enable the court to determine the extent of the lien. There was no error in the denial of the motion.

The order is affirmed.

ANDERSON v. MARKET ST. RY. CO.

Civ. 7837.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 24, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 22, 1931.

1. Negligence ⇨136(26).

Issue of contributory negligence, while ordinarily for jury, may in some cases become question of law under undisputed facts.

While ordinarily question of contributory negligence must be left to jury, there are cases where standard of conduct required of person under given circumstances is so obvious as to be applicable to all persons under such circumstances.

2. Carriers ⇨327.

Pedestrian running directly into path of approaching street car while crossing street on pedestrian lane, intending to board car, held contributorily negligent.

Pedestrian was contributorily negligent as matter of law, because her own testimony showed that she exercised no care whatsoever when crossing street intending to board approaching street car at safety zone on other side of street. She knew that she was on "blind side" of car where no passengers were admitted, that car would stop only for persons waiting on safety zone, that there was nothing about manner in which car approached to indicate that it was stopping, that car was coming at fast rate of speed, and yet proceeded to run directly into its path. Defendant's uncontradicted testimony showed that there was headlight burning on street car, and that all lights on car were burning.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Morgan, Judge.

Action by Amelia Anderson against the Market Street Railway Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals.

William M. Abbott, William M. Cannon, and Walter H. Linforth, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

C. H. Fish and L. S. Deming, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SPENCE, J.

In this action to recover for personal injuries, judgment upon the verdict was entered in favor of plaintiff, from which judgment defendant appeals.

Appellant urges several grounds for a reversal, the main contentions being: First, that there is no evidence of negligence on the part of appellant; and, second, that, even if it can be said that there is testimony showing negligence on appellant's part, the evidence shows that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. In our opinion the latter contention must be sustained, and we believe that a discussion of the remaining points raised by appellant would serve no useful purpose.

The accident occurred near the intersection of Mission and Avalon streets in San Francisco at about 7:20 p. m. on the evening of September 14, 1929. At that point Mission street runs in a general northerly and southerly direction. Respondent, a woman sixty-eight years of age, was struck by a north-bound street car while she was running across the pedestrian lane from the west to the east side of said street. It does not appear that there was any other vehicle or street car in the immediate vicinity, and respondent's view of the street car was unobstructed. Respondent had come into Mission street on the west side at Theresa street, a short distance north of Avalon street. The north-bound street car, according to her testimony, was then "far away in the other block." She was intending to board this car at the safety zone at the east side of Mission street near Avalon street, and she proceeded in a southerly direction to Avalon street before starting to cross. She testified that she had been taking the car frequently at this point over a period of several years. She stated that it was the custom of the cars to stop there when people were waiting at the safety zone, "but not otherwise." The uncontradicted testimony showed that this was not a "regular stop," and that cars stopped there only when passengers were waiting at the safety zone.

Respondent was the only witness called on her behalf to testify concerning the circumstances immediately surrounding the accident, and the testimony offered by appellant's witnesses with respect thereto was not helpful to her. Examining her testimony with respect to the movement of the street car, we find that she observed it several times after entering upon Mission street at Theresa street, and that it was at all times going fast. Using some of the expressions found in the record, we find that it was "going fast" when she first saw it "far away in the other block"; that later she observed it going just "as fast"; that "it hadn't slowed down any"; that thereafter when the car was at the south end of the safety zone it was "coming just as fast as it had been on the other occasions" when she saw it; that the car did not "slow down at any time," but "came fast the whole time." Referring to her own conduct, she testified that she was running because she was in a great hurry. Again employing some of the precise words used, we find the following:

"Q. Did you try to run across the track in front of this car? A. Yes, I was in a great hurry. * * *

"Q. Yes, but as far as you went, you were running, weren't you? A. Yes, I was in a hurry to get over, but I didn't get over.

"The Court: Well, he wants to know if she was running; this is his question. A. I was running."

The following questions and answers of respondent show the approximate relative positions of respondent and the car, the safety zone referred to being fifty-four feet in length and being located just south of the lane on which respondent was crossing.

"Q. When the street car was at the other end of the safety zone, did you notice how fast it was coming? A. Very fast.

"Q. And you saw when it was at the other end of the safety zone and before you got up on the first track that it was coming very fast, did you? A. Yes.

"Q. And seeing it at that point and coming very fast, did you try to run across the track in front of it?

"The witness: Yes, I was in a hurry. * * *

"Q. At the time you started to run across the tracks, the rails on which this particular car was traveling, wasn't the front of it within twenty feet of you? A. I cannot say how many feet.

"Q. Well, in distance, wasn't the front of the car as near to you as from where you are now to where I am standing? I cannot say that."

Respondent testified that she raised her hand to signal the car when she was in the "middle of the street." At one point she testified that the car was then at the end of the safety zone, but further testified as follows:

"Q. Well how close to the line that you were crossing on was the front of this on-coming car when you held up your hand as a signal? A. I cannot say definitely how far it was. I cannot say that because I was in such a hurry.

"Q. Well, without telling us definitely where the front of the car was, tell us about how far it was from you when you put up your hand? Was it as far as from where you are to where I am? A. It was very near, very close."

The "hurry" to which respondent refers so frequently in her testimony bore relation to nothing other than the street car itself. She stated: "Yes, I was in a hurry to take the car." She did not remember whether she saw any one waiting on the safety zone as she crossed, but the uncontradicted testimony shows that there was no one waiting there. When asked whether the headlight was burning on the street car, she answered: "That I cannot say, because I was in a hurry." Replying to whether there were any lights lit on the street car, she said: "I didn't look after that; I was in a hurry." On this subject uncontradicted testimony showed that all lights on the car were lit.

[1, 2] It is true as contended by respondent that the issue of contributory negligence is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury, but there are cases in which it becomes a question of law under the undisputed facts. Brown v. Pacific Electric Railway Company, 167 Cal. 199, 138 P. 1005; Arnold v. San Francisco-Oakland Railways, 175 Cal. 1, 164 P. 798; Larrabee v. Western Pacific Railway Company, 173 Cal. 743, 161 P. 750; Young v. Southern Pacific Company, 189 Cal. 754, 210 P. 259. As was said in Brown v. Pacific Electric Railway Company, supra, at page 205 of 167 Cal., 138 P. 1005, 1007: "While it is true that ordinarily the question of contributory negligence must be left to the jury, we think that this is one of the cases where 'the standard of conduct required of persons under given circumstances is so obvious as to be applicable to all persons under such circumstances.' Hamlin v. Pacific Electric Co., 150 Cal. 779, 89 P. 1109. If Mr. Brown had taken the commonest precautions, the accident would not have occurred. * * *" In the present case respondent's own testimony showed that she did not take any precautions or exercise any care whatsoever. She was at all times aware of the approach of the car, of its speed, and of its proximity. She knew that she was on the "blind side" of the car where no passengers were admitted and knew that the car would stop only for persons waiting on the safety zone. She knew that there was nothing about the manner in which the car approached to indicate that it was stopping, and, to the contrary, testified that she knew that it "came fast the whole time." Having this knowledge she proceeded to run directly into its path, and the unfortunate accident is obviously accounted for by her great hurry to beat the on-coming car as she crossed the track. In our opinion the conclusion that her own negligence was a proximate cause, if not the sole proximate cause of her injuries, follows necessarily and irresistibly from the undisputed facts.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Caryl M. Sheldon, Judge.

Action by A. J. Padgham against the Inyo Marble Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Robert E. Austin and John N. Helmick, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George L. Greer, of Los Angeles (Perry F. Backus, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

Mr. Justice KNIGHT delivered the opinion of the court.

Plaintiff brought this action to recover certain sums of money alleged to be due on several assigned claims against the defendant corporation, one of which was based on a promissory note for $5,000. The trial took place before the court sitting without a jury, and judgment was given in favor of plaintiff on all counts but one, which related to the promissory note. With reference thereto the court found that the note was executed and delivered to R. H. Tune "by the officers of said corporation without authority and that in so executing and delivering said note, they acted in excess of their authority and there was no consideration whatsoever therefor." Accordingly judgment on that count was rendered in favor of defendant, and plaintiff appeals therefrom.

A copy of the note was not set out in the complaint, nor was the original nor a copy thereof produced at the trial, but it appears from the findings that the note was executed and delivered on or about December 31, 1926, that it bore 7 per cent. interest, and provided for the allowance of an attorney's fee in case suit was brought to collect it. The circumstances leading up to the execution and delivery of the note, briefly stated, were as follows: On the date of its execution and for the several months preceding, the plaintiff herein, A. J. Padgham, was the president, and E. D. Rasmussen was the treasurer, of said corporation. R. H. Tune, the payee named in the note, had been its general manager and secretary for several years, but whether or not he occupied either of those positions on the date of or shortly preceding the execution of the note is not clear from the record. A man named Dunn owned the controlling interest in the company, but had held no office therein since 1915. The company had much outstanding indebtedness, and on November 5, 1925, the directors sought to adjust its financial affairs by borrowing money or issuing the notes of the corporation in liquidation or renewal of said indebtedness, and to that end adopted a resolution authorizing and directing "the president or vice president and the secretary or assistant secretary" of the corporation "to issue a note or notes or to borrow money from any private individual, firm, or company or bank for and in the name of this corporation, and on such terms as may be agreed to by said officers, such sum or sums of money as in the judgment of said officers this corporation may require for the purpose of liquidating, renewing, or funding any indebtedness of this corporation now owing and due, provided the aggregate amount of such loans or notes shall not at any time exceed the sum of $10,000"; and the resolution further provided that "said president or vice-president and said secretary or assistant secretary are hereby authorized, directed and empowered to execute in its corporate name for such moneys so borrowed or for such obligations so renewed, extended or refunded, and interest, the note or notes of this corporation, and deliver the same to said respective payees. * * *" The plaintiff herein, A. J. Padgham, as one of the directors of said corporation, was present at the directors' meeting at the time the resolution was passed and voted for its adoption. Shortly after the adoption of the resolution, Dunn, although not an officer of the corporation, prepared and handed to Tune the promissory note in question, which, as stated, was made payable to Tune, and requested the latter to obtain Padgham's signature thereto, which Tune did. Dunn then secured the signature of Rasmussen (the treasurer of the corporation) thereto, and, after leaving the note with Tune for a short while, took it from Tune's desk without having it indorsed by Tune. About a month later Tune saw the note for the last time. It was then on Dunn's desk, and he attempted to take possession of it, but was unable to do so. Shortly after these transactions took place a new directorate and set of officers took control of the corporation and thereafter conducted its affairs. At the time of trial (July, 1928), Dunn was in the penitentiary, and Tune admitted that he, too, had been sent there about the same time; but whether the offenses for which they were committed to prison grew out of the transactions connected with the affairs of said corporation does not appear. Evidence was introduced to show that the note was issued in part payment of money claimed to be due Tune from the corporation for past services, but it would seem that there is a conflict in the evidence as to how much, if anything, was actually due him at the time the note was executed; the accountant who examined the books under the new régime having testified that Tune's account was overdrawn.

[1-3] It is conceded that the sole authorization for the issuance of the note was the resolution above mentioned, no claim being made by plaintiff that any such authority was derived from statute or the by-laws or articles of incorporation of the company; and, as will be observed, by the terms of said resolution, the directors of the company restricted the authority to adjust its indebtedness and to issue notes in liquidation thereof to the "president or vice-president and the secretary or assistant secretary"; and admittedly neither the secretary nor the assistant secretary participated in this transaction, nor did either of them join with the president, as contemplated and directed by the terms of the resolution, in issuing and signing the note in question; the treasurer, Rasmussen, having presumed to do so in their place and stead without any legal authority whatever from the corporation.

As said in Black v. Harrison Home Co., 155 Cal. 121, 99 P. 494, 497: "It is an elementary principle of corporation law that the president of a corporation has no power, merely because he is president, to bind the corporation by contract. The management of the affairs of a corporation is ordinarily in the hands of its board of directors, and the president has only such power as has been given him by the by-laws and by the board of directors, and such other power as may arise from his having assumed and exercised the power in the past with the apparent consent and acquiescence of the corporation. The general rule in this regard is stated in 2 Cook on Corporations, § 716, as follows: "The president of a corporation has no power to buy, sell, or contract for the corporation, nor to control its property, funds, or management. This is a rule which prevails everywhere, excepting possibly in the state of Illinois. * * * It is true that the board of directors may expressly authorize the president to contract; or his authority to contract may arise from his having assumed and exercised that power in the past; or the corporation may ratify his contract or accept the benefits of it, and thereby be bound. But the general rule is that the president cannot act or contract for the corporation any more than any other one director"—citing numerous cases. In that case the validity of a contract for the sale of real estate belonging to the corporation was challenged, and, as here, the directors' resolution authorized the president and secretary to execute the same; but it was executed by the president alone; and in holding that it was unenforceable against the corporation the court said: "The resolution of the board of directors authorized such contracts only when jointly executed by the president and secretary. The president's want of express authority to make either of these contracts on behalf of the corporation is thus affirmatively made to appear." Furthermore, it may be stated as a general rule that promissory notes executed in the name of a corporation by an officer thereof, who has not been authorized by directors' resolution so to do, and who is not clothed with general power to execute the same or other obligations on its behalf, do not bind the corporation. Pauly v. Pauly, 107 Cal. 8, 40 P. 29, 48 Am. St. Rep. 98. Of course, there are a number of exceptions to the foregoing rule, among them being where the corporation has received the proceeds or the benefit of the note, and where, by a course of conduct as outlined in the decisions, it is estopped from setting up non-compliance with corporate by-laws or resolutions; but it is unnecessary to go into those exceptions or discuss them here, because the facts of this particular case do not bring it within any of them. Nor are we to be understood as holding that the note in question would have been unenforceable in the hands of an innocent purchaser, because that situation is not involved. Here, as stated, the note which plaintiff is seeking to enforce against the corporation is one that he executed and delivered himself, as the president of the corporation, in violation of the very terms of the resolution which gave him the only authority to act at all in the matter; and it further appears without dispute that, as one of the directors of the corporation, he was present at the meeting of the board when the resolution was passed, and voted for its adoption. Under such circumstances we are of the opinion that the trial court correctly held that as against him the corporation is not estopped from urging as a defense the irregularity above mentioned, in the issuance and execution of the note. Putnam v. Ensign Oil Co., 272 Pa. 301, 116 A. 285.

[4] Plaintiff seems to attach some importance to a "financial statement" prepared by Tune as general manager of the corporation, which was submitted to and accepted by the old board of directors several weeks after the note in question was executed; but he has failed to refer to any part of the statement showing that the note in question was mentioned therein; and, even though it were mentioned, the transaction relied upon was entirely insufficient as a matter of law to constitute a ratification.

It is well to mention in conclusion that plaintiff has furnished us with no authorities whatever to support his position on the appeal; the very few he has cited involving questions far remote from those with which we are here concerned.

The judgment is affirmed.

YORK, J.

This is an appeal by defendant Soffel from a judgment awarded on two trade acceptances signed by said defendant and held by plaintiff.

*For opinion denying rehearing, see 3 P. (2d) 338.

The points raised by appellant would require a weighing of the evidence by this court. It cannot be said that there was not sufficient evidence to support the findings or that the findings were not sufficient to support the judgment. This is an action brought on two trade acceptances, and the court found that the plaintiff purchased said trade acceptances in the due course of business for value, prior to the maturity thereof; that plaintiff is an innocent purchaser for value of said trade acceptances, and that plaintiff is the holder for value of said trade acceptances.

The fact that the trial court had evidence before it that, at the time the trade acceptances were taken by the bank, the bank had made the statement upon the deposit slip, which was made out at the time the trade acceptances were presented to and accepted by the bank, "We will use our discretion as to sending direct or through intermediary banks for collection acting as your agent only and assuming no responsibility beyond carefulness in selecting such agents," is not conclusive upon the trial court, other evidence having been introduced in reference to the transaction, and sufficient to prove that respondent was the holder of the acceptances by purchase in due course and for value.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action by John Cassetta and another against George Del Frate, William J. Gloria, and Alfred J. Hennessy. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants Gloria and Hennessy appeal.

See, also, 298 P. 55.

Alfred J. Hennessy and William J. Gloria, both of San Francisco, in pro. per.

James F. Brennan, of San Francisco (E. A. McDonald, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiffs employed Mr. Gloria and Mr. Hennessy as their attorneys to prosecute an action in tort for injuries arising from a motor vehicle accident. After the suit was filed, plaintiffs moved for leave to substitute other counsel. Their motion was granted, and Mr. Gloria and Mr. Hennessy appeal upon a bill of exceptions.

The contract of employment was in writing. The parties agreed to pay their counsel 50 per cent. "of all amounts recovered by suit or settlement or compromise and said assignment shall be a lien on any judgment or any amount recovered by judgment or compromise or settlement."

[1] On the strength of this assignment, appellants insist that they have an interest in the subject-matter of the action which prevents their discharge as attorneys under the rule of Gage v. Atwater, 136 Cal. 170, 172, 68 P. 581, and Kirk v. Culley, 202 Cal. 501, 505, 261 P. 994. Their assignment, however, is merely an assignment of the proceeds of the judgment or settlement. As such it creates a lien upon the fund recovered. Hoffman v. Vallejo, 45 Cal. 564, 572; Goad v. Hart, 128 Cal. 197, 201, 61 P. 761, 964; Tracy v. Ringole, 87 Cal. App. 549, 552, 262 P. 73.

[2-5] But a lien upon the judgment does not alone create an interest in the subject-matter of the suit which would entitle the holder to control the litigation (Todd v. Superior Court, 181 Cal. 406, 419, 184 P. 684, 7 A. L. R. 938; Scott v. Superior Court, 205 Cal. 525, 532, 271 P. 906), and it is the interest in the subject-matter which is the controlling factor. The complaint in the main case is not in the record, but it is stated in the bill of exceptions that the action is one for "injuries" received by plaintiffs in an automobile collision. If the action is for personal injuries alone, it is not capable of assignment. Oliver v. Walsh, 6 Cal. 456; Jones v. Manning, 35 Cal. App. 321, 323, 169 P. 912. If it involves damages to property, it might be assigned to that extent. 3 Cal. Jur. 256; Civ. Code, § 954; Stapp v. Madera Canal & Irr. Co., 34 Cal. App. 41, 46, 166 P. 823. If the cause comes within the class of cases "arising out of the violation of a right of property," which are made assignable under the Code section, it was incumbent upon appellant to show that fact. Upon the record before us we must conclude that the interest of appellants under their assignment is therefore an interest in the proceeds collected under their power, and this power is not one "coupled with an interest in the subject of the agency" within the meaning of section 2356, Civil Code. In the absence of such a relation, the client has the absolute right to change his attorney at any stage in the action. Gage v. Atwater, 136 Cal. 170, 172, 68 P. 581; Scott v. Superior Court, 205 Cal. 525, 531, 271 P. 906.

The order is affirmed.

GRIFFIN, Justice pro tem.

Petitioner and decedent intermarried in Chicago, Ill., on the 8th day of February, 1912. He had known decedent and lived in her family a greater portion of the time for more than 33 years prior to the marriage. They took up their residence in California on November 1, 1923, and continued to reside in this state until the death of the decedent, which occurred on August 6, 1928. The bulk of the estate in question was accumulated in Illinois. About $20,000 cash in fees was received by petitioner while he was in California, for legal work that he had partially completed before he came to California. He estimated the proportionate value of his services in the two states to be as follows: $15,000 while he lived in California and $5,000 while living in Illinois; that he received from his law practice from 1911 to the date of his wife's death about $79,000 gross. At the time of the marriage the decedent had property of the approximate value of $2,000; $803 of this sum was in the savings department of the American Trust & Savings Bank of Chicago. The petitioner had two pieces of property in Chicago worth from $2,000 to $5,000; a piece of property on Michigan avenue which in 1912 was worth about $30,000; a law business with modest equipment, and $2,000 in the bank. The decedent, according to the testimony of contestant, operated a hotel of 157 rooms in Chicago from the year 1895 to 1909, which hotel had a gross income of about $50 per day; what the exact net earnings were was not known to the witness; in 1909, decedent divorced her first husband, paying him the sum of $1,000; that there is but one son living, the contestant herein, the issue of the first marriage; that decedent had an account in an amount unknown, in the Greenbaum Sons Bank in Chicago, prior to 1925.

The items set forth in the inventory and appraisal, claimed by respondent to be community property and by contestant claimed to be the separate property of the deceased, are enumerated as follows: (1) Checking account in the name of Roberta Bruggemeyer, in the First National Bank of Monterey Park, Cal., $1,470.45; (2) a savings account in the name of deceased in the Bank of America of California, Redlands branch, $5,000; (3) a savings account in the name of deceased in the Security First National Bank of Los Angeles, Redlands branch, $39,718.30; (4) a checking account in the name of deceased in the Bank of America, Chicago, Ill., $623.43; (5) a promissory note dated "7/15/27," payable to deceased, secured by deed of trust on property in Los Angeles county, Ramona Acres (Steele property), $4,713.75; (6) personal effects, jewelry, and clothing, $675; (7) lot 165, Ramona Acres plat, Los Angeles county $6,000; (8) a contract of sale to Aaron and Anna Rodman, being a portion of lot 165, Ramona Acres, given by Mancha and Roberta Bruggemeyer, which contract of sale was made prior to September 17, 1925, balance due $1,568.13; (9) a contract of sale of a portion of lot 165, Ramona Acres, given by Roberta Bruggemeyer, made subsequent to September 17, 1925 (Reid property), $5,200; (10) a contract of sale of a portion of lot 165, given by Mancha Bruggemeyer and Roberta Bruggemeyer, dated prior to September 17, 1925 (Wilkinson property), the unpaid balance being $4,667, the estate's interest therein being $2,338.50; household furniture therein, $500. Petitioner admits item 11, consisting of three $50 Third Liberty bonds, appraised at $150, and item 12, being sixteen $50 Fourth Liberty bonds, appraised at $527.79, to be the separate property of deceased.

Item 1. This item was placed in this bank in the name of the wife, Roberta Bruggemeyer, by petitioner September 17, 1925, it being the earnings of the petitioner, received while he was engaged in the practice of law in Chicago and brought here by him. The reason assigned by petitioner for placing this money in her account at that time was that Mrs. Bruggemeyer had a stroke of paralysis in 1925, that it affected the right side of her head, that she was laboring under the delusion that he (the petitioner) was seeking to get rid of her; that she would be ejected from the house that she was living in and that she was penniless; that to satisfy her peace of mind petitioner took her over to her banker, and that at that time he drew a deed and handed it to the banker and at the same time deposited the money mentioned in this item in her name, which he took from a joint account of petitioner and his wife. He further testified that he had no intention of giving her the property or this money for the purpose of creating a separate estate for her; that it was done only to ease her mind and to assure her that he was not neglecting her.

Item 2. This item of $5,000 came from a check drawn by Mrs. Bruggemeyer on the Bank of America in Chicago, Ill., and was deposited by petitioner to her account in the Bank of America at Redlands, Cal., January 9, 1928. It was part of a sum of money, to wit, $20,000, that he (the petitioner) placed to her account about May 1, 1925, when they were both back in Chicago on a business trip after they had moved to California. This particular $20,000 was one-half of the proceeds from the sale of Monarch Refrigerator Company's stock that he had sold a day or two before for $40,000. This stock was purchased by him in July, 1919, when he was president of this company, and paid for out of his earnings. The reason assigned by petitioner for this deposit of funds to her account in Illinois was to the effect that he told her (his wife) he had made this deposit to her account, but that he had no intention of making her a gift of it as her separate property, as they never had any separate property, and that, as they were just coming back to California, it seemed the courteous thing to let her know that "they stood in equal partnership in the same," and "that the money would not always stand in his name." He stated further "that he had practiced that before in a limited way."

Item 3. Petitioner testified that this item of $39,718.30 was wholly his earnings from his law practice and earnings from his real estate in Chicago; that it came in her name under the following conditions: The petitioner and Roberta Bruggemeyer had a joint account in the First National Bank of Los Angeles in the sum of $9,897.48, which was transferred to Roberta Bruggemeyer's account December 5, 1925, and on the same day petitioner transferred from the Bank of America of Illinois the balance of the $20,000, to wit, $15,000, that he had received from the sale of his Monarch Refrigerator Company stock and deposited this in her account. A few days after this he then deposited the proceeds from the sale of two Liberty bonds of his in her account, making a sum total of about $25,500. The interest that accumulated over this period was added to it; no further explanation was made as to the source of the balance in the account. The reason assigned by the petitioner for this transfer was similar to the reasons above stated, but, adding that on this particular day, and for some days prior, she (Mrs. Bruggemeyer) was in a very bad way (in a sense she was worrying); that he told her that the money he received from that stock he would put in her name so that she would never have anything to worry about. Petitioner further testified that in her (Mrs. Bruggemeyer's) last days, that is, the last three years of her life, she had hallucinations, some of which were that he was consorting with other women; that these other women were polluting petitioner and were robbing her; that she was "broke" and petitioner had all the money; that petitioner was trying to get rid of her; that petitioner's dirty women had been on the porch, and that it was too filthy for her to use. Petitioner was compelled to tear out the entire cement porch, steps, and brick columns and put in a different colored porch, before she would be willing to sit in the swing on the porch. Petitioner further testified that in the transfer of this account, the deposit of the proceeds of the Liberty bonds, and the transfer of the account from Illinois, he did not at any time intend to make her a gift, or that it should become her separate property or estate; that her condition was so appealing to his own mentality that he was seeking to ease her mind; that he did not believe that he was divesting himself of the money, by placing the same in her name instead of either his name or their names.

Item 4. This item, in the sum of $623.43, petitioner testified was accumulated interest from the deposit petitioner made from his funds, the proceeds of the sale of the Monarch Refrigerator Company stock, which was placed in the account of Mrs. Bruggemeyer in May, 1925.

Items 5 and 6. Regarding these items petitioner testified that he purchased the real property, lot 165 of Ramona Acres, in April, 1923, for the sum of $10,500 from his earnings as a lawyer. This money was withdrawn from petitioner's account in the Greenbaum & Sons Bank, now called the Central Trust Company, in Chicago. Title to the real property was held in joint tenancy with petitioner's wife. Houses were built upon it and rented, the money deposited in their joint account, the cost of building being paid from petitioner's $20,000 he received from the sale of his Monarch Refrigerator Company stock. The trust deed was taken back in the name of Mrs. Bruggemeyer for convenience sake only, as he was in the east on business a portion of the time and that he had no intention of giving her the trust deed or the fruits thereof as her separate property.

Items 7, 8, and 9. These items were contracts of sale of a portion of this Ramona Acres executed and delivered under about the same conditions and circumstances as above related, with the express intent that they should not operate as a gift or be considered to be the separate property of deceased.

All of the title of Mancha Bruggemeyer to the above described tract was on the 17th day of September, 1925, by grant deed conveyed to Roberta P. Bruggemeyer, his wife. Petitioner gives as his reasons for this transfer that Mrs. Bruggemeyer's condition in September of that year was perhaps as bad as at any time in her life; that she was saying that petitioner was trying to get rid of her; that she had no place to go, and that petitioner was going to put her out; that as a result of this petitioner took her to her banker and made the deed of this property to her to satisfy her peace of mind only, and that he had no intention of making a gift of this property to her as her separate estate.

Dr. Sweeney, manager of the Security First National Bank, testified that petitioner transferred the funds to the account of his wife, and that there was some conversation about the fact that petitioner wanted her to feel perfectly happy and contented, and if she was worried or annoyed about it petitioner would transfer to her name certain sums of money, $10,000 or $15,000 from some other bank, as well as the real property above mentioned.

Dr. John A. Morande, a physician personally acquainted with Mrs. Bruggemeyer, treated her from 1925 until her death. He testified that she had a severe cerebral hemorrhage some time before he saw her in 1925; that he then considered her a mental case; that she had hallucinations and falsely believed that her husband was keeping company with other women; that on one occasion she stated: "Well, I have got him now where I want him—I have got all this (money and property) in my possession now"; that she seemed to get better after she had been satisfied of the transfer of the property, but he did not think she was ever really rational; that he called in a Dr. Bishop, who handles mental cases, and he thought he would have to take her to a sanitarium. Dr. E. J. Eytinge corroborated the testimony of Dr. Morande and petitioner as to her mental and physical condition and as to her peculiar characteristics and hallucinations. He testified that he had often heard petitioner try to make Mrs. Bruggemeyer agree with him that she should eat certain foods and take some medicine or have a nurse, and he would do his best to argue her into his point of view, but that it never worked.

The evidence discloses that petitioner, within three weeks after the death of deceased, conceived the idea of erecting a monument to the memory of his departed wife and accordingly contracted for and erected a public library and denominated it the "Bruggemeyer Memorial" and presented it to the city of Monterey Park, where his wife died; that the expenses were paid from the funds of the estate by the executor, Mancha Bruggemeyer, without an order of court or being directed to do so by the will. That the contestant herein did examine the plans and specifications and take some part in the preparation for the dedication of the library is admitted, but he was not aware of the source from which payment was to be made. The trial court found that the property, real, personal, and mixed, that the deceased Roberta Pauline Bruggemeyer may have had at the time of her marriage to petitioner had been either expended and used up, or had been so commingled with the property acquired by the said Mancha Bruggemeyer and his wife after their marriage that the same can no longer be identified; that all the property standing in the name of Roberta Pauline Bruggemeyer at the time of her death is directly traceable to and was derived from the earnings and efforts of the said Mancha Bruggemeyer excepting some personal effects and Liberty bonds of the total value of about $1,500; that, with no intention of making a gift, but solely to counteract the vagaries and hallucinations of deceased, Mancha Bruggemeyer transferred into the name of said Roberta Bruggemeyer all of the property set forth in the inventory, except that portion above mentioned, found to be her separate property; that the remaining portion of the property mentioned in the inventory is and was community property; that the expenses of administration, burial, and last illness of deceased (without taking into consideration any of the moneys expended on the memorial library) exceeded the value of the separate property of the decedent which was expended for this purpose; that the contestant is only entitled to his share of the separate property and only entitled to question the correctness, validity, and propriety of the executor's account in connection therewith; that it is not true that the entire estate of said decedent or any portion thereof was acquired by said decedent as her separate property in the state of Illinois or that said property came into the state of California impressed with the character of her separate property.

1. Contestant claims that the trial court erred in finding that the property inventoried in the estate was community property, there being no sufficient evidence upon which the trial court could or should have made such a finding.

2. Contestant claims that, even if said property should appear to the court to be community property, one-half thereof has by said testatrix been taken out of the category of community property by the will of said decedent and should be distributed to the contestant under section 1307 of the Civil Code.

3. Contestant further claims that the entire estate of said decedent was acquired by said decedent in the state of Illinois, where the law of community property, so called, does not prevail, and that said property was, in the state of Illinois, the absolute property of said decedent, and that said property came to the state of California impressed with the character which it bore in the state of Illinois, and is therefore, in California, the separate property of said decedent. Contestant objects to the approval of the final account of executor for the reason that it appears by said account that the executor, without previous authority of court or by specific direction in the will of deceased so to do, has expended as part of the expenses of administration, to the prejudice of contestant, the sum of $33,294.71, for the purpose of erecting a monument or memorial to the deceased in the form of a public library; that said expenditure is disproportionate to the value of the entire estate, which is appraised at $68,485.33, and asks that said sum be disallowed in said account.

[1, 2] Respondent contends that he is authorized under the general provisions of the law to make such expenditure, and that it was and should be a proper charge of administration against the estate; that the contestant is estopped from contesting this item in the account by reason of his participation in the erection of the monument. An executor may erect a monument, such as a pillar, statue, shaft, or any other structure placed over a tomb or grave, if the cost of same is reasonable and does not exceed such sum as may, upon a consideration of all of the circumstances, including the station of the deceased and the value of her estate, be found to be proper and reasonable, but an executor, as such, without express authority so to do by will, has no right to erect a public library as a monument to the memory of his deceased wife, donate it to a city, and charge the expense of erecting same to the estate as a part of the funeral expense. Fancher v. Fancher, 156 Cal. 13, 103 P. 206, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 944, 19 Ann. Cas. 1157; 12 Cal. Juris. 88; Estate of Lucy Weringer, Deceased, 100 Cal. 345, 34 P. 825.

[3] Independent of objections urged by any person to items in the account of an executor, it is the duty of the court, especially where the item is brought to the attention of the court in settling the account, to carefully scrutinize the same and to reject any improper items therefrom, whether objections are interposed or not. Estate of Willey, 140 Cal. 238, 73 P. 998; 12 Cal. Juris. 56.

[4] Where a wife makes a will in general terms, disposing of her interest in community property, which property was acquired before the amendment of section 1401 of the Civil Code in 1923, such a testamentary disposition does not destroy the operation of the statute relating to the disposition of community property upon the death of the wife under said section. McKay v. Lauriston, 204 Cal. 557, 269 P. 519.

Whether the court, under the evidence and the law applicable thereto, can rightfully find that the personal property above designated to be community property, is a question that requires some consideration, in view of the amendment of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 827) to section 164, Civil Code, of this state and its subsequent amendment in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 746), which subsequent amendment reads as follows: "All other property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife, or both, including real property situated in this state, and personal property wherever situated, heretofore or hereafter acquired while domiciled elsewhere, which would not have been the separate property of either if acquired while domiciled in this state, is community property, * * *" and the construction the courts have placed on these amendments as to their effect on property brought into this state from another state where the so-called community property law does not exist.

In Estate of Drishaus, 199 Cal. 369, 249 P. 515, it was held, in so far as the amendment of 1923 was concerned, that the amendment to section 164 of the Civil Code adding the words "heretofore or hereafter" is not to be given retroactive effect so as to injuriously affect the rights of a husband in respect to his separate property owned and brought to this state in 1916 prior to the adoption of said amendment; and his vested interest in personal property brought to this state in 1916 prior to said amendment and which was his separate property under the laws of a state in which it was acquired is unaffected by said amendment. And at page 371 of 199 Cal., 249 P. 515, 516, the court held: "The effect of the amendment, if valid, would be to render the personal property of the decedent, acquired prior to the taking effect of the amendment and while a resident of the state of Nebraska, community property, and as such subject to the laws of this state declaring the status of husband and wife with relation to the community property during the period of their residence in this state prior to the husband's death. The property of the decedent herein acquired by him in and under the laws of the state of Nebraska prior to the date when he became a resident of California, and having been under the laws of the state of Nebraska his separate property, continued to be such when the decedent became a resident of this state in the year 1916, in conformity with the well-settled rule upon that subject set forth in the following uniform line of decisions: Kraemer v. Kraemer, 52 Cal. 302; Estate of Burrows, 136 Cal. 113, 68 P. 488; Estate of Niccolls, 164 Cal. 368, 129 P. 278; Estate of Warner, 167 Cal. 686, 140 P. 583; Estate of Boselly, 178 Cal. 715, 175 P. 4; Estate of Arms, 186 Cal. 554, 199 P. 1053; Estate of Frees, 187 Cal. 150, 201 P. 112."

The last case cited has reference to a case wherein a decedent, who had acquired certain property in the state of Wisconsin which was separate property under the laws of that state, had subsequently removed to Illinois (which is the state from which some of the funds in the case before us were acquired), and under the laws of which state, also, personal property acquired by a decedent during his marriage would constitute his separate property, and had thereafter, in the year 1910, removed to California, where with his wife he had resided until his death in the year 1920. This court had, therefore, before it the question as to the effect of the amendment to the Civil Code made in the year 1917, as to whether by reason of said amendment to the Code the property had become community property. The court, in determining that question, considered two propositions: (1) As to whether said amendment of the Civil Code made in 1917 (which read in part as follows: "Including real property situated in this state, and personal property wherever situated, acquired while domiciled elsewhere, which would not have been the separate property of either if acquired while domiciled in this state") would be constitutional in so far as it was attempted by the Legislature thereby to convert the property of the husband which had theretofore been separate property into community property; (2) as to whether the statute of 1917 should or could be given retroactive effect.

In considering these propositions this court held that under the decisions of Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 48 P. 223, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170, the amendments to sections 164, 172, and 172a of the Civil Code adopted in 1917 (St. 1917, pp. 827, 829) were not to be given retroactive effect so as to injuriously affect the vested rights of the husband in respect to his separate property owned by him prior to said amendment to the Code. So may it be said of the amendment of 1923 amending section 164, Civil Code, in so far as it applies to property acquired before, and the character of the property determined prior to the adoption of the amendment. Whether all of the money which was brought to California was accumulated in Illinois by decedent before or after the adoption of this amendment in 1917 is not clear from the evidence before us. The trial court has found it to be community property. (If this amendment of 1917 is valid and does apply, then practically all of said personal property brought into the state by the petitioner would have been community property.) If said law is not valid and does not apply, practically the entire balance, being the earnings of petitioner acquired in the state of Illinois and standing in his name, would be his separate property when brought here.

Adopting either view of it, contestant herein would not be benefited, nor would he be entitled to participate in the proceeds of the estate unless petitioner, by his subsequent act, has made a gift of this property to his wife and by reason thereof it became her separate property.

[5] It is true that section 164, Civil Code, p. 746, reads: "But whenever any real or personal property, or any interest therein or encumbrance thereon, is acquired by a married woman by an instrument in writing the presumption is that the same is her separate property, and if acquired by such married woman and her husband, or by her and any other person, the presumption is that she takes the part acquired by her, as tenant in common, unless a different intention is expressed in the instrument; and the presumptions in this section mentioned are conclusive in favor of a purchaser, encumbrancer, payor, or any other person dealing with such married woman, in good faith and for a valuable consideration."

The presumption herein referred to is a disputable presumption and may be overcome by competent evidence. Vandevort v. Godfrey, 58 Cal. App. 578, 208 P. 1017.

In Bare v. Parker, 51 Cal. App. 106, 108, 196 P. 280, the court said: "In affairs matrimonial, such as this, men are often moved to action by the prompting of emotion or sentiment, or even by considerations of domestic policy. To relate all the operating causes that influenced human conduct long after the passing of the occasion, with varying attending circumstances, is quite difficult for the average person. The rigid rules of logic, properly applied in an effort to explain conduct in ordinary business transactions, are often unsatisfactory aids in divining motives that may have influenced matrimonial conduct. For this reason, all other things being equal, careful consideration must be given to the testimony of the survivor of the marriage, who, perhaps, alone has knowledge of the secret understanding of marital purposes and intentions. The credibility of the witness, however, is subject to the test of the general rules of evidence. It has been held that title placed in the wife's name, with no intention of making a gift to her of the property, but merely for the purposes of pleasing her, is sufficient to rebut the presumption prescribed by section 164, Civil Code"—citing Fulkerson v. Stiles, 156 Cal. 703, 105 P. 966, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 181.

[6] The trial court found that the transfer of all of the property above mentioned was not intended as a gift. We believe that the evidence amply justifies this finding. Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 104 P. 308; Estate of Jolly, 196 Cal. 547, 238 P. 353; Estate of Nickson, 187 Cal. 603, 203 P. 106.

The evidence establishes as a fact that there was the item of about $20,000 in money which was received through the sale of petitioner's stock and was placed to the account of the wife, not as a gift, but under conditions as heretofore related, after petitioner and his wife became residents of the state of California.

Respondent relies upon section 946 of the Civil Code, which provides that, "if there is no law to the contrary, in the place where personal property is situated, it is deemed to follow the person of its owner, and is governed by the law of his domicile," and that, independently of the statute of 1917, personal property in Illinois acquired by a married man, by his efforts, should be treated as community property where he was domiciled in California at the time of its acquisition and vice versa. 5 Cal. Jur. § 6, p. 280, and cases cited. We find that the trial court has found adversely to respondent, defeating his contention that the property was acquired while petitioner and his wife were residents of the state of California and therefore was community. It held that deceased never acquired the money as her separate estate as a gift from her husband; therefore it remained the separate property of the husband under the law of the state of Illinois; he acquired it through the sale of his stock, which said stock was acquired by him during the month of July, 1919, by his private earnings while residing in Illinois.

We are of the opinion that the evidence in this case establishes as a fact beyond dispute that the bulk of the property above listed and ordered distributed in the decree of distribution was the separate property of the husband and is directly traceable to his earnings in Illinois, which were brought to this state by him.

[7] Under the laws of the state of Illinois, Estate of Arms, 186 Cal. 554, at page 563, 199 P. 1053, all of this property acquired in the state of Illinois would have been the separate property of the husband when brought to this state and would remain such, notwithstanding the provisions of section 164 of the Civil Code as amended in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 827), and its subsequent amendment in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 746). In so far as said amendments attempt to change the character of personal property acquired by either husband or wife, or both, while domiciled in another state, when by the laws of the other state it would be their separate property, said amendments are ineffectual and do not convert that particular property into community property when subsequently brought to this state, and when the owner becomes a resident of California.

We are of the opinion that the authorities above cited sufficiently justify the reasons for this holding without restatement of them at length in this decision.

Therefore the finding of the trial court that all of the property above mentioned was the community property of petitioner and the deceased must be reversed to exclude from consideration in the probate proceedings of the deceased wife's estate such portions of the property as is the petitioner's separate property, it being no part of the estate and not subject to distribution thereunder. There is ample evidence to support the finding that the property above mentioned was and is not the separate property of the deceased.

Therefore the decree of distribution is reversed and the case remanded for appropriate proceedings. That portion of the order of the trial court approving and settling the final account allowing the item of $33,294.71 as a proper charge against the estate is reversed.

HARMON et al. v. HOPKINS.

Civ. 451.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.

Aug. 19, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 17, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 15, 1931.

1. Jury ☞9.

No one may be deprived of constitutional right to jury trial except in manner provided in Constitution and laws passed in pursuance thereof (Code Civ. Proc. § 631, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1929, p. 851, § 1; Const. art. 1, § 7).

2. Jury ☞28(1).

Under Constitution, Legislature may determine acts or omissions which shall deprive litigant in civil action of trial by jury (Code Civ. Proc. § 631, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1929, p. 851, § 1; Const. art. 1, § 7).

3. Jury ☞26.

Phrase "day set for trial," as used in statutes regarding waiver of jury trial by failing to file jury fee, means first date fixed for trial, of which parties have been duly notified (Code Civ. Proc. § 631, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1929, p. 851, § 1; Const. art. 1, § 7).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Day of Trial," see Words and Phrases.]

4. Jury ☞26.

"Within" as used in statute providing for waiver of jury trial by failing to deposit jury fee within ten days prior to date set for trial means "not later than" or "at any time not less than" (Code Civ. Proc. § 631, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1929, p. 851, § 1; Const. art. 1, § 7).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Within," see Words and Phrases.]

5. Jury ☞26.

Plaintiff, by depositing jury fee only six days before first date set for trial, waived jury trial, notwithstanding case was reset and tried at later date (Code Civ. Proc. § 631, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1929, p. 851, § 1; Const. art. 1, § 7).

6. Appeal and error ☞949.

Court's discretion in refusing to submit case to jury, where plaintiff failed timely to deposit jury fee, will not be disturbed, unless grossly abused.

7. Jury ☞26.

Where plaintiff failed to deposit jury fee within proper time, court's refusal to submit case to jury held not abuse of discretion (Code Civ. Proc. § 631, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1929, p. 851, § 1; Const. art. 1, § 7).

This was so, although fee had actually been paid and jury was present when case was called.

8. Appeal and error ☞1031(1).

Prejudice will not be presumed because issues of fact were tried by court instead of jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Charles C. Haines, Judge.

Action by F. W. Harmon and another against Isabel Morrison Hopkins. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Carlton D. Dethlefsen, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Wright & McKee, and C. M. Monroe, all of San Diego, for respondent.

FINNEY, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by plaintiffs from a judgment in favor of the defendant, rendered by the court sitting without a jury, in a trial held after plaintiffs' demand for a jury trial had been denied.

This appeal presents just one question, viz., Did the court err in denying plaintiffs' demand for a jury trial?

On March 21, 1929, the attorney for the plaintiffs wrote the clerk of San Diego county asking if it was necessary to make a deposit for jury fees at the time of filing the memorandum of motion to set this cause for trial, and on March 25 received from the clerk a reply stating that $36 must be deposited as jury fees at least six days prior to the date of the trial. This was the rule in San Diego county prior to the amendment to section 631 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which went into effect in August, 1929. Under rule V, adopted by the judicial council, the Superior Court of San Diego county has a "Civil Active List" and a "Civil Trial List" of cases pending for trial, and by inadvertence this cause was set on the "Civil Trial List" on October 10, 1929, but no notice of this setting was ever served upon the plaintiffs or their attorney. By consent of plaintiffs the case went over and was again set on the "Civil Trial List," for trial on November 25, 1929, and notice of the setting was served upon plaintiffs' attorney on November 5, 1929. It was inconvenient for plaintiffs' attorney to try the case on November 25, and an effort was made by defendant's attorneys, for his accommodation, to have the case removed from the "Civil Trial List" and reset at the first call of the calendar in December. This request for removal was refused by the presiding judge and the case continued on the "Civil Trial List" for trial until November 27—two days after it should have been tried—when it was again reset for trial on December 18, 1929, on which latter date it was tried and judgment rendered for the defendant by the court sitting without a jury, after plaintiffs' demand for a jury trial had been denied, although a jury was present and available for the trial at that time.

On November 19, 1929, plaintiffs' attorney wired to the county clerk of San Diego county, inquiring the amount necessary to be deposited as jury fees in this case, and on the same date received a reply that the jury fees were $24, but that it was too late to make the deposit. However, on the same date, November 19, 1929, the jury fees in the sum of $24 were deposited in this case by the plaintiffs and were received and accepted by the county clerk.

Article 1, § 7, of the Constitution, which relates to the matter of jury trials, so far as material here, reads as follows: "The right of trial by jury shall be secured to all, and remain inviolate. * * * A trial by jury may be waived * * * in civil actions by the consent of the parties, signified in such manner as may be prescribed by law."

And section 631, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 851, § 1), relating to waiver of jury trials in civil cases, and in force at the time in question, so far as here involved, reads as follows, to wit:

"Trial by jury may be waived by the several parties to an issue of fact in manner following: * * *

"5. By failing to deposit with the clerk, within ten days prior to the date set for trial, a sum equal to the amount of one (1) day's jury fees payable under the law."

[1-5] The right of trial by jury is a constitutional right, and no one may be deprived thereof except in the manner provided in the Constitution of this state and laws passed in pursuance thereof. The Constitution, under the provision above quoted, has delegated to the Legislature the power to determine what acts or omissions shall deprive a litigant in a civil action of a trial by jury, and in section 631, Code of Civil Procedure, above quoted, the Legislature has defined these acts and omissions. Subdivision 5 of this section of this Code has not been judicially construed by the Appellate or Supreme Court, so far as we are aware, but a construction has been placed upon it by the bench and bar, in operating under it, wherein said subdivision is commonly understood to require a deposit of the jury fee to be made with the clerk of the court, not less than ten days before the day set for the trial of the action, or a jury trial will be waived, and of course the "day set for trial" means the first date fixed for the trial, of which the parties have been duly notified. We think, undoubtedly, this is the true and correct construction of subdivision 5 of this section. While appellants contend that the word "within" as used in the phrase "within ten days prior to the date set for trial," in subdivision 5, is equivocal and may be interpreted to mean "at any time less than ten days prior to the date of trial," we do not regard this contention as having any merit, when we consider the connection in which the word is used and the purpose to be served by this provision of the Code. One important purpose of the provision is to make certain that there will be time to call the jury after the deposit of the jury fee had been made and that the jury fee will be available when required. Such a provision is necessary to enable the court to conduct its business without delay and in an orderly manner. The word "within" as used in the phrase above quoted means "not later than" or "at any time not less than," and the phrase so interpreted would read "not less than ten days prior to the date set for trial" or "at any time not less than ten days prior to the date set for trial." The word "within" has been so construed by this court when used in a similar connection, and such construction must be adopted here. Royal Grocery Co. v. Oliver, 57 Cal. App. 278, 207 P. 61. The jury fee in this case was deposited only six days prior to the first date set for the trial, and it is, therefore, plain that appellants, under the Code section referred to, waived a jury trial by failure to make the deposit four days earlier, that is to say, ten days prior to the first date set for trial, of which they had been duly notified. The fact that the case was reset for trial and tried at a later date is immaterial, and has no bearing on the point under consideration, if we are to give effect to the plain meaning of the language used in subdivision 5 of section 631, Code of Civil Procedure, and the purpose for which it was enacted.

[6-8] Appellants urge that, even if there was a waiver of a jury trial, by failure to deposit the fees within ten days prior to the date set for trial, it was an abuse of discretion, on the part of the court, to refuse to submit the case for trial to the jury, inasmuch as the jury fee had actually been paid, and the jury was present when the case was called for trial, and it would have involved no delay in the proceedings of the court.

It is probably true that the court had the right, notwithstanding such waiver, to submit the case to trial by jury, if he had chosen to do so (Doll v. Anderson, 27 Cal. 249), but the court has a discretion in the matter, and its order refusing to submit the case to a jury will not be disturbed, when no gross abuse of discretion appears (Ferreira v. Chabot, 121 Cal. 233, 53 P. 689, 1092). Appellants have not attempted to point out wherein they have suffered any injury or prejudice by reason of the trial by the court instead of the jury. Their only complaint on this appeal is "the trial court erred in denying plaintiffs a jury trial." Prejudice will not be presumed as a consequence of the issues of fact, in a case being tried by the court instead of the jury. On the contrary, the presumption is that the appellants have enjoyed the benefit of a fair and impartial trial, according to the usual modes of procedure under the Constitution and laws of this state. Clearly, the appellants have failed to show any prejudice or other error on the part of the court which would justify a reversal of the case.

Accordingly, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WILLISON.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 18, 1931.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 17, 1931.

1. Burglary ⇨42(3).

Possession of stolen property, together with other evidence, including admissions by defendant that he had taken some of stolen articles from owners' houses, justified burglary conviction.

2. Criminal law ⇨1202(3).

In burglary prosecutions, evidence held insufficient to justify finding of prior convictions, state having failed adequately to identify defendant with former prisoners.

3. Jury ⇨31(11).

Jury trying not guilty plea in burglary prosecutions could also properly try plea of not guilty because of insanity (Pen. Code, § 1026).

4. Criminal law ⇨1201.

Statute regulating imprisonment on fourth conviction of felony is constitutional (Pen. Code, § 644).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William T. Aggeler, Judge.

J. J. Willison was convicted of burglary, together with prior convictions, as charged in two actions which were consolidated for trial, and he prosecutes appeals.

Judgment modified, and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial affirmed in part and reversed in part, and cause remanded.

Superseding opinion in 296 P. 644.

John F. Groene, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J.

These appeals include two actions which were consolidated for trial. In action 42098 the defendant was accused of burglary committed on September 12, 1930, at the house of one Katayama in the city of Arcadia. In said action it was further charged that before the commission of said offense the defendant on May 11, 1925, was convicted of burglary in the county of Los Angeles; and in April, 1911, was convicted of grand larceny in Sonoma county, and in April, 1908, was convicted of petit larceny with prior conviction in the county of Alameda; and for each of said offenses served a term of imprisonment in a penal institution. In action 42179 defendant was accused of the crime of burglary committed on September 13, 1930, at the house of one Vanderbeck in the city of Pomona.

[1] The points on appeal, as stated in the brief for appellant, are substantially as follows: First. That the evidence is not sufficient to justify the verdict in either one of the two actions in this, that the evidence shows merely that the defendant was found in possession of certain stolen property, but that this evidence was not accompanied by other and additional evidence sufficient to support the verdict. Appellant seeks to have applied to this case the rule that possession of stolen property, the fruits of a burglary, is a circumstance tending to show guilt, but is not sufficient alone to justify a conviction. An examination of the record discloses testimony of admissions made by the defendant that he had taken some of the stolen clothing from the house of Katayama, and also that he had taken some of the stolen articles from the house of Vanderbeck. There is also evidence tending to prove that certain explanations made by the defendant, concerning the sources from which he had obtained possession of the stolen articles, were false.

The second point is that no entry was shown in either case. The record shows that in each case the house was locked when the owner went away for a temporary absence, and upon the owner's return the house was found broken open, and articles of personal property had been removed. It was made very clear in each instance that a burglary had been committed by some one, and the circumstances were sufficient to justify the jury's finding that the defendant was the guilty person.

[2] Under points 3 and 4 it is claimed that the evidence was not sufficient to justify the finding of prior conviction in the county of Alameda and of prior conviction in the county of Sonoma, to which we have referred. In the case from Alameda county, the judgment was rendered against one James Mallek. The witness Metcalf, for many years an employee in the prison at San Quentin, identified the defendant herein as being the same person whom he knew in the prison as Tony Mallach. There is, however, a total absence of evidence that the person known to the witness as Tony Mallach was the same person named as defendant in the prison commitment issued against James Mallek.

The witness Metcalf further testified that, after being in prison under the name of Tony Mallach, the defendant came in again as a prisoner under the name of Powers, whose first name, according to this witness, was either John or George. Metcalf recognized the defendant here as the man whom he had known in the prison as Powers. The witness produced in evidence the prison commitment of Powers, whose prison number was 25040. The defendant named in this commitment was not George or John Powers, but was Edward Powers. There is no evidence that, while the defendant was in prison and known by the name of George Powers, he was being held there under the commitment issued against a defendant named Edward Powers. It may be that these defects in the record are the result of carelessness in the introduction of the evidence. But, where the state completely fails to produce any evidence of an essential fact, defendant is entitled to the benefit of the record thus made.

The fifth point assigns error in the giving of an instruction concerning possession of stolen property as a circumstance tending to show guilt. The decision in People v. Brown, 71 Cal. App. 181, 192, 235 P. 72, and other decisions there cited, are sufficient authority to sustain the said challenged instruction in the present case.

[3] Under point 6, appellant claims that the court erred in overruling defendant's motion that the issue of insanity, under his plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, be tried before another jury, and not by the jury which had passed upon the plea of not guilty. There is no merit in this contention. Pen. Code, § 1026; People v. Leong Fook, 206 Cal. 64, 273 P. 779; People v. Troche, 206 Cal. 35, 273 P. 767; People v. Davis, 94 Cal. App. 192, 270 P. 715.

[4] Finally, appellant contends that the provisions of section 644, Penal Code, concerning the term of imprisonment prescribed in the case of a felony conviction of a person who has been previously three times convicted of felony, are unconstitutional for various stated reasons. The principles which underlie legislation affecting the penalties to be inflicted upon habitual criminals were discussed by the Supreme Court of California in the case entitled In re Rosencrantz, 205 Cal. 534, 271 P. 902. The validity of section 644 of the Penal Code was therein sustained as against several forcefully presented grounds of objection thereto. The present appellant has not offered any more substantial reason for determining that said section is unconstitutional than were the contentions made by the petitioner in the Rosencrantz Case, and we conclude that there is no merit in the contention here made.

The judgment of the court is modified. The order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, in so far as said motion is related to the alleged prior convictions in the superior court of the county of Sonoma and in the superior court of the county of Alameda, and as to those matters only, is reversed, and, as to all other matters and issues of the case, the said order is affirmed. Upon completion of the disposal, by new trial or otherwise, of said issues relating to former convictions in the county of Alameda and in the county of Sonoma, the trial court is directed to pronounce and enter judgment against the defendant, as prescribed by law. For the purposes hereinabove stated, the cause is remanded to said trial court.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 12, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 9, 1931.

1. Evidence ☞75.

That railroad produced no evidence contradicting that of injured switch tender respecting his duties afforded strong presumption that evidence within its control as to true situation, if produced, would have been unfavorable to railroad (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 6, and § 2061, subds. 6, 7).

2. Negligence ☞124(3).

Upon issue of negligence in performance or omission of act, evidence of ordinary practice and custom is competent.

3. Master and servant ☞101, 102(1).

Master must furnish servants reasonably safe instrumentalities and work place.

4. Master and servant ☞231(1).

Servant has right to assume that master furnished reasonably safe instrumentalities and place.

5. Master and servant ☞286(14).

Whether switch tender, injured when lever was jerked out of hand, was furnished reasonably safe instrumentalities and place to work, held for jury (Federal Employers' Liability Act [45 USCA §§ 51-59]).

Evidence for plaintiff tended to show that when he was attempting to operate switch he was thrown and injured, which was due to fact that lever was jerked out of his hand as result of switch having been blocked by engine sand that had been permitted to run into switch by railroad yard engine which had passed over switch short time before accident. There was engine oil upon iron plate upon which switch tender was required to stand when operating lever, and, according to plaintiff's evidence, he could not see oil because of darkness and it was not his duty to keep platform clean.

6. Master and servant ⇨286(14).

In action by injured switch tender, whether fellow servants' permitting switch engine to deposit sand in switch, and permitting oil on lever platform, was negligence, held for jury (Federal Employers' Liability Act [45 USCA §§ 51-59]).

7. Master and servant ⇨262(3).

Assumption of risk, whether ordinary risk or extraordinary hazard caused by master's negligence, must be pleaded.

8. Master and servant ⇨265(13).

To show assumption of risk, master must show that danger was so obvious that servant knew and appreciated, or must be charged with knowledge and appreciation of, hazard.

9. Appeal and error ⇨999(3).

Master and servant ⇨288(3).

Whether switch tender, injured when throwing lever because of sand blocking switch and oil on platform causing him to fall, assumed risk, held for jury, whose decision was conclusive (Federal Employers' Liability Act [45 USCA §§ 51-59]).

10. Trial ⇨296(1).

Omissions or inaccuracies in instruction are cured if supplied by others, and if jury were fairly and consistently instructed generally.

11. Damages ⇨132(3).

$25,000 to 34 year old railroad switch tender for serious and permanent spinal and back injuries preventing physical work held not excessive.

Evidence favorable to injured plaintiff tended to show that, at time of accident, he was 34 years old and had life expectancy of 32.5 years and earning capacity of $175 monthly; that, at time of trial, two years after accident, plaintiff was still incapacitated from performing any work; that he had chronic, permanent disability in lower part of back, the sacroiliac joint, and lumbar spine; that subluxation in sacroiliac joint was on its right side; that spondylolisthetic condition was permanent; and that he had not been able since accident, and would not be able in future, to do any physical work.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by George Thomas against the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Paul Blackwood, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MURPHEY, Justice pro tem.

In this action respondent seeks to recover damages against appellant for personal injuries sustained by him while employed by appellant in interstate commerce as a switch tender, which position he had occupied in the Los Angeles yards for approximately three years before the accident. During the course of a night's work, his duty required him to throw about thirty switches. In throwing a switch, the operator stands on an iron plate approximately twenty inches wide and forty feet long. The switches are thrown by a lever set into and level with the plate or platform on which the operator stands. In order to reach the lever, the operator stoops, releases a safety catch with one hand, and takes hold of the lever with the other, raising it to make the throw of the switch points. The lever weighs fifteen or twenty pounds and requires considerable pressure to operate it. One operation of the lever throws eight switch points, each about fifteen feet long, and the total weight of equipment operated by one swing of the lever runs into tons.

At 11:30 o'clock on the night of the accident, when respondent came on duty, the switch was in good condition and was thrown by him six or eight times prior to the accident. On two of these occasions, about twenty or twenty-five minutes before the accident, the switch was thrown for the particular yard engine claimed to have deposited the sand, which caused the accident, in the switch points, and on these occasions it worked all right. At the time of the accident, respondent was attempting to operate the switch again and claims to have been thrown and injured, due to the lever being jerked out of his hand, as a result of the switch having been blocked by engine sand that had been permitted to run into it by appellant's yard engine above mentioned, which engine had stopped over the switch a short time before the accident. The facts of the case, so far as the happening of the accident is concerned, are substantially conceded to be as above set forth. There is some disagreement as to whether any duty devolved upon the plaintiff to perform any other service than that of throwing switches. It may be conservatively said, however, that there is an abundance of evidence to support the finding that such was his sole duty, and the full extent of his responsibilities as an employee of the defendant. The plaintiff was seriously injured as the result of his original unsuccessful effort to throw the switch point. There is ample evidence in the record to sustain this statement of fact, but in addition to the record evidence, the trial judge and jurors were taken to the scene of the accident on the afternoon of the first day's trial, where a personal inspection was made of the physical condition prevailing at that point, and experiments were made, by employees of the defendant and one of the jurors, in operating the switches.

So far as the negligence phase of the case is concerned, the only defense available to the defendant is that, with respect to the happening of the accident, the admitted facts do not measure up to the legal standards of actionable negligence. An examination of the authorities, we are satisfied, can leave little doubt that under the facts and circumstances of this case, the determination of the question of the negligence of fellow servants of respondent is a question of fact for the jury. The evidence as to the duties incumbent upon respondent as a switch tender may be fairly summarized as follows: The respondent testified: "The job I was holding at the time of my accident was an active job. I worked eight hours; there were three shifts, and I held one shift during all that time. My duties as switch tender were these—the switch tender throws switches and keeps the trains moving. You take the orders which the yardmaster passes over to you, and keep your trains going, and see that you get them in the right place. I had no duties to perform at the switch stand except that of throwing the switch itself. I have never been required to clean up oil and stuff around places on the railroad. I didn't know the oil was there. I might have wiped it off if I had known; probable would. The assistant yardmaster, Henry W. Young, was in charge of this place down where I was working. When I had matters to report, I reported them to him. When I fell forward there, I got up on my hands and knees and I was covered with black engine oil. The oil was on the place where I had been standing to attempt to throw the switch. I stood on this plate for the purpose of throwing the switch. I do not know how that oil got on that switch plate. I had seen oil on that particular switch plate before. I do know how that oil got on that switch plate; it got there spilling from the engines. When I saw oil on other occasions, I did do something; I notified the yard office. I had a lantern that night. I didn't notice the oil at all, until I had it on my hands and knees after my fall." Con Riley, a witness called by the appellant, testified: "My business is passenger section foreman in the passenger yards, Los Angeles passenger yards. I have been with the Southern Pacific Company for twenty-five years. I do know where this switch is that is in evidence in this accident; that is in my territory and I have charge of that equipment. I inspect those switches, see that they are in proper working condition; I inspect those switches in the yard nearly every day. I do remember the occasion of November 12th, 13th, 14th, along in there, of 1925. I have not at any time in my daily inspection found any oil on that switch up there."

[1] It is admitted that one of the printed rules of appellant, No. 46, provides yardmasters are responsible for conditions within the yard. There is no contradiction in the record with respect to the duties of the switch tender. Appellant did not produce evidence at the trial conflicting in any way with that above set out, which fact affords a strong presumption that if the appellant had produced the evidence within its control as to the true situation, such evidence would have been unfavorable to it. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 6; Id., § 2061, subds. 6 and 7. This has generally been the rule in the federal court. Fitzsimmons v. Ogden, 7 Cranch (11 U. S.) 2, 3 L. Ed. 249; Clifton v. United States, 4 How. (45 U. S.) 242, 273, 11 L. Ed. 957; Kirby v. Tallmadge, 160 U. S. 379, 16 S. Ct. 349, 40 L. Ed. 463. This presumption is further strengthened by the fact that such testimony as was produced by appellant at the trial of this action was corroborative of respondent's positive testimony that it was not his duty to inspect or maintain this switch and keep it in good working order.

With respect to sand at the switch point, respondent testified as follows: "It was unusual to have the sand. I had never seen sand that way before. That was the first time I had found sand in that particular switch in my whole railroad experience. I do know what sand is used for on railroads. It gives the engine traction power. * * * I know that every railroad engine, practically, carried a sand tank for that purpose." Edward J. Kelly, who for twenty-three years had been an engineer for the Southern Pacific Company, five years of which he operated a switch engine, but who was not in the employ of the appellant at the time of the accident, testified: "The practice is to shut off sand when approaching these switches. It is shut off because it is dangerous to let sand run. It will plug up the switch points and prevent the operation of the switch."

[2-5] It is a well-settled rule upon the issue of negligence in the performance or omission to perform an act, that evidence of the ordinary practice and custom, if any, generally followed in the performance of same, is competent. *Hennessey v. Johnson (C. C. A.) 221 F. 801, L. R. A. 1915E, 287, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 581; McComb v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Company (Cal. App.) 294 P. 81; Owl Creek Coal Co. v. Goleb (C. C. A.) 210 F. 209, 216. In which last case, the court used the following language: "It is equally well settled that, upon the issue of negligence in the performance or omission of an act, evidence of the ordinary practice and the usual custom, if any, of ordinarily prudent and intelligent persons in the performance, under the same or like circumstances, of the same, or like acts, is competent." (Citing cases.) It is manifest, therefore, that there is substantial evidence to support the contention of the respondent in this case that his sole duty in the operating of the switch point did not require him either to inspect the platform or the place upon which he stood or the switch points themselves to determine whether they were in working order. Furthermore, that the deposit of sand in the switch point was an unusual occurrence generally and, as to the respondent himself, entirely unknown to his experience. It would hardly seem necessary to quote authorities to sustain the position that there is a positive duty upon the master to furnish its servants with reasonably safe instrumentalities, and a reasonably safe place wherein to do their work, and that the servant has a right under the law to assume that the master has performed such duty. There is an abundance of authority both federal and state, to support the proposition that under the facts and circumstances of this case the question, as to whether the instrumentality supplied to the plaintiff in the performance of his duties measured up to that standard, is one of fact for the jury. Mappin v. Atchison, Topeka, etc., Ry. Co., 198 Cal. 733, 247 P. 911, 49 A. L. R. 1330; Neale v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 178 Cal. 225, 172 P. 1105; Boin v. Spreckels Sugar Co., 155 Cal. 612, 102 P. 937; Kreitzer v. Southern Pacific Co., 38 Cal. App. 654, 177 P. 477; Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company v. De Atley, 241 U. S. 310, 36 S. Ct. 564, 60 L. Ed. 1016; Carolina C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Stroup, 239 F. 75, 152 C. C. A. 125.

[6] There is ample evidence in the record, direct and inferential, that the sand found in the switch point upon which the accident is predicated, was deposited by a switch engine operated by an employee of the defendant. Whether such acts, conduct, and activities constituted negligence under the authorities is a question of fact for the jury. In Sioux City & Pacific Railroad Company v. Stout, 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 657, 661, 21 L. Ed. 745, the court says: "If, upon any construction which the jury was authorized to put upon the evidence, or by any inferences they were authorized to draw from it, the conclusion of negligence can be justified, the defendant was not entitled to" a nonsuit, but the question of negligence must be left to the jury. In Davidson

Steamship Co. v. United States, 205 U. S. 187, 192, 27 S. Ct. 480, 482, 51 L. Ed. 764, the court says: "It is well settled that where there is uncertainty as to the existence of either negligence or contributory negligence, the question is not one of law, but of fact, and to be settled by a jury; and this, whether the uncertainty arises from a conflict in the testimony, or because the facts, being undisputed, fair-minded men will honestly draw different conclusions from them."

[7-9] The second ground of defense set up by appellant in this action is that the plaintiff was engaged in interstate commerce and that said accident and injury, if it occurred at all, arose directly from the risks and dangers ordinarily incident to and attendant upon the operation of the equipment in interstate commerce and that said risks and dangers, by virtue of his employment, were risks and dangers assumed by him. The law is clear that upon the question of the assumption of risk or danger, whether from ordinary risks incident to the employment or from extraordinary hazards caused by the master's negligence, is a special defense and must be pleaded. It may be noted, however, in this connection that the defendant does not plead extraordinary hazard. In the case of Bird v. Utica Gold Mining Co., 2 Cal. App. 674, 677, 84 P. 256, 258, the court says: "If the particular employment of plaintiff was such that he must be deemed to have assumed the risk of working in a dangerous place, we think this was an affirmative defense to be shown by defendants. One who relies upon an exception to a general rule must state the facts which bring his case within it. Senter v. Davis, 38 Cal. 450. It is the general rule that an employer is liable to his servant for injuries resulting from the employer's negligent failure to provide a safe place to work. To this there may be exceptions, as where the servant is employed to make the place safe. A defense founded on such an exception is an affirmative defense, and need not be negated by the plaintiff." In the case of Oregon Short Line & U. N. Ry. Co. v. Tracy, 66 F. 931, 936 (C. C. A. 9), the court says: "It is assigned as error that the court excluded evidence offered by the defendant tending to prove that the plaintiff knew the condition of the track where the accident occurred, and that he therefore assumed the risks incident thereto. The defendant had not pleaded such knowledge upon the part of plaintiff, and the ruling of the court was in accordance with the doctrine established by the authorities. [Citing cases.] The doctrine of these decisions is that the assumption of the risk after knowledge of the defects is matter of defense in the nature of a waiver of the right to recover for the defendant's negligence, and must be pleaded."

It is not enough for appellant to attempt to show bare knowledge in order to raise this question, but it must go further and show that the situation was dangerous, and that the danger was so open and obvious that respondent knew and appreciated or must be charged with the knowledge and appreciation of its hazards. In Gila Valley Ry. Co. v. Hall, 232 U. S. 94, 102, 34 S. Ct. 229, 231, 58 L. Ed. 521, the court says: "Moreover, in order to charge an employee with the assumption of a risk attributable to a defect due to the employer's negligence, it must appear not only that he knew (or is presumed to have known) of the defect, but that he knew it endangered his safety; or else such danger must have been so obvious that an ordinarily prudent person, under the circumstances, would have appreciated it." Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co. v. De Atley, supra; Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Ward, 252 U. S. 18, 40 S. Ct. 275, 64 L. Ed. 430.

The record does not disclose any evidence whereby appellant attempted to offer any proof whatever upon the question of extraordinary risks and hazards caused by the master's negligence. In appellant's answer it is alleged, only, that the accident and injury arose directly from risks and dangers ordinarily incident and attendant upon the operation of said equipment. However, in any event, if respondent's assumption of risk of the negligent acts of appellant's employee by reason of his knowledge of the risk, and an appreciation of the danger arising therefrom, may be said to be an issue in this case, there can be no question but that the matter was submitted to the jury for its decision, and the decision of the jury and the judgment of the court based thereon will be binding and determinative of the issue on this appeal.

In Kanawha, etc., Railway Co. v. Kerse, 239 U. S. 576, 581, 36 S. Ct. 174, 175, 60 L. Ed. 448, the court said: "The burden of proof of the assumption of risk was upon defendant, and unless the evidence tending to show it was clear and from unimpeached witnesses, and free from contradiction, the trial court could not be charged with error in refusing to take the question from the jury."

In Mappin v. Atchison, Topeka, etc., Ry. Co., 198 Cal. 733, 742, 247 P. 911, 915, 49 A. L. R. 1330, the court says: "It may be stated in limine that it is conceded that the defense of assumption of risk is one of the defenses which may be taken advantage of by a defendant carrier, where the action is brought under the provisions of the Federal Employers' Liability Act; but it should also be said that upon the issue of assumption of risk the burden of proof is upon the employer (Kanawha, etc., Railway Co. v. Kerse, 239 U. S. 576, 60 L. Ed. 448, 36 S. Ct. 174; see, also, Rose's U. S. Notes; 18 R. C. L. § 126, p. 631; 16 Cal. Juris. p. 1079, and cases cited); and that as a general rule the question of assumption of risk is a question of fact for the jury. (16 Cal. Juris. p. 1080, and cases cited). The only exception to this rule is that, when the evidence in the case is clear, direct, and undisputed, the question of assumption of risk becomes a question of law for the court."

When applied to the facts of this case, it is manifest that the evidence, if any, of the assumption of risk by respondent fails utterly to measure up to this standard. In Chesapeake & O. Ry. Co. v. Winder, 23 F.(2d) 794, 795 (C. C. A., 4th Cir.), the court says: "On the second point, as to the assumption of the risk by the defendant, while it is true that the defense of the assumption of risk is not barred by the Federal Employers' Liability Act (45 USCA §§ 51-59; Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665) —Jacobs v. So. Ry. Co., 241 U. S. 229, 36 S. Ct. 588, 60 L. Ed. 970—the burden of proving that plaintiff had assumed the risk is upon the defendant, and in order to justify a directed verdict for the defendant on that ground the evidence tending to show such assumption must be clear and uncontradicted."

In Kreitzer v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, at page 667 of 38 Cal. App., 177 P. 477, 482, the court says: "Whether or not defendant was negligent in failing to provide a safe place for the decedent to work; whether decedent was guilty of gross negligence in failing to select a place which was designed for safety and was safe; whether, when placing himself in the position selected, he failed to take ordinary precautions to protect himself—were questions which, under the evidence, could not be taken from the jury and decided by the court as matter of law, but were proper questions for the jury. In Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 227, 229, 53 P. 651, the court said 'The rule is, that negligence is a question of fact for the jury, even when there is no conflict in the evidence, if different conclusions upon the subject can be rationally drawn from the evidence.' * * * The burden of establishing the defense of assumption of risk is upon the defendant. * * * 'The question of assumption of risk is quite apart from that of contributory negligence. The servant has the right to assume that the master has used due diligence to provide suitable appliances in the operation of his business, and he does not assume the risk of the employer's negligence in performing such duties. * * * This rule is subject to the exception that where a defect is known to the employee, or is so patent as to be readily observed by him, he cannot continue to use the defective apparatus in the face of knowledge and without objection, without assuming the hazard incident to such a situation.'" It may be remarked in passing that the facts and circumstances of this case did not bring the respondent within the purview of the exception above noted.

[10] Appellant criticizes many of the instructions given by the trial court, but we are satisfied from a careful examination of the instructions given that the jury was fully and fairly instructed upon all the issues pertaining to this case; in fact, the court fully instructed the jury upon the question of extraordinary risks and hazards, notwithstanding the fact that that issue was not raised by the pleadings as hereinabove mentioned. In its criticism of the instructions given by the trial court, it is difficult to determine what particular instructions are objected to by the defendant. Exceptions are noted to all instructions offered by the court, and among those specifically excepted to in appellant's brief are several instructions which were offered by the defendant and given by the court at its instigation. In Campbell v. Southern Pacific Ry. Co., 21 Cal. App. 175, 177, 131 P. 80, 81, the court said: " * * * It may well be that some particular instruction fails to contain a complete or accurate statement of the law. If, however, when the entire charge is examined, the omissions or inaccuracies in a particular instruction appear to have been supplied, and the jury fairly and consistently instructed, generally, as to the law, this is sufficient to defeat any claim of error predicated on defects in particular instructions." This language is strikingly appropriate to the situation disclosed by the record in this case. If we were to make any criticism at all of the instructions given by the court in this case, we would say on the whole that they were more favorable to the appellant than the law applicable thereto justified. Every issue was fully, clearly, and correctly presented to the jury.

[11] The damages awarded in this case—$25,000, assessed by the jury and approved by the court—are large, but it cannot be fairly said that when the evidence offered by the respective parties is dispassionately considered the verdict is so grossly disproportionate to any reasonable limit of compensation warranted by the facts as to shock the sense of justice, and raise at once a strong presumption that it is based on prejudice or passion rather than sober judgment. This accident happened on the 13th day of November, 1925, and the verdict was rendered by the jury on the 23d day of November, 1927, two years after the happening of the accident. The plaintiff's earning capacity was $175 a month. At the time of the trial, the evidence showed that he was still entirely incapacitated to perform any kind of work. At the time of the accident he was 34 years of age and had a life expectancy of 32.50 years. The opinions of several experienced physicians were to the effect that the plaintiff has a chronic permanent disability in the lower part of his back, the sacroiliac joint, and also the lumbar spine; that the subluxation in the sacroiliac joint is on the right side of the joint; that there are two sides of the joint; that he will never recover. With regard to the spondylolisthetic condition, the physicians are of the same opinion. He has not been able to do any work and is not in a condition to do any physical work. In the future he will not be able to do any work involving physical activity. This evidence if believed by the jury is sufficient to support the verdict given in this case. The court on its own motion appointed a young physician to make an examination of respondent, but, notwithstanding the fact that upon such examination this physician in his testimony minimized not only the injuries found by the more experienced doctors to exist, but was of the opinion that such injuries as respondent was afflicted with were not caused by the accident involved in this action, nevertheless it is significant that the trial judge, in sustaining the verdict of the jury, entirely discredited this evidence of his appointee. On the question of damages, in its closing brief appellant says: " * * * We must concede that in view that there was a dispute as between the respective parties as to the amount of damages which the respondent sustained, this court will not disturb the verdict of the jury, unless it can be said that the amount of damages given was awarded under passion and prejudice. We do contend, however, that a careful examination and analysis of the medical testimony given in the instant case does not justify the award of damages given by the jury; but in any event, we earnestly contend that the respondent was not entitled to any damages for the reason that he did not receive his injuries by reason of any negligence on the part of appellant or any of its servants or employees." All of which contentions were resolved in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, which determination under the well-settled principles of law are binding upon this court.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Waters A. Bushnell against Yoshika Tashiro and another. From an adverse judgment, defendants appeal.

Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, for appellant People's Laundry Co.

Myrick & Deering and Scott, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J.

While walking across a street in San Francisco, plaintiff was struck and injured by a Ford delivery truck owned by the defendant People's Laundry Company and driven by its employee and codefendant Tashiro; and subsequently he brought this action for damages against the owner and the driver, claiming that the accident was caused by the driver's negligence. Upon trial a jury rendered a verdict against both defendants for the sum of $6,500, and from the judgment entered thereon People's Laundry Company prosecutes this appeal. The accident occurred on a Sunday evening about 6 o'clock on Folsom street, near Ninth, a short distance from the laundry, and the sole ground urged for reversal is that the evidence establishes as a matter of law that at that time Tashiro was not performing any service within the scope of his employment, but was using the truck for his own pleasure and convenience without the knowledge or consent of his employer; and that consequently appellant is absolved from liability.

[1-4] The decisions are uniform in holding that, in an action for damages against an employer for personal injuries caused by the negligence of his employee while operating the employer's automobile, proof that the automobile belonged to the employer and at the time of the accident was being operated by the employee, raises an inference sufficient to establish a prima facie case that the automobile was being operated by the employee under the authority of the employer and within the scope of the employment, and that the burden is then upon the defendant to overcome or dispel such inference by proof of facts to the contrary. Among the numerous cases so holding are McWhirter v. Fuller, 35 Cal. App. 288, 170 P. 417; Brown v. Chevrolet Motor Co., 39 Cal. App. 738, 179 P. 697; and Wagnitz v. Scharetg, 89 Cal. App. 511, 265 P. 318. And it is further held that such inference is not destroyed or overcome as a matter of law merely because it is contradicted by the testimony of the employee or of other witnesses produced on behalf of the defendants, but that the issue remains one of fact for the determination of the jury, for the reason that, as sole judges of the weight of the testimony and the credibility of the witnesses, the members of the jury are not bound to accept such testimony as true, but may, if not convinced thereby, reject any portion or the whole thereof. Grantham v. Ordway, 40 Cal. App. 758, 182 P. 73; Wagnitz v. Scharetg, supra; Ferris v. Sterling, 214 N. Y. 249, 108 N. E. 406, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 1161; Adams v. Wiesendanger, 27 Cal. App. 590, 150 P. 1016;

Perry v. Paladini, Inc., 89 Cal. App. 275, 264 P. 580; Dierks v. Newsom, 49 Cal. App. 789, 194 P. 518, 520; Randolph v. Hunt, 41 Cal. App. 739, 183 P. 358, 361; Lemka v. Nauman, 103 Cal. App. 757, 284 P. 1062; Crain v. Sumida, 59 Cal. App. 590, 211 P. 479; Frierson v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 55 Cal. App. 397, 203 P. 788.

In the present case appellant in its answer expressly admitted ownership of the truck, and respondent established the fact of Tashiro's employment at the time of the accident by Tashiro's deposition theretofore taken by respondent, and which respondent introduced in evidence subject to the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Tashiro also testified therein, however, that at the time the accident occurred he was not performing any service for his employer, but was using the truck, without permission, for his own pleasure. In this connection the evidence shows without dispute that Tashiro's duties consisted of collecting and delivering laundry by means of said truck, his territory covering the regions lying north of Market street; that he was obliged to work every day, including Sundays, his duties on Sundays requiring him to collect and deliver "left over" laundry, which he was allowed to do at such hours during the day as best suited his convenience; and he claimed that on this particular Sunday, after having collected and delivered the "left over" laundry, he drove the truck back to the laundry, on Tenth street two blocks south of Market, placed it in the garage, and thereafter took it out again without permission, and, accompanied by his wife and a friend, both of whom were employed at and lived over the laundry, went for a ride. It was while they were returning to the laundry that they collided with respondent. Tashiro, his wife, and the superintendent of the laundry, named Tsukamoto, were afterwards called as witnesses for the defense; and Tashiro testified to substantially the same story. His wife stated also that at the time of the accident they were using the truck on a mission of their own; and Tsukamoto testified that the drivers were not allowed to use the trucks on Sundays for their own pleasure without asking permission, and that on the Sunday in question Tashiro neither asked for, nor was granted, such permission.

It is evident that the foregoing testimony would have been legally sufficient to controvert the inference establishing the prima facie case against appellant, if the jury had accepted the testimony as true; but it did not do so, and under the doctrine of the cases above cited it was not compelled, as a matter of law, to do so, notwithstanding that the testimony was not rebutted. As said in Dierks v. Newsom, supra, "the evidence introduced by the appellant made out a complete defense if full credence was given to it by the trial court [here it was the jury]; but the court was not bound thus to unreservedly accept it, even if uncontradicted. The court saw and heard the witnesses testify, and with this advantage, not enjoyed by us, it was for it to determine the degree of credence to be accorded to this testimony. It is not essential that the credulity of the court should correspond with the positiveness with which a witness testifies. A court may reject positive testimony, although it be not contradicted or impeached by any direct testimony. Its inherent improbability may be such as to deny it all claims to belief. A witness' manner of testifying may give rise to doubts as to his sincerity, or create the impression that the facts testified to by him are colored or not correctly stated."

In this connection it may be stated that according to Tashiro's testimony he spent much of the time on this particular Sunday afternoon shopping and visiting friends in the district in which his duties were daily performed, including a visit to another laundry operated by the same company; and his testimony as to the route they traveled that afternoon was not only self-contradictory in several respects, but was at variance to some extent at least with that given by his wife as to the places and persons they visited and the object of taking the truck that afternoon. And although his wife first stated that she accompanied her husband on the truck only on Sundays, she afterwards admitted that she sometimes rode with him on week days to do her shopping, while he was performing his regular duties. And again it was shown that, although Tashiro had been employed by the laundry for over four years, and had been accustomed to using the truck on Sundays for his own pleasure, this was the first Sunday that he had ever taken it out, as claimed by him and Tsukamoto, without asking permission; and that the reason he did not obtain permission on this single occasion was, as he testified, that he believed Tsukamoto was in church.

It would appear therefore, that there were certain elements of weakness in the testimony of said witnesses which warranted the jury in deeming it to be of doubtful probative value; and consequently it cannot be reasonably held on appeal, as a matter of law, contrary to the implied finding of the jury, that such testimony was and is conclusive as to all matters to which it relates. To appropriate some of the language used in the decision in Randolph v. Hunt, supra, "Being the exclusive judges of the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses, if the testimony did not carry conviction to their minds [the minds of the jury], they had the legal right to reject it. We must assume that they did not believe the story, and we cannot say, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that the jury acted arbitrarily, or otherwise than in good faith and with an honest purpose,

We would not be justified by the record in branding the statement of these witnesses as false, although there are certain circumstances that tend somewhat to discredit it, but we are not in a position to interfere with the jury's discretion in that particular." We conclude, therefore, that under the doctrine of the group of cases above cited the testimony of said witnesses given in contradiction of the inference establishing the prima facie case of liability against appellant did no more than create a conflict therewith, even though said testimony was not rebutted; and, that being so, the determination of the jury on that issue is conclusive on appeal.

[5, 6] Appellant has cited several cases which it claims sustains its contention that, where the evidence adduced in controversion of an inference is uncontradicted, it is sufficient as a matter of law to overcome such inference. An examination of those cases shows, however, that some of them merely declare the general rules relating to an owner's liability, about which there is no dispute, and do not involve, as here, the question of the legal effect of uncontradicted testimony given in opposition to such an inference; and as to some of the others it will be found that there are certain elements present therein or absent therefrom which exclude them from the operation of the rule which appellant is seeking to invoke. But, even conceding that a conflict in principle exists between some of those cases and the group hereinabove set forth, it is apparent that such conflict has been done away with by the decision of the Supreme Court in the recent case of Smellie v. Southern Pacific Company, 299 P. 529, 534, which was rendered since the present case was argued and submitted. There the court reviews the entire subject, and discusses several of the earlier cases, including some of those upon which appellant relies, and, after doing so, adheres to and restates as the law of this jurisdiction the doctrine of the group of cases above cited, and of which Grantham v. Ordway, Randolph v. Hunt, and Perry v. Paladini, Inc., are fair representatives. Summarizing the decision in that case relating to the points with which we are here concerned, it was therein held (1) that presumptions are dispelled and disappear from the case when controverted by the uncontradicted testimony of the party relying upon the same, or of his witnesses, under circumstances which afford no indication that the testimony was the product of mistake or inadvertence, and the fact so proved is wholly irreconcilable with the presumptions sought to be invoked, citing Mar Shee v. Maryland Assurance Corp., 190 Cal. 1, 210 P. 269; (2) that they are not dispelled and do not vanish from the case as a matter of law when contradicted or controverted by the party against whom they are invoked. "In such case," says the court, "their guiding and compelling effect is undermined and diminished or destroyed to the extent that they are controlled by the facts as found to exist"; and (3) "that the testimony of a witness called under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure is not, when weighing it against a presumption, to be considered, nor is it really, evidence of the party calling such witness, and that the evidence thus produced does not dispel a presumption contrary thereto, but [is] in favor of the party calling such adverse witness."

[7] As will be noted, in the present case the testimony given in contradiction of the inference that the truck was being operated within the scope of the driver's employment was elicited from Tashiro, whose deposition was introduced by plaintiff subject to the provisions of said section 2055, and the witnesses called by the defendants; consequently, under the law as stated in Smellie v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, such inference was not dispelled and did not vanish entirely from the case as a matter of law by reason of such testimony. It operated merely to create a conflict. True, in the case last mentioned the court was dealing with a presumption created by statute, as distinguished from an inference arising from the facts; but the situation is not affected thereby, for, as will be seen from an examination of that case as well as from all of the other decisions upon the subject, including the cases of Perry v. Paladini, Inc., Grantham v. Ordway, and Randolph v. Hunt, supra, the terms "inference" and "presumption" are used interchangeably, and the rule is applied alike to both. Another recent case adhering to the doctrine restated and approved in Smellie v. Southern Pacific Co., is Poncino v. Reid-Murdoch & Co., 298 P. 818, wherein the Supreme Court, after hearing and decision in the District Court of Appeal, held, contrary to the decision of the latter court, that as against an inference establishing the prima facie case the uncontradicted testimony of the employee and of the other witnesses produced by the defendants created only a conflict.

Since, therefore, under the foregoing authorities, the evidence relied upon by appellant to absolve it from liability created only a conflict, and did not as a matter of law dispel the inference establishing respondent's prima facie case, it is beyond the power of the reviewing court, on appeal, to interfere with the conclusion reached by the jury on that issue.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiff sued to recover broker's commissions alleged to be due and owing to him from the defendant's testator. The defendant asserts that there is no testimony to support the finding that the plaintiff performed the contract under which he claims relief. She also asserts that there was no agreement employing the plaintiff. And she further asserts that the purported agreement was one of exchange and that there was found to be a material defect in the title to Ehrlick's property which was not removed and therefore no commission was earned. These several contentions we think may best be treated together.

On January 16, 1928, defendant's testator executed an instrument agreeing to exchange three several parcels of land together with $15,000 in cash for a parcel on the west line of Mission street which was entirely covered by buildings. The writing included, among others, these passages:

"Henry H. Traxler is hereby constituted my agent to negotiate this exchange and two days are allowed him to secure written acceptance hereof.

"15 days from the date of acceptance shall be allowed for search of titles and consummation, unless one or both titles are found to be defective. In the latter event the party or parties whose title is defective shall be allowed 60 days additional, after receipt by Henry H. Traxler of written notice of objections to title, within which to remedy defects.

"At the conclusion of 60 days, or before, if both titles are sooner made acceptable, this exchange shall be finally consummated in the office of Henry H. Traxler by each party delivering to the other all payments and instruments in writing required to comply with the terms specified and particularly to vest in each by grant, bargain and sale deed good merchantable title to all of the real property that is to go from one to the other under this agreement. * * * It is further agreed with the said agent that when he has secured an acceptance in writing of the above proposition that I will then pay to said agent at his office in San Francisco, the sum of one thousand and no/100 ($1,000.00) on demand for services rendered; and it is understood that said agent may also act as agent for the owner of the above secondly described property from whom he may also receive a commission. Time is of the essence hereof. (Signed). Ralph McLeran. The foregoing is hereby accepted and performance by me is agreed to this 17th day of January, 1928, and I agree to pay Henry H. Traxler at his office in San Francisco, California, the sum of thirty-six hundred twenty-five ($3625.00) dollars as agreed for services rendered; and it is understood that Henry H. Traxler may also act as agent for the owner of the firstly herein described property from whom he may also receive a commission.

"Commission to be paid upon consummation as follows: $1,725.00 in cash. Lot on 34th Ave. and 2 lots in Richmond City property. (Signed). Gustav Ehrlick."

The paper was not signed by this plaintiff. After it had been signed by Ehrlick, a survey was made, and it transpired that the improvements on Ehrlick's property overlapped the sidewalk on the east line of the property and that they overlapped to the extent of three-quarters of an inch the property adjoining on the north side. The overlapping was never cut off nor the overlapping property purchased, but further proceedings between the exchanging parties were, by stipulation, indefinitely postponed. Mr. McLeran died on August 21, 1928. The plaintiff presented a claim against the estate of the decedent. That claim was as follows: "To services rendered in securing acceptance of exchange proposition as per agreement, $1,000.00. To commission earned for services performed as real estate agent as per agreement, $3,625.00. Total $4,625.00." The judgment as rendered was for the full sum covered in the claim, together with interest.

[1] The contention that the evidence does not support the findings is based on the fact that no one was called as a witness to identify the signature of Ehrlick. Nevertheless, one copy of the contract, purporting to be signed by Ehrlick and his signature acknowledged before a notary public, was admitted in evidence. That evidence was sufficient to support the finding.

[2-4] The contention that there was no agreement of employment of Traxler rests on the fact that he did not sign the written instrument. That fact is not determinative. McLeran and Ehrlick both signed, and under the clear terms of the writing they were the ones "to be charged." The statute (Civ. Code, § 1624) was complied with. Harper v. Goldschmidt, 156 Cal. 245, 104 P. 451, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 689, 134 Am. St. Rep. 124. This plaintiff was entitled to sue thereon before it was rescinded. Lundeen v. Nowlin, 20 Cal. App. 415, 129 P. 474; Stanton v. Carnahan, 15 Cal. App. 527, 115 P. 339. In so far as the defendant was concerned her testator became liable under the terms of the contract when the plaintiff had " * * * secured an acceptance in writing of the above proposition. * * * " Darrow v. Houlihan, 205 Cal. 771, 774, 272 P. 1049.

[5-7] The defendant next asserts that there was a defect in the title to the property of Gustav Ehrlick—there was an overlapping. True, but it was slight and the wall of the adjacent property is in place. The courts will treat the slight overlapping as de minimis. Mertens v. Berendsen (Cal. Sup.) 1 P. (2d) 440; 39 Cyc. 1506; Macdonald v. Bach, 51 App. Div. 549, 64 N. Y. S. 831, 833. As shown above, the plaintiff held the written authorization of Mr. McLeran empowering him to negotiate the exchange. If Mr. McLeran did not own the entire fee and if his wife later refused to join in executing a deed to Mr. Ehrlick, such facts did not constitute a defense. 4 Cal. Jur. 596, 597. As the trade was not actually carried out, the defendant asserts it was not "consummated" within the terms of the contract and Mr. Ehrlick never became liable and therefore she is not liable. Under the facts the point may not be sustained. 4 Cal. Jur. 599.

[8] So far we have confined our discussion of the damages to that portion of the compensation which Mr. McLeran undertook to pay if the parties had exchanged deeds. It remains for us to take up and discuss the claim of the plaintiff that he was also entitled to be compensated for the loss of the commissions which Mr. Ehrlick had agreed to pay. The latter has not performed, and could not perform, solely because Mr. McLeran refused to perform. The plaintiff pleaded and the court found the special circumstances under which the contract was actually made were communicated by the plaintiff to Mr. McLeran and to Mr. Ehrlick. Indeed, such facts appear as a part of the written contract signed by those two parties. Pointing to these facts, the plaintiff then claims that he was entitled to ask damages in a sum equal to the amount Mr. McLeran promised to pay plus the amount Mr. Ehrlick promised to pay. Hunt Bros. Co. v. San Lorenzo, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 51, 56, 87 P. 1093, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 913; Klepper v. Am-La France, etc., Co., 104 Cal. App. 249, 254, 285 P. 1048. Those cases are in point, except that they did not involve a sale or exchange of real estate. In this state no case involving a sale or exchange of real estate presents the exact question. However, the rule contended for has been followed and applied in such actions by the courts of other jurisdictions. One of the latest cases, and probably the leading one on the subject, is Calkins v. Woolworth Co. (C. C. A.) 27 F.(2d) 314. On pages 318 and 319 of 27 F.(2d) are to be found the principal cases on the subject that have been decided in this country. An examination discloses that there is no substantial conflict. Where there was an apparent conflict it will be found that there was a difference in the facts. It follows that if this action had been brought against Mr. McLeran in his lifetime the amount of the damages should have been ascertained as claimed by the plaintiff. We do not understand the defendant to claim that any different rule should be followed in estimating the amount of the damages when, as here, the defendant is the executrix or administratrix.

We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re MONTAGUE'S ESTATE.

Civ. 7958.

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California.

Aug. 13, 1931.

Divorce ☞255.

Where divorce complaint alleged there was no community property, and interlocutory divorce decree became final before filing of petition for distribution of deceased wife's estate, husband's claim that property was community property held without foundation (Civ. Code, § 169).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Nellie A. Montague. Frank P. Montague filed a first and final account as administrator of the estate of Nellie A. Montague, deceased, and Flora J. Benjamin and others filed a petition to determine heirship and distributive rights, and from that portion of the decree distributing part of estate to persons other than himself, the administrator appeals.

Affirmed.

Catherine A. McKenna and J. Irving McKenna, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lewis H. Smith, Archie A. Smith, and Manley C. Davidson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J.

Upon objection to the first and final account of the appellant as administrator of the estate of Nellie A. Montague, deceased, and a petition to determine heirship and distributive rights, filed by the sisters and a brother of said deceased, a decree was made and entered apportioning the estate to appellant and to the said petitioners. The administrator appealed from that portion of the decree which distributed a part of the estate to persons other than himself.

The appellant and Nellie A. Montague intermarried in 1915. On or about May 15, 1925, they ceased living together, and on April 21, 1928, appellant filed a complaint alleging desertion, and that "there are no children as the result of said marriage, nor is there any community property." An interlocutory decree was granted pursuant to personal service and the entry of a default in said action. By his petition for letters of administration in this proceeding appellant represented himself as the only heir at law of said deceased, and in his first and final account he averred that the whole thereof was community property, praying a decree "distributing all of the said estate to Frank P. Montague, surviving husband of the said deceased." However, upon the appearance of the respondents, and after hearing the evidence, the trial court awarded one-half of the estate to them. It is contended that this was error. That the parties to the divorce action had agreed upon a reconciliation, that a form of dismissal had been prepared, and other extraneous matters, as asserted by the appellant's brief, but they are not supported by the record, and in any event are immaterial.

The parties had not lived together as husband and wife for a period of at least three years, and about eleven months prior to the filing of said first and final account it was adjudged and decreed that all of the allegations of the complaint for divorce were true, that is, that there was then no community property, which is equivalent to a judgment based upon findings of fact that whatever property the decedent may then have had was her separate property. The findings and decree were introduced and are a part of the record in this matter. No appeal or order purporting to nullify the former decree was effected. Hence it becomes too obvious to require extended discussion that the claim that any part of said estate was community property is without foundation, for the reason that the interlocutory decree became final and conclusive six months from the date of its entry, and prior to the filing of the petition for distribution. Civ. Code, § 169; Brown v. Brown, 170 Cal. 1, 147 P. 1168; Id., 170 Cal. 8, 147 P. 1171.

CRAIG, J.

An action having been instituted against the purchaser of real property and his surety pursuant to the failure of the former to build thereon as agreed between the parties, judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff and against said surety, from which the latter appealed.

The instrument forming the basis of this action speaks for itself. Appellant and Robert Unger bound themselves to the plaintiff in the sum of $19,593, by an instrument in writing wherein it was recited that, whereas the respondent had sold to Unger certain real property, and Unger had given as a part of the purchase price certain promissory notes and agreed to complete ten houses thereon within 120 days, of the value of $3,000 each, "therefore, that if the above named Robert Unger, his heirs, executors and administrators do and shall well and truly complete within one hundred twenty (120) days from the close of said escrow, a dwelling house upon each and every one of the said ten (10) lots, which said dwelling house shall contain not less than five (5) rooms and shall cost and be reasonably worth not less than $3,000, and shall be approved by the undersigned surety, then the above written obligation shall be void; otherwise to run in full force and effect." The provisions of said undertaking were alleged in the complaint, and it was made a part thereof. The plaintiff further alleged, however, that the parties thereto all agreed and that it was by them contemplated that the improvements mentioned would preserve the plaintiff's interest and security, which was represented by trust deeds, and "would so far increase the value of the whole property that the trust deeds in favor of plaintiff would furnish ample security"; that "said undertaking stood as security for the difference between the value of the property without and the value of the property with dwelling-house"; that, without the agreed improvements, "plaintiff's interest in the property represented by said deeds of trust would be impaired"; and that the parties also contemplated "that by the performance of the terms of said undertaking, Exhibit 'A' hereof, defendant Robert Unger would be able to sell and transfer at a profit said lots and said dwellings thereon to purchasers who would assume all of the encumbrances against the same." The structures were not completed within the time specified, and the plaintiff alleged that each house was in fact of a value less than $2,400. And "that the value of each of said [ten] lots, together with the dwelling-house thereon as constructed * * * did not * * * exceed the sum of $4,000; that if a dwelling-house had been erected on each of said lots at a cost and of the reasonable worth of $3,000, each of said parcels at all times herein mentioned would have had a market value of $6,500"; that Unger had been unable to sell the lots at a profit, or to purchasers who would assume the incumbrances against them, by reason of which the plaintiff had been compelled to assume and pay certain specified obligations, and had been damaged in the sum of $19,593.

The plaintiff's theory of the case arose and was pursued upon the basis of appellant's guarantee that the value of the properties, when improved, would exceed the value of the vacant lots by a sufficient amount to assure sales of the improved properties at a profit and to satisfy or guarantee incumbrances held by the plaintiff and others represented by deeds of trust and mortgages. The findings of fact conformed substantially to the allegations of the complaint, and the trial court specifically found and rendered judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $9,186.17. This result included $311.97 expended in making certain repairs, and $1,745 as the cost of alleged encroachments, besides a damage in the sum of $6,928.70. The latter amount was arrived at through the following computation: Trust deeds on the property, held by the plaintiff, $19,088; value of the lots as adjudged by the court, after improvement, $47,159.30; first-mortgage incumbrances thereon, outstanding, $35,000; value of the plaintiff's equity, $12,159.30, which, deducted from the amount of the indebtedness represented by said deeds of trust, leaves a deficit in said sum of $6,928.70, in which amount the plaintiff was damaged by the erection of houses worth but $2,538.93 each, instead of $3,000, as originally agreed by the parties to the construction contract.

Although so alleged and found, it is apparent at once that neither fraud, mistake, nor ambiguity of appellant's contract of guaranty was claimed by the plaintiff, nor did it seek to reform the instrument. The effect of the complaint based upon the undertaking, and of the plaintiff's testimony at the trial, was not to recover for a failure to construct ten houses of a value of $3,000 each and to obtain judgment accordingly, but to read into the undertaking so providing a guarantee by the appellant surety that respondent's property as a whole would by improvement be a safe and profitable venture, and to recover for its breach. It is interesting to observe in this connection that appellant was not a party to the realty hazard alleged. Its contract made no provision for repairs, for encroachments, or for deficiencies in the event of foreclosure. No word or possible construction of its language can be made to embrace the value of the real property, or respondent's equity, or prospective loss arising from a failure of its appraisal at a satisfactory valuation to the respondent. It cannot be said, as the respondent's theory would tend to indicate, that appellant agreed to be bound in damages in the event of unprofitable valuation, even though houses worth $3,000 each were built; nor that appellant would not be liable if respondent profited by the deal, even though the houses were not worth $3,000 each. The limitations of the four corners of the undertaking defined the obligation of the Guardian Investment Company as follows, only: That, whereas, Unger had agreed to erect ten houses within a stipulated time, to cost and be reasonably worth $3,000 each, "now, therefore, if the above-named Robert Unger * * * shall well and truly complete * * * a dwelling house upon each * * * of said ten lots * * * reasonably worth $3,000, * * * then the above obligation shall be void." It cannot be successfully contended that Unger's failure to perform would constitute a breach of appellant's obligation rendering it liable in damages to the respondent, as the latter insists. It is in the nature of an undertaking which, upon Unger's failure to build or to furnish full value, may be enforced, in the manner and for the purposes therein prescribed, to the extent of the injury resulting only from such specified derelictions. The trial court found that each house was reasonably worth $2,538.93, or $461.07 less than the agreed value of the structures which Unger contracted to erect. Appellant's consent to insure the success of respondent's investment was requisite to a judgment for damages such as found by the trial court, whereas the express language of its contract excludes such contingency and liability.

From what has been said other points presented by the parties become immaterial to a determination of this appeal.

The judgment is reversed.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued to foreclose a mechanic's lien. The cause was tried before the court, and, at the close of plaintiff's case, the trial court granted a nonsuit as to certain defendants. The plaintiff appeals on typewritten transcripts.

Plaintiff is the assignee of Union Tank & Pipe Company, a corporation. This company sold to defendant Bailes a quantity of oil well casing which Bailes used in sinking a well upon property owned by defendant Barry, and located at Huntington Beach, Orange county. The contract price with Bailes for the materials furnished was $1,945. When the company filed its claim of lien for these materials it entered the amount due as $2,949. On the trial it developed that this sum of $2,949 was due the company upon a separate account with Bailes for materials furnished him to be used upon property located at Signal Hill in Los Angeles county. Upon this showing, the trial court sustained objections to the offer in evidence of the claim of lien and the assignment thereof. If these rulings were sound, the order granting the nonsuit was proper because plaintiff had no evidence establishing the lien, which it sought to foreclose.

The evidence was without contradiction that four hundred and eighty feet of thirteen-inch casing, together with a shoe and guide, were furnished Bailes by the pipe company; that these materials went into the improvements on respondent's property; and that the agreed price therefor was $1,945. It was also shown that the pipe company had another charge against Bailes on account of pipe furnished him to be used on property in Signal Hill. This charge was for seven hundred and twenty feet of pipe, amounting to $2,949. In the claim of lien here at issue the company inadvertently inserted the figures $2,949 as the amount due. Because this charge was identical with another account on the books against Bailes, it is argued that no legal claim of lien was filed against the property in suit. Upon this theory the trial court excluded from evidence the claim of lien and the assignment.

We are unable to agree with this ruling.

Section 1203, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that: "No mistake or errors in the statement of the demand, or of the * * * balance asserted to be due * * * shall invalidate the lien, unless the court finds that such mistake or error * * * was made with intent to defraud, or (matters not material)." Here there was no claim of fraud. Appellant alleged and proved without contradiction an honest mistake or error. There was no claim and no proof that respondents were misled or that they suffered any injury through the error.

A statute of this character demands that we give it full effect where applicable. The true purpose of the statute is to relieve a lien claimant from the consequences of an error of this nature. The fact that the amount erroneously inserted in the claim was identical with another account for goods sold does not affect the case. If the Legislature had intended an exception in such cases, it would have so declared. But the only exceptions made are those involving fraud and the rights of innocent third parties. We are satisfied that this case must be ruled by the statute.

Order reversed.

Criminal law ⇨1201.

Statute forbidding mention to jury of previous conviction held repealed pro tanto by subsequent statute making prior conviction integral part of offense (Pen. Code, § 1025; St. 1923, p. 695).

Pen. Code, § 1025, provides that when defendant who is also charged with previous conviction pleads not guilty, and answers that he has suffered the previous conviction, charge of such conviction must not be read to jury or alluded to at trial, and St. 1923, p. 695 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 1970), which was enacted subsequently to Pen. Code, § 1025, relates to the possession of a firearm capable of being concealed on the person by one who has previously been convicted of a felony, thereby making it necessary to prove such conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles county; Walter Guerin, Judge.

John Forrester was convicted of violating St. 1923, p. 695 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 1970), pertaining to the possession of firearms, and he appeals.

CONREY, P. J.

Pursuant to count 2 of an information duly filed, defendant was convicted of the crime of violation of chapter 339, p. 695, Laws of 1923 (Act 1970 of Deering's Gen. Laws 1923), "committed as follows: That the said John Forrester, on or about the 29th day of January, 1931, at and in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, did wilfully, unlawfully and feloniously have in his possession and custody and under his control a certain firearm, capable of being concealed upon the person, the said firearm having a barrel less than twelve inches in length, the said John Forrester having theretofore been duly and legally convicted of a felony, to-wit, burglary, on the 24th day of April, 1922, by and before the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Los Angeles." It was further alleged that before the commission of said offense defendant had been convicted of the crime of burglary, and judgment of said superior court pronounced and rendered on the 24th day of November, 1922, and that defendant served a term of imprisonment therefor in a penal institution. On arraignment on March 9, 1931, the defendant regularly entered his plea of not guilty and admitted the prior conviction. On April 8, 1931, the case was tried before a jury, which found the defendant guilty. Thereafter, on April 13, the date set for pronouncing of judgment and sentence, the defendant filed and presented a demurrer to the information, which demurrer was overruled and the cause further continued to April 17, for hearing defendant's motion for a new trial and motion for arrest of judgment. On April 17 said motions were denied and judgment pronounced by the court. The clerk's minutes show that after the jury had been sworn to try the cause: "Information is read and plea stated. Motion of defendant's counsel for dismissal, for reasons stated, is argued and denied." The reporter's transcript shows that after the jury had been sworn and the plea stated, defendant's counsel moved that an order of mistrial be entered "upon the ground that the reading of the information has violated the rights of the defendant in the al-lusion and in informing the jury of the fact that this defendant had been guilty of a prior conviction when this defendant has admitted that fact solely for the purpose of his protection against its influence upon the jury." The objection thus made was overruled by the court, and thereafter the court, notwithstanding objections on the part of defendant, admitted evidence establishing the fact of the former conviction.

Appellant contends that the admission of such evidence is prohibited by the terms of section 1025 of the Penal Code. That section provides as follows: "When a defendant who is charged in the indictment or information with having suffered a previous conviction, pleads either guilty or not guilty of the offense for which he is indicted or informed against, he must be asked whether he has suffered such previous conviction. If he answers that he has, his answer must be entered by the clerk in the minutes of the court, and must, unless withdrawn by consent of the court, be conclusive of the fact of his having suffered such previous conviction in all subsequent proceedings. * * * In case the defendant pleads not guilty, and answers that he has suffered the previous conviction, the charge of the previous conviction must not be read to the jury, nor alluded to on the trial." If the foregoing provisions of section 1025 of the Penal Code apply to the offense of which the defendant was convicted in this action, it would be impossible ever to convict the defendant on this charge. For the offense described in the indictment includes, as a substantive part of the offense, the fact that the person charged with having in his possession the prohibited firearm is a person "who has been convicted of a felony against the person or property of another," etc. Notwithstanding the fact that the defendant upon his arraignment admitted the prior conviction, as separately stated in the indictment, he pleaded not guilty to the principal offense and thereby put in issue the alleged fact that, at the stated time and place, he had in his possession the described firearm, he having been theretofore legally convicted of a felony, to wit, burglary, etc. Considering the two statutes together, we are satisfied that the provisions of section 1025 of the Penal Code were not intended to apply to a case where the fact of former conviction is an integral part of the present offense concerning which the defendant is brought to trial. If any additional ground of reconciliation of the two statutes should seem to be necessary, the fact may be noted that the Firearms Act of 1923 is of much later date than said section of the Penal Code, and is of necessity, pro tanto, a repeal of said section 1025, Penal Code.

Our decision upon the question hereinabove discussed practically disposes of all of the points raised on the appeal. The evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict; the demurrer to the information was properly overruled; the court did not err in permitting the clerk to read the first paragraph of count two of the information; the court did not err in denying defendant's motion to stop the trial and enter an order of mistrial; the court did not err in overruling the objections to the evidence offered to prove that defendant had suffered said former conviction of burglary; the court did not err in denying defendant's motion for an advised verdict; and the verdict was not ambiguous. It was stipulated that, in reading the information to the jury, the clerk read only the first paragraph, and did not read the second paragraph, which separately charged the previous conviction of a felony.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

HYDE v. CITY OF SANTA CRUZ.

Civ. 7803.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Aug. 27, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 26, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 26, 1931.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨360(6).

Municipal construction contract specifying completion date held not part of architect's agreement not limiting time of performance so as to entitle architect to additional compensation for inspecting during extension period (Civ. Code, § 1642).

This was so, since the architect's agreement did not incorporate into itself the terms of the construction contract, and therefore it could not be aided or enlarged by the terms of the construction contract.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨360(6).

That construction contract permitted municipality to declare forfeiture for delay in completion did not entitle architect to additional compensation for inspecting during extension period.

This was so, since the provision permitting the city to forfeit $100 per day as liquidated damages, representing in part additional engineering fees, was not expressly made for the architect's benefit, although its enforcement might incidentally benefit him.

Action by Charles Gilman Hyde against the City of Santa Cruz. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

H. C. Symonds, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John H. Leonard, of Santa Cruz, and Lindsay & Gearhart, of Fresno, for respondent.

GRAY, Justice pro tem.

Respondent, by a written agreement employed appellant to design a sewerage and sewerage disposal works, to prepare all drawings and the contract for its construction, and to supervise and inspect such construction for a percentage of its cost, payable in progress installments, subject to final determination thirty-five days after completion. Although providing that time was of its essence, the agreement did not limit the time for performance of these services except as to require appellant to begin the engineering work on a specified date and to furnish the designs, drawings, and construction contract on a certain day "so that the work may be let and construction thereof may begin as much prior to January 1, 1927, as shall appear expedient and proper and so that the entire project shall be completed and accepted as far as possible in advance of December 31, 1927." The construction contract, furnished by appellant and executed by the successful bidder, set December 31, 1927, as the date of completion, defined avoidable and unavoidable delays, required the contractor to pay respondent $100 for each day, after date of completion, the work was uncompleted, as liquidated damages "representing the cost to the city of additional engineering and clerical hire and the loss of interest and of the use of the works caused by the delay," and provided that the contractor should pay such sum, if the city extended time of performance for a delay that appellant should determine was avoidable. The work was not completed by December 31, 1927, but was completed within the time extended by the city.

[1, 2] Appellant sued to recover compensation, additional to that provided in his agreement, for his services in supervising and inspecting during such time extension. To supply the lack of time limitation in his agreement for rendition of his services, appellant pleaded that the above-noted provisions of the construction contract were embodied in his agreement. The court rendered judgment against appellant, finding, among other facts, that these provisions did not form part of appellant's agreement with the city. Appellant appeals, questioning principally this finding. This finding is legally correct. The rule, as stated in section 1642 of the Civil Code, that "several contracts relating to the same matters, between the same parties, and made as parts of substantially one transaction, are to be taken together," has no present application because appellant's agreement and the construction contract differ as to parties, dates of execution, and subject-matter, and they must be regarded as separate contracts, and not as constituting one contract. Uhlhorn v. Goodman, 84 Cal. 185, 23 P. 1114; Pettibone v. Lake View Town Co., 134 Cal. 227, 66 P. 218. Appellant's agreement does not incorporate into itself the terms of the construction contract, and therefore it cannot be aided or enlarged by the latter's terms. Mannix v. Tryon, 152 Cal. 31, 91 P. 983; Kirkpatrick v. Pye, 59 Cal. App. 125, 210 P. 438. Nor is appellant's contention aided by the provision of the construction contract permitting the city to forfeit $100 a day as liquidated damages, representing in part additional engineering fees, since such provision was not expressly made for his benefit although its enforcement might incidentally benefit him. Chung Kee v. Davidson, 73 Cal. 522, 15 P. 100. The same conclusions as our own were reached as to similar contentions under similar facts in Town of Decatur v. Jaudon, 136 Ga. 854, 72 S. E. 351.

Since this finding demolishes the foundation of appellant's case, it will be unnecessary to consider other findings questioned by him.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Criminal law ⇨245.

Any irregularity of proceedings and insufficiency of evidence at preliminary examination to establish corpus delicti held waived by failure to move to set aside information prior to pleading not guilty (Pen. Code, §§ 524, 995).

2. Habeas corpus ⇨117(2).

Defendant discharged on prior application for writ of habeas corpus for defect of proof at preliminary examination, could be arrested and re-examined for same offense (Pen. Code, §§ 524, 995, 1496).

Application of Carl Frederick Heinze for a writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to the Sheriff of San Joaquin County to secure release of petitioner on ground that commitment was void for failure to establish corpus delicti.

Writ denied.

D. P. Eicke, of Stockton, for Petitioner.

Guard C. Darrah, Dist. Atty., of Stockton, for respondent.

R. L. THOMPSON, J.

This is a petition for a writ of habeas corpus.

It is contended the order of a magistrate holding the petitioner for trial in the superior court upon a charge of attempting to extort money contrary to the provisions of section 524 of the Penal Code is void for failure to have established at the preliminary examination the corpus delicti. It is asserted the record fails to show probable cause to believe the petitioner is guilty of the offense charged.

The petitioner is held by the sheriff of San Joaquin county pursuant to a commitment duly issued by a justice of the peace of Stockton township, based upon an order previously made by him holding the petitioner for trial in the superior court upon the charge of attempting to extort money contrary to the provisions of section 524 of the Penal Code. Upon proceedings duly had in the justice's court, an order of the above-named magistrate was made July 8, 1931, binding the petitioner over for trial for the offense last mentioned. The petitioner was thereupon held a prisoner upon said charge pending the trial thereof. On July 17, 1931, upon a previous petition for a writ of habeas corpus, the superior court of San Joaquin county discharged the prisoner. On the last-mentioned date a new complaint was filed against the petitioner in said justice's court charging him with the same offense in substantially the same language in which the first complaint was couched. The petitioner was again taken into custody by the sheriff. On July 20, 1931, another preliminary examination was held. Additional testimony was then adduced. This petition for a writ of habeas corpus alleges that the magistrate, on the last-mentioned date, "without reasonable or probable cause, or without the corpus delicti having been established, made an order holding said petitioner to answer to the superior court." August 3, 1931, an information was filed in the superior court of San Joaquin county charging the petitioner with the crime of attempting to extort money contrary to the provisions of section 524 of the Penal Code. Upon the last-mentioned date the petitioner was duly arraigned in open court and pleaded "not guilty" of the offense with which he was charged. The cause was then set for trial for September 1, 1931. No motion was made pursuant to section 995 of the Penal Code, to set aside the information on the ground that "before the filing thereof the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate." This petition for a writ of habeas corpus was thereupon presented to this court.

[1] The information having been filed, and the petitioner, without objection, having been arraigned thereon and having pleaded not guilty thereto, and failing to have moved to set aside the information under the provisions of section 995 of the Penal Code, waived his right to object to the irregularity of the proceedings or insufficiency of the evidence before the magistrate. Ex parte Moan, 65 Cal. 216, 3 P. 644, 646; In re Ephriam Northcott, 71 Cal. App. 281, 235 P. 458; People v. Bawden, 90 Cal. 195, 27 P. 204, 206. Upon the hearing of the petition for a writ of habeas corpus in the Moan Case first above cited, the court said: "When the defendant in this case was arraigned and pleaded not guilty, and did not move to set aside the information, he was thereby precluded from taking the objection that he had not been examined and committed in the manner required by law." In the Bawden Case last cited, the court said: "A defendant, upon arraignment, may move to set aside the information upon the ground 'that before the filing thereof the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate,' and if the motion be not then made, the defendant is precluded from afterwards taking the objection."

[2] It is asserted that since the petitioner in the present proceeding was previously discharged upon a writ of habeas corpus, he could not be again legally imprisoned for the same cause. Section 1496 of the Penal Code does provide that:

"No person who has been discharged by the order of the court or judge upon habeas corpus can be again imprisoned, restrained, or kept in custody for the same cause, except in the following cases:

"1. * * *

"2. If, after a discharge for defect of proof, or for any defect of the process, warrant, or commitment in a criminal case, the prisoner is again arrested on sufficient proof and committed by legal process for the same offense."

Assuming that the superior court properly discharged the petitioner in the former application for a writ of habeas corpus "for defect of proof" at the original preliminary examination, clearly this section authorizes the arrest and re-examination of the accused for the same offense. If the petitioner was held for trial in the superior court in the present case upon insufficient evidence, that defect could be taken advantage of only upon motion to set aside the information pursuant to the provisions of section 995 of the Penal Code. It is unnecessary to pass upon the sufficiency of the evidence, since that want of evidence, if any such defect exists, was waived by failure to move to set aside the information prior to the entry of the petitioner's plea.

The petition for a writ of habeas corpus is denied.

It appeared that when plaintiff, who was driving at lawful speed, was about to enter intersection, he looked to the right and saw defendant's automobile 75 to 90 feet away approaching intersection at speed of 35 to 40 miles an hour, but plaintiff made no effort to stop. St. 1923, p. 560,  $\S$  131 (a), as amended by St. 1925, p. 412,  $\S$  15, provides that, when two vehicles approach intersection at approximately same time, vehicle approaching from right has right of way if traveling at lawful speed.

WARD, Justice pro tem.

This is an action for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff, Herman Clark, under the following circumstances: On August 2, 1929, the plaintiff was driving a 1927 Dodge coupé automobile in a westerly direction on Addison avenue in the city of Palo Alto. At the same time and place the defendant was driving a 1930 Nash sedan automobile in a southerly direction on Emerson street. At the intersection of these two streets the cars of the plaintiff and defendant collided. As the result of that collision the plaintiff sustained injuries. The plaintiff in his complaint charged the defendant with negligence in the operation of her automobile. The defendant denied any negligence on her part, and, as a separate defense, pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The case was tried before a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff. Judgment was entered accordingly. A motion for a new trial was denied, and defendant appealed.

[1, 2] Plaintiff, about to enter the intersection, saw defendant's car 75 to 90 feet away approaching the intersection at a speed of 35 to 40 miles an hour. Plaintiff, driving on the right side of the street at a lawful speed, made no effort to stop. It is the contention of appellant that the conduct of the plaintiff and respondent at the time and place of the accident which gave rise to the respondent's injuries was negligence as a matter of law, and that such negligence proximately contributed to the happening of the accident. Appellants cite Kinney v. King, 47 Cal. App. 390, 190 P. 834, but that was a case in which an ordinance was introduced which in effect provided that, when vehicles approach simultaneously, the vehicle approaching from the right has the right of way. In the case at bar the statute provided: "When * * * such vehicle is traveling at a lawful speed." Defendant was not traveling at a lawful rate of speed, and hence did not have the right of way. Appellant's position in effect is that plaintiff, going at a lawful rate of speed, seeing defendant approaching at an unlawful rate of speed, should have given the right of way. To lay down such a rule would be an invitation to speed-mad motorists to violate the law, and, if an accident should occur, to place the blame, as a matter of law, upon the driver operating within a lawful rate of speed. It is the duty of one operating within a lawful speed in approaching an intersection to "use due care to avoid colliding with another; he must be ever alert and watchful, so as not to place himself in danger, and, while he may assume that others will exercise due care, he cannot for that reason omit any of the care which the law demands of him." Flores v. Fitzgerald, 204 Cal. at page 377, 268 P. 369, 371.

[3-6] This case is a question of fact and not a question of law. In a case such as this where a claim of contributory negligence becomes an issue, the rule is the same. "Contributory negligence is a question of law only when the court is impelled to say that from the facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his injury." Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 336, 208 P. 125, 128. Otherwise contributory negligence is a question of fact for the jury. Flores v. Fitzgerald, supra, 204 Cal. at page 376, 268 P. 369. Appellants also cite Donat v. Dillon, 192 Cal. 426, 221 P. 193, but in that case the court did not decide that there was contributory negligence as a matter of law, but that it was contributory negligence as a matter of fact. Grillich v. Weinshenk, 64 Cal. App. 474, 222 P. 160, also cited by appellant, is a correct interpretation under the provision of the statutes at that time. See section 20 (f) of the California Vehicle Act, Stats. 1919, p. 215. We are not dealing with the statute as amended in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 541, § 55), but the statute in effect at the time of this accident, which provided as follows: "When two vehicles approach an intersection of public highways at approximately the same time, the vehicle approaching from the right shall have the right of way, provided such vehicle is traveling at a lawful speed." See section 131 (a), Stats. 1925, p. 412. In this case the plaintiff, driving westerly and the defendant southerly, approaching an intersection at approximately the same time, the defendant had the right of way provided his vehicle was traveling at a lawful speed. The question of his speed was a matter for the jury to determine, and, if the jury determined the speed to be unlawful, then it was their duty to determine if plaintiff approached and entered the intersection in a careful and prudent manner. By their verdict the jury determined these issues: "When therefore the issue is such that it must be left with the jury and the jury has returned a verdict for the plaintiff, we must assume that the jury found adversely to the defendant on the issue of contributory negligence. Such finding is just as conclusive on appeal as the jury's finding on the issue of defendant's negligence." Swartz v. Acme Express & Drayage Co., 102 Cal. App. 613, at page 619, 283 P. 358, 360.

[7] After the jury had been instructed on all legal questions appertaining to this case, the court made the following statement: "Those are the formal instructions, Ladies and Gentlemen, that I deem expedient to give you and which are applicable to the case. There are a few general instructions in regard to your duties as Jurors. * * * It seems to me the first thing that will be necessary to do would be, after electing a Foreman, that you will deliberate on the instructions given you with reference to contributory negligence. Did the alleged negligence of the Plaintiff in any way contribute to this accident, or was such alleged negligence the proximate cause of this accident? If nine of you should vote that it did, that the negligent driving of the plaintiff was the proximate cause of the accident, that ends the case, because then you cannot give any verdict for him against the defendant, if his contributory negligence was the proximate cause of the accident. If, however, nine of you should consider that his conduct and his actions in driving his automobile in this intersection, did not at all contribute or was not the proximate cause of the happening of this accident, then you will proceed to fix the damages, if any, that you think he is entitled to." Standing alone this instruction is clearly erroneous. It omitted and disregarded any question of negligence on the part of the defendant. However, other instructions stated the rule correctly, not once, but in six different instructions. This is the only instruction that appellant attacks. The whole charge taken together eliminates this one instruction as an accurate statement of the law applicable to this case. We do not believe that the jury was misled or that the erroneous instruction resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

Judgment and order are affirmed.

Alfred J. Hennessy, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and William F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen. (Seibert L. Sefton, of San Francisco, of counsel), for the People.

GRAY, Justice pro tem.

Appellant was convicted upon ten counts of an indictment, each charging a separate crime of grand theft. His motion for a new trial was granted as to the first nine counts, but was denied as to the last. This tenth count accused appellant of the crime of grand theft by charging that on June 11, 1930, he unlawfully took the sum of $260, the property of the complaining witness. From the order denying a new trial and the judgment imposing sentence upon this count, appellant appeals, urging as grounds for reversal: (1) The insufficiency of the evidence to establish the commission of the crime formerly designated as obtaining money by false pretenses, (2) the lack of corroboration of the alleged false pretense, (3) the court's error in denying his motion to strike from the record all of the testimony of the complaining witness because the latter in testifying used notes made subsequent to the events recorded, and

(4) misconduct of the district attorney in allowing such witness to so testify.

No attempt will be here made to detail the entire transaction between the parties covering a period of over six months and involving approximately $9,000 of complainant's money. Nor is it necessary to discuss several theories advanced by respondent upon which the judgment might be affirmed. But our attention will be confined solely to a consideration of the errors alleged by appellant, with a recital of only such evidence as is necessary to understand his contentions. Although there is merit in respondent's claim that the testimony would support a contrary finding by the jury, the correctness of appellant's statement, that he truthfully represented to complainant that he owned a valid and subsisting option to purchase a lease of oil and gas rights in certain Montana lands, will be conceded for present purposes. Appellant does not question that the evidence establishes the receipt by him from complainant of the sum of $260.

[1-6] In support of his first claim of error, appellant argues: (1) That the hereinafter quoted testimony contains the only representation upon which the count could be based, and (2) that such representation, being that he would ship a barrel of oil, was merely a promise to perform a future act, which legally is not a false pretense. But his first premise is incorrect because complainant, in a prior part of his testimony, testified that appellant had previously stated he was negotiating for the sale of the lease through Mr. Gilman to the Puget Sound Light & Power Company. The falsity of this representation was proven by Gilman's testimony denying such negotiations. It is unnecessary to prove all of the false representations claimed, provided that enough are proven to convince the jury that those shown were material in inducing the complainant to part with his money. People v. Fraser, 81 Cal. App. 281, 253 P. 340; People v. Griesheimer, 176 Cal. 44, 167 P. 521. Where two false representations are made, the jury is not compelled to find that either was the sole inducing cause. People v. Walker, 76 Cal. App. 192, 244 P. 94. The complaining witness testified: "On June 11, * * * Mr. Fisher told me that Mr. Gilman requested a barrel of oil sent from this property in Montana to Seattle to the Puget Sound Light and Power Company, where it was to be analyzed and tested to see if it was the oil the Puget Sound people wanted. He said the expense of sending this barrel of oil would be between $250.00 and $275.00. I gave him $260.00 for the purpose." Gilman testified he never made such request, and appellant on the stand admitted he never sent the oil. His denial of any recollection of such conversation was not a denial that he made such statement and, if it were so considered, it merely raised a conflict as to which the verdict is conclusive. People v. Hennessey, 201 Cal. 568, 258 P. 49. There is nothing in this testimony that warrants appellant's statement that the only representation therein contained was his promise to ship in the future a barrel of oil, and hence there is no basis in fact for his second premise. But, in the first sentence, there is a positive statement of the existence of a past fact, to wit, that he had an order for a barrel of oil, which was a false pretense. People v. Rothstein, 180 N. Y. 148, 72 N. E. 999, 1 Ann. Cas. 978.

[7] Equally untenable is appellant's second claim, that there is a lack of the corroboration required by section 1110 of the Penal Code. This is furnished by the testimony of Scott, that appellant had also represented to him that he was negotiating the sale of the lease to the Puget Sound Light & Power Company. People v. Whiteside, 58 Cal. App. 33, 208 P. 132. It is also supplied by his admissions of misrepresentations, including that as to the sale to the Puget Sound Light & Power Company, made to complainant in the presence of the latter's brother-in-law; by his conduct when, under investigation, in face of accusatory statements of other victims (People v. Wymer, 53 Cal. App. 204, 199 P. 815); and by his evasive, contradictory, and impeached testimony given at his trial. People v. Harrington, 92 Cal. App. 245, 267 P. 942.

[8-11] Near the end of his direct testimony the complaining witness, when asked if he recalled giving appellant any money on March 1, 1930, inquired if he might look at some notes and was told by the district attorney to do so. Then he testified that he gave certain sums on specific dates to appellant. On cross-examination, he stated that the notes were copied, after appellant's arrest, from a book which he then produced and in which he had entered at the time the date and amount of each payment to appellant. Later in the same cross-examination the court, at the request of appellant's attorney, ordered him not again to refer to the notes. At the close of the evidence, appellant's attorney moved to strike out all of the testimony of this witness on the ground that he had testified from notes written subsequent to the event recorded. Appellant assigns the denial of this motion as error. The objection is untenable, because the notes, while made after the event, were copies of entries made contemporaneously with the event. Assuming as correct counsel's misstatement of fact, notes made after the event may be used by the witness to refresh his memory, if they were made when the fact was fresh in his memory. Code Civ. Proc. § 2047; Paige v. Carter, 64 Cal. 489, 2 P. 260; 65 A. L. R.

1479, note. Since the notes were used in only part of the testimony, the motion to strike out all of the testimony was properly denied. 24 Cal. Jur. 778. The motion was also properly denied because the evidence was admitted without objection, although counsel had opportunity to object. 24 Cal. Jur. 780.

[12] Appellant's assignment of the district attorney's misconduct is supported only by his counsel's unsworn statement that the district attorney by standing between him and the witness had prevented him from seeing that the witness was using notes. But, even if this were so, counsel must have heard the witness' request to use the notes and was then advised that he was so doing. He also was advised early in his cross-examination as to the use of notes. However, the misconduct, if any, becomes immaterial as the notes were properly used.

Finding appellant's assignments of error untenable, the judgment is affirmed.

Evidence that defendant pasturing cattle on land was informed of sale under trust deed and that purchaser would attempt to recover for pasturage held sufficient notice of sale and demand for payment.

Respondent instituted this action to recover the sum of $2,000 for the use of pasturage on property which he owned in Imperial county. The case was tried before a jury. The court gave a peremptory instruction to return a verdict in favor of respondent in the sum of $928.20, upon which verdict the judgment was entered. From this judgment an appeal was taken.

At the time of the trial the attorneys for the respective parties entered into a written stipulation by the terms of which they agreed upon all materials facts of the case except one upon which evidence was introduced. From this stipulation it appears that on and prior to August 2, 1927, the Imperial Holdings Company, Incorporated, was the owner and in possession of the land upon which pasturage was had by the cattle of appellant. Prior to this date the above-named corporation had executed its promissory notes to respondent secured by deeds of trust upon this property. These deeds of trust were duly recorded at some time prior to August 2, 1927. On February 14, 1928, the Imperial Holdings Company was in default in its payments of principal and interest on these promissory notes, and respondent recorded notices of default under the trust deeds and took the necessary steps to foreclose the same. The real property was sold to him on June 11, 1928, under the second deed of trust. The sale under the first deed of trust was postponed by the trustee and was not held. On June 18, 1928, the trustee made and executed his deed under such sale conveying the real property to respondent. This deed was accepted by him before June 27, 1928, and was duly recorded on that date. It was further stipulated that the sale was held and conducted in all respects according to law and that the trustee's deed conveyed the title of the real property to respondent.

It further appears from the stipulation that the real property in question was planted to alfalfa. On August 2, 1927, appellant, with the consent and under an agreement with the Imperial Holdings Company, went into possession of the real property and pastured stock thereon, the value of the pasturage to be credited upon a former and concurrently accruing indebtedness from the Imperial Holdings Company to appellant. Appellant advanced the total sum of $14,115.93 to the Imperial Holdings Company, and the value of the pasturage used to and including the 11th day of June, 1928, was $12,290.91, leaving a balance of $1,825.02 of the indebtedness unpaid on this last date.

It was further stipulated that on the 11th day of June, 1928, appellant had 442 head of cattle pasturing on the property, which cattle remained thereon up to and including the 7th day of August, 1928. It was further stipulated "that the reasonable value of such pasturage so used by defendant was $22.10 per day from June 11th, to and including August 7th, 1928."

It is apparent from the judgment rendered that the trial court concluded respondent entitled to $22.10 per day for the forty-one days from June 27 to August 7, 1928, both dates inclusive.

[1] It is evident from the stipulation that the trustee's deed was delivered to and accepted by respondent before June 27, 1928, and that he thereupon became the owner of the property upon which the pasturage used by appellant was growing. This deed conveyed to him the title to the real property together with the crops growing thereon. He thereupon became the owner of the alfalfa which was pastured by appellant's cattle.

A similar situation is presented in the case of Penryn Co. v. Sherman-Worrell Co., 142 Cal. 643, 76 P. 484, 100 Am. St. Rep. 150, which is decisive of the issue presented on this appeal. The case of Shamlian v. Wells, 197 Cal. 716, 242 P. 483, supports this conclusion.

In the Penryn Case it was held as follows: "The deed of trust is not wholly set forth, but we understand that it was the ordinary form of the trust deed commonly used in this state.

* * * The crop in question was then growing on the trees, and was part of the realty, and the purchaser's title by relation took the date of the trust deed. The purchaser was at least in as good a position and had rights equal to those of a purchaser at foreclosure sale holding a deed, and having possession after the period of redemption had expired. Treating the sale here as a foreclosure where there is no right of redemption, and in view of the entry into possession under the sale by the purchaser, it is quite clear that neither the mortgagor—the grantor in the trust deed—nor his grantees under a crop mortgage executed subsequently to the trust deed would have the right to crops not severed at the time of the purchaser's deed and entry. * * *

As we read the opinions in Huerstal v. Muir, 64 Cal. 450, 2 P. 33, and Dasey v. Harris, 65 Cal. 357, 4 P. 204, cited by appellant, the growing crops unsevered are part of the realty, and, while such crops are for some purposes treated as personal property, they remain part of the realty so long as unsevered. As between the mortgagor and mortgagee of a chattel mortgage, all that appellant claims may be true, but the giving of such chattel mortgage has not the effect claimed when the rights of a purchaser under foreclosure sale are brought in question. Plaintiff took its mortgage with knowledge of the deed of trust, and that under it the bank had the right to enforce its claim by sale of the premises, and that a purchaser at such sale would take an absolute title to the land as of the date of the trust deed—a date prior to plaintiff's chattel mortgage, and that such deed would be free from any incumbrance subsequently placed upon the land."

[2] Appellant maintains that as its possession of the premises was lawful and under color of right on the 11th day of June, 1928, it could not be held for the value of the pasturage used by it without and until notice of the sale was given and demand of payment for the pasturage was made by respondent. We think the record contains sufficient evidence to support the conclusion that such notice was given and demand was made. Two witnesses testified as to such notice and demand, one on behalf of respondent and one on behalf of appellant. As the court withdrew the issue of fact from the jury by giving an instruction to return a verdict for respondent, we must consider the evidence most favorable to appellant in order to determine whether or not there was sufficient evidence of such notice and demand, if such were necessary, to justify the trial court in giving the instruction.

F. L. Lathrop, one of the officers of appellant, testified that either on June 12th, or June 19th, one of the attorneys for respondent came to appellant's office and that the following occurred: "He (the attorney) said, 'Mr. Lathrop, I presume that you have learned that we bought in the 202 Ranch by our trust deed yesterday.' I said I didn't know it, but I took that much for granted that you were going to, and he said 'Yes, we did.' He said, 'How many cattle have you got out there at the present time on the 202 Ranch,' and I said 'Four Hundred and forty head.' He said, 'What pasture are you paying out there,' and I said 'One Dollar and fifty cents.' 'Well,' he said, 'of course from now on, Mr. Phillips will expect this pasture to be paid to him,' and I said, 'Well, that makes it kind of a tough deal out of it, we have advanced quite a good deal of money for the raising of crops and are short about two thousand dollars, and I am going to stay on the place and try to feed our money out.' Mr. Hickcox said, 'I don't know a thing about the cattle, but Mr. Phillips will be out here in the next two or three days, and you and Mr. Phillips can make your own deal.' I said, 'All right.'"

[3] It is evident from the foregoing testimony that appellant had notice of the sale and had notice that respondent would demand payment for the pasturage used by appellant. This evidence does not show any agreement as to the amount to be paid for this pasturage, but it is evident that some amount would be demanded by respondent. Appellant was informed in this conversation that if it continued to occupy the premises and use the pasturage respondent would attempt to recover for it. This was sufficient notice to appellant, and the parties having stipulated as to the value of this pasturage there was no issue of fact left to be submitted to the jury. In determining the number of days this pasturage was used, the court took the period most favorable to appellant; that is, from June 27 to August 7, 1928, inclusive. Respondent was entitled to recover the value of the use and occupancy of his premises for this period.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Usury ⇨119.

Whether loan is usurious is pure question of fact.

2. Appeal and error ⇨901.

Defendant must show that findings adverse to him have no substantial support in evidence.

3. Usury ⇨113.

Borrower claiming loan was usurious had burden of establishing affirmative issue that he delivered stock to lender as bonus or consideration for loan, and that true value of stock, with interest paid, constituted interest payment of money or value exceeding 12 per cent.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued for $3,500, the balance due on a promissory note. Defendant admitted the execution of the note and pleaded that the transaction was usurious. The cause was tried without a jury. Plaintiff had judgment as prayed, and defendant appeals upon a bill of exceptions.

On September 21, 1927, defendant wired plaintiff's assignor: "We will gladly pay you five thousand shares (stock in New England Consolidated Mines Company) as bonus for the loan of five thousand dollars for ninety days." Plaintiff's assignor wired back: "Company will make loan if you endorse note. Seven per cent interest after maturity." On the same day plaintiff's assignor wrote a letter to defendant in which he stated: "Just received your wire asking for loan of $5,000, for ninety days, without interest, but with a bonus of 5000 shares of your Mine Company's stock. * * * You will notice though that as I do not know anything about the financial complexion of the Mining Company, I am asking you to endorse the note, and to make it read 7% interest after maturity, should it not be paid in time." On September 23 following defendant mailed his personal note in conformity with these instructions and at the same time wired plaintiff's assignor to send him $2,000 through Western Union and to mail certified check for $3,000. This was done. Defendant received the full sum of $5,000 and plaintiff's assignor received the note in suit. On October 8, 1927, defendant mailed to plaintiff's assignor a certificate for 5,000 shares of the mining company without any further explanation or direction as to the purpose of sending it. The certificate was received and retained by plaintiff's assignor. Payments of $1,500 were made upon the note, together with one payment of interest in the sum of $90.43. Prior to the commencement of the action plaintiff's assignor tendered the return of the stock as worthless. The judgment covers the balance due on the note and interest and $350 as attorney's fees.

[1, 2] On this appeal the appellant states two points—that the transaction was usurious, and that in an action for the principal sum loaned the borrower may set off the value of the bonus paid in contravention of the usury statute. The second point may be conceded. The first is a pure question of fact. The findings on this issue are adverse to appellant, hence it is incumbent upon him to show that these findings have no substantial support in the evidence.

[3] The contract does not rest in the original offer of appellant because it was not accepted. The qualifications made by respondent's assignor were accepted by the appellant, and these form the contract. This was a simple contract to loan money at 7 per cent. interest. The subsequent delivery of the stock, whether given as a bonus, or as a security for the loan, was not part of the contract. Appellant did not prove his affirmative defense of usury by the mere showing that the stock was sent to and received by respondent's assignor. It was incumbent upon him to show the purpose of the delivery of the stock—that it was a consideration for the loan—and that its true value, taken with the rate of interest paid, completed an interest payment of money or value in excess of 12 per cent.

The trial court found that the stock was not given as a bonus or fee in consideration for the loan. Appellant's only evidence on this issue is found in his own testimony. Here we find him testifying that he sent the stock as a bonus for the loan; that he did not send it for that purpose; that he sent it in full payment of the note; that he did not send it for that purpose; and, finally, that the note was paid in full by the delivery of the stock. Upon this testimony we cannot say that the trial court erred in finding that appellant had not sustained the burden of proof which the law puts upon him to establish his affirmative issue.

Upon the second point there is a direct conflict in the testimony of the two witnesses called to prove the value of the stock. One testified that it was "worth par one dollar" a share; the other testified that it had no market value. Upon cross-examination of the first witness it was shown that he had no knowledge of the value of the stock, but was merely speaking of the paper value of the shares. Upon this issue as well the burden of proof was on the appellant. Having failed to prove any defense, he has failed to show any error in the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

Thomas R. White, of San Francisco, and C. H. McIntosh, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Cross & Brandt, of San Francisco, for respondent.

Mr. Justice KNIGHT delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal by defendant from an adverse judgment in an action to recover the sum of $2,000 which plaintiff claims was loaned by him to the defendant at the latter's request to enable defendant to purchase certain shares of stock in a mining corporation which the parties were organizing. The defendant denied that the money advanced by plaintiff constituted a loan, but the trial court, sitting without a jury, found otherwise, and in our opinion there is sufficient evidence to support such finding.

[1, 2] It appears from the record that plaintiff and others had contributed certain sums of money to a so-called prospecting fund to send defendant to Venezuela to examine certain mining properties in that country, the amount of the plaintiff's contribution thereto being $1,000. Upon defendant's return his report was submitted and an "equipment" fund was created by the same parties for the purpose of operating the property, to which plaintiff subscribed $5,000, half of which was paid at the time the subscription was made. A corporation was then organized under the laws of Nevada, of which defendant became the president; and at a meeting subsequently held in San Francisco certificates of stock were delivered to those who had contributed and subscribed to the funds above mentioned in proportion to the amount of their contributions and subscriptions. When plaintiff's certificates were handed to him he noted that they called for 5,000 shares of preferred stock and 35,000 shares of common stock in excess of the amount he had contributed and subscribed, which excess stock represented a value of $5,000. According to the testimony given by plaintiff and other witnesses called in his behalf he protested, stating that he had not subscribed for the amount of stock called for by the certificates, and that he would not accept it, and he demanded that the certificates be reissued for the correct amount. However, plaintiff and defendant were intending to proceed at once to Venezuela, and the process of obtaining corrected certificates would have delayed their departure because it would have been necessary to send the erroneous certificates back to Reno, Nev., and have new ones issued and signed by the resident secretary of the corporation. Defendant called attention to this situation, and in order to avoid the delay agreed with plaintiff, according to the testimony supporting the trial court's finding, that he would take over a portion of the excess stock called for by said certificates to the extent of $2,000, if plaintiff would lend him the money to pay for the same, stating that he would repay plaintiff after receiving three or four months' salary from the company. Plaintiff consented to do so, but before advancing the $2,000 insisted that defendant give him a "receipt showing the transaction." Thereupon defendant dictated, signed, and delivered to plaintiff an instrument reading as follows: "March 10th, 1925. Received from Andy Anderson the sum of two thousand ($2000) dollars in currency to be applied on my subscriptions to Venezuela Gold. [signed] Venezuela Gold, Inc. by R. D. Adams." (Italics ours.) Plaintiff objected to the form of the document, and particularly to the presence therein of the words "Venezuela Gold, Inc.," preceding defendant's signature, but in response to the objection defendant stated, in substance, according to plaintiff's witnesses, that the receipt was all right, that as friends they understood its meaning, which was all that was necessary, and that he would soon be able to take care of the matter. Thereupon plaintiff retained the certificates as issued and later paid the balance of $3,000 for his portion of the excess stock; but defendant refused to repay plaintiff the $2,000 which he had advanced for him under the circumstances above stated.

It is evident, we think, without discussion, that the foregoing evidence is legally sufficient to sustain the trial court's conclusion that the transaction constituted a loan. At the trial defendant admitted that a dispute arose over the contents of the certificates, but denied asking plaintiff to lend or advance him $2,000 or any other sum with which to purchase a portion of the excess stock, claiming that the proposition made by him was that, if plaintiff did not care to take the excess amount of stock, the company would relieve him of it later by reselling the same. His explanation for having given the receipt, however, was evidently unsatisfactory to the trial court; and in any event it is apparent that the testimony given by defendant tended only to create a conflict on the points to which it related; and, since it was within the exclusive province of the trial court to pass upon the weight of the testimony, its decision in the matter is controlling on appeal.

[3] Defendant further contends that at most the evidence as a whole establishes nothing more than an oral agreement between plaintiff and defendant for the purchase and sale of certain stock for a consideration of $2,000, and that therefore such agreement was invalid and unenforceable under section 1739 of the Civil Code, which requires agreements to buy and sell personal property for a price of $200 or more to be in writing, unless the buyer accepts part of the property or pays a portion of the purchase price. It is well settled, however, that, if the evidence is such that reasonable minds might fairly draw different conclusions therefrom, the conclusion reached by the jury, or the court sitting as such, is final and cannot be disturbed on appeal. 2 Cal. Jur. 934. Therefore, since, as pointed out, the trial court's conclusion in the present case that the transaction constituted a loan is founded on substantial evidence, it is conclusive on appeal, even though, as defendant contends, there was evidence which may have justified a different conclusion. Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513; Brandes v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co., 102 Cal. App. 221, 282 P. 1009; Cole v. Manning, 79 Cal. App. 55, 248 P. 1065. The remaining incidental points urged by defendant are likewise without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem.

The original complaint in this action was filed in the office of the county clerk of Los Angeles county, on August 8, 1927. Three amended complaints were thereafter filed. Demurrers to all of them were sustained, with leave to amend. Failing to amend the third amended complaint, judgment of dismissal of the action was made and entered, and the plaintiffs have appealed from said judgment.

The third amended complaint alleges that the Julian Petroleum Corporation is a Delaware corporation, with its offices and principal place of business in the city of Los Angeles, county of Los Angeles, state of California; that on May 19, 1927, the Perkins Oil Well Cementing Company, a California corporation, commenced an action against the said Julian Petroleum Corporation, and the California Eastern Oil Company, another Delaware corporation, in the District Court of the United States, Southern District of California, Southern Division.

The complaint in said last-named action is made a part of the third amended complaint in the case at bar, and so far as it is necessary for a consideration of this appeal, it alleges that within two years last past the Julian Petroleum Corporation became indebted to the plaintiff in that action for services performed, in the sum of $5,554.85, and is unpaid and unsecured; that prior to the commencement of said action and subsequent to the incurring of all of said indebtedness due the plaintiff, the defendant California Eastern Oil Company for a valuable consideration assumed and agreed to pay all of the indebtedness of every kind and character of the defendant Julian Petroleum Corporation, including the indebtedness owed by said company to the plaintiff; that the assumption of all of the indebtedness by the California Eastern Oil Company was for the benefit of all of the creditors of the defendant Julian Petroleum Corporation, and said assumption of indebtedness has not been revoked or set aside, and is now in full force and effect; that such assumption was made on April 23, 1927, by an instrument in writing.

That the said action was brought by the complainant therein, for and on behalf of all the other creditors of both the California Eastern Oil Company and the Julian Petroleum Corporation; that prior to April 23, 1927, the Julian Petroleum Corporation was engaged in business in California and other states in the oil and other allied industries; that the indebtedness of the Julian Petroleum Corporation assumed by the California Eastern Oil Company was in excess of the sum of $12,000,000; that the assets held by the Julian Petroleum Corporation are now owned by the California Eastern Oil Company and exceed in value the sum of $30,000,000, subject, however, to the said indebtedness; that most of said indebtedness is now due, and unless a receiver is appointed for both of said companies, there will be a multiplicity of suits and the assets of said two corporations will be irreparably lost.

It is further alleged therein that the California Eastern Oil Company issued and delivered to the Julian Petroleum Corporation, 1,828,436 shares of the capital stock of the said California Eastern Oil Company, which is a majority of the stock of the last-named corporation, and by virtue of the holding of said stock, the Julian Petroleum Corporation has control of the California Eastern Oil Company. It is then alleged in appropriate terms that the properties held by the said defendants require large sums of money to operate them and that the defendants are without funds or credit; and that it is necessary in order to save the property of said corporations that the operation of their business should continue without interruption, in order to comply with the conditions and obligations of certain leases and agreements, under which large portions of the property of said corporation are held.

There are further allegations concerning the business of the Julian Petroleum Corporation and the California Eastern Oil Company, showing the necessity for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the properties of said defendants, and to administer the same for the purpose of preventing bankruptcy and irreparable loss. Among other things, it is asked that receivers be appointed to take charge of and operate the property of the defendant.

It is further alleged in the complaint in the case at bar, that the defendants in said action above referred to, the Julian Petroleum Corporation and the California Eastern Oil Company, filed answers admitting all of the allegations of the complaint in that action, and consented to all the relief sought by the complaint.

It is also alleged in the third amended complaint in the case at bar that a complaint in intervention by one Michael Harris, was filed in the other action, alleging that plaintiff therein is a stockholder in the Julian Petroleum Corporation and setting forth the transfer on the 23d day of April, 1927, by the Julian Petroleum Corporation to the California Eastern Oil Company, of all the physical assets of the Julian Petroleum Corporation, in consideration of the issuance to it by the California Eastern Oil Company of 1,828,346 shares of the common stock of the California Eastern Oil Company; that the California Eastern Oil Company has obligations in excess of $12,000,000 which will become due within a period of four months, and that said obligations are not permanently financed, and no part of said debts can be paid by said company, California Eastern Oil Company; that the disposition of the assets at forced sale will cause great and irreparable loss.

It is further alleged in the complaint in intervention in said action, that as to the capital stock of the Julian Petroleum Corporation, great uncertainty exists as to the amount issued and its ownership and as to whether the directors of said Julian Petroleum Corporation, in authorizing the transaction of the sale of its properties to the California Eastern Oil Company, were regularly and duly elected directors of said corporation. The relief sought in said action is that the creditors of the defendant, Julian Petroleum Corporation, and California Eastern Oil Company, be brought into court and required to set forth their claims against the said companies; that the complainant have judgment for $5,554.85, for the appointment of a receiver, the marshaling of the assets of the companies, and to do such other things as may be meet and proper in the premises.

It is further alleged in the third amended complaint in the case at bar, that an answer to the complaint, and, also, to the complaint in intervention in that action, was filed by the Julian Petroleum Corporation and, also, by the California Eastern Oil Company, admitting all of the allegations of said complaint, and the complaint in intervention, and consenting to the relief sought for by both the complaint and the complaint in intervention. It also appears from the third amended complaint in the case at bar, that on May 19, 1927, the District Court of the United States appointed the plaintiffs in this action, receivers of the properties of the defendant, Julian Petroleum Corporation, and California Eastern Oil Company, in that action.

It is further alleged in the third amended complaint in the case at bar that on July 1, 1927, the said United States District Court made an order that the receivers in that action, to wit, Joseph Scott and H. L. Carnahan, were "authorized, empowered and directed whenever it shall be deemed by them advisable or necessary or proper, so to do, to institute in the proper courts of the state of California any and all suits necessary to carry out their powers and duties as receiver, and necessary to subject and reduce to their possession, any properties, real, personal or mixed, of the Julian Petroleum Corporation or the California Eastern Oil Company; and the commencement of any such suits by the receivers, as such receiver, already commenced by them, is hereby ratified and approved."

On March 12, 1928, said United States District Court made and entered a nunc pro tunc order purporting to amend the order last recited, by giving to the said receivers the right to prosecute any action to recover any debt or penalty or obligation of any kind and character due or to become due the said corporations, under and pursuant to the Usury Law of the state of California, or growing out of, or pertaining to any act or acts in violation of the said Usury Law.

It is further alleged in the third amended complaint in the case at bar that the said action in the United States District Court is still pending and undetermined, and that the orders made as aforesaid, are still in full force and effect.

It is further alleged therein that the receivers appointed in said action have taken over and are now in full management of all of the properties of the Julian Petroleum Corporation and the California Eastern Oil Company, as such receivers, and are managing the same in such capacity, with full power and authority to do so, and with full power and authority to prosecute and maintain all actions to recover for the benefit of the said corporations, their stockholders and creditors, all the properties, assets, moneys due, or to become due, to the said Julian Petroleum Corporation, and are specifically authorized to maintain all and every action of every kind and character necessary to recover any debts or penalties or obligations of any kind or character, due or to become due the said corporation under or pursuant to the Usury Law of the state of California.

It is further alleged therein that on or about December 11, 1926, the Julian Petroleum Corporation became and was indebted to the defendant in the present action, W. I. Hollingsworth, in the sum of $100,000, and that the latter was then entitled to enforce the said indebtedness; that it was then and there a thing in action held by said defendant Hollingsworth against the said Julian Petroleum Corporation, and due and enforceable according to law; and that as a forbearance of the said W. I. Hollingsworth not to press and enforce his claim of $100,000 against the said Julian Petroleum Corporation and in consideration of an extension of time, the said Julian Petroleum Corporation agreed to pay and on or about the 11th day of December, 1926, did pay to said W. I. Hollingsworth the sum of at least $19,000; and that the said W. I. Hollingsworth then and there, knowingly, received and accepted from the said Julian Petroleum Corporation, the said sum of at least $19,000, for and in consideration of said forbearance for the said period of one month to press and enforce his claim for $100,000 against the said Julian Petroleum Corporation.

It is then alleged that by reason of said transaction, the Julian Petroleum Corporation is entitled to treble the amount of said money so paid to defendant, being the sum of $57,000.

It is alleged in a second and third count of the complaint the same state of facts, except that the Julian Petroleum Corporation paid, and the defendant received the sum of $19,000 for two additional extensions of time of thirty days each.

The fourth cause of action sets forth the same facts for another thirty days' extension of time, except that it is alleged that the Julian Petroleum Corporation agreed to pay and thereafter did pay to said W. I. Hollingsworth the sum of at least $19,000 in money, or the equivalent thereof.

The prayer is for the sum of $228,000, with legal interest thereon from the several dates of the receipt by the defendant of the usurious interest.

The demurrer to the third amended complaint sets forth many grounds wherein it is alleged that said complaint is insufficient as a pleading. According to the appellants, but two of them are worthy of consideration. These are, that no cause of action is stated in the complaint, and that the receivers have not the legal capacity to sue. We will consider these objections together. The Usury Law of California is found in Statutes 1919, page lxxxiii. Section 1 of said act first fixes the legal rate of interest at 7 per cent. per annum, with a proviso that parties may contract in writing for a rate of interest not to exceed 12 per cent. per annum. Section 2 provides that an agreement for interest in conflict with the foregoing section shall be null and void as to any stipulation to pay interest and no action at law to recover interest in any form shall be maintained and the debt itself cannot be declared due until the full period of time it was contracted for has elapsed.

[1] The first paragraph of section 3 reads as follows: "Every person, company, association or corporation, who for any loan or forbearance of money, goods or things in action shall have paid or delivered any greater sum or value than is allowed to be received under the preceding sections, one and two, may either in person or his or its personal representative, recover in an action at law against the person, company, association or corporation who shall have taken or received the same, or his or its personal representative, treble the amount of the money so paid or value delivered in violation of said sections, providing such action shall be brought within one year after such payment or delivery." The second paragraph of section 3 makes unlawful certain acts which may be used as subterfuges to circumvent the purpose of the act. The first consideration before us is whether or not the treble interest which may be collected under the Usury Law is a debt or a statutory penalty. Since the argument of this case, we think the law has been definitely settled by the decisions of the Supreme Court that the treble interest provided for in said act, is a statutory penalty. This question has been so determined in Esposti v. Rivers Bros., Inc., 207 Cal. 570, 573, 279 P. 423, 424; it is held "that the right which the original maker of a usurious note and mortgage is given under section 3 of the Usury Act to recover such interest and to treble the same is in the nature of a statutory penalty, and, under the authorities from other jurisdictions, which we hereby approve, is not assignable." The cases cited from other jurisdictions which are approved are: Pardoe v. Iowa State Bank, 106 Iowa, 345, 76 N. W. 800; Lloyd v. First National Bank, 5 Kan. App. 512, 47 P. 575; Robinson v. St. Maries Lumber Co., 34 Idaho, 707, 204 P. 671; 21 R. C. L., p. 211, § 6; Wilson v. Shrader, 73 W. Va. 105, 79 S. E. 1083, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 886, 893, and notes; Allen v. Petty, 58 S. C. 240, 36 S. E. 586; First State Bank, etc., v. Bank of Jefferson, 112 Okl. 177, 240 P. 311. See, also, Peterson et al. v. Ball et al. (Cal. Sup.) 296 P. 291. That the interest and treble interest is in the nature of a debt and not a penalty, the appellant relies upon the case of Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Co., 200 Cal. 609, 254 P. 956, 255 P. 805, 53 A. L. R. 725. But as we construe the Haines Case, it merely holds that the interest and treble interest provided for in the Usury Act partakes sufficiently of the nature of an action of debt to sustain offsets and counterclaims. In any event that such interest is a penalty and not a debt is the plain holding in Esposti v. Rivers Bros., Inc., supra.

The next question to be considered is whether a cause of action for a statutory penalty can be assigned or whether it is purely personal to the injured party. We think that a cause of action for a statutory penalty may not be assigned. Such is the holding in Esposti v. Rivers Bros., Inc., supra. In Peterson et al. v. Ball et al., supra, it is held that the cause of action which accrued in favor of the corporation and against the directors of said corporation, being in the nature of a statutory penalty, was not assignable and the plaintiffs, trustees by assignment for the benefit of the creditors of the corporation, were not entitled to recover against the defendants.

[2] The principle upon which this rule of law is founded is in the fact that the assignability of penalties encourages litigation and strife. The same principles of public policy forbid the conversion of penalties into commodities or assets. Wilson v. Shrader, 73 W. Va. 105, 79 S. E. 1083, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 886. We are therefore satisfied that the right of action to recover the treble interest was personal to the Julian Petroleum Corporation, and was not assignable, unless the plaintiffs, as receivers in the action of the Perkins Oil Well Cementing Company, Plaintiff, v. Julian Petroleum Corporation, and the California Eastern Oil Company, Defendants, are the "personal representatives" of the Julian Petroleum Corporation, within the meaning of the first paragraph of section 3 of the Usury Law. In volume 18, English and American Encyclopedia of Law (2d Ed.) p. 813, it is said: "The primary and ordinary meaning of the terms * * * 'personal representatives' * * * is executors and administrators, and in the absence of anything to show a contrary intent, they must be so construed." See, also, Davis v. Davis, 26 Cal. 23, 85 Am. Dec. 157. However, "the terms * * * 'personal representatives,' etc., are often used in statutes * * * in a broader sense, so as to include all persons who stand in place of and represent the interest of another, either by his act or by operation of law." 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 814. It is a rule of universal application that trustees in bankruptcy are "personal representatives" and entitled to sue for penalties derived by virtue of a statute. Wright v. First National Bank (Circuit Court, D. of Indiana, Gresham, District Judge) Fed. Cas. No. 18078; Monongahela Nat. Bank v. Overholt, 96 Pa. 327. This rule seems to be based upon the law that the trustees of an estate of a bankrupt are vested by operation of law with the title of the bankrupt, Federal Bankruptcy Act, Vol. 11, U. S. Code Ann., § 110. Referring to the powers of receivers, it is said in Baldwin Century Edition of Bouvier's Law Dictionary, page 1025: "A receiver is a ministerial officer of the court, with no power but those conferred by his order of appointment and the practice of the court." In 23 Ruling Case Law, p. 9, it is said: "As a general rule, a receivership is a purely ancillary remedy and cannot be maintained in a proceeding instituted solely for that purpose, to be finally disposed of as that court may direct. It is held to be a proceeding quasi in rem, and is classed as one of the provisional remedies, like the proceedings by information or in attachment, and bears a similar relation to courts of equity that proceedings in attachment bear to courts of law." In 22 California Jurisprudence, § 2, it is said: "He, (a receiver) is an officer or representative of the court, appointed on behalf of all the parties who may establish rights in the cause, to take the charge and management of property which is the subject of litigation, for the purpose of preservation and ultimate disposition, according to the final judgment therein."

It is also said in 22 California Jurisprudence, p. 429, § 3: "There is a clear distinction between a receivership in a liquidation proceeding and one which is but a provisional remedy. * * *" In the same book, page 433, section 8, it is further said: "There is in California no such thing as an action brought distinctively for the mere appointment of a receiver." Murray v. Superior Court, 129 Cal. 628, 62 P. 191; Ex parte Casey, 71 Cal. 269, 12 P. 118; In re French Bank Case, 53 Cal. 495; Hobson v. Pac. States Mercantile Co., 5 Cal. App. 94, 89 P. 866. "The subdivisions of section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure prescribing the cases when a receiver may be appointed do not assume to create substantive rights of action where none existed before, but are designed to provide a more efficacious remedy in the conduct of actions, the right to bring which already exists and is elsewhere provided for. (French Bank Case, 53 Cal. 495.) Appointment of a receiver is not a special proceeding, but one in a pending action, auxiliary or ancillary to the action and a part of it." Murray v. Superior Court, 129 Cal. 628, 62 P. 191.

According to the third amended complaint, the main object of the action in which these plaintiffs were appointed receivers was as stated in respondent's opening brief, "to settle the intricate and involved question of ownership of stock in the (Julian Petroleum) Corporation; to determine whether the same was properly or improperly issued; to settle and validate the transfer of properties to the California Eastern Oil Co.; to quiet title of the California Eastern Oil Co., thereto, and to have the latter corporation pay all of the debts of the Julian Co., etc. Clearly, the extremely limited work of the receivers in caring for the few assets of the Julian Company is merely ancillary to a determination of the questions just outlined, and entirely independent thereof." It further appears from the said complaint that the Julian Petroleum Corporation is solvent. The principle decided in the case of Peterson et al. v. Ball et al., supra, is applicable to the case here. In that case, the five plaintiffs were trustees by assignment for the benefit of the creditors of the insolvent Bartlett Music Company; the defendants were at one time the directors of the said insolvent corporation, and while acting as such, contracted debts in excess of the subscribed capital stock thereof, and under section 309 of the Civil Code as it then stood, each one of said directors became "in their individual or private capacity, jointly and severally liable to the corporation, and to the creditors thereof, to the full amount of the * * * debt contracted. * * *" The trial court granted a motion for judgment on the pleadings in favor of the defendants. The Supreme Court held the action was for a statutory penalty, and therefore not assignable, and the trustees for the creditors by assignment were not entitled to maintain the action.

Two cases strongly relied upon by appellants to support their claim that receivers have a right to sue for a statutory penalty are National Bank v. Trimble, 40 Ohio St. 629, and Barbour v. National Exchange Bank, 45 Ohio St. 133, 12 N. E. 5. In the former case it is stated: "If the payor of such interest, before action brought, was adjudged a bankrupt, his assignee in bankruptcy became his 'legal representative,' and as such was entitled to bring the action." In the latter case, the doctrine in National Bank v. Trimble, was affirmed. In both cases, the party payor was alleged to be bankrupt. Whatever the doctrine may be elsewhere, we are of the opinion that the facts alleged in the third amended complaint herein do not constitute the plaintiffs the "personal representatives" within the meaning of the Usury Law. Therefore, the said amended complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

Counsel for defendant has presented many other grounds of demurrer which he claims justified the order of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer. If we are correct in our conclusions as above set forth, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the other questions.

The judgment is affirmed.

HOUSER, J.

From the record presented on this appeal it appears that for the sum of $4,250 defendant purchased from plaintiff's assignor a two-thirds interest in "one ambulance, all the furnishings and equipment located down stairs at 1011 North Wilmington street, Compton, California, and all outstanding contracts with any person, corporation, or municipality, the subject of which are the performance of duties connected with the undertaking business, which the said lessor has this day entrusted to the care of the undersigned." In payment thereof, defendant executed what is entitled a "purchase lease," which in effect was an installment promissory note for the sum of $4,000, to which was annexed a conditional sale contract of the property hereinbefore mentioned and which contract contained several statements and conditions, including the fact that the "lessor has agreed and promised that upon the payment of said note * * * it will sell and transfer" to defendant the ambulance and other property described in said instrument. Thereupon defendant paid a portion of the principal of said note and went into, and at all times thereafter remained, in exclusive possession of the property, with the exception that the ambulance, which was of the value of $475, and certain other personal property of the value of $100, were thereafter "repossessed" by other persons who asserted and apparently established title thereto. However, defendant never rescinded the contract. The balance remaining due on said obligation not having been paid, plaintiff (to whom said "purchase lease" had been assigned) brought an action against defendant, which resulted in a judgment in favor of plaintiff for said balance, interest thereon, and attorney's fees according to the terms of the contract, less a credit of two-thirds of the value of the ambulance and the other personal property of which defendant had been dispossessed as aforesaid. It is from such judgment that defendant has appealed to this court.

[1] Appellant contends that one who relies upon an agreement such as is the basis for the action here under consideration must both "allege and prove performance, or a tender of performance, of the contract." But, considering the fact that after the execution of the contract defendant was placed in possession of the property, in which situation, with the exception of that portion thereof of which he was dispossessed, he so remained without any attempt on his part to rescind the contract, it must be presumed that, notwithstanding such untoward existing conditions, he ratified the agreement between him and plaintiff's assignor. In such circumstances, as is indicated in the case of Arnois v. Bell, 70 Cal. App. 222, 232 P. 758 (syllabus), "the seller is not required to tender to the purchaser a bill of sale of the property sold as a condition precedent to demanding payment of the balance of the purchase price. * * *"

[2] Nor did the fact that there was a partial failure of consideration for the promissory note of defendant have the effect of voiding the entire contract. In 19 California Jurisprudence, at page 1002, occurs the following statement of the law: "Absence or failure of consideration is matter of defense as against any person not a holder in due course; and partial failure of consideration is a defense pro tanto, whether the failure is an ascertained and liquidated amount or otherwise. This has long been the law in California"—citing cases.

And in 13 Corpus Juris, page 368, the law is thus declared: "Where there is a failure of a part of a lawful consideration the part which failed is simply a nullity and imparts no taint to the residue. * * *" To the same effect, see Easton Packing Co. v. Kennedy, 6 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 626, 63 P. 130; Knobloch v. Bader, 18 Cal. App. 421, 123 P. 341.

It follows that the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

The complaint is in the usual form, alleging title on a tax deed. Among the parties defendant it names Porter C. Blackburn, appellant herein. The complaint was filed with the county clerk and summons issued thereon on the 1st day of October, 1928, and was served on appellant on June 19, 1929. Thereafter and on February 21, 1930, the default of the appellant with others was entered by the clerk.

The only defendants answering were Robert Davis, commonly known as Bob Davis, and Annabell Davis. Subsequently they appeared in court by counsel and moved the court to have their answers stricken from the record, which motion was granted by the court.

A trial of the issues was had by the court on March 25, 1930, at which time the court rendered judgment for plaintiff, quieting title to certain lands in Imperial county, as prayed for.

[1, 2] Subsequently and on May 24, 1930, appellant filed his notice of appeal. The default of defendant having been duly and regularly entered, was conclusive of his rights in the case. By failing to answer the complaint he admitted all of the facts alleged therein. A defendant against whom a default is entered is out of court and is not entitled to take any further steps in the cause affecting plaintiff's right of action. *Christerson v. ### KNIGHT, J.

The trial court, sitting without a jury, awarded plaintiff a judgment against the defendants for the sum of $1,853.59, in an action for damages based upon the alleged negligence of defendants in operating a motortruck, and defendants have appealed, contending as sole ground for reversal that the evidence is insufficient to support the trial court's finding on the issue of defendants' negligence.

In lieu of a reporter's transcript, the parties entered into a written stipulation setting forth the material portions of the evidence adduced at the trial, and incorporated the stipulation in the clerk's transcript. It appears therefrom without dispute that about 9:30 o'clock in the morning a motortruck owned and operated by defendants crashed into the rear end of plaintiff's touring car as it stood parked next to and parallel with the curb on the right-hand side of the street, hurling the car against plaintiff, who was standing on the curb next to his automobile, knocking him unconscious, breaking his collar bone, and inflicting other serious injuries upon his person. The driver of the truck and two men who were riding with him at the time of the accident testified in explanation thereof that they were compelled to turn sharply from their course into plaintiff's automobile to avoid colliding with an automobile driven by some woman, unknown to them, who swerved directly in front of their truck. But in direct contradiction of such explanation, the "plaintiff and his two witnesses testified," so the written stipulation states, "that at the time of the accident there was no traffic moving on said highway except the truck of defendants."

[1] It will be seen at once, therefore, that there is a sharp conflict in the testimony relating to the single question of fact controlling the determination of the case, namely, whether the presence of another automobile caused defendants suddenly to divert their course, as claimed by them. Indeed, defendants concede the existence of such conflict, but they argue that in deciding the disputed question of fact the trial court should have believed their witnesses instead of plaintiff and his two witnesses. In other words, the only foundation for the appeal is a claimed preponderance of evidence in favor of defendants, notwithstanding that the finding of the trial court on the vital question of fact in the case is directly and substantially supported by testimony adduced on the part of plaintiff. Such an appeal is held to be frivolous. Holcomb v. Breitkreutz, 180 Cal. 17, 179 P. 162; Brannigan v. Miller, 35 Cal. App. 292, 169 P. 696.

[2-4] Moreover, the undisputed facts of the case, showing among other things that plain-tiff's automobile at the time it was struck was parked alongside of the curb, are amply sufficient to satisfy every essential element of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur; and consequently the inference of defendants' negligence arising therefrom in itself is legally sufficient to sustain the trial court's finding on that issue, regardless of the supporting testimony given by plaintiff and his two witnesses. In this respect the case is identical in principle with Bauhofer v. Crawford, 16 Cal. App. 676, 117 P. 931, 932, wherein a passing automobile struck a milk wagon standing alongside of the street, injuring the driver of the wagon as he was alighting from the wagon to serve a customer; and in applying the rule of presumed negligence the court said: "The rule thus invoked [arising from the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur] is laid down in the case of Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146, 40 P. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, and a number of other California cases as follows: 'When the thing which causes the accident is shown to be under the management and control of the defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have such management and control use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from the want of ordinary care by the defendant.' Under such circumstances, proof of the happening of the event raises a presumption of the defendant's negligence, and casts upon the defendant the burden of showing that ordinary care was exercised." In the present case the defendants did not make such showing, the explanation offered by them as an excuse for having collided with plaintiff's automobile as it stood parked along the curb having been rejected by the trial court as being without foundation in fact. Therefore, since it is within the exclusive province of the trial court to pass upon the credibility of witnesses, its decision in the matter is controlling on appeal.

Finally, it may be stated that, aside from either of the two points above mentioned, the physical conditions existing immediately following the accident, as shown by the statement of facts, including the location of plaintiff's automobile, are legally sufficient to support the inference that the truck was not being driven in a prudent manner and with ordinary care.

In the state of the record above described, it must have been obvious to defendants from the beginning that the prospect of a reversal of the judgment was hopeless; and, since the appeal presents no question of law, it would appear that it was taken for the purpose of delay. The judgment was entered in May, 1928, and as a result of the appeal therefrom plaintiff, whose injuries were inflicted entirely without fault on his part, and which incapacitated him for several months from following his occupation as a sign painter, has been deprived of the benefit of his judgment for over three years. The circumstances are such, therefore, as call for the imposition of a penalty. Holcomb v. Breitreutz, supra; Brannigan v. Miller, supra.

The judgment is affirmed, with damages added in the sum of $50 for a frivolous appeal.

Defendants' demurrers to plaintiff's second amended complaint were sustained with leave to amend. Plaintiff failed to amend after notice and judgment was entered in favor of defendants. Plaintiff appeals upon the judgment roll.

[1, 2] The complaint in question is entitled "Action for Damages" and covers twenty pages of the transcript. It appears to be drawn upon the theory that a conspiracy existed between the defendants, for it is alleged in various places that defendants conspired to do certain acts. Such allegations are insufficient unless it appears that some right of plaintiff has been violated by some alleged wrongful act or acts of defendants for "conspiracy cannot be made the subject of a civil action unless something is done which, without the conspiracy, would give a right of action." Bowman v. Wohlke, 166 Cal. 125, 135 P. 37, 39, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1011; Moropoulos v. C. H. & O. B. Fuller Co., 186 Cal. 679, 200 P. 601; Menner v. Slater, 148 Cal. 285, 83 P. 35, 39; Dowdell v. Carpy, 129 Cal. 168, 61 P. 948. In our opinion plaintiff's complaint failed to show that any act of the defendants violated any of its rights.

[3] We have endeavored to ascertain appellant's theory from the brief on file, but it has not been helpful. It fails to comply with rule 8 of the Rules of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, which provides that, "The briefs must present each point separately under an appropriate heading showing the nature of the questions to be presented." The headings of the appellant's brief are "Statement of the Case," "Points and Authorities," "Point 1," "Point 2," "Point 3." Any points which appellant may have desired to urge are not presented in the headings at all and the body of the brief is not enlightening. The headings in appellant's brief should show the points involved in the appeal and should be so stated as to compel a reversal in the event that the points stated in the headings are well taken. Otherwise the difficulty of opposing counsel in answering the brief and of the court in ascertaining the points to be decided is at once apparent and the purpose of the rule is defeated. Although the appeal might be dismissed solely because of appellant's failure to comply with the rule (Hawkins v. Doolittle [Cal. App.] 298 P. 862), we have examined the second amended complaint and are satisfied that it failed to state a cause of action.

The judgment is affirmed.

SPENCE, J.

Plaintiff brought this action seeking to recover damages against defendant Carmichael's U-Drive Autos, Inc., for personal injuries inflicted upon plaintiff when struck by an automobile belonging to defendant. The trial court directed a verdict in favor of defendant, and from the judgment entered upon the directed verdict plaintiff appeals.

The accident occurred on the evening of August 7, 1928. The driver stopped the car a short distance from the scene, disappeared without being identified, and has not been seen since. It appeared that about one hour prior to the accident defendant had rented the car to a man who gave his name as Max Watson. It is conceded that there was ample evidence to show that the driver of the car negligently drove it over the curb and struck plaintiff while he was standing on the sidewalk, but defendant based his motion for a directed verdict upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to go to the jury on the question of the liability of defendant as owner of the car.

[1, 2] At the time of the accident section 1714¼ of the Civil Code had not been enacted, and by his complaint plaintiff sought to impose liability on defendant as owner by alleging that defendant "negligently let and hired" the automobile to Watson; that defendant "negligently permitted Watson to drive and operate said automobile upon the highway"; that "defendant knew * * * that said Max Watson was not competent to operate" said automobile; and "that said Max Watson was not licensed to drive or operate any automobile upon such highway." In other words, the gravamen of plaintiff's cause of action was the alleged negligence in intrusting the car to Watson. These allegations of the complaint were sufficient, for it is well settled that liability may be imposed upon an owner who negligently intrusts his automobile to another. Rocca v. Steinmetz, 61 Cal. App. 102, 214 P. 257, and cases cited. Such negligence is most frequently predicated upon the fact that an owner knowingly intrusts his car to an incompetent person, but we do not believe that the owner is liable solely in those cases where such showing is made. The charge being that of negligence, the standard by which the conduct of the owner is to be measured is the general one based upon the care which an ordinarily prudent person would exercise under similar circumstances, and the question whether a particular owner's conduct measures up to that standard is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury. 19 Cal. Jur., p. 729; 42 C. J., p. 1261.

[3-5] Appellant contends that the evidence introduced was sufficient to make out a prima facie case against respondent as owner, and in our opinion this contention must be sustained. Before discussing the evidence surrounding the renting of the car, we will first dispose of respondent's contention that there is no evidence to show that Watson was driving at the time of the accident, and the further contention that there is no evidence to show that Watson did not have a driver's license. With respect to the first contention it appeared that Watson rented the car and was unaccompanied as he drove it from respondent's establishment about one hour before the accident. From this evidence the jury would have been warranted in finding that Watson was driving at the time of the accident. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 32; Sutton v. Tanger (Cal. App.) 1 P.(2d) 521. In an endeavor to prove that Watson did not have a driver's license, search was made in the files of the division of motor vehicles, which files contain some 4,000,000 names. Employees of the division testified giving the names and addresses of licensed persons bearing the name "Max Watson," and depositions of these persons were taken and introduced to prove that none of them had rented the car involved in the accident. It is true, as contended by respondent, that there was no testimony relating to persons licensed under names such as "M. Watson," "M. D. Watson," or other similar names containing the initial "M," but we do not believe this was essential. It is well settled that slight proof makes out a prima facie case when a negative is to be proved. 10 Cal. Jur. 789, 1158.

[6] Turning to the facts surrounding the renting of the car to Watson, the evidence showed that respondent was engaged in the business of renting cars without drivers; that Watson, who was unknown to respondent, applied for a car at about 7 p. m. on the night of the accident; that Watson had no driver's license but produced a "driver's temporary permit" issued that same day by the division of motor vehicles and designated by them as a "student's permit," which permit entitled the holder to drive motor vehicles for thirty days, but only when accompanied by a licensed driver; that Watson was unaccompanied at the time he rented the car as well as at the time of the accident; that, as Watson did not have "the customary operator's license," respondent's station clerk had him back the car "up and down the floor a couple of times," and then permitted him to take it after signing a 24-hour contract and making the required deposit.

Respondent argues that the fact that it violated section 76 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 536), by knowingly intrusting the car to an unlicensed person, is immaterial, citing Perry v. Simeone, 197 Cal. 135, 239 P. 1056, and Arrelano v. Jorgensen, 52 Cal. App. 622, 199 P. 855; but, as those cases were decided prior to the amendment in 1927 of section 63 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1927, p. 1428, § 17), we do not believe that they are determinative. That section now requires the examination of all persons applying for licenses, and an operator's license is no longer merely a means of identification, but is in effect a certificate evidencing the fact that the holder had demonstrated his competency. Under these circumstances, we believe that the violation of the statute is material. Cragg v. Los Angeles Trust Co., 154 Cal. 663, 98 P. 1063, 16 Ann. Cas. 1061; Andreen v. Escondido Citrus Union, 93 Cal. App. 183, 269 P. 556. The distinction between violations of statutes which are designed for the protection of the public and violations of statutes which have no such purpose is pointed out in Austin v. Rochester Folding Box Co., 111 Misc. Rep. 292, 181 N. Y. S. 275. In our opinion, where an examination is required to test the competency of the applicant before the issuance of an operator's license, and it is provided by statute that no person shall knowingly permit his motor vehicle to be driven by an unlicensed person, a showing of a violation of the statute by the owner makes out a prima facie case against him in favor of a person who has sustained injury through the negligence of such unlicensed driver. Correia v. Liu, 28 Hawaii, 145. As is said in the concurring opinion in that case at page 154: "The fact that Miller was unlicensed is evidence prima facie in the eyes of the law that Miller was incompetent and that Correia committed a breach of his common-law duty not to entrust his car to a driver who was known by him to be incompetent or who under the circumstances should have been known by him to be incompetent and was sufficient to put Correia upon inquiry as to Miller's competency or incompetency."

[7] In the present case, respondent knew that Watson had no driver's license but possessed merely a temporary permit allowing him to drive provided he was accompanied by a licensed driver. This knowledge was sufficient to put respondent upon inquiry as to the competency of Watson, and it was for the jury to determine whether under these circumstances respondent was negligent in permitting Watson, after backing the car up and down the floor a couple of times, to drive the car upon the highway unaccompanied by a licensed driver.

For the foregoing reasons, we are of the opinion that the trial court erred in directing a verdict in favor of respondent.

The judgment is reversed.

JONES v. FOSTER.

Civ. 7697.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Aug. 13, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 12, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 8, 1931.

1. Evidence ⇨442(4).

Parol evidence held inadmissible to show that realty broker was to receive commission in addition to "2½ per cent. on sale if a deal is made" called for by memorandum.

Parol evidence was offered to the effect that the broker was to receive full commission as exclusive agent on the sale of the property, and in addition thereto 2½ per cent. in consideration of broker's services on the sale of the property to the owner by the former owners. At the time the memorandum was signed, the escrow instructions, whereby the owner agreed to purchase the property from the former owners, had already been signed and deposited, and the word "sale" could not be made to refer to some antecedent sale of the property without rewriting the entire agreement, nor was the word "deal" ambiguous, since the owner having already signed the agreement to purchase the property from the former owners, the only uncompleted deal for the sale of the property was a contemplated deal to be consummated at some future time.

2. Brokers ⇨46.

Owner can sell property himself, although he has exclusive agent to sell, without becoming liable for commission.

3. Brokers ⇨52.

Broker failing to bring minds of buyer and seller to agreement for sale and terms thereof is not entitled to commission, notwithstanding he made efforts to sell property and first called buyer's attention to it.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1).

Brokers ⇨88(3).

Whether sale is primarily result of broker's efforts is fact question, and trial court's conclusions thereon, sustained by substantial evidence, are conclusive.

5. Brokers ⇨86(4).

As respects right to commission, finding that broker was not procuring cause of sale of realty held sustained by evidence.

6. New trial ⇨99.

Granting new trial for newly discovered evidence is largely discretionary.

7. New trial ⇨102(1).

New trial should not be granted for newly discovered evidence, where party has not shown due diligence in discovering and producing it.

8. New trial ⇨104(1).

New trial should not be granted for newly discovered evidence which is purely cumulative or does not render different result upon retrial probable.

[1] This is an action in which the plaintiff, the assignee of Mrs. N. E. McCann, alleges that on or about the 2d of March, 1926, the defendant entered into a contract with said Mrs. McCann by the terms of which he agreed to give to her the exclusive agency for selling certain property and to pay her the regular commission allowed to realtors on sales and, in addition thereto, to pay 2½ per cent. as consideration for certain services theretofore performed by Mrs. McCann in procuring the sale of said property to the defendant from the former owners thereof. This service it was alleged was performed by Mrs. McCann in securing the property from the former owners at the lowest net market price, which she alleges she succeeded in doing, waiving her commission on said sale. The complaint further alleges that on or about the said 2d day of March, 1926, Mrs. McCann became the exclusive agent of defendant for the sale of said property, and pursuant thereto proceeded in due course at divers times to secure a purchaser or purchasers for said ranch property for the defendant at an advanced price over the purchase price, and that during that time she proceeded, as said exclusive agent, to negotiate with various parties with respect to the sale of said property, and to interest certain persons in the purchase of said property, and that thereafter in due course the defendant Foster completed the sale of said property to certain persons at a price materially in advance of the purchase price paid by him to the former owners, to wit, the sum of approximately $185,000. In support of her complaint, the plaintiff offered in evidence the following memorandum: "I agree to give Mrs. N. E. McCann exclusive agency on the Stockwell Ranch property also the Vitagliano property as follows 59 Acres and 40 acres—on Riverside Drive and Pacoima Lankershim Calif I am to pay her 2½ per cent on Sale of Said property if a deal is made—John B. Foster March 2-1926." No other writing of any kind or character was executed by either of the parties in connection with this transaction. In addition to the memorandum above set out, plaintiff offered parol evidence to the effect that she was to receive full commission as exclusive agent on the sale of said property purchased by Foster and, in addition thereto, 2½ per cent. in consideration of her services on the sale of said property to Foster by the former owner. The court sustained the objection to the introduction of this parol evidence on the ground that the agreement upon its face imports to be a complete expression between the parties and that the parol evidence is not admissible to vary its terms.

The court further found that Mrs. McCann, the assignor of appellant, was not the procuring cause of the sale and, therefore, was not entitled to any commission on the sale by Foster to Beesemeyer. This ruling was clearly correct and supported by an unbroken line of authorities. If there was any other agreement between the parties with respect to the payment of commissions, the time and place to evidence that agreement was in the writing providing for her compensation. In Thorman v. David, 199 Cal. 386, 389, 249 P. 513, 514, the court says: "It is the contention of the plaintiff that the said escrow instructions did not constitute such a written contract as expressed the complete understanding of the parties, and that the oral evidence was admissible to supplement the written expression of their understanding. It is the position of the defendant that the said agreement was complete and fully expressed the intention of the parties, and that the admission of the oral evidence was in contravention of the well-established rule codified in sections 1625 and 1698 of the Civil Code and in section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and as approved in such cases as Harrison v.

McCormick, 89 Cal. 327, 26 P. 830, 23 Am. St. Rep. 469," and several other cases cited in that decision. "In the Harrison Case the rule is thus stated: 'The question whether a writing is upon its face a complete expression of the agreement of the parties is one of law for the court, and the rule which governs the court in its determination has been well stated as follows: "If it imports upon its face to be a complete expression of the whole agreement—that is, contains such language as imports a complete legal obligation—it is to be presumed that the parties have introduced into it every material item and term; and parol evidence cannot be admitted to add another term to the agreement, although the writing contains nothing on the particular one to which the parol evidence is directed."'" To the same effect Bradbury v. Higginson, 167 Cal. 553, 558, 140 P. 254, 256, wherein the court says: "The defendant relies upon section 1640 of the Civil Code, providing that 'when, through fraud, mistake, or accident, a written contract fails to express the real intention of the parties, such intention is to be regarded, and the erroneous parts of the writing disregarded.' * * * Whatever may be the real scope of this enactment, it certainly cannot have the effect of authorizing a court, in the absence of a showing of a right of reformation, to find, upon oral testimony, that a written contract includes provisions which do not appear upon its face, and to enforce such provisions as a part of the written contract. This would not be an interpretation of the contract. It would be altering a written contract by proof of the parol agreement of the parties, a procedure which is contrary to the most elementary principles governing the effect of written instruments."

It must be remembered in this case that at the time this written memorandum of exclusive agency was signed, the escrow instructions whereby Foster agreed to purchase the property from the former owners had already been signed and deposited, and he made appellant's assignor his exclusive agent to sell this property, and agreed to pay 2½ per cent. commission on the sale price of that property if the deal was made. This language could not be made to refer to some antecedent sale of the property without rewriting the entire agreement.

It is appellant's contention that the agreement is not clear as to the word "deal," contending that just what "deal" was referred to in the memorandum is uncertain, and that the deal actually referred to was the deal whereby respondent agreed to purchase the property. Defendant having already signed the agreement to purchase the property from the former owners, the only uncompleted deal for the sale of the property was a contemplated deal to be consummated at some future time, and this we are satisfied is the only rational construction that can be placed on the language used in the memorandum.

[2] It was conceded in this action that the defendant himself consummated the sale of the property with Gilbert Beesemeyer as purchaser, and there was some contention at the time of the trial of this action, and we think from the language of the complaint, that it was the plaintiff's thought the crux of the action was that Mrs. McCann, as exclusive agent, was entitled to the commission under the agreement if a sale was made either by herself or by the defendant at a price in advance of the original purchase price of the property by the defendant from the former owner. In this court this position has been abandoned by the plaintiff, for we find in his reply brief this statement: "We have no quarrel with counsel as to the right of an owner to sell the property himself, notwithstanding the fact that he has an exclusive agent, without becoming liable for the payment of a commission." There is no question as to this being a sound proposition of law. Snook v. Page, 29 Cal. App. 246, 155 P. 107; Faith v. Meisetschlager, 45 Cal. App. 7, 187 P. 61.

[3-5] The sole question then remaining to be determined is as to whether the assignor of the plaintiff was the procuring cause of the sale from respondent to Beesemeyer. The respondent objected to any introduction of any testimony tending to show that Mrs. McCann had procured Beesemeyer, to whom respondent sold the property, on the ground that the allegations of plaintiff's complaint in this respect were insufficient. While there can be slight doubt that the complaint is vulnerable to this attack, nevertheless we do not deem it necessary in the determination of this controversy to enter into any discussion of that question. We are entirely satisfied that the evidence, contradictory though it may be in some respects, falls far short of establishing the right of plaintiff to recover on the theory that his assignor was the procuring cause of this sale. The fundamental law with respect to this matter is summarized in the following: "The duty assumed by the broker is to bring the minds of the buyer and seller to an agreement for a sale, and the price and terms on which it is to be made, and until this is done his right to commissions does not accrue." Sibbald v. Bethlehem Iron Co., 83 N. Y. 382 [38 Am. Rep. 441]. * * * If he failed to do that, he is not entitled to the commission, even though he made efforts to sell the property, and first called to it the attention of the party who subsequently made the purchase. * * * Zeimer v. Antisell, 75 Cal. 509, 512, 17 P. 642, 643. "It is not enough that he contribute indirectly or incidentally to the sale by imparting information which tends to arouse interest, but it is sufficient if it be established that he set in motion a chain of events which without break in their continuity caused the buyer and seller to come to terms, that his efforts constituted the proximate cause of the meeting of the minds of the principals. * * * Sessions v. Pacific Improvement Co., 57 Cal. App. 1, 206 P. 653; Sargent v. Ullsperger, 54 Cal. App. 384, 201 P. 934. It is necessary for the broker to prove therefore that he was the efficient or procuring cause of the sale; in other words, it must appear that his efforts had to do with the meeting of the minds of the seller and buyer. * * * In any event the question of whether or not the sale is primarily the result of the broker's efforts is one of fact, and the trial court's conclusions thereon will not be disturbed on appeal if there be substantial evidence to sustain them. Sessions v. Pacific Improvement Co., supra." Bail v. Glantz, 78 Cal. App. 49, 53, 248 P. 258, 259. The evidence on this issue may hardly be said to be contradictory as to the ultimate fact with respect to the purchase of the property by Beesemeyer from the defendant. Beesemeyer himself testified that he never did meet the assignor of plaintiff in connection with this transaction, never discussed the matter with her and did not know her in the deal at all. Under such circumstances we may not disturb the findings of the trial court.

[6-8] The motion for a new trial was properly denied. In O'Rourke v. Vennekohl, 104 Cal. 254, 256, 37 P. 930, the rule, succinctly stated, is clearly applicable to the facts of this case: "After a careful examination of the record, we are unable to say that the court erred in denying the motion for a new trial. The motion was based upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence. The granting of a new trial upon this ground is largely matter of discretion, an exercise of which will not be disturbed by this court except in case of abuse clearly disclosed by the record. It should not be granted in any case where the party has not shown due diligence in discovering and producing the evidence, nor where the evidence is purely cumulative, nor unless the newly-discovered evidence is such as to render a different result upon a retrial probable. Testing the showing made in this case by these rules, we certainly cannot say that there was any abuse of discretion in denying the motion. The new evidence was largely, if not entirely, cumulative, and conceding that appellants' view of the law be correct, that a new trial should not be refused merely because the evidence is cumulative, in a case where the cumulation is sufficiently strong to render a different result probable, we cannot say that the record presents such a case."

It follows that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

SALVO v. MARKET ST. RY. CO.

Civ. 7750.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Aug. 27, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 26, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 26, 1931.

1. Street railroads ⇨114(14).

Evidence sustained verdict that motorist struck by street car was negligent, where he traveled 30 feet without looking toward left (St. 1923, p. 558, § 130, as amended by St. 1925, p. 398, § 15a).

Evidence tended to show that motorist, in attempting to make left turn, traveled in second gear at not more than five miles an hour, at which rate he could have stopped in four or five feet, for a distance of thirty feet or more without looking toward left, the direction from which danger might have been expected, and failed to see approaching street car until he was on tracks and car was about ten feet away.

2. Negligence ⇨82.

Where both parties were negligent, plaintiff whose negligence contributed proximately to injury cannot recover.

3. Appeal and error ⇨930(2).

Where jury, being instructed to find for defendant if plaintiff's negligence contributed proximately to injury, returned verdict for defendant, court must assume that jury found contributory negligence.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1001(1).

Where contributory negligence is properly submitted and jury finds for defendant, verdict supported by sufficient evidence cannot be disturbed, unless independent legal errors are shown.

5. Negligence ⇨117.

As plea of contributory negligence, allegation that plaintiff's negligence proximately caused and contributed to injuries is not to be commended.

6. Appeal and error ⇨171(3).

Where trial was conducted on theory that contributory negligence was properly alleged, allegation cannot be successfully criticized on appeal.

7. Trial ⇨296(4, 5).

Instruction precluding recovery if plaintiff's negligence contributed "in any degree" to injuries held not erroneous under instructions that no degrees of negligence or contributory negligence were involved.

It appeared that court had defined contributory negligence and proximate cause, and had instructed jury that there were no degrees of negligence or contributory negligence involved.

8. Appeal and error ⇨1066.

That instruction omitted last clear chance doctrine held not error, where doctrine was not presented by evidence or pleadings, or by requested instructions.

9. Street railroads ⇨85(1).

Street car has paramount, though not exclusive, right of way over tracks (St. 1923, p. 558, § 130, as amended by St. 1925, p. 398, § 15a).

10. Street railroads ⇨90(3).

Generally, even though motorist sees approaching street car, motorman is negligent in not sounding signal (St. 1923, p. 558, § 130, as amended by St. 1925, p. 398, § 15a).

11. Appeal and error ⇨1068(1).

Instruction that motorman was not negligent in not sounding signal when motorist saw street car held harmless, where jury found both parties negligent and based verdict on motorist's contributory negligence (St. 1923, p. 558, § 130, as amended by St. 1925, p. 398, § 15a).

12. Evidence ⇨121(1).

Generally, expressions of actors made during occurrence are admissible, especially if spontaneous and caused by event.

13. Evidence ⇨123(1).

Expressions of actors made after occurrence, no matter how shortly afterward, where there is attempt to explain event or to defend one's self, are inadmissible as res gestæ.

14. Evidence ⇨123(11).

Conversation between motorist and street car motorman held objectionable as hearsay and not part of res gestæ, where motorist failed to show statements were made during occurrence.

15. Witnesses ⇨379(7).

Where automobile guest testified for motorist who was suing street railway, cross-examination showing that guest, having sued both parties, charged motorist with negligence, held proper as impeachment (Code Civ. Proc. § 2052).

16. New trial  $\hookrightarrow$  104(1).

Denying new trial for newly discovered evidence which was merely cumulative and insufficient to demand different verdict held not abuse of discretion.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued for personal injuries resulting from a collision between a motor vehicle which he was operating and a street car operated by defendant. The cause was tried with a jury. A verdict was returned for defendant, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment on the verdict and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] At about 6:35 a. m. on May 1, 1929, plaintiff was driving his automobile easterly along Lakeview avenue, in San Francisco, and, as he approached the intersection of San Jose avenue, he stopped and took on a passenger. Lakeview avenue ends at the westerly line of San Jose. It is eighty feet in width from curb to curb; San Jose is seventy feet in width and meets Lakeview at right angles, running in a northerly and southerly direction. Plaintiff approached the intersection in second gear at a rate of speed of not more than five miles per hour and continued at the same rate of speed into San Jose avenue, attempting to make a left-hand turn into that avenue in order to proceed northerly to his destination. The defendant operates a double track line of street cars on San Jose avenue located approximately in the center of that thoroughfare. As plaintiff was making his turn upon the westerly, or south-bound tracks his machine was struck by a car operated by defendant proceeding southerly. The plaintiff and his passenger were both injured. They testified that they did not see the approaching street car until about the moment of impact and that they heard no bell or other warning of danger. The defendant denied negligence on its part and pleaded contributory negligence of plaintiff.

The foregoing facts, which are fully supported in the evidence, are sufficient to sustain the jury's verdict; hence it is not necessary to refer to the conflicting testimony of the eyewitnesses to the collision. It is sufficient to say that, if the jury believed the facts as related, they returned the proper verdict.

[2, 3] The case is controlled by general principles which are quite simple in their application to the particular state of facts appearing in the record. Appellant was attempting to make a left-hand turn into a widely used thoroughfare along which two lines of street railways were operated. He was thoroughly familiar with the intersection. His view of all traffic approaching from the north on San Jose avenue was clear for a distance of two or three blocks as soon as he reached the intersection. He was traveling in second gear at not more than five miles an hour, at which rate he could have stopped in a distance of four or five feet. He did not see the approaching street car until he was on the tracks and the car was about ten feet away. Thus, from the time he passed the intersection, and for a distance of thirty feet or more, he proceeded without looking to his left—the direction from which danger might be expected. Hence, in utter disregard of the provisions of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 558, § 130, as amended by St. 1925, p. 398, § 15a) which required him to first see that a left turn could be made in safety and without the exercise of the slightest care or caution for his own safety, he put himself in a position of danger through his own negligence. The record discloses without doubt that this was the view taken by the jury when they returned to the court for further instructions on "whether the degree of negligence counts and what we should do in the event both are negligent." The trial judge correctly instructed them that, if they found that both parties were negligent and that plaintiff's "negligence contributed proximately to his injury, then plaintiff cannot recover." The jury retired and returned with a verdict for defendant, and we cannot but assume that they found plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence.

[4] Cases in which similar circumstances have been held to constitute contributory negligence are Hamlin v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 776, 782, 89 P. 1109; Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 377, 113 P. 663; Read v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 185 Cal. 520, 197 P. 791. We do not need to determine whether the facts of this case constitute contributory negligence as a matter of law. The rule controlling is that, when the issue of contributory negligence has been submitted to the jury under proper instructions, and the jury finds for the defendant, we may not disturb the verdict when we find that the evidence is sufficient to support it unless independent errors of law are shown.

[5, 6] The appellant states that the issue of contributory negligence was not properly pleaded. The answer alleged as a separate defense that the injuries to plaintiff "were proximately caused by said carelessness and negligence (of plaintiff) and that said carelessness and negligence proximately contributed thereto." The form of the pleading does not merit judicial approval, but, though the pleading is open to criticism, the trial was conducted throughout upon the theory that this defense was properly alleged, and the objection cannot now be urged on appeal. Schuh v. R. H. Herron Co., 177 Cal. 13, 18, 169 P. 682; Jones v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 104 Cal. App. 47, 50, 285 P. 709, where other authorities are cited.

[7, 8] Appellant criticizes the instruction which advised the jury that, if they found that he "was guilty of any contributory negligence which proximately in any degree contributed to cause the injuries, et cetera," they must find for the defendant. The trial judge had defined contributory negligence and proximate cause and had instructed the jury that there were no degrees of negligence or contributory negligence involved in the case. Appellant's criticism is without merit. Strong v. S. & P. R. R. Co., 61 Cal. 326, 328; Metcalfe v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 63 Cal. App. 331, 334, 218 P. 486. As to the suggestion that the instruction omitted consideration of the "last clear chance" doctrine, it is sufficient to say that the appellant did not present that issue, did not propose an instruction to cover it, and that there is no evidence which would justify its application. New York Lub. Oil Co. v. United Railroads, 191 Cal. 96, 99, 215 P. 72.

[9] Appellant criticizes that portion of the instructions which advised the jury that a street car had a paramount, though not exclusive, right of way over ordinary vehicles upon that portion of the street upon which it can travel. The instruction was in harmony with all the authorities. In Shipley v. San Diego Elec. Ry. Co., 106 Cal. App. 659, 289 P. 662, 664, the court says: "The rights and duties of the users of the public streets are reciprocal, subject to the duty of free vehicles to yield a clear right of way to the operation of the street car over its tracks when necessary." Lawyer v. Los Angeles Pac. Co., 161 Cal. 53, 56, 118 P. 237; Haber v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 78 Cal. App. 617, 636, 248 P. 741; Hamlin v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 776, 779, 89 P. 1109, are in accord.

[10, 11] The instruction which advised the jury that it was not negligence on the part of the motorman to fail to sound a warning signal when the approach of the car was seen by appellant is not generally a correct statement of the law. But in view of the record which discloses that the jury found both parties negligent and returned their verdict on the basis of appellant's contributory negligence, we cannot say that this instruction was prejudicial.

The instruction covering the duty of the motorman upon being confronted with a sudden emergency correctly stated the law. Bibby v. Pac. Elec. Ry., 58 Cal. App. 658, 662, 209 P. 387.

The instruction covering the duty of the operator of the motor vehicle was in full accord with the provisions of the State Vehicle Act and was properly given. As we have heretofore said, appellant's failure to obey these simple regulations was the proximate cause of the accident. The application of the statute to a case of this character is made plain in New York Lubricating Co. v. United Railroads, 191 Cal. 96, 100, 215 P. 72.

The foregoing instructions covered the subject-matter of those proposed instructions which were refused and which the appellant insists should have been given. For the reasons herein given relating to the instructions criticised, the proposed instructions were properly refused.

[12, 13] The appellant presents three assignments of error arising out of rulings upon the admission of testimony. First, the appellant was asked upon his direct examination whether he had a conversation with the motorman immediately after the impact. He answered yes, and then was asked to state the conversation. Objection was made on the ground that it was hearsay and no part of the res gestæ. This objection was sustained. Attacking the ruling appellant cites Lloyd v. Boulevard Express, 79 Cal. App. 406, 411, 249 P. 837, and similar cases holding such conversations admissible. To the contrary are Williams v. So. Pac. Co., 133 Cal. 550, 555, 65 P. 1100, 1102; Durkee v. Cent. Pac. R. R. Co., 69 Cal. 533, 535, 11 P. 130, 58 Am. Rep. 562; Willard v. Valley Gas & Fuel Co., 171 Cal. 9, 16, 151 P. 286; Zohner v. Sierra Nevada Life, etc., Co. (Cal. App.) 299 P. 749; and similar cases. The pith of these decisions (which, we may add, unquestionably represent the majority view) is found in the Williams Case where the Supreme Court say: "Expressions of persons who are actors, made during the occurrence, may generally, but not always, be proved. If spontaneous and caused by the event, they may nearly always be shown. But if afterwards, no matter how shortly afterwards, there is an attempt to explain what has happened, or to account for it, or to defend one's self, or the like, it is incompetent and inadmissible as res gestæ." (Emphasis ours.)

[14] Applying this rule to the case at hand we find that appellant failed to present to the trial judge the surrounding circumstances which would have shown whether the conversation was had "during the occurrence." Ordinarily a conversation between those who are not parties to the action is hearsay and inadmissible for that reason. When a party seeks to present evidence of a conversation which is an exception to that rule, it is incumbent upon him to show to the court the reasons for the exception. Appellant failed to do this at the time the objection was made. On his motion for a new trial he filed an affidavit stating that he proposed to show that the motorman said he was looking at his watch and so failed to see appellant approaching the track. This was "an attempt to explain what has happened" and manifestly was not "made during the occurrence" but was made some time after both vehicles had come to a standstill and when the motorman and the appellant were standing in the street talking over the collision. Hence, the appellant having failed to lay the proper foundation for his question, the objection was properly sustained.

[15] Error is laid to the ruling permitting respondent on cross-examination of the witness Archini to bring out that she had a suit pending against the parties to this action based upon the same collision, and that in her complaint she charged this appellant with negligence. The witness was a guest riding with appellant at the time of the collision. She appeared as his witness and gave testimony favorable to him. The cross-examination was for the purpose of impeachment and was proper. This rule is statutory (Code Civ. Proc. § 2052).

Under the same section of the Code appellant's third objection to these rulings falls. He was asked in rebuttal what Dr. Bohm, a witness for respondent, had told him after the doctor's first examination of the appellant. It is now argued that this was asked for the purpose of impeaching Dr. Bohm. But no foundation was laid as required by the section cited.

[16] The motion for a new trial was made upon the usual grounds, including "newly discovered evidence." This new "evidence" consists of tests of speed of other street cars running on San Jose avenue subsequent to the date of the accident. If any admissible evidence of this character was found after the trial, it would have been cumulative of that offered at the trial to prove negligence on the part of the respondent. It would not have been sufficient to demand a verdict for the appellant, because there is ample evidence in the record upon which the jury could find against the appellant on the issue of contributory negligence. There was no abuse of discretion in denying the motion. Parker v. So. Pac. Co., 204 Cal. 609, 618, 269 P. 622.

We find no error in the record.

McLUCAS, P. J.

Defendant appeals from an order made July 10, 1931, denying a motion for change of venue. The action was brought in the justice's court of Santa Monica township to recover the sum of $328.55 for services rendered and material furnished to the defendant.

The verified complaint alleges that the defendant is a resident of Santa Monica township, that the obligation sued on was incurred in Santa Monica township, and that the services were rendered and materials furnished within said township. The defendant was served with a copy of the complaint and summons in Santa Monica township. The population of Santa Monica township exceeds 30,000. Defendant filed demand for change of venue and filed a notice of motion for change of venue to the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles, on the ground that at the time of the commencement of the action, the defendant was, and ever since said time has continued to be, and still is, a resident of La Crescenta township, in the county of Los Angeles. In support of the motion, defendant filed his affidavit that he was a resident of La Crescenta township at all of said times. At the time of filing the notice of motion, defendant filed a demurrer, but did not file an answer as required by section 831, Code of Civil Procedure.

The population of La Crescenta township is less than 30,000, and consequently the justice's court thereof would not have jurisdiction of the action; the demand being in excess of $300. In a proper case both the justice's court of Santa Monica township, the population of that township being over 30,000 and the demand being less than $1,000 (section 112, Code Civ. Proc.), and the Los Angeles municipal court (St. 1929, p. 838), the demand being less than $2,000 and the action arising within Los Angeles county, would have jurisdiction. The respondent relies upon the provisions of sections 832 and 833, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the place of trial in justices' courts. But these sections are not applicable to justices' courts in townships having a population of thirty thousand or more. Section 831h of the Code of Civil Procedure provides as follows: "Civil actions in justices' courts in cities, cities and counties, towns and judicial townships having a population of thirty thousand or more shall be commenced and prosecuted in the manner provided by law for the commencement and prosecution of civil actions in municipal courts of this state and the rules of pleading and practice applicable to the prosecution of civil actions and enforcement of judgments in the municipal courts of this state shall apply to and govern the prosecution and maintenance of civil actions and enforcement of judgments in said justices' courts." In People v. Justice's Court (Cal. Sup.) 299 P. 731, 732, it was held that section 848, Code Civ. Proc., relating to service of justices' court summons outside the county, was not applicable to justices' courts in townships of 30,000 or more. The court said: "We are of the opinion that by these sections the Legislature intended to provide that, in those justices' courts exercising the enlarged jurisdiction, the same status that had formerly existed in reference to such actions when they were triable in the superior or municipal courts should be retained."

[1] It follows that the provisions relating to change of venue from municipal courts are applicable to this case, it being a civil action in a township of thirty thousand population. Section 831 Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 1692, § 1) provides that the municipal court in an action of this character must, on motion, based upon a demand of the defendant therefor in writing at the time he answers, change the place of trial of an action commenced in such court to another court in which such action is cognizable as follows: "To the municipal or justice's court, if the action be cognizable therein, established in the city or township, respectively, in which the defendants, or some of them, reside at the commencement of the action, if within the county in which the municipal court, in which the action is commenced, is situated; provided, that none of the defendants reside in the city where the action is commenced."

[2] It was impossible to so change the place of trial in this case, since there was no municipal or justice court, in which the action was cognizable, established in the township of La Crescenta, where the defendant resided at the commencement of the action. Only actions where the demand did not exceed $300 were cognizable in La Crescenta township; it being less than 30,000 population. Section 112, Code of Civil Procedure.

[3] While it is true that any municipal court established in Los Angeles county, either the Los Angeles or Long Beach municipal court, has jurisdiction concurrent with justice courts, where such justice courts have not been given exclusive jurisdiction, of all civil cases arising outside the city in which a municipal court is established and within the county in which such municipal court is established (St. 1929, p. 838; Southwestern Portland Cement Co. v. Cochrane [Cal. Super.] 300 P. 445), yet where the action arose in Santa Monica township, the action was commenced in Santa Monica township, and there is no court having jurisdiction of the action in La Crescenta township where the defendant resides, we see no reason or law for removal to the municipal court of Los Angeles.

In conclusion it should be noted that section 831a, Code of Civil Procedure, provides as follows: "Nothing contained in this chapter shall be construed to limit the power of the court to hear and determine any of the actions herein enumerated, arising, or where any of the defendants reside, within the jurisdictional limits of the court as established by law, and any such action may, notwithstanding any of the provisions of this chapter, be tried in the municipal court where commenced, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial for cause as provided in sections 831b and 398 of this code, unless demand for change of place of trial is made as provided in this chapter." Section 831b, as amended in 1929 (St. 1929, p. 1694, § 2), Code of Civil Procedure, also provides that: "At the time of hearing of a motion for change of place of trial made under the provisions of the preceding sections of this chapter, the court, may on plaintiff's counter-motion, order the action retained for trial therein, notwithstanding defendant's right to a change of place of trial."

The order denying change of venue is affirmed, with costs of appeal to respondent.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of David Bloom, deceased. On objections by Ray L. Riley, as State Controller, and by Jonas Bloom, executor of the estate of David Bloom, to a report filed by the inheritance tax appraiser, fixing the amount of estate tax. From an order that no inheritance tax was due, Ray L. Riley, as Controller, appeals.

Affirmed.

For opinion of District Court of Appeal herewith adopted, see 293 P. 633.

Herbert Kaufman and W. Urle Walsh, both of San Francisco (W. H. H. Gentry and A. W. Brouillet, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Brobeck, Phleger & Harrison, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

A petition for hearing in this case after decision by the District Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, Division 1, was granted by this court. After further consideration we are satisfied with the opinion of the District Court of Appeal and hereby adopt the same as and for the opinion of this court, as follows:

This is an appeal by the state controller from an order entered in the above matter determining that no inheritance tax was due the state of California, and directing a refund of the inheritance tax previously paid.

David Bloom died testate in the city and county of San Francisco on September 16, 1925. On September 25, 1925, Jonas Bloom, the executor and respondent herein, filed his petition for an order admitting the will to probate, and on October 8, 1925, the same was duly admitted to probate. The petition alleged, and the court found, that the decedent at the time of his death was a resident of said city and county. In due course of administration of the estate, the inheritance tax appraiser appointed by the court filed his report fixing $64,268.81 as the amount of the tax, of which $57,145.24 was charged against the distributive share of respondent, and finding that the decedent died a resident of the city and county of San Francisco. On September 7, 1927, the state controller filed objections to the report, alleging that certain corporate stock owned by decedent had been undervalued by the appraiser and that a copartnership interest of decedent had not been included in the report. On December 13, 1928, objections to the report were filed by respondent, following which amended and supplementary objections thereto were filed on his behalf individually and as executor. These objections alleged that the report was incorrect in finding that the decedent died a resident of the above city and county, and that he was a resident of San Salvador at the time of his death; that consequently the stocks and bonds foreign to the state of California and which were owned by decedent were not subject to an inheritance tax in this state. The parties stipulated as to the value of the property in question, and also that the decedent had an interest in certain partnership accounts which were not mentioned in the report. After a hearing, the court found upon the evidence that decedent died a resident of San Salvador, and the order appealed from was entered accordingly. The evidence sufficiently supports the finding that decedent was a resident of San Salvador, but, as stated, the order admitting the will to probate contained a finding that the decedent died a resident of the city and county of San Francisco, and the controller contends that respondent is conclusively bound thereby. The parties also stipulated that the only matter to be determined on appeal is the legal effect of the order in the above respect, but appellant makes the further contention that respondent by reason of his testimony in support of the petition for the probate of the will is also estopped to assert that decedent was not a resident of the said city and county.

[1-5] A proceeding for the probate of a will is one instituted for the purpose of establishing the status of a written instrument. State of California v. McGlynn, 20 Cal. 233, 81 Am. Dec. 118; Estate of Parsons, 196 Cal. 294, 237 P. 744. While the order admitting the same to probate is conclusive in subsequent proceedings as to the ultimate fact of the will, it is not save as to parties litigant (Clapp v. Vatcher, 9 Cal. App. 462, 99 P. 549), or for the purpose of the proceeding itself (Estate of Relph, 185 Cal. 605, 198 P. 639), conclusive as to the facts upon which the question of will or no will depends (Gridley v. Boggs, 62 Cal. 190), or, quoting from Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.), § 1524: "When the same issues arise with respect to a different subject matter." As was said in Brigham v. Fayerweather, 140 Mass. 411, 5 N. E. 265, with regard to such decrees, "strangers though bound to admit the title or status which the judgment establishes are not bound by the findings of fact." Thus it has been held that an order admitting a will to probate is not conclusive as a decree in rem as to the mental condition of the testator or other facts upon which the validity of the instrument depends (Gridley v. Boggs, supra), or as to matters incidental, though necessarily adjudicated, such as to relationship of the parties to decedent (Sorensen v. Sorensen, 68 Neb. 483, 94 N. W. 540, 98 N. W. 837, 100 N. W. 930, 103 N. W. 455), or the fact of the death as against strangers in a collateral proceeding (Mutual Benefit Life Ins. Co. v. Tisdale, 91 U. S. 238, 23 L. Ed. 314; Carroll v. Carroll, 60 N. Y. 121, 19 Am. Rep. 144; In re Rowe, 197 App. Div. 449, 189 N. Y. S. 395, affirmed 232 N. Y. 554, 134 N. E. 569; Day v. Floyd, 130 Mass. 488; Steele's Unknown Heirs v. Belding [Tex. Civ. App.] 148 S. W. 592). It has also been decided in numerous cases that an adjudication upon the question of residence of the testator in a proceeding for the probate of the will is not conclusive upon strangers in a matter not involving the validity of the order granting letters testamentary. Dallinger v. Richardson, 176 Mass. 77, 57 N. E. 224; Colvin v. Jones, 194 Mich. 670, 161 N. W. 847; Matter of Horton, 217 N. Y. 363, 111 N. E. 1066, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 611; Smith v. Smith's Executor, 122 Va. 341, 94 S. E. 777; Thormann v. Frame, 176 U. S. 350, 20 S. Ct. 446, 44 L. Ed. 500; Overby v. Gordon, 177 U. S. 214, 20 S. Ct. 603, 44 L. Ed. 741; Dunsmuir v. Scott (C. C. A.) 217 F. 200. In Tilt v. Kelsey, 207 U. S. 43, 28 S. Ct. 1, 4, 52 L. Ed. 95, the court, in passing upon this question, said: "Upon principle and authority, that adjudication, though essential to the assumption of jurisdiction to grant letters testamentary, was neither conclusive on the question of domicile, nor even evidence of it in a collateral proceeding."

[6] Appellant, in support of his contention, has cited certain California cases. In Estate of Dole, 147 Cal. 194, 81 P. 534, and Estate of Davis, 151 Cal. 327, 86 P. 183, 90 P. 711, 121 Am. St. Rep. 105, orders admitting wills to probate were attacked on the ground that the testator was a nonresident of the county, and in Estate of Parsons, supra, a petition for partial distribution was opposed upon the ground that a portion of the will, the whole of which had been admitted to probate, had been revoked by the testator. Also in Estate of Relph, supra, the proceeding was in effect an attack upon an order granting letters of administration made upon the ground that the decedent was resident in another county. In each of these cases it was held that the orders could not be questioned collaterally, and none is an authority for the proposition that the findings upon which the orders were based were conclusive upon strangers in proceedings not involving the validity of the orders. In Estate of Barton, 196 Cal. 508, 238 P. 681, the testator died in San Diego county, where his will was admitted to probate, the finding in the order being that he was a resident of that county at the time of his death. The will was executed in Rhode Island, where the testator was then domiciled. He owned certain foreign corporate stock which by the terms of the will was bequeathed to one Charles E. Blake, a resident of Rhode Island, but who predeceased the testator. Under section 1343 of the Civil Code this legacy lapsed upon the death of Blake. Upon the filing of the petition for distribution, Blake's heirs filed objections to the distribution of the stock to the residuary legatee, alleging that the testator, contrary to the above finding, was domiciled in Rhode Island at the time of his death and that under the laws of that state the legacy did not lapse. A demurrer to the objections filed was sustained, and the stock distributed to the residuary legatee. On appeal from the decree it was held following Estate of Relp, supra, that the findings of jurisdictional facts supporting the order were final adjudications in all subsequent stages of the administration; also that, while the fact that the testator died in San Diego county leaving estate therein was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to make the order (Code Civ. Proc. § 1294, subd. 2), nevertheless Blake's heirs were privileged to appear and oppose the admission of the will to probate on the ground that the testator was a resident of the county, and, having failed to do so after due notice, were concluded by the finding. While a decree admitting a will to probate as a judgment in rem is conclusive only as to the status adjudicated, it is, nevertheless, as to all persons interested in the will who, being notified to appear at the probate, might come in, or who, had they come in, would have been heard on any question which the court might properly determine at the hearing, as conclusive for the purposes of administration as a decree in personam. Garwood v. Garwood, 29 Cal. 514; Estate of Allen, 176 Cal. 632, 169 P. 364; Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) § 1524; 15 Cal. Jur. Judgments, §§ 180, 181, pp. 117, 118. This was the gist of the decision in the Estate of Parsons, supra, on this question, and all that is necessary to support that decision.

[7, 8] The above cases make it plain that judgments in rem are binding upon persons who are not parties to or participants in the proceeding only so far as the status, title, or other res constituting the subject-matter is adjudicated. Estate of Blake, 157 Cal. 448, 108 P. 287. It is well settled that the tax imposed by the Inheritance Tax Law (St. 1921, p. 1500, as amended) is on the right to succeed to the property of the estate rather than upon the property itself. Estate of Letchworth, 201 Cal. 1, 255 P. 195. The statute makes no provision for notice to the state or any officer thereof of hearings upon petitions for the probate of wills or for letters of administration, and before the appointment of the inheritance tax appraiser the state is a stranger to the proceeding. Any other rule would afford opportunity for fraud, of which unscrupulous persons would not be slow to take advantage.

[9, 10] While the state may be concluded by a judgment in rem as to the res with respect to which the judgment was rendered, as, for example, the validity of the organization of irrigation districts (People v. Linda Vista Irr. District, 128 Cal. 477, 61 P. 86; People v. Perris Irr. District, 132 Cal. 289, 64 P. 399, 773), or the genuineness of a will duly admitted to probate (State v. McGlynn, supra), nevertheless it has been held that judgments of this character do not conclude the state or its agencies unless the law authorizing the proceeding contemplates such result, since the state, without its consent, express or implied, cannot be sued (Berton v. All Persons, 176 Cal. 610, 170 P. 151), and also that the right of the state to collect an inheritance tax cannot be prejudiced by the findings of the court in a proceeding for the probate of a will (Estate of Holt, 61 Cal. App. 464, 215 P. 124).

[11-13] We find no merit in appellant's further contention that as between the state and the executor the latter is estopped by his testimony at the hearing of the petition for the probate of the will. The estoppel of a judgment is operative only when it is mutual (34 Cor. Jur. Judgments, § 1407, p. 988), which was not the case as to the state. Moreover, it is an essential element of an estoppel by conduct that the party asserting it was injured or misled by the conduct of his opponent (10 Cal. Jur. Estoppel, § 20, p. 636), which is not contended to be the fact here.

The conclusions of the trial court are supported both by the facts and the law, and its order should therefore be affirmed.

The order is affirmed.

JARDINE v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

L. A. 12757.

Supreme Court of California.

July 31, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Aug. 27, 1931.

1. Appearance ⇨24(13).

If, after denial of motion to quash service, defendant answers and goes to trial on merits, it waives right to raise jurisdictional question on appeal.

2. Prohibition ⇨3(5).

Existence of remedy by appeal does not prevent use of prohibition, where remedy by appeal is not adequate or speedy.

3. Prohibition ⇨10(1).

Objection to jurisdiction over defendant's person held properly raised by application for writ of prohibition.

4. Statutes ⇨64(7).

Part of statute relating to service of summons on unincorporated association and part making individual property of parties served with process subject to judgment held severable as regards constitutionality (Code Civ. Proc. § 388).

Code Civ. Proc. § 388, provides that when two or more persons, associated in any business, transact such business under a common name, whether it comprises the names of such persons or not, the associates may be sued by such common name, the summons in such cases being served on one or more of the associates; and the judgment in the action shall bind the joint property of the associates, and the individual property of the party or parties served with process, in the same manner as if all had been named defendants and had been sued upon their joint liability.

5. Associations ⇨2.Constitutional law ⇨309(1).

Statute providing that jurisdiction over unincorporated association doing business should result from service on one or more of its members held not unconstitutional as denial of due process (Code Civ. Proc. § 388; Const. art. 1, § 13).

6. Exchanges ⇨14.

Los Angeles Stock Exchange held "association engaged in business," within meaning of statute permitting service on unincorporated association by service on members (Code Civ. Proc. § 388).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Association," see Words and Phrases.]

7. Associations ⇨2.

Statute relating to service of summons on unincorporated association should receive liberal construction (Code Civ. Proc. § 388).

LANGDON, J.

This is an application for a writ of prohibition. On or about October 8, 1929, Arthur M. Loeb and others, alleging themselves to be minority stockholders of Sunset Pacific Corporation and acting on behalf of said corporation in a representative suit, brought an action in the superior court of Los Angeles county against various defendants. It was alleged in the complaint that on April 15, 1929, all property and assets of Julian Petroleum Corporation were assigned to Sunset Pacific Corporation upon its purchase of the same at a sale held by the United States District Court on October 15, 1928, pursuant to a plan of reorganization of the company. It was further alleged that the defendant Jacob Berman formed a general scheme to defraud the Julian Petroleum Corporation and its stockholders by the issuance and sale of void certificates of stock; and that he did so with the aid of other defendants, who had notice of the fraudulent character of his acts. The prayer was for an accounting of all profits realized from the sale of such securities and for general equitable relief.

The complaint and summons named as defendants "Los Angeles Stock Exchange, a nonprofit and unincorporated association," and a number of individuals, some of whom were members of the association and others were not. Of the total membership of the exchange, only a small group were named, and they were specifically alleged to have individually participated in the fraudulent acts. Copies of the complaint and summons were served upon the association and its president, various individual defendants named in the complaint and summons, and some members of the exchange who were not named in the complaint or summons. All of the defendants made special appearances, to object to the jurisdiction of the court by motion to quash the summons. A hearing was had on affidavits and exhibits offered by the parties, and all of the motions were denied. Thereafter applications for writs of prohibition were made to the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division 2. That court denied the applications made on behalf of the exchange and individuals who were named in the complaint and summons; and granted the writ as to those persons who, as members of the exchange, were served with process though not named in the complaint or summons. 293 P. 117. No attack is made upon the decision of the said District Court of Appeal in so far as it applies to the individual defendants. A hearing in this court was granted, however, to consider further the application made by petitioner, J. Earl Jardine, president of the Los Angeles Stock Exchange, on behalf of the exchange. It may be noted that the exchange itself appeared in its association name to file its motion to quash summons, but upon the denial of said motion, took no further steps on its own behalf. However, we attach no significance to this circumstance. The sole problem before us is whether the lower court has acquired jurisdiction over said defendant Los Angeles Stock Exchange.

The solution of the problem depends upon the meaning and validity of section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows: "When two or more persons, associated in any business, transact such business under a common name, whether it comprises the names of such persons or not, the associates may be sued by such common name, the summons in such cases being served on one or more of the associates; and the judgment in the action shall bind the joint property of all the associates, and the individual property of the party or parties served with process, in the same manner as if all had been named defendants and had been sued upon their joint liability."

Petitioner contends that the Los Angeles Stock Exchange does not come within the terms of this statute; and further contends that it is an unconstitutional denial of due process of law.

[1-3] Before proceeding to a consideration of these contentions, it is necessary first to determine whether they are properly raised in this application for a writ of prohibition. It is argued by counsel for the plaintiffs in the original action, who appear herein as counsel for respondent superior court, that the nature of the activities of the exchange was a question of fact which was presented to the trial court on motion to quash summons; that the said court had before it affidavits and exhibits describing the work of the exchange and containing conflicting statements and conclusions; and that on this conflict as to the facts the court rendered a decision which is conclusive and not subject to attack by writ of prohibition. We cannot view the situation in this light. The questions of fact relate to jurisdiction over the defendant, and are connected with a question of law—the meaning and constitutionality of a statute. The trial court necessarily considered facts, but also made a determination of the legal question, which determination is obviously not conclusive. Respondents' chief objection to this proceeding is, however, that for any supposed error in the trial court's decision, the petitioner has an adequate remedy by appeal. This would, of course, require that judgment be permitted to go by default in the lower court; for if, after denial of the motion to quash, the defendant association answered and went to trial on the merits, it would waive its right to raise the jurisdictional question on appeal. If "a defendant wishes to insist upon the objection that he is not in court for want of jurisdiction over his person, he must specially appear for that purpose only, and must keep out for all purposes except to make that objection." Olcese v. Justice's Court, 156 Cal. 82, 87, 103 P. 317, 319. "By answering and going to trial on the merits, the defendant made a general appearance and submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the court. It thereby waived any right it may have had to insist that jurisdiction of its person had not been obtained." Remsberg v. Hackney Mfg. Co., 174 Cal. 799, 801, 164 P. 792, 793. Hence, respondents' contention amounts to this: Petitioner must either give up the right to contest jurisdiction or to defend on the merits of the case; that while both rights are given by the law, only one can be exercised. Curiously enough, there are a number of decisions in this state which hold that the remedy of a defendant who attacks jurisdiction over his person is by appeal only. See Germain Seed, etc., Co. v. Justice's Court, 41 Cal. App. 397, 182 P. 784; Lumas Film Corporation v. Superior Court, 89 Cal. App. 384,

264 P. 792; Bullard v. Superior Court, 106 Cal. App. 513, 288 P. 629, and cases cited. These cases fail to distinguish between jurisdiction over the subject-matter and the person, and seem to overlook the dilemma in which their holdings place the defendant who objects to jurisdiction over his person. There was a time when such a rule would have been perfectly reasonable, for the view of some of the earlier cases in this state was that a defense on the merits was not a waiver of the right to raise the jurisdictional question on appeal. These cases were disapproved in later decisions, of which Remsburg v. Hackney Mfg. Co., supra, is typical, and there is now no sound basis for the view contended for by respondent. The correct rule is, we think, set forth in Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co. v. Justice's Court, 79 Cal. App. 759, page 761, 250 P. 1104, 1105, where the court, after distinguishing and criticizing other cases, said: "It is apparent, therefore, that if prohibition will not lie in this case, the petitioner here must waive either the lack of jurisdiction and submit to the jurisdiction of the court, or stand upon the defense of lack of jurisdiction and waive the defense on the merits. We do not think that the rule requires the petitioner to do either." Moreover, the existence of a remedy by appeal does not prevent the use of prohibition where the remedy by appeal is not adequate or speedy. The writ is sought here not only for the reason just discussed, but for the additional reason that a decision in favor of petitioner on the jurisdictional question would avoid the delay and expense of a protracted trial. This factor has frequently influenced this court to determine a jurisdictional point on petition for writ of prohibition. Department of Public Works v. Superior Court, 197 Cal. 215, 239 P. 1076; A. G. Col. Co. v. Superior Court, 196 Cal. 604, 238 P. 926; Davis v. Superior Court, 184 Cal. 691, 195 P. 390. See, also, Chaplin v. Superior Court, 81 Cal. App. 367, 253 P. 954; Knox v. Superior Court, 100 Cal. App. 452, 280 P. 375.

We conclude that the jurisdictional question was properly raised by this petition; and since this conclusion is in direct conflict with the group of cases to which reference has been made (Bullard v. Superior Court, supra, and others cited supra), we are compelled to overrule them in so far as they purport to hold that an objection to jurisdiction over the person of a defendant cannot be raised by an application for a writ of prohibition.

[4] This brings us to the argument of petitioner, and we direct our inquiry first to the constitutionality of section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This section was enacted as a part of the original code, and is substantially the same as section 656 of the Practice Act. It provides that the judgment in an action brought under it against members of an association shall bind (1) the joint property of all the associates, and (2) the individual property of the party or parties served with process. This latter provision as to individual property was added by amendment of the statute in 1907. Petitioner contends that both parts are unconstitutional, and respondent makes no argument as to the validity of the 1907 amendment, on the ground that if the first part be sustained, a valid judgment can be rendered and the extent of the enforcement of that judgment is of no consequence at this time. We are satisfied that the provisions are severable, and that respondents' position is sound. A discussion of the power to enforce such a judgment against individual property of members served with process is wholly immaterial in this proceeding, and we express no opinion on the point.

The only authority which has been cited to the point that section 388 is unconstitutional is Tay, Brooks & Backus v. Hawley, 39 Cal. 93, where the court made certain statements with respect to the constitutionality of section 32 of the Practice Act. The particular provision was that in an action against "defendants jointly indebted upon a contract," where summons was served on one or more, but not all of them, the judgment might be enforced against "the joint property of all." The court was of the opinion that to take even the joint interest in property of a defendant not served was a denial of due process of law. It may be observed that the case deals with section 32 and not section 656 of the Practice Act. Section 32 now appears, without the provision commented upon, as section 414 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In Davidson v. Knox, 67 Cal. 143, 7 P. 413, it was said that this provision was eliminated as a consequence of the declaration in Tay v. Hawley. But no similar change was made when section 656 of the Practice Act became section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and there is an obvious and decided difference between an attempt to bind the joint property of joint debtors under a contract, and that of members of an association. Whether the conclusion of the court in Tay v. Hawley as to joint debtors is correct, is a question which does not bear upon the problem involved in the instant case, though it may be remarked in passing that the case apparently stands alone in the United States in its expressions on this point. Warren, Corporate Advantages Without Incorporation, p. 243. Moreover, the facts of the case did not even present the problem discussed by the court, for only one defendant was involved, and he was served with process. The court made this clear when it said (39 Cal. 97): "This case might, perhaps, have been disposed of without noticing the question. * * *

The validity of section 388 has not been directly passed upon in any case that we have found in our reports, although it has been frequently applied, as will hereinafter appear. A study of its origin and purpose should, however, remove any doubts which may have existed. For a long time the established rule was that in the absence of statute, an unincorporated association could not sue or be sued in its common name; all the members thereof had to appear in their own names as parties plaintiff or defendant. The basic reason was that the association was not, in the eyes of the law, a legal unit or entity, and had no legal capacity to become a party to an action. Baskins v. United Mine Workers, 150 Ark. 398, 234 S. W. 464; Karges Furniture Co. v. Amalgamated Woodworkers' Union, 165 Ind. 421, 75 N. E. 877, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 788, 6 Ann. Cas. 829; Pickett v. Walsh, 192 Mass. 572, 78 N. E. 753, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1067, 116 Am. St. Rep. 272, 7 Ann. Cas. 638; St. Paul Typothetae et al. v. St. Paul Bookbinders' Union, 94 Minn. 351, 102 N. W. 725, 3 Ann. Cas. 695; Warren, Corporate Advantages Without Incorporation, pp. 542, 668; Wrightington, Unincorporated Associations (2d Ed.) pp. 136, 425; Sturges, Unincorporated Associations as Parties to Actions, 33 Yale L. J. 383; 5 C. J. 1365, 1369. The difficulty was only one of procedure, and the objection was purely technical. The liabilities or rights of the members were in no way involved, and were not, in theory, impaired by the operation of the rule. They might have brought actions if they all joined as plaintiffs, and they might have been held to any liability imposed upon them by law, if sued and served individually. But where associations with large membership were involved, the operation of the rule frequently had inconvenient and unjust consequences, and various exceptions came to be recognized. Thus, it is generally held that failure to raise the question of capacity is a waiver of the objection. And in suits in equity, courts have taken jurisdiction over all of the association members, though not all were made parties to the action, on a theory of representation. Likewise, where statutory recognition of the association as an entity has been found, suits have been permitted without any specific statute on the right to sue. See United Mine Workers v. Coronado Coal Co., 259 U. S. 344, 390, 42 S. Ct. 570, 66 L. Ed. 975, 27 A. L. R. 762; Warren, supra, pp. 664, 669; Sturges, supra, 33 Yale L. J. 383; Dodd, Dogma and Practice in the Law of Associations, 42 Harv. L. Rev. 977, 1001.

The many inconveniences of the rule were not wholly evaded by these exceptions, and statutes were widely adopted for the purpose of eliminating this procedural obstacle by permitting suits to be brought against the associates in the common or association name. In most instances, they did not give the association the right to appear as a plaintiff. These statutes dealt solely with the manner of bringing actions, and were not intended to effect any change in the substantive law. Members of associations had the same rights and were subject to the same liabilities as before, only now they could be sued by a less complicated and cumbersome process. The various state acts are classified and discussed in detail in Professor Warren's treatise. Corporate Advantages Without Incorporation, p. 542 et seq.

Such statutes, whenever subjected to constitutional attack, have been uniformly sustained, not only as to partnerships but as to other unincorporated associations, including those not organized for profit. United States Heater Co. v. Iron Molders' Union, 129 Mich. 354, 88 N. W. 889; Appeal of Baylor, 93 S. C. 414, 77 S. E. 59; F. R. Patch Mfg. Co. v. Capeless, 79 Vt. 1, 63 A. 938. See, also, Sugg v. Thornton, 132 U. S. 524, 10 S. Ct. 163, 33 L. Ed. 447; Kittredge v. Grannis, 244 N. Y. 182, 155 N. E. 93; Esteve Bros. & Co. v. Harrell (C. C. A.) 272 F. 382; Thomas v. Nathan, 65 Fla. 386, 62 So. 206; Brooks & Ellis v. McIntyre, 4 Mich. 316; Wrightington, Unincorporated Associations, pp. 137, 436; note, 20 Harv. L. Rev. 58. The court, in United States Heater Co. v. Iron Molders' Union, supra, spoke briefly and to the point when it said (129 Mich. 354, 88 N. W. 893): "The law deals with conditions as they exist. It recognized that there may be unincorporated voluntary associations, clubs, and societies in this state * * * and also that it may be necessary or desirable to make them defendants in an action at law or proceeding in chancery. * * * It is for the legislature to determine who may sue and be sued, so long as it does not interfere with vested rights or deny any remedy. 'As a general rule, every state has complete control over the remedies which it offers its suitors in its courts. * * * And any rule or regulation in regard to the remedy which does not, under pretense of modifying or regulating it, take away or impair the right itself, cannot be regarded as beyond the proper province of legislation.' Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) 442."

[5] In California, section 388 has been frequently applied without any questioning of its validity. The leading case is Artana v. San Jose Scavenger Co., 181 Cal. 628, 185 P. 850, 851, which involved an action against a partnership in its common name, and the court said that a partnership was, for the purposes of the statute, "regarded as a legal entity distinct from its members." In Armstrong v. Superior Court, 173 Cal. 341, 159 P. 1176, the court briefly expressed the view that it was applicable to a labor union. A number of well-considered cases, hereinafter discussed, have dealt with its application to unincorporated associations of various kinds. They have all tacitly recognized the validity of the statute. Whether, for the purpose of the suit, the unincorporated association is to be considered an entity, or whether the statute merely permits an action to be brought against the associates in the name of the association, is a point upon which the decisions from other jurisdictions are not in agreement. In California, the entity theory has been established by a number of decisions. Artana v. San Jose Scavenger Co., supra; John Bollman Co. v. S. Bachman & Co., 16 Cal. App. 590, 117 P. 690, 122 P. 835; Craig v. San Fernando Furniture Co., 89 Cal. App. 167, 264 P. 784; Ferry v. North Pacific Stages et al. (Cal. App.) 296 P. 679; see, also, Gardiner v. Eclipse Grocery Co., 72 Mont. 540, 234 P. 490; Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Cook (Tex. Civ. App.) 221 S. W. 1049; Warren, supra, p. 249 et seq. We think that it was unquestionably competent for the legislature to enact section 388, and that it is perfectly consistent with due process to provide that jurisdiction over an association doing business shall result from service upon one or more of its members. So far as constitutionality is concerned, we see no distinction between such a statute applied to partnerships and to other unincorporated associations. Const. art. 1, § 13.

[6] We thus arrive at the problem of construction. We must determine whether the provisions of section 388 apply to the Los Angeles Stock Exchange. In brief, the question is whether the association transacts business.

The work of the Los Angeles Stock Exchange was described in the affidavits and exhibits filed with the trial court. The record before us is somewhat meager, but it appears to cover the important facts. From this record we learn that the exchange is a voluntary unincorporated association of about sixty members, who pay dues to the association for the privilege. The personnel of the membership is constantly changing. The exchange functions through trustees elected annually by the members. Members have no interest in the property of the association prior to its dissolution. The purposes of the exchange, set forth in the constitution and by-laws, are, in part, to furnish rooms, and other facilities for the transaction of their business by its members, as brokers; to operate a general stock exchange for the listing, calling, trading in, buying, and selling of stocks, bonds, and securities of all kinds, and for the sale and transfer of membership rights and privileges; to conduct a clearing house for the proper completion of any purchases or sales and the proper transfer and delivery of shares of stock, bonds and securities; to develop and extend the market for stocks, bonds, and securities; to borrow and loan money, give and take security therefor, and to acquire by purchase or otherwise, own, hold, lease, enjoy, sell, convey, and otherwise deal in and with real estate and interests therein and personal property; and generally to do any and all things necessary and proper in the conduct of the "business" and in the carrying out of the purposes of the association. In pursuance of these objects, property of considerable value has been acquired by the exchange, title to which is vested in the trustees. It appears that it has organized and controls "Los Angeles Stock Exchange Building Corporation," which was, at the time of this action, constructing an office building in Los Angeles, for the occupation of which rentals are to be charged and collected by the corporation. This and other activities are not limited to dealings between members. Thus, an escrow department is maintained, which is available to outsiders transferring securities upon payment of the required fees. A charge is made to the corporations whose securities are listed on the exchange. Memberships are sometimes sold by the association. An insurance fund is maintained for members. Through these various means the exchange has collected and expended large sums of money, and now has, according to an affidavit on file with the trial court, an accumulated surplus of over a million dollars.

The above description sufficiently indicates the nature of the association involved herein. In its organization it is similar to other stock exchanges, since practically all were modeled after the New York Stock Exchange. The nature of such organization has been described in a number of cases. See, generally, Belton v. Hatch, 109 N. Y. 593, 17 N. E. 225, 4 Am. St. Rep. 495; Wilson v. Commercial Telegram Co. (Sup.) 3 N. Y. S. 633; People v. Feitner, 167 N. Y. 1, 60 N. E. 265, 82 Am. St. Rep. 698; Citizens' National Bank v. Durr, 257 U. S. 99, 42 S. Ct. 15, 66 L. Ed. 149; Swift v. San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board, 67 Cal. 567, 8 P. 94; Clute v. Loveland, 68 Cal. 254, 9 P. 133; Hassey v. Ruggles, 30 Cal. App. 19, 156 P. 989; Lowenberg v. Greenebaum, 99 Cal. 162, 33 P. 794, 21 L. R. A. 399, 37 Am. St. Rep. 42; Meyer, The Law of Stockbrokers and Stock Exchanges, p. 37. But a glance at the earlier cases shows that much of the activity we find in the modern exchange is newly developed, and the old view of the institution as being merely a place where the members met to transact their business is far from correct today. For this and other reasons which will hereinafter appear, these cases are of little aid in dealing with the precise question before us. Our inquiry must necessarily extend to unincorporated associations generally. And at the outset, it will be well to bear in mind the basic contention of petitioner, namely, that section 388 was designed to apply only to trading associations, engaged in some business for profit, the members of which incur joint liability in the transaction of the business, and that the stock exchange engages in no business, the business which goes on under its direction being solely the business of the individual members.

The decision upon which petitioner most strongly relies is Swift v. San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board, 67 Cal. 567, 8 P. 94, 97, supra. In that case a suit was brought against the defendant association under section 388, and the lower court found that the exchange was not an association engaged in business. Upon appeal, Mr. Justice McKee expressed his approval of the finding as follows: " * * * It is unquestionable that the main objects of the association are the establishment of a mart for the sale and purchase of stocks and exchange by the members for their individual gain or loss, and the creation of a trust fund for the benefit of surviving wife or children, etc., of deceased members. * * * The collection of these fees, fines, or dues does not constitute a business in which the members participate in the way of profit or loss as partners or otherwise. * * * There are no profits earned to be divided among its members, nor are there any losses to be borne arising out of the acts of the joint body. * * * I therefore think that the acts performed by the association in carrying out the purposes for which it was established are not done in the transaction of a business carried on in the name of the association for the profit or loss of its members. * * * But all these things, although in the nature of business, do not in themselves constitute a business for the transaction of which the members have associated themselves in the name of the association. They are merely incidental to the primary objects of the association."

Warman Steel Casting Co. v. Redondo Beach Chamber of Commerce, 34 Cal. App. 37, 166 P. 856, 857, is another case involving a suit against an unincorporated association, and contains similar language: "The association in this case was not one from which the members derived any specific individual profit, or profit different from that which would accrue to the municipal community. Its purpose was to promote the common welfare, and it had no 'business,' in the sense of being engaged in a private commercial enterprise."

In Cuzner v. California Club, 155 Cal. 303, 100 P. 868, 869, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1095, a suit was brought against the defendant, a social club, by a member thereof, to enjoin the selling of liquor in its clubrooms as a violation of an ordinance requiring the licensing of persons "conducting, managing or carrying on the business of a retail liquor dealer." An injunction was refused on the ground that the defendant was not engaged in that "business." After describing the organization and pointing out that the privilege was confined to members and their guests, and that the profits were used only for the social purposes of the club, the court said (page 311 of 155 Cal., 100 P. 868, 871): " * * * In its transactions with its members in the carrying on of the clubhouse looking simply to the giving to them such privileges in the property devoted to bona fide club purposes as they are all, in common, entitled to under the constitution and rules of the club, it is not engaged in business at all in the commercial or trade sense, as ordinarily understood."

St. Paul Typothetae et al. v. St. Paul Bookbinders' Union, 94 Minn. 351, 102 N. W. 725, 3 Ann. Cas. 695 (quoted approvingly in Warman Steel Casting Co. v. Redondo Beach Chamber of Commerce, supra), was an action by one unincorporated association against another. The defendant was a labor union and the plaintiff was an employers' association. The court, construing the statute permitting suit in the common name, said (94 Minn. 351, 102 N. W. 727): "Its purpose was to authorize the courts to take jurisdiction over unincorporated associations engaged under a common name in some sort of business in which property is bought and sold, debts contracted—concerns owning and holding property, and incurring pecuniary liability. * * *"

The foregoing decisions are the strongest that have been found in support of petitioner's contention. To them may perhaps be added the case of Lowenberg v. Greenebaum, 99 Cal. 162, page 164, 33 P. 794, 795, 21 L. R. A. 399, 37 Am. St. Rep. 42, which says of the San Francisco Stock Exchange: " * * * It does not itself do any stock business, but its purpose is to afford facilities for its members doing such business, each individually for himself." Petitioner cites also the cases of Hopkins v. United States, 171 U. S. 578, 19 S. Ct. 40, 43 L. Ed. 290, and People v. Feitner, 167 N. Y. 1, 60 N. E. 265, 82 Am. St. Rep. 698.

An examination of these decisions shows that they are not all concerned with the power to sue unincorporated associations, and those which are not tend rather to confuse than to clarify the issue before us. The word "business" is a broad term which may be variously interpreted. See Easterbrook v. Hebrew Ladies' Orphan Society, 85 Conn. 289, 82 A. 561, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 615. This is made clear by the case of Cuzner v. California Club, supra. The holding was simply that the activities of the club did not constitute the carrying on of business as a retail liquor dealer, within the meaning of an ordinance imposing a tax upon such business. Moreover, Mr. Justice Angellotti uses language which is, we think, quite damaging to petitioner. He says (page 311 of 155 Cal., 100 P. 868, 871): "A bona fide social club, if permitted by its articles of incorporation or association, may, of course, so engage in business, either by transactions with its members, or members of the public, as, for instance, by letting for a consideration rooms not used for the ordinary purposes of the clubhouse, or by engaging in some outside enterprise for the purpose of realizing profits to be devoted to club purposes; and, so far as it does such things, even incidentally for the purpose of realizing profit to be devoted solely to club purposes, it would be engaged in business in the commer- cial sense as fully as any person could be." (Italics ours.)

The case of Lowenberg v. Greenebaum, supra, held that the seat of a member of the San Francisco Stock Exchange was not taxable property. The same holding was made in People v. Feitner, supra. Hopkins v. United States, supra, held that the Kansas City Live Stock Exchange was not engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the federal regulatory statute. On the other hand, Citizens National Bank v. Durr, 257 U. S. 99, 42 S. Ct. 15, 66 L. Ed. 149, held that the state of Ohio could levy a property tax on a resident, based upon his ownership of a membership in the New York Stock Exchange; and Board of Trade v. Olsen, 262 U. S. 1, 43 S. Ct. 470, 67 L. Ed. 839, held that the plaintiff, an incorporated grain exchange, doing no buying or selling of grain on its own behalf, was nevertheless conducting "a business affected with a public national interest" and subject to national regulation as such. In State ex rel. Griffith v. Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, 117 Kan. 564, 232 P. 254, 37 A. L. R. 1267, the defendant, a corporation with avowed benevolent and social purposes, was held subject to ouster as a foreign corporation doing business in the state. The same result was reached in Knights of Ku Klux Klan v. Com., 138 Va. 500, 122 S. E. 122. Pacific Typesetting Co. v. International Typographical Union, 125 Wash. 273, 216 P. 358, 360, 32 A. L. R. 767, held that the defendant association, a labor union, the purpose of which was to secure better hours and working conditions for its members, was when actively carrying out this purpose doing business within the state. In re Tidewater Coal Exchange (C. C. A.) 280 F. 638, held that a commodity exchange was an "unincorporated company" within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, and could be adjudicated a bankrupt. The court, after a discussion of its activities, decided that although it did no trading itself, it was nevertheless engaged in business. Wrightington (Unincorporated Associations), p. 294 remarks that the opinion in the Tidewater Coal Exchange Case "implies the existence of a distinction between non-profit associations which are adjuncts of commercial enterprise and those whose functions are charitable, religious, educational or social," and that "for purposes of statutory regulation the distinction here foreshadowed will prove helpful." This brief review of cases discussing the general meaning of "business" emphasizes the necessity of construing our procedural statute in the light of the purpose of its enactment. See Superior Oil & Refining Syndicate v. Handley, 99 Or. 146, 195 P. 159; Dimond v. Minnesota Savings Bank, 70 Minn. 298, 73 N. W. 182.

Of the above-mentioned cases, even those which deal specifically with the power to sue an association do not, after careful study, stand as controlling authorities. Swift v. San Francisco Stock & Exchange Board, supra, was concerned with an action by executors of the estate of a deceased member of the exchange to recover a sum of money provided as part of a system of insurance for members. For reasons not material here, the court decided that the executors were not entitled to recover, and Mr. Justice McKee's discussion of the power to sue the association was unnecessary, as appears from the brief concurring opinion by the other members of the court: "We concur in the judgment, on the ground that the executors of the deceased, Swift, cannot sustain the action. Whether or not any other person or persons can do so, it is not necessary, we think, to decide." Warman Steel Casting Co. v. Redondo Beach Chamber of Commerce, supra, is still less convincing. The objects of the defendant association were "to secure attractions and public entertainments, to foster and encourage commerce, stimulate home trade, secure manufactures, improve and beautify streets and parks, attract tourists, induce immigration, and to obtain the organized efforts of our citizens for the better promotion of the best interests of Redondo Beach." Assuming that these purposes can in any way be compared with those of the Exchange, there is presented the same situation as in the Swift Case; the power to sue was not an essential issue. The court said (page 41 of 34 Cal. App., 166 P. 856, 857): "The first proposition discussed is determinative of the appeal. * * *" St. Paul Typothetae et al. v. St. Paul Bookbinders' Union, supra, upon which the preceding case leans heavily, is very illuminating, both on its facts and in its discussion. The court said (94 Minn. 351, 102 N. W. 726): "The Typothetae is not a business association within the proper meaning of the term. * * * Its exclusive occupation, as disclosed by the complaint, is that of promoting and protecting the persons, firms, and corporations composing it in controversies with their employees. * * * So far as the complaint discloses, it has no capital stock and no property. The union is an association of employees or workmen organized for similar purposes; it has no capital stock or property. * * *" The court later says, significantly (94 Minn. 351, 102 N. W. 728): "The defendant union is wholly unlike the associations involved in Cornfield v. Order Brith Abraham, 64 Minn. 261, 66 N. W. 970, Steinert v. United Brotherhood of Carpenters & Joiners of America, 91 Minn. 189, 97 N. W. 668, and Taylor v. Order of Railway Conductors, 89 Minn. 222, 94 N. W. 684. The associations there before the court were engaged in the business of insuring their members, a distinct and well-established line of business. * * *" (Italics ours.)

Neither in these nor in other cases which we have found is there any unequivocal holding, necessary to the decision of the case, to the effect that an association with objects and activities similar to those of the Los Angeles Stock Exchange, cannot be sued in its association name. We are not, however, limited to this negative treatment of the question, for there are several pronouncements which suggest the propriety of such a suit, two of which are by the courts of this state. In Camm v. Justice's Court, 35 Cal. App. 293, 170 P. 409, 411, an action on a book account was brought against Sonoma County Good Roads Club, an unincorporated association, the purpose of which was the promotion of public interest in the improvement and maintenance of the streets, roads, and highways of Sonoma county. It is true that the complaint alleged that it was "doing business," and that there was no record before the court containing facts to contradict the allegation; so the discussion by the court is, perhaps, not more necessary to the decision than in the Swift and Warman Steel Casting Co. Cases. Nevertheless we find the language persuasive. The court said: " * * * We do not think it was necessary, to authorize the maintenance of the action against the members of the club by their common name, to show by the complaint the specific purpose or purposes for which the members of the club had so associated themselves together, nor is it important whether it was a voluntary association and not organized and conducted for pecuniary profit to its projectors or members. Armstrong v. Superior Court, 173 Cal. 341, 342, 159 P. 1176. By this we mean to say that section 388 has reference to an association of two or more persons who thus band together for the purpose of transacting as a single body any kind of business, whether for profit to themselves or for charitable or philanthropic purposes, and that, where persons so associated, to effectuate the specific objects of their association and for the benefit thereof, create liabilities against themselves as such associates, such persons, as such associates, may be proceeded against by their common name in any action to enforce the liabilities so created." (Italics ours.) The later case of Herald v. Glendale Lodge, 46 Cal. App. 325, 189 P. 329, contains what we believe to be the most satisfactory discussion of this subject, and reaches a conclusion which appears to us to be eminently sound and reasonable. A member of the defendant lodge brought an action to enjoin it from serving liquor in violation of an ordinance. Although the case might perhaps have been decided on the theory of waiver by general appearance, the court did not place its decision solely on that ground. Mr. Justice Sloane first reviewed the prior conflicting decisions in this state, and then said (page 330 of 46 Cal. App., 189 P. 329, 331): "We are inclined to hold with the ruling in Camm v. Justice's Court, 35 Cal. App. 293, 170 P. 409. We see no sufficient reason for restricting section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure to associations formed for commercial business. As already pointed out, the term 'business' has a common and general application to all sorts of enterprises which engage people's attention and energies. When a number of persons are associated under a common name in an undertaking in which the associates incur obligations for which they are legally liable, why should they not be sued in the common name which they have adopted, whether it is a money-making concern or otherwise? Indeed, the question of profit is the only distinction that exists between the two classes of associations suggested. If a number of persons were associated together, furnishing to their patrons for pay precisely the same accommodations, entertainment and service that the Elks' lodge furnishes its members, there would be no question but that they were engaged in a 'business.' Why should a different rule of liability exist because the associates happen to contract their liabilities in an enterprise in which they are catering to themselves? The word 'business,' in its broad sense, embraces everything about which one can be employed; and in its narrower sense it signifies a calling for the purposes of livelihood or profit. Easterbrook v. Orphan Society, 85 Conn. 289, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 615, 82 A. 561. Where the sense in which the word is used is open to construction, it should be accepted with the meaning most in harmony with the context."

One other decision seems worthy of quotation here. In Fitzpatrick v. International Typographical Union, 149 Minn. 401, 184 N. W. 17, the defendant union, an unincorporated association, was sued, and service of process was made upon a member thereof. The court considered its earlier holdings in St. Paul Typothetae v. St. Paul Bookbinders' Union, supra, and Taylor v. Order of Railway Conductors, 89 Minn. 222, 94 N. W. 634, and decided that the latter case was controlling. In doing so, it reversed the judgment of the trial court, which had made an order vacating the service. The opinion states (149 Minn. 401, 184 N. W. 18): " * * * We find that its activities embrace many having no necessary connection with its activities as a union and quite apart from 'the promotion of the interests and welfare of their members. * * *' The constitution provides for dues. It provides for a union printers' home. It provides for an old age pension fund. It provides for death benefits. * * * The home is in the name of a distinct corporation. The defendant functions not only as a labor union, having the welfare of its members as trade unionists in view, but as an organization which through dues coming from its members gives old age pensions, death benefits, and a home for eligible infirm and invalid members."

The conclusion to which we are led by these authorities is that the Los Angeles Stock Exchange is an association engaged in business within the meaning of section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is unquestionably engaged in business in the broad sense of the term, and, we believe, in any other reasonable sense of the term as well. It is, of course, true that the main business transacted in its quarters is the business of others, the individual members. We might even concede, perhaps, that the business transacted by the exchange is incidental to its main purpose, and that its main purpose is not the transaction of business. Such is the contention that petitioner makes. But that these activities are incidental in no way alters the fact that they constitute the doing of business. There is nothing in the statute which requires that the associates be exclusively engaged in business, or in any one business to the exclusion of all others. It is sufficient if they associate together for the purpose of transacting business. Whether they have additional noncommercial purposes is immaterial. This is what we conceive to be the meaning of the statute, and the prevailing view of the authorities.

We have already summarized the purposes and activities of the exchange. It has sold seats, charged and collected listing fees, acted as escrow holder, and from the proceeds of its enterprises is constructing a building to bring in more revenue. Petitioner points out that these profits do not accrue to the members, and that they have no rights in any of the property of the association until dissolution. This statement is undeniably true as far as it goes, although there seems to be no reason why the members, at any time, could not agree to dissolve the association, in which case they would divide these assets. But apart from this possibility, we differ with petitioner as to the conclusion to be drawn from this statement. The question is not whether the members secure for themselves any profits, present or prospective, but whether there is a business. Here we have a business, and one which earns large profits. If they are not the profits of the members individually, they must be the profits of the association itself, and such is, indeed, the fact. No amount of theoretical argument can escape the fact that money is being received for services rendered, and that the money so received and the property purchased with it is held by trustees for the association.

[7] Only by disregarding the normal meaning of its language could we adopt the narrow interpretation of section 388 which petitioner urges. But the history of the statute, already discussed, suggests the opposite interpretation. Since it establishes no substantive liability, and merely provides a convenient method of suit to enforce an existing liability, there is certainly no reason to restrict its application to any one class of associations doing business. It abrogates a rule unsuited to present conditions, and should receive a liberal construction.

We have given due consideration to the argument of petitioner that the use of the words "joint liability" was intended to limit suits brought under the statute to those against associations, the members of which were jointly liable for its obligations; and that such liability only attaches to the members of a "trading association." The case of McCabe v. Goodfellow, 133 N. Y. 89, 30 N. E. 728, 17 L. R. A. 204, cited to this point, held that the members of a "law and order association" were not liable for certain debts contracted by the president. The case is doubtless correct in its statement of the principles upon which liability might or might not be enforced in the situation before the court, but it does not deal with the question of suit, and hence can hardly be of assistance in construing our statute. Moreover, we are not sure that we perceive the relevancy of the subtle distinction between a "trading association" and one transacting business, with respect to the problem before us here. We may concede that the statute was enacted so that suits might be brought to enforce an established liability, and that it does not contemplate the bringing of actions where no liability exists. In this it is similar to every other statute which provides a remedy for the enforcement of a right. But that the court should test this procedural statute in each case, by attempting to determine in advance of a trial whether a joint liability actually exists on the facts, was plainly not the legislative intention. It would be highly improper for us to express an opinion as to the liability of the associates under the facts and the law. That is a matter upon which there is neither evidence nor proper pleadings before us. Of course, if the associates engage in business under a common name, they would normally incur joint liabilities in the conduct of that business. But that issue must first be presented to the trial court. In determining the question of jurisdiction, there is no need for us to decide anything except that they are so engaged in business. As one court bluntly remarked: "Whether the plaintiff can get anywhere with his case does not interest us; or whether his judgment, if he gets one, will be of use." Fitzpatrick v. International Typographical Union, 149 Minn. 401, 184 N. W. 17, 19, supra; see, also, Embree v. McLennan, 18 Wash. 651, 52 P. 241.

The application by petitioner for a writ of prohibition on behalf of Los Angeles Stock Exchange is denied.

DOUGERY v. BETTENCOURT et al. *

Sac. 4411.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 31, 1931.

Rehearing Granted Sept. 28, 1931.

1. Levees and flood control ⇨28.

Reclamation district tax deed held valid as against persons not subsequent purchasers or incumbrancers, notwithstanding recorder placed duplicate sale certificate in desk drawer and entered sale memorandum in "Irrigation District Tax Sales" certificates book (Pol. Code, § 3480; Civ. Code, §§ 1170, 1213).

While neither the filing of the instrument in the drawer nor the entry of the memorandum constituted "recording" in its ordinary meaning of copying the instrument in the proper book, Pol. Code, § 3480, providing that the treasurer shall execute to each purchaser, including himself as trustee, a certificate of sale, and shall record a duplicate in the county recorder's office, is indefinite in its requirements, and it can hardly require a literal compliance, there being no indication of what book shall contain the record, nor is the county of recording specified.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Record," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Mortgages ⇨154(4).

Vendor and purchaser ⇨231(6).

Instrument recorded in wrong book would not constitute constructive notice to subsequent purchasers or incumbrancers (Civ. Code, § 1213).

3. Levees and flood control ⇨28.

Purchaser of reclamation district tax deed before 1927 statutory amendment took free of existing irrigation district lien, but not free of future assessments under outstanding bond issue (Pol. Code, § 3480).

Pol. Code, § 3480, at the time of the sale, provided that the county treasurer, after one year, should execute a deed to the purchaser conveying the property free of incumbrance except state, county, and municipal taxes, and the unpaid balance of the assessment, which clearly covered irrigation district tax liens already assessed.

4. Taxation ⇨727.

Legislature can authorize sale of tax titles free of irrigation district's assessment lien (Pol. Code, § 3480).

5. Waters and water courses ⇨230(6).

Irrigation district's bond issue is general obligation upon all district lands, but lien upon specific property arises only after assessment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; H. S. Gans, Judge.

Action by James C. Dougery against Frank J. Bettencourt and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals.

PER CURIAM.

This is an action to quiet title to a tract of land of about 215 acres situated in Glenn county. Plaintiff's claim of title is based upon a tax deed of J. J. Ossenbruggen, county treasurer of Colusa county, as trustee of the bond fund of reclamation district 2047. The record shows that the said reclamation district was organized in 1920, to include lands in Glenn and Colusa counties, and pursuant to its statutory authority levied an assessment on the lands, including the tract involved herein. Bonds were issued and sold, and to meet the interest due thereon an installment of the assessment was called. For failure to pay this installment the tract was placed on sale on June 29, 1926, and, no bidders appearing, the county treasurer sold it to himself as trustee. Thereafter, upon the expiration of the one-year period of redemption, he resold it to plaintiff and executed and delivered a deed to him on August 12, 1927, which was recorded in Glenn county on August 13, 1927. This action to quiet title was subsequently brought. The defendants are Frank J. Bettencourt, the original owner of the land; David E. Hughes, holder of a mortgage on it; and Glenn-Colusa Irrigation District. The last-named defendant claims liens originating in three assessments on 80 acres of the land which is included within its boundaries.

The lower court found against the claim of plaintiff and rendered its judgment, decreeing that defendant Bettencourt was the owner of the property, subject to the Hughes mortgage, but requiring said defendant to reimburse plaintiff in the sum of $299.03, paid by the latter to the county treasurer as the purchase price thereof, and any other sums paid for taxes or assessments, together with interest. The said sums to be repaid to plaintiff are made a lien upon the property superior to the mortgage.

[1] The ground upon which the court drew its conclusion as to the invalidity of the deed was stated as follows: "There was not recorded in the office of the County Recorder of the County of Glenn, State of California, being the county in which said real property is situate, any duplicate or copy of the certificate of sale to the purchaser, as required by the provisions of section 3480 of the Political Code of the State of California." The correctness of this conclusion is the chief question on this appeal.

Section 3480 provides that the treasurer "shall execute to each purchaser, including himself as trustee, a certificate of sale, and shall record a duplicate in the county recorder's office." In this case the treasurer issued such a certificate of sale to himself, and on July 19, 1926, deposited a duplicate thereof in the office of the county recorder of Glenn county. The recorder wrote upon it the words "Recorded at request of J. J. Ossenbruggen," together with the time. The instrument was then placed by the recorder in a desk drawer, and a memorandum of the sale was entered in a book devoted to certificates of "Irrigation District Tax Sales." Neither the filing of the instrument in the drawer nor the entry of the memorandum constituted recordation in its ordinary meaning of copying the instrument in the proper book. See Cady v. Purser, 131 Cal. 552, 63 P. 844, 82 Am. St. Rep. 391. Nevertheless, we do not think that this fact invalidates the deed. The statute can hardly require a literal compliance, since it is indefinite in its requirements. There is no indication of what book shall contain the record, nor is the county of recordation specified. The county recorder accepted such certificates and did note them in a book which was open to inspection, and likewise kept the documents themselves available. In the absence of statutory direction as to how and where to record, we cannot hold that the circumstances disclose a fatal defect in the proceedings.

[2] Moreover, section 1170 of the Civil Code provides: "An instrument is deemed to be recorded when, being duly acknowledged or proved and certified, it is deposited in the recorder's office, with the proper officer, for record." Plaintiff fully complied with the provisions of this section. It has been held that the error of the recorder in copying an instrument so deposited in the wrong book does not make the recordation wholly ineffective. Watkins v. Wilhoit, 104 Cal. 395, 38 P. 53. Of course, an instrument thus improperly recorded would not constitute constructive notice of its contents under section 1213 of the Civil Code, but this section is for the protection of subsequent purchasers or incumbrancers, and cannot be invoked by others. Watkins v. Wilhoit, supra; Cady v. Purser, supra. We find nothing in section 3480 of the Political Code to suggest the proper content of the certificate or the purpose of its recordation, and defendants Bettencourt and Hughes are not subsequent purchasers nor incumbrancers. Doubtless it was intended in some way to give notice to the owner (see Lewis v. Tulare, etc., Dist., 56 Cal. App. 52, 204 P. 421), but that intention does not necessitate a compliance with the terms of section 1213 of the Civil Code. Particularly is this true in a case like the present where the absence of a statutory direction makes it impossible to determine what type of record is contemplated.

[3-5] The only other point which requires discussion is the effect of the sale on the rights of the defendant irrigation district. At the time of the sale section 3480 provided that the treasurer, after one year, should execute a deed to the purchaser conveying the property "free of encumbrance except state, county and municipal taxes, and the unpaid balance of said assessment." The purpose of such a provision was to attract buyers at tax sales, and its language clearly covers liens such as are claimed by defendant irrigation district. Several sections of the Political Code have been amended to include within the exceptions taxes of irrigation, conservation, water storage districts, etc. (see Pol. Code, §§ 3466, 3787), but no such change was made in section 3480 until 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1449, § 2), after the sale in question took place. The lien of said defendant district attached prior to that of the reclamation district, and, under the express provision of the statute, was wiped out. The Legislature has power to make such a provision. California Loan & Trust Co. v. Weis, 118 Cal. 489, 50 P. 697. Plaintiff's contention that this also discharges the land from liability for all future assessments of defendant district under its outstanding bond issue is unaccompanied by any citation of authority, and is, on principle, untenable. The bond issue is a general obligation upon all lands in the district, but a lien upon a specific piece of property arises only after an assessment has been levied. See Clark v. Demers, 78 Mont. 287, 254 P. 162. The only effect of the delivery of the deed was, we think, to discharge existing liens which attached by the levy of prior assessments.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter its decree quieting the title of plaintiff against the claims of defendants.

WOLPERT v. GRIPTON et al.

Sac. 4391.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 27, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 24, 1931.

1. Appeal and error ⇨907(3).

On appeal from judgment roll alone, evidence must be deemed sufficient to sustain findings.

2. Chattel mortgages ⇨84.

Unrecorded chattel mortgage is good as between parties thereto (Civ. Code, §§ 2957, 2959).

3. Chattel mortgages ⇨197(1).

Mere general creditor of chattel mortgagor cannot attack validity of unrecorded chattel mortgage (Civ. Code, §§ 2957, 2959).

4. Bankruptcy ⇨184(2½).

Bankruptcy trustee of mortgagor being placed in position of lien creditor may attack alleged void chattel mortgage (Civ. Code, §§ 2957, 2959, Bankruptcy Act [11 USCA]).

5. Chattel mortgages ⇨192.

One month's delay in recording chattel mortgage in county where property was situated held not to affect validity of mortgage, where none of creditors' claims were created before recordation (Civ. Code, §§ 2957, 2959, 2973).

5. Chattel mortgages ⇨192.

Unrecorded chattel mortgage is not void as to those not acquiring rights or becoming creditors of mortgagor either prior to or during period of time between execution and recordation (Civ. Code, §§ 2957, 2959, 2973).

7. Chattel mortgages ⇨192.

Five months' delay in recording chattel mortgage in county of mortgagor's residence held not to affect validity of mortgage, where creditors became such knowing of existence of mortgage (Civ. Code, §§ 2957, 2959, 2973).

8. Appeal and error ⇨931(1).

All intendments and presumptions are in favor of findings and judgment of trial court.

9. Bankruptcy ⇨304.

Finding that it was not true that none of creditors of chattel mortgagor had knowledge of existence of mortgages held to mean that creditors became such knowing of mortgages (Civ. Code, §§ 2957, 2959, 2973).

10. Bankruptcy ⇨298.

Failure of bankrupt's trustee of chattel mortgagor with full knowledge of facts to seek adjudication of validity of mortgages for period in excess of two years constituted laches under circumstances.

11. Equity ⇨72(1).

In addition to mere lapse of time, there must exist some circumstances from which defendant may be prejudiced or lapse of time must be sufficient that prejudice may be reasonably supposed to establish laches.

12. Equity ⇨67.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Suit by F. C. Wolpert, trustee in bankruptcy, in the matter of the California Lumber Products Company, against Walter A. Gripton and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. During pendency of case the defendant named died, and Dorothy L. Gripton, as executrix of the last will and testament of Walter A. Gripton, deceased, was substituted in his stead.

Affirmed.

Charles Kasch, of Ukiah, and John V. Filipini, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Keith C. Eversole, of Ukiah, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J.

[1] This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant Walter A. Gripton, a chattel mortgagee, and against plaintiff, the trustee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor corporation, in an action brought by such trustee to have certain chattel mortgages declared invalid, for an accounting, and for the return of the property covered by the chattel mortgages, or the value thereof. The cause was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and, the appeal being on the judgment roll alone, it must be assumed that the evidence, not now before us, is ample to sustain the findings of the court below.

A complete résumé of the findings seems necessary. Among other things, the court found that the insolvent corporation, whose principal place of business is in the city and County of San Francisco, was created and organized under the laws of this state on February 10, 1923; that 2,201 of its 2,329 shares of issued stock were issued to the de-defendant Claude D. Plum, who, with his wife and a named third person, constituted the board of directors of the corporation; that on May 5, 1923, the corporation and the respondent Walter A. Gripton entered into an unrecorded agreement in writing, wherein and whereby the latter agreed to loan and advance to the corporation the sum of $30,000 and, in the event the corporation needed further money, an additional $10,000, if and when requested, in consideration for which the corporation agreed to execute and deliver to the respondent its promissory note in the principal sum of $30,000, together with chattel mortgages as security therefor on its lumber mill, machinery, equipment, and all logs and lumber cut and manufactured by it; that, pursuant to the terms of said agreement, Gripton advanced and loaned $30,000 to the corporation, whereupon the latter did, on May 5, 1923, execute and deliver to respondent its promissory note in that sum, secured by two duly executed chattel mortgages on the personal property above described; that said two chattel mortgages were thereafter, and on June 5, 1923, duly recorded in the county of Mendocino, the situs of the property covered thereby, and were, on October 9, 1923, duly recorded in the city and county of San Francisco, the principal place of business of the corporation-mortgagor; that thereafter, and from time to time between July 5, 1923, and August 5, 1923, Gripton advanced and loaned to the corporation various additional sums aggregating $10,000, all of which future advances were also provided for and secured by the chattel mortgages theretofore executed and delivered; that in addition to the secured loans of $40,000, Gripton, between August 5, 1923, and September 27, 1923, advanced and loaned to the corporation various other and unsecured sums of money totaling $10,600; that from time to time, and as the loans were made, the corporation had duly executed and delivered to respondent its several promissory notes covering both the secured and unsecured loans; that on October 9, 1923, and with the consent and authorization of the corporation acting through its president and general manager, and not by reason of any fraud or conspiracy or attempt to secure a preference, Gripton peaceably and lawfully entered upon and took possession of the mortgaged property; that the agreement of May 5, 1923, wherein provision was made for the loans and evidences of indebtedness thereafter given and made, is valid, save and except a portion thereof relating to a certain bonus to be paid to respondent; that the notes and mortgages executed and delivered by the corporation pursuant to the terms of the agreement with Gripton are, and each is, valid as to the principal thereof, but not as to the interest therein provided for; that, at the time respondent entered upon and took possession of the mortgaged property, the corporation mortgagor was in default and respondent was acting solely to protect his security, and not by reason of any desire to secure a preference; that this present action, though purporting to be for the benefit of the corporation's creditors other than respondent, was in fact instigated by the defendant Plum, president and general manager of the corporation and its principal stockholder; that, with the exception of $3,535 paid in by the stockholders of the corporation, $1,464.13 received for lumber sold, and $15,782.42 advanced by unsecured creditors, the $50,000 advanced and loaned by Gripton to the corporation constituted its entire capital investment, assets, and operating resources up to and including October 9, 1923; that on said date, and solely by reason of the corporation's default, and under and pursuant to the terms of the agreement between the parties, the respondent, upon due notice, declared the principal of the loans due and payable, and on the following day noticed for sale the property covered by the chattel mortgages; that five days thereafter, and on October 15, 1923, an involuntary petition in bankruptcy was filed against the corporation, and the proposed sale under respondent's chattel mortgages was thereupon restrained until further order of the bankruptcy court; that on November 3, 1923, the corporation was duly adjudged a bankrupt; that at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy the assets of the corporation did not approximate the amount of respondent's secured loan; that no equity, therefore, exists in favor of the corporation or its trustee in bankruptcy; that the restraining order remained in force from October 15, 1923, to August 28, 1925, during all of which time the trustee in bankruptcy represented to respondent that he would secure a purchaser for the property and would pay respondent the amount ($40,000) of his secured loan; that such payment was never made, whereupon the respondent, Gripton, on August 21, 1925, filed before the referee in bankruptcy his petition for leave to foreclose his chattel mortgages; that the plaintiff, as successor to the original trustee of the bankrupt corporation, resisted and opposed respondent's application, and the referee in bankruptcy thereafter made his order authorizing respondent's foreclosure of the mortgage liens, the order reciting the absence of any equity in the trustee by reason of the insufficiency of the mortgaged property to fully pay and discharge respondent's secured loans, and the expiration of approximately one and a half years without the trustee having secured a purchaser of the property at a sum equal to or in excess of respondent's lien upon the property; that on September 10, 1925, and upon due and legal notice, respondent caused all of the mortgaged property to be sold at public auction, and, being the highest and best bidder therefor, respondent himself bought in the property for the sum of $5,750, its reasonable worth, giving the corporation credit for this amount upon its promissory note for $30,000. The findings further recite that all of the respondent Gripton's transactions with the corporation, up to and including the foreclosure sale and buying in of the property, were had in good faith and without any intent or design to hinder, delay, or defraud the corporation's creditors; that all during respondent's possession of the property he has properly cared for and maintained it, paying all accrued taxes, etc.; that it is true that on November 3, 1923, the corporation was indebted to unsecured creditors in the sum of $15,782.42, and to employees in the sum of $8,410, all in addition to respondent's secured loan of $40,000 and his unsecured loan of $10,600, but that it is not true that any debts were contracted by the corporation between May 5, 1923, and June 5, 1923, and it is "not true that none of the creditors of said [corporation] had any knowledge of the existence of said chattel mortgages or either thereof or of any advances made by said Gripton [respondent]"; that at all of the times from October, 1923, to December, 1925, the predecessor of the appellant trustee "had full knowledge of each and all of the matters which are herein found as facts which occurred or existed prior to said 10th day of December, 1925, when and as the same occurred, and that such knowledge upon the part of said [predecessor trustee] was the reason that he instituted no proceedings during his said trusteeship for the purpose of recovering any of the property which is herein described." Upon these findings, the court concluded, as matter of law, that the agreement for the loans, together with the several notes and chattel mortgages executed and delivered pursuant thereto, are and each is valid as to the principal sum, but not as to the interest; that the respondent was not guilty of fraud, but at all times acted in good faith and without any design to hinder, delay, or defraud any of the corporation's other creditors; that the appellant trustee is guilty of laches; that respondent is the owner and entitled to the possession of the property sold upon the foreclosure of the chattel mortgages; and none of the corporation's acts constituted a preference. Judgment for respondent was accordingly entered, from which this appeal has been taken by the trustee, whose principal contention is that respondent's mortgages are void because of the delay intervening between their execution and recordation. Defendant Walter A. Gripton died since the entry of judgment, and Dorothy L. Gripton, executrix of his last will, has been substituted, and the title of the cause ordered amended accordingly.

[2-4] Our law provides that a mortgage of personal property is void as against creditors of the mortgagor unless it is recorded in the office of the county recorder of the county in which the mortgagor resides, if the mortgagor be a resident of this state, and in the county in which the property mortgaged is situate. Civ. Code, §§ 2957, 2959. However, since an unrecorded chattel mortgage is good as between the parties thereto, a mere general creditor of the mortgagor is not in a position to attack its validity. Loosemore v. Baker, 175 Cal. 420, 422, 166 P. 26; Lemon v. Wolff, 121 Cal. 272, 275, 53 P. 801. Only a creditor who has acquired a lien upon the mortgaged property by virtue of some legal proceeding, or who is armed with some process authorizing seizure of the property, can question its compliance with the formalities prescribed by the Code. Lemon v. Wolff, supra. In the case of Noyes v. Bank of Italy, 206 Cal. 266, 269-270, 274 P. 68, we held that under the Bankruptcy Act (11 USCA) a trustee in bankruptcy is placed in the position of a lien creditor, and is thus entitled to attack an alleged void mortgage, thereby enabling him to protect the interests of general creditors against invalid liens and unlawful transfers. There can, therefore, be no question as to appellant's right to prosecute an action of this character. His right of recovery, however, is dependent on matters to be presently considered.

The recordation of a chattel mortgage has been designed as a substitute for and the equivalent of the immediate delivery and continued change of possession made essential by section 3440 of the Civil Code to effect transfers of personal property in other cases. Ruggles v. Cannedy, 127 Cal. 290, 296, 53 P. 911, 59 P. 827, 46 L. R. A. 371. Recordation should, therefore, be had immediately upon execution, or as soon thereafter as practical, in order to give notice to and bind third parties, otherwise the mortgage is void as to those persons enumerated in section 2957, supra. Ruggles v. Cannedy, supra, page 298 of 127 Cal., 53 P. 911, 59 P. 827; Williams v. Belling, 76 Cal. App. 610, 245 P. 455. An unrecorded chattel mortgage, or one whose recordation has been unduly delayed, has been held to be void both as to antecedent creditors and those who became creditors of the mortgagor during the period of time between execution and recordation. Noyes v. Bank of Italy, supra, page 272 of 206 Cal., 274 P. 68; United Bank & Tr. Co. v. Powers, 89 Cal. App. 690, 694-695, 265 P. 403. However, sections 2957 and 2959, supra, are qualified by and are to be read with section 2973 of the same Code, which latter section provides, in part, that unrecorded mortgages of personal property "are nevertheless valid between the parties * * * and persons who, before parting with value, have actual notice thereof." In this connection, see Ronning v. Way, 18 Cal. App. 527, 530, 123 P. 615, and Old Settlers' Inv. Co. v. White, 158 Cal. 236, 240, 110 P. 922.

[5-9] The findings show that the recordation of the mortgages here assailed was delayed for a period of one month in the county where the property was situate, and for a period of five months in the county where the corporation mortgagor had its residence, assuming for present purposes that the principal place of business of a mortgagor corporation is its residence for purposes of recordation under section 2959, supra. Gallup v. Sac., etc., Drainage Dist., 171 Cal. 71, 74, 151 P. 1142; Wright v. Bundy, 11 Ind. 398. The one month's delay in the county where the property was situate does not affect the validity of the mortgages, for the reason that the court below found, and the appeal being on the judgment roll it must be assumed the finding is sustained by the evidence, that none of the claims of the other creditors of the corporation, whom the appellant trustee represents, had been created or had arisen prior to June 5, 1923, the date of recordation in Mendocino county, the situs of the property. We have already pointed out that, under the authorities, a chattel mortgage is not void as to those who did not part with or acquire any rights or become creditors of the mortgagor either prior to or during the period of time between execution and recordation. United Bank & Tr. Co. v. Powers, supra, page 694 of 89 Cal. App., 265 P. 403. Nor do we think the five months' delay in the county of residence is fatal to the validity of respondent's mortgages. Among other things, appellant's complaint alleges that the creditors of the corporation, other than respondent, were without knowledge of the existence of respondent's chattel mortgages, or of any loans or advances made by him to the corporation. This allegation is found to be untrue, the trial court declaring that it is "not true that none of the creditors of said [corporation] had any knowledge of the existence of said chattel mortgages or either thereof or of any advances made by [respondent]." All intendment and presumptions being in favor of the findings and judgment of the court below, the foregoing finding may fairly and reasonably be construed to mean that the other creditors of the corporation had become such well knowing of the existence of respondent's mortgages. Under section 2973, supra, and the cases construing that section, such actual notice of the existence of respondent's mortgages precludes the other creditors or their representative (the appellant trustee) from challenging their validity.

[10-12] There is a further and additional ground determinative of this appeal. The court below has found that the appellant is precluded from prevailing in this action by reason of laches. In this connection, it is found that from October, 1923, to December, 1925, a period in excess of two years, the original trustee (appellant's predecessor in office) had full knowledge of all the facts now relied on as a basis for the claim of invalidity in respondent's mortgages, and during all of that time had done nothing toward securing an adjudication of the question, other than causing the bankruptcy court to temporarily restrain respondent's threatened foreclosure of the mortgages. This action was not filed until April 9, 1926. Equity abhors stale claims. There is no hard and fast rule, either as to the lapse of time or the circumstances which will justify the application of the doctrine of laches. In addition to mere lapse of time, there must exist some circumstances from which the defendant may be prejudiced, or there must be such a lapse of time that it may be reasonably supposed that such prejudice will occur if the remedy is allowed. Cahill v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 42, 47, 78 P. 467. Laches is a question of fact, on the evidence, and must be determined by a consideration of all the circumstances of each particular case. Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 245, 81 P. 516. It is a question to be determined primarily and very largely by the trial court, and an appellate court will not interfere with its discretion in this respect unless manifest injustice has been done, or unless its conclusion cannot reasonably be held to find support in the evidence. Suhr v. Lauterbach, 164 Cal. 591, 594, 130 P. 2; Pratt v. Pratt, 43 Cal. App. 261, 271, 279, 184 P. 956. As we have not the evidence before us in this case, we are not in a position to declare the trial court's finding and conclusion in this regard to be unwarranted. The circumstances disclosed by the findings are, in our opinion, sufficient to justify the application of the doctrine of laches to appellant's claim.

[13] The provision for a usurious rate of interest on the loans secured by respondent's mortgages does not affect the validity of the principal sum due or the mortgages securing the same. Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Co., 200 Cal. 609, 622, 254 P. 956, 255 P. 805, 53 A. L. R. 725. Moreover, no part of the principal sum or interest has ever been paid to the respondent. In this opinion we have given no consideration to the real property mentioned in the complaint, for in appellant's opening brief it is stated that the real property "is not any part of the subject matter of the present litigation."

The findings of fact set out at length in this opinion negative all claim of actual fraud. Walter A. Gripton advanced substantially all of the funds available to the corporation during the period of its solvency. He was never reimbursed. There is now owing to his executrix, the substituted respondent, approximately $44,850, which is undoubtedly uncollectible. To deprive the estate and respondent not only of this sum of money, but also of the meagre security the executrix holds therefor, would, under the circumstances disclosed by the findings, be highly inequitable. The conclusion of the court below is a proper one. Our examination of the appellant's briefs discloses nothing suggesting a different determination.

The judgment must be, and it is, therefore, affirmed.

SEAWELL, J.

This appeal was first passed upon by the District Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, Division 2, Presiding Justice Nourse writing the decision in affirmance of the trial court's judgment. 293 P. 93. A petition for hearing by this court was granted and the appeal is now before us for decision. Said District Court of Appeal affirmed the judgment upon the ground that the issue as to whether appellant had been guilty of negligence, as found by the trial court, in making delivery of the securities involved in the action to a party who embezzled the same, was one of fact and the trial court's finding thereon, by reason of conflicting evidence, could not be disturbed.

Plaintiff sued for the market value and accrued dividends of certain stocks and bonds which had been deposited with the Union Trust Company prior to its consolidation under the name it now bears. The cause was tried without a jury and judgment went for the plaintiff in the sum of $17,967.47. The appeal was taken on a bill of exceptions.

On December 1, 1916, plaintiff's mother, Nelly C. Mason, deposited with the Union Trust Company thirty-nine $1,000 bonds of the United Railroads of San Francisco, subject to the terms of a reorganization agreement. The trust company issued to her a certificate or receipt for the bonds, which provided that the interest of the depositor was assignable by transfer on the books by the holder in person or by agent upon surrender of the certificate properly indorsed. On October 31, 1917, plaintiff's mother, through her attorney in fact, Theodore Gray, sold and transferred her interest in this certificate to the plaintiff, and in 1919 said attorney in fact presented the assigned certificate to the trust company and made demand for delivery of the bonds. The trust company refused to make delivery when it was developed that plaintiff's mother died on February 12, 1918, the objection of the trust company being that the question might be raised as to legal delivery and also as to whether the assignment as presented by Mr. Gray, attorney in fact, was made after the death of his principal, who was a resident of England, for the purpose of avoiding the administration of her estate and the payment of inheritance taxes. Some time between this date and March 3, 1926, the trust company received in exchange for the thirty-nine bonds of the United Railroads other securities, as it was authorized to do under the reorganization agreement.

The request of Mr. Gray to make said transfer in 1919, one year after his principal's death and upon a power of attorney executed several years prior thereto, fully warranted the trust company and its attorneys in adopting precautionary measures in the circumstances of the situation, and the suggestion that the estate of Mrs. Mason be probated and plaintiff prove her claim or that proof be made in some satisfactory manner was not unreasonable. During the lifetime of Mrs. Mason, Mr. Gray had made no request for a transfer of said certificate and the trust company did not know of its existence. No move was made to take out letters of administration, and the matter remained quiescent as between the trust company and Mr. Gray, with the exception of one other request made in 1921, until November 5, 1925, a period of six years, when he delivered the original certificate issued to Nelly C. Mason by the Union Trust Company, and assigned by himself, as her attorney in fact, to plaintiff, Florence Elizabeth Mason Palmer, undorsed by any one, so it is claimed, to one James R. Ewing, Jr., with whom said Theodore Gray had bargained to reduce to possession.

Mr. Ewing, who appeared at this stage of the proceeding, was a stranger to Theodore Gray. He called upon him at his home, and made known to Mr. Gray that he had obtained knowledge of Mr. Gray's attempt to gain possession of said securities some years prior thereto from friends connected with the Union Trust Company. He assured Mr. Gray that he had correspondents in New York City whose standing with the Equitable Trust Company of New York, which was a depository jointly named in the reorganization agreement with the Union Trust Company, was such that they could induce the Equitable Trust Company, which in turn was able to control said Union Trust Company, to interest itself in the proposition to the end that said securities could be obtained from the Union Trust Company's possession without even an indorsement.

Mr. Gray, whose version of the transaction is as herein stated—Ewing not being produced at the trial—said he did not believe that Ewing would be able to obtain said securities from the possession of said Union Trust Company and so informed Ewing. Nevertheless he placed in his possession said certificate or receipt issued by said Union Trust Company, dated December 1, 1916, together with the transfer from Nelly C. Mason to Florence Elizabeth Mason Palmer, bearing date October 31, 1917, and executed by Theodore Gray, as attorney in fact of Nelly C. Mason. Beneath the date of execution and the name "Theodore Gray, attorney in fact" appears the name "Florence Elizabeth Mason Palmer." This signature is not, it is admitted on all sides, in the hand of the person it purports to be in, and was designed by the person who wrote it to deceive the officials of the Union Trust Company or some other financial institution into the belief that the name as written was the indorsement of Florence Elizabeth Mason Palmer, the owner of said securities. Mr. Gray denied that it was written by him or that it was on the assignment when he delivered the certificate to Ewing. On the other hand, the appellant offered an expert witness whose testimony tends to identify said indorsement as the handwriting of Mr. Gray, and cites as an exemplar the same name admittedly written by Gray into the body of the assignment, as evidence of the claim. It would seem that Mr. Gray at the trial acquitted Ewing of having committed the forgery. Ewing made no attempt to acquire possession of said securities and collateral through the offices of his said New York correspondents or the Equitable Trust Company of New York, but shortly after it came into his hands attempted to sell the certificate to McDonnell & Co., but failed because there was no assignment of the certificate to him. A proper form of transfer was submitted to him, but Ewing said that it would be of no use because the owner of the certificate was in England. He then set about to obtain said securities from the custody of the Union Trust Company. In his plan he prepared an assignment of said certificate in type form, except his own name as transferee, which appears in his own hand. The purported transferor's name, Florence Elizabeth Mason Palmer, is signed at the proper place, but the day on which the spurious signature was written is in doubt, inasmuch as two witnesses, J. Kempson Smith and W. H. Taplin, officers of the American Bank, who had occasion to inspect the paper on which the assignment was written, on November 17, 1925, under circumstances hereafter related, were not in accord as to whether said name appeared on the assignment at the time they jointly observed it. Mr. Smith is quite sure it did not, while Mr. Taplin is of the impression that it did. The circumstances under which said assignment to Mr. Ewing came to the attention of Mr. Smith and Mr. Taplin was in the preparation by Ewing of his plan to deceive the Union Trust Company into the belief that the Ewing assignment bore the indicia of verity. Whether the assignment, which was typed on the upper half of the sheet of paper which it occupied, was folded so as to conceal the name of the transferor, is not certain. Be this as it may, James R. Ewing, Jr., had a business acquaintance at The American Bank, and he presented to it the paper upon which said assignment appears and upon which his name appears on the lower half, directly under and approximately a quarter of an inch below the name Florence Elizabeth Mason Palmer. He requested Mr. Smith to witness his signature and the latter complied with his request. He then suggested that it would better suit his purposes if the bank would place its stamp as a guaranty of his signature. Accordingly he was directed to Mr. Taplin, the assistant cashier of said bank, who complied with his request by impressing the stamp of the bank directly under the signature, "James R. Ewing, Jr.," in words as follows: "Signature Guaranteed. The American Bank, San Francisco. W. H. Taplin." Mr. Taplin's signature was in ink. Upon the assignment as presented to the Union Trust Company, and done no doubt for the purpose of giving the paper the appearance of having passed scrutiny, in front of the signatures of the purported assignor, assignee and the American Bank, an X inclosed with a circle was placed. Both Mr. Smith and Mr. Taplin are positive that no such check marks appeared upon the paper at the time it came to their attention.

Immediately after the word "signature" in the line "signature guaranteed," as it appears from the impress of the bank's stamp, was inserted in ink the letter "s," making the line read "signatures guaranteed." Thus converting the word into the plural gave the appearance of the bank having guaranteed all the signatures contained on the purported document of transfer. Thus prepared, Ewing presented said certificate of deposit which was issued to Nelly C. Mason December 1, 1916, ten years prior to its presentation by Ewing. Upon the authority of said purported assignment and the guaranty of signatures thereon by the American Bank, the moneys due upon the principal of said bonds and moneys on deposit with the Union Trust Company were paid to him, and all interest past due was paid to him by the United Railroads. Ewing appropriated the entire sum which came into his hands. The bonds had been "called" in 1924, and consequently did not bear interest thereafter. Mr. Gray, as attorney in fact and the agent of Mrs. Mason during her lifetime, and as the attorney in fact and agent of her daughter, Florence Elizabeth Mason Palmer, since 1917, took no reasonable steps looking to the establishment of ownership and possession of said securities. The only move made by him consisted in entering into an absurd scheme, proposed by Ewing and assented to by Gray, whereby Ewing, without the semblance of competent authority, according to Gray's own narrative of the transaction, was supposed to obtain from a trust company securities and valuable property which had been placed with it in another person's name. The conduct of Mr. Gray becomes even more surprising when it is recalled that his training as a business man and accountant was exceptional, and his business experience as a confidential adviser to a leading San Francisco firm continued through a number of years. His acquaintance with Ewing was recent and he entrusted him with valuable securities belonging to another in circumstances that should have suggested caution, seemingly without making reasonable inquiry as to his business reputation. His conduct in the transaction, as related by himself, from first to last is culpable and indefensible measured by the most liberal standard that may be applied in a case involving trust relations or ordinary business methods. If his dereliction alone could be held sufficient to relieve appellant of its failure of duty which it owed to the owners of said securities in its trust and depositary capacity, in the circumstances of this case, there can be no doubt but that it would compel a reversal of the case, but the further fact that had the Union Trust Company made a reasonable investigation and an examination of its records as to the authority of Ewing to withdraw said securities and funds, the obvious forgeries would have been disclosed and all the parties to the transaction, including the Union Trust Company, Gray, and perhaps the owner of the stock, would have been furnished with indubitable proofs of the general dishonesty of the person offering the forged papers, presents the counterside of the question and contains the strength of respondent's case.

[1-3] Much space is given in the briefs to a discussion of the transactions had between Gray and Ewing. We think much of this evidence is not relevant to the issues. That Gray's unusual acts were largely if not wholly responsible for opening the opportunity for Ewing's criminal act is plain, but that he did not intend that said Ewing should endorse any names upon the certificate or assignment than appeared upon it when delivered to him, or that it was understood that he should prepare a fictitious assignment made to himself, are facts found in his favor. Impliedly the trial court found that Gray placed the securities in the hands of Ewing with the view of enabling him to negotiate for their delivery to him. In other words, he had no criminal intent and the securities or proceeds were to be delivered to him and not to Ewing. This, though sounding somewhat weak, has some support in the evidence. The other important finding which rests upon controverted evidence, but which is conclusive upon this court, reads:

"That in truth and in fact, said purported assignment of said certificate and receipt was not signed by plaintiff, or by her attorney in fact, Theodore Gray, or by anyone with her or his authority, knowledge or permission, and the endorsement in plaintiff's name at the bottom of the reverse side of said certificate or receipt likewise was not signed by plaintiff, or by said Theodore Gray, or by anyone with her or his authority, knowledge or permission.

"The court further finds that plaintiff never appointed the said James R. Ewing, Jr., as her agent to receipt and accept, or receipt or accept, from said defendant the said stock, bonds or money, or any thereof."

Appellant invokes the aid of section 3543, Civil Code, which provides that: "where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he, by whose negligence it happened, must be the sufferer." We doubt its application to the instant case. A duty rests upon every bank and trust company to protect its depositors against forged instruments. In this case Gray was the attorney in fact of the owner of the securities which were subjected to forgery, but he was not the author of the forgery, nor did he aid and abet its commission. His unwise conduct made the forgery possible, but such an act could not relieve the trust company of the duty of comparing respondent's signature with her signature as written on her signature card which it had in its files for the purpose of guarding against forgeries, which are a common menace to depositors. It had no special acquaintance with Ewing, and had it used the same caution it used when the matter came to its attention in the first instance the forgery would have been frustrated. The fact that it was content to rely upon the purported guaranty of signatures by the American Bank was the assumption of a risk which it should not have assumed in view of its ready means of detecting the fraud. We think the parties were not in pari delicto in a legal sense.

[4] Appellant complains that its examination of two witnesses, Gray, who was not a party to the action, but who was beneficially interested in the result, and respondent, a party, was unduly circumscribed by the trial court. Appellant undertook to show by these witnesses, on cross-examination of one and by calling the other as his witness, that Mrs. Mason left a large estate which had not been probated in California, and that Gray declined to follow the suggestion of the trust company for the reason that the proceeding would bring to light the fact that a large estate had escaped the payment of the income tax and also that it would put him to the test of disproving to the court that the assignment executed by him as attorney in fact of the mother in favor of the daughter was in fact not executed or delivered until after the death of the mother, and if legally made it was a gift. While this testimony, although somewhat remote, may have had some bearing upon the good faith of Gray in the transaction and should have been received under the salutary provisions of section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, we do not believe that it could have changed the result of the court's decision, for the reason that the court would take judicial notice of the fact that a tax was due the state on such a large amount under the inheritance tax statutes of the state as frequently construed by the courts, and for the further reason that the probative strength of the fact, if established, would not have been regarded as sufficient to overcome the positive statements of Gray as to when and the circumstances in which said assignment was made by authority of Mrs. Mason.

We are aware of the unhappy circumstances which enmesh the appellant, and by which it was lulled into a state of credulity which made it an easy prey to a rascally plot, but we see no way to relieve it at the expense of the person who intrusted it with valuable property with the understanding that it would guard it with vigilant care.

LANGDON, J.

This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment of the superior court of Sutter county in favor of defendants in an action seeking various forms of equitable relief. The controversy arises out of a contract for the sale of about 1,600 acres of real property in said county, entered into by defendants as vendors and plaintiff as purchaser, on October 27, 1927. The sale price was specified to be $65,000, payable by an immediate deposit in escrow of the sum of $1,000, together with a note and mortgage of a third party, previously pledged with defendants by plaintiff, and the further payment of $55,000 in cash. The deed was to be deposited at once, and the balance of the purchase price was to be paid within 30 days. The same period was also allowed the purchaser to examine the title, and the vendor was given 60 days thereafter to cure any defects. An escrow was opened with a title insurance company. The sum of $1,000 was paid into escrow by plaintiff; and the note was deposited by defendants. Defendants also deposited a deed. A title search was made, and plaintiff called attention to two matters affecting the title: The absence of a patent, and litigation concerning water rights in adjoining property, between defendants and third parties. Later a question arose as to a subsisting lease on the property. The lease was terminable upon sale, and this defect was cured within the time allowed by the contract, as was also the case with the patent. Plaintiff, however, demanded that defendants bring to a successful conclusion their suit involving the easement in the adjoining property. This was not done and the present action was brought. Among other things, plaintiff asked for declaratory relief, for a constructive trust of the land in his favor, for specific performance, for an accounting, and for relief against a threatened forfeiture by defendants of the sum of $1,000 paid on account of the purchase price, and specified in the contract as liquidated damages for its breach. Defendants filed an answer and cross-complaint. The court found, in substance, that the contract of sale did not include any water rights; that no defects in the title existed; that a deed had been tendered in conformity with the terms of the contract; that plaintiff had failed to deposit the balance of the purchase price; and was at no time ready, able, or willing to perform his obligation to pay the balance of the price. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendants, quieting their title to the property, and forfeiting the installment payment made by plaintiff on the purchase price.

[1, 2] We are satisfied that this judgment was correct. A study of the complaint and of plaintiff's brief indicates that the relief sought was probably specific performance with a deduction in the purchase price as compensation for the alleged defects, although some of his testimony is inconsistent with this theory. Conceding the power of the court in a proper case to grant specific performance in this manner, an essential basis for the equitable remedy must be a showing by the plaintiff of performance, or tender of performance, or ability and willingness to perform. Buckmaster v. Bertram, 186 Cal. 673, 200 P. 610; Peckham v. Stewart, 97 Cal. 147, 31 P. 928; Pomeroy, Specific Performance of Contracts (3d Ed.) p. 713, § 323. Plaintiff pleaded none of these things, and the record shows that he neither deposited nor tendered the balance of the purchase price within the time required by the contract, nor did he ever pay it. Moreover, it affirmatively appears from his own testimony that he was unable to do so. His intention was to borrow the greater part of the purchase money, and he had not met the conditions laid down by the prospective lender. The chief condition, he testified, was the successful termination of the suit involving the water rights. Under these circumstances he cannot have specific performance, regardless of whether defendants are in default in their performance. The obligation to pay the purchase money into escrow within the 30-day period was, by the terms of the contract, an independent covenant, not conditioned upon deposit of the deed by the vendor; and the breach of that covenant leaves plaintiff without any right to the equitable relief sought. Southern Pacific R. R. Co. v. Allen, 112 Cal. 455, 44 P. 796; Donovan v. Judson, 81 Cal. 334, 22 P. 682, 6 L. R. A. 591.

[3, 4] The only other question is whether plaintiff is entitled to the return of his deposit. Since plaintiff is in default, defendants are entitled to retain it if they have fully performed. The only serious contention made by plaintiff is that the contract was one for the sale of real property and therefore carried with it all interests comprehended by the term, including water rights. The litigation over these rights had commenced prior to the execution of the contract, and it was stipulated that plaintiff was fully informed of the facts concerning it. The contract of sale was drawn by plaintiff's attorney, and an ambiguity should not be construed in his favor. Cal. Civ. Code, § 1654; Robert Marsh & Co., Inc., v. Tremper (Cal. Sup.) 292 P. 950. But there is no ambiguity. The contract contains no reference to the litigation, and makes no mention of water rights. To construe it as requiring defendants to carry unmentioned litigation to a successful conclusion within the 60-day period for curing defects in the title would be most absurd. The trial court's interpretation of the instrument is clearly supported by the evidence.

[5] No other defects in title were pleaded nor presented at the trial. On appeal, several alleged additional defects are set forth, reference being made to an informal report of the title search, introduced in evidence by defendants for a wholly unrelated purpose, namely, to establish its date. It is obviously improper to raise such issues on appeal, without pleading or proof in support thereof, and without an opportunity for rebuttal by the adverse party. Indeed, it does not even appear that these objections were made by plaintiff within the time specified in the contract.

1. Equity ⚡66.

Cancellation of notes under contract that notes should be void unless agreement for improvement of land was carried out will not be decreed, except on condition that plaintiffs do equity (Civ. Code, §§ 3275, 3369).

Under Civ. Code, § 3369, court of equity cannot enforce forfeiture, but must grant relief from it, and under section 3275, whenever, by terms of obligation, party incurs forfeiture or loss in nature of forfeiture by reason of failure to comply with provisions, he may be relieved therefrom on making full compensation to the other party, except in case of grossly negligent, willful, or fraudulent breach of duty. It follows that notes and deeds of trust in present suit should not be canceled unless defendants were reimbursed for reasonable value of benefits already conferred by their part performance.

2. Damages ⚡80(1).

Any provision by which property is forfeited without regard to actual damage suffered would be unenforceable penalty.

3. Damages ⚡80(1).

Provision that notes should be void on failure to carry out agreement respecting improvement of land was "penalty" (Civ. Code, § 1671).

By its terms, the provision would apply regardless of amount of balance due on note and irrespective of kind or extent of default in performance, or amount of beneficial performance already received. There was nothing in the pleadings or in the nature of the contract to show that the actual damage suffered by default in performance would be "impracticable or extremely difficult to ascertain," and, unless such a showing is made, the provision is unenforceable.

LANGDON, J.

This action was brought to cancel two notes and deeds of trust by which they were secured. Upon motion of plaintiffs, judgment was rendered in their favor on the pleadings. Defendants appeal on the judgment roll.

From the pleadings it appears that plaintiffs executed one note and deed of trust on their own property, and later succeeded to the property subject to the other deed of trust executed by one McMillan. The notes and deeds of trust arose out of the same type of transaction and are similar in their provisions. Plaintiffs on December 14, 1922, purchased from Berkeley Securities Company a tract of land of about 10 acres, at $655 per acre, paying $2,500 in cash, and executing their note for the balance, which totaled $4,832.77. The note was made to Security Bond & Finance Company, and the deed of trust to defendant Mercantile Trust Company, as trustee. The note provided that its payment was dependent upon performance by the vendor of the terms of a certain contract entered into by the parties at the time of purchase. By the terms of this contract, Berkeley Securities Company was given control over the property, and it agreed to grade the land, plant Kadota fig trees, install pumping plants, irrigate, cultivate, and care for the land and pay taxes for a period of six years. Until the payment of the note, one-half the proceeds of the crops was to go to the company, and the other half was to be credited on the last payments to be made on the note. The note contains this provision: " * * * Upon failure of the said Berkeley Securities Company to carry out any and all parts of its terms, conditions and covenants in the said agreement after ninety days' written notice" the note is to become "null and void as to the balance of the payments to be made herein." The deed of trust contains a similar provision. The complaint sets forth that written notice of failure to comply with the care contract was served on Berkeley Securities Company on July 17, 1926, and on defendant College Building & Loan Association on July 29, 1926. The latter notice concluded with the statement that "these instruments are now both null and void." The answer alleges that the care contract was fully performed for a period of three and one-half years; that Berkeley Securities Company and Security Bond & Finance Company became bankrupt, but that defendant College Building & Loan Association purchased the note for value and prior to the default in performance. It is further alleged that plaintiffs received the whole of the crops for 1926, 1927, and 1928, without accounting to defendant for its share thereof. The answer also sets forth various expenses incurred in carrying out the contract, and alleges that the reasonable cost of carrying out the required performance for the remaining two and one-half years of the six-year period was the sum of $50 per acre for each year, excluding the value of the crops.

[1-3] The prayer of the answer was that the court grant relief to the plaintiffs only upon condition that they do equity. This position is, we think, unquestionably sound.

The note expressly provides a penalty for failure to perform the care contract. That penalty is the forfeiture of the right to enforce the note and deed of trust. A penalty need not take the form of a stipulated fixed sum; any provision by which money or property would be forfeited without regard to the actual damage suffered would be an unenforceable penalty. See Greenleaf v. Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works, 78 Cal. 606, 21 P. 369; Ballantine, Forfeiture for Breach of Contract, 5 Minn. L. Rev. 329. By its terms, the provision would apply here regardless of the amount of the balance due on the note, and irrespective of the kind or extent of default in performance, or the amount of beneficial performance already received. There is nothing in the pleadings or in the nature of the contract to show that the actual damage suffered by default in performance would be "impracticable or extremely difficult to ascertain" (Cal. Civ. Code, § 1671), and, unless such a showing is made the provision is unenforceable (Cal. Civ. Code, § 1670; Sun-Maid Raisin Growers v. Mosesian, 90 Cal. App. 1, 265 P. 828; Leslie v. Brown Bros., 208 Cal. 606, 283 P. 936; see Arndt, Liquidated Damages in California, 10 Cal. L. Rev. 8).

Moreover, the action is in equity, to cancel the note and deed of trust. The settled doctrine, not only prevents a court of equity from enforcing a forfeiture (Cal. Civ. Code, § 3369), but requires that the court grant relief from it. Section 3275 of the Civil Code provides: "Whenever, by the terms of an obligation, a party thereto incurs a forfeiture, or a loss in the nature of a forfeiture, by reason of his failure to comply with its provisions, he may be relieved therefrom, upon making full compensation to the other party, except in case of a grossly negligent, willful, or fraudulent breach of duty." This section codifies the equitable rule, which Pomeroy states as follows: "Wherever a penalty or a forfeiture is used merely to secure the payment of a debt, or the performance of some act, or the enjoyment of some right or benefit, equity, considering the payment, or performance, or enjoyment to be the real thing intended by the agreement, and the penalty or forfeiture to be only an accessory, will relieve against such penalty or forfeiture by awarding compensation instead thereof, proportionate to the damages actually resulting from the non-payment, or non-performance, or non-enjoyment, according to the stipulations of the agreement. The test which determines whether equity will or will not interfere in such cases is the fact whether compensation can or cannot be adequately made for a breach of the obligation which is thus secured." Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence, § 433. The same writer also declares that "a court of equity will never, by its affirmative action, or by the affirmative provisions of its decree, enforce a penalty or forfeiture, or any stipulation of that nature. * * * Id., § 381; see, also, section 459. The present holder of the note has not been guilty of any of the misconduct described in section 3275 of the Civil Code, nor can the bankruptcy of its predecessor in interest be regarded as a willful breach of duty. Defendant offers to do equity and to compensate plaintiffs for all losses actually sustained. It would be difficult to conceive of a clearer case for the application of the equitable doctrine.

Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 1, 55 P. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17, upon which plaintiffs place great reliance, is not controlling. The holding there was that in a contract of sale of real property, where time was of the essence, the vendor might, upon default by the vendee, stand upon his contract, retain title, and forfeit prior installments of the purchase price. In that case payment of the whole of the purchase price was a condition, precedent to the right to receive a deed. While this decision undoubtedly permits a forfeiture in violation of the spirit and perhaps the language of section 3275 (see 18 Cal. L. Rev. 681), its conclusion was reached without any consideration of the statute, and it deals only with express conditions precedent. It cannot be deemed to apply to a case involving facts which are wholly dissimilar. Defendants here are not defaulting purchasers claiming a deed, and plaintiffs are not standing upon their contract, but are seeking the aid of the court to escape from its obligations. Moreover, the instant case does not involve a condition precedent to performance by the purchasers. The payments on the note are required to be made periodically, and concurrently with performance by the vendor. The penal provision is in the nature of a condition subsequent, setting forth a contingency upon the happening of which the forfeiture takes place. See 6 R. C. L. 904, §§ 290, 291.

Another persuasive argument of defendants is that a strict construction of the forfeiture provisions, as required by statute (Cal. Civ. Code, § 1442), shows that there was not a sufficient compliance, with its requirement of notice on the part of plaintiffs. Because of the above conclusion, it is unnecessary to consider this point.

It follows that the notes and deeds of trust should not be cancelled unless defendants are reimbursed for the reasonable value of the benefits already conferred by their part performance. On the other hand, if the notes remain as binding obligations, plaintiffs are entitled to compensation for the partial failure of performance, which compensation may be applied on their liability under the notes, and reduced by any amount which may be due defendants out of the proceeds of crops not accounted for. Of course, in requiring plaintiffs to reimburse defendants for the reasonable value of their performance, the court must permit a deduction for any damages actually suffered by the default.

The judgment is therefore reversed, with directions to the trial court to permit amendment of pleadings or introduction of evidence in conformity with the conclusions reached in this opinion.

In determining whether grantor of trust deed was in default, authorizing foreclosure, grantor held entitled to offset against delinquent interest payments on trust deed note, interest grantor paid on sum, included in trust deed note, which grantee agreed to pay on delinquent taxes, but never paid, though grantor could not offset, in addition, interest accumulating on delinquent taxes.

Grantor in trust deed could not offset interest accumulating on delinquent taxes which the grantee in the trust deed had failed to pay, since both the delinquent taxes and the trust deed note, covering the sum which the grantee had agreed to pay on delinquent taxes, bore interest at 7 per cent., and the detriment suffered by the grantor of the trust deed through the grantee's failure to pay the delinquent taxes, was completely offset by the credit received by reason of the overpayment of interest, and to give the grantor an additional 7 per cent. interest would be to give him a credit of 14 per cent. for the failure of the grantee of the trust deed to pay an indebtedness bearing only 7 per cent. interest.

CURTIS, J.

This action was brought by the plaintiff claiming to be the owner of certain real property in the possession of the defendant, for the purpose of obtaining possession of said real property. The defendant held said real property under a lease from one F. E. Johnson, and the court permitted said Johnson to intervene in said action, and under said permission he filed a complaint in intervention in said action in which he asserted his ownership to said real property and the defendant's right to said possession thereof under a lease from said intervener.

To secure the proper background of the relations existing between the parties to this action at and immediately prior to the commencement of this action it might be well to briefly trace the dealings carried on by them for a period of seven or eight years prior to the commencement of this action. At the inception of these dealings Johnson was the owner of the real property which forms the subject-matter of this action. At that time he borrowed from the plaintiff a sum of money, the exact amount of which does not appear, but it was probably the sum of $5,000. For this amount he gave his promissory note and secured the payment of said note by a mortgage on said real property. This note and mortgage remained outstanding and unpaid for some three or four years, or possibly five; the exact period does not appear from the record. That point is not material. Johnson was greatly in arrears in payment of his interest on said note, and the plaintiff, some time in 1926, brought suit for the foreclosure of said mortgage. Before this action reached final judgment and on January 6, 1927, the parties to said action adjusted their differences by Johnson giving a new note, covering his prior indebtedness to the plaintiff, certain delinquent taxes on the real property which the plaintiff had paid, and other delinquent taxes against said real property which had not been paid. This promissory note was secured by a trust deed given upon said real property. The amount of this note was $14,340.72, and it was made up of the following items: Balance due on first note, $7,406.83; delinquent taxes paid by plaintiff, $5,422.66; delinquent taxes not paid, $537.07; other delinquent taxes not paid, $1,974.16.

These items amount to $15,340.72. Of this amount the plaintiff released Johnson from the payment of $1,000, which amount deducted from the aggregate amount due plaintiff left the sum of $14,340.72, the amount of the later or second promissory note executed by Johnson in favor of plaintiff. It will be noted that in this note were included two items for delinquent taxes which had not been paid. Plaintiff agreed to pay all of these delinquent taxes. The item of $537.07 plaintiff paid following the execution and delivery of the note, but the plaintiff never did pay the other item of $1,974.16. This second note was dated January 6, 1927, and bore interest at 7 per cent. per annum payable monthly. It was payable eighteen months after date with a proviso that, if the interest was not paid within ten days after it became due, then the whole sum of principal and interest at the option of the holder should become due and payable. Johnson paid the interest on the whole of the principal sum of said promissory note, including the sum of $1,974.16 up to February 6, 1928; the last payment having been on February 29, 1928. The trust deed given to secure the payment of said note contained a covenant that "no default or breach under any of the terms of this trust deed shall be claimed until the maker of the obligation for which it is security shall have been served with a copy of written notice of such breach, and the privilege of curing same within ten days thereafter shall have been accorded them."

On May 24, 1928, plaintiff caused to be served upon Johnson, in pursuance of the foregoing stipulation in the trust deed, a notice of default in the payment of the interest due on said promissory note and in the payment of taxes due upon said real property. No interest or other payment was made by Johnson to the plaintiff on account of the amounts due on said promissory note and trust deed. Thereafter the trustees under said deed of trust, after due and legal notice as provided by law and in accordance with the terms of said trust deed, sold said real property to satisfy the amounts due plaintiff on said promissory note. At this sale the plaintiff, Frank Casey, became the purchaser of said real property, and by virtue of this purchase he claims to be the owner of said real property and entitled to the possession thereof. The trial court made findings against the plaintiff and rendered judgment in favor of the defendant Nishihara and adjudging the intervener to be the owner of said real property, subject only to the rights of plaintiff under and by virtue of said trust deed.

The basic finding upon which the trial court rested its judgment against plaintiff and in favor of defendant intervener was "that on the said 24th day of May, 1928, at the time that the said notice was so served by the said plaintiff, Frank Casey, upon the said F. E. Johnson, defendant in intervention, as aforesaid, that the said F. E. Johnson, defendant in intervention, was not in default of any of the provisions of said deed of trust requiring him to pay taxes upon the said real property described in said deed of trust and hereinbefore described, as aforesaid, and the court further finds that at the time of the service of said notice, as aforesaid, the said defendant in intervention, F. E. Johnson, was not in default in the payment of interest on the said principal sum owing by said defendant in intervention, F. E. Johnson, to the said plaintiff, Frank Casey, as evidenced by the said promissory note for which the said deed of trust was executed, as aforesaid, and in this respect the court finds that on the date of the service of the said notice as aforesaid that said plaintiff, Frank Casey, was indebted to the said defendant in intervention, F. E. Johnson, in the sum of one hundred twenty-three and 89/100 dollars ($123.89) as will be hereinafter more specifically set forth and referred to."

The court then proceeds to find that the amount of interest due and unpaid on the promissory note of $14,340.72 on May 24, 1928, the date Johnson was served with the notice of default, was the sum of $216.48. It further found that of said sum of $14,340.72, the sum of $1,974.16 was retained by Casey for the purpose of paying the delinquent taxes on said real property, and that Casey had never paid any of said delinquent taxes; that, in paying the interest on the entire principal sum of said promissory note from January 6, 1927, to February 6, 1928, Johnson had paid interest on said sum of $1,974.16, and the amount of interest paid on this sum of $1,974.16 by Johnson from January 6, 1927, to February 29, 1928, was $149.70. The court further finds "that on the date of said service of the said notice by the said plaintiff, Frank Casey, upon the said defendant in intervention, F. E. Johnson, that the said defendant in intervention, F. E. Johnson, was entitled to a further credit from the plaintiff, Frank Casey, in the further sum of one hundred ninety and 67/100 ($190.67), being seven per cent. of the said sum of nineteen hundred and seventy-four and 16/100 dollars ($1,974.16) retained by the said plaintiff Frank Casey from said tax sale, as aforesaid, which said seven per cent. was added to the said sum necessary to redeem said property at the time of the execution of said note to the date of the service of said notice, by reason of the statutes in such case made and provided. * * *" The court then proceeds to add these two amounts of $149.70 and $190.67 together, thereby securing the larger amount of $340.37, which latter amount the court found Johnson was entitled to as a credit against the interest due from him on May 24, 1928. This interest, as we have seen, amounted to $216.48, which deducted from the credit of $340.37 leaves the sum of $123.89, which amount the court found Casey was indebted to Johnson on May 24, 1928, at the date the notice of default was served. As conclusions of law from these facts the court found that, as Johnson was not in default, the notice was prematurely given, and all proceedings thereafter looking toward the sale of said real property under said trust deed were illegal, and the deed issued to Casey by the trustees was a nullity. It is apparent that, if the findings of the trial court are supported by the evidence, the conclusions drawn therefrom are correct, and the judgment must be affirmed.

There is no question but that Johnson was entitled to a credit on the interest due from him on May 24, 1928, in the sum of $149.70, being the interest paid by him from the date of said note to February 29, 1928, on the sum of $1,974.16, which Casey was to pay on the delinquent taxes, but which he never did pay. This sum of $1,974.16 Casey had agreed to pay out and advance for Johnson, and it was upon the understanding and agreement that he would do so that this amount was included in the promissory note secured by the trust deed. As Casey failed to advance this sum, Johnson never became indebted to him in this amount. Nevertheless, Johnson paid interest thereon, amounting to said sum of $149.70. This payment was rightly credited on the amount of interest Johnson owed, and reduced this latter amount to the extent of said sum of $149.70. As to the item of $190.67, we question the action of the court in giving credit in this amount to Johnson on the interest due from him. It appears to us that the court gave a double credit to Johnson in allowing both of these amounts as credits in favor of Johnson on his interest account. If Casey had paid these delinquent taxes, then Johnson was no doubt in default in the sum of at least $216.48. Having neglected to make the payment of $1,974.16, Casey was not entitled to interest thereon, and for that reason said sum of $149.70 was correctly credited to Johnson. Having received credit for this amount, he is not entitled to a further credit in the amount of the interest accumulating on the delinquent taxes which Casey failed to pay. The delinquent taxes, the court found, bore interest at 7 per cent. per annum the same as provided in the promissory note given by Johnson to Casey. Therefore the detriment suffered by Johnson through Casey's failure to pay said delinquent taxes was completely offset and met by the credit Johnson received by reason of his overpayment of interest. To hold otherwise would be to give Johnson credit of 14 per cent. for the failure of Casey to pay an indebtedness bearing only 7 per cent. interest. We can see no escape from this conclusion. It follows, therefore, that the findings of the court are not sustained by the evidence and particularly that which finds Johnson was not in default in the payment of interest on said promissory note on May 24, 1928, the date said notice of default was served on him. To the contrary, the undisputed facts show that he was in default in the sum of $216.48, less the sum of $149.70, or $66.78.

While this conclusion may result in Johnson losing his property, from the facts above stated it seems to us that he has no one to blame but himself. It further appears to us that Casey has been extremely lenient with Johnson and has been slow to take advantage of Johnson's numerous defaults and delinquencies. In the first place, the undisputed evidence is that Johnson borrowed some $5,000 from Casey a few years prior to January 6, 1927. The exact date does not appear in the record, but is not material. Johnson failed to pay the interest on this loan, and Casey was compelled to institute an action to foreclose the mortgage given to secure its payment. At that time it appears that not only a large amount of interest, over $2,000, was due, but $5,422.66 in delinquent taxes had accumulated against the mortgaged property which Casey was compelled to pay. While this foreclosure action was pending, Casey agreed to dismiss it and give Johnson another chance to save his property. A new note dated January 6, 1927, secured by a trust deed, was made out, which included the several amounts due from Johnson to Casey, with the stipulation that the interest thereon was to be paid monthly. The interest on this entire note amounted to only $83.65 per month. On January 1, 1928, Johnson leased the real property covered by the trust deed to the defendant Nishihara for the sum of $235 per month; the lease covering a period of ten years. This rental was payable monthly in advance. We, of course, do not know the condition of Johnson's financial affairs, but it would seem that his first duty to Casey as well as to himself would have been to devote sufficient of the rental received from the real property covered by the trust deed in payment of the interest on the indebtedness secured by the trust deed. Not only did he fail to meet his interest promptly, but he permitted it to become over three months in arrears, from February 6 to May 24, 1928, during which time he received as rental from this real property over $700, which amount far exceeded the amount of the delinquent interest. It would appear from the record before us that he made no reasonable attempt to meet his interest engagements with Casey, while he was appropriating to his own use the entire proceeds of said real property. On the other hand, the evidence shows that Casey was extremely lenient and indulgent in his dealings with Johnson. Not only did he permit a large amount of interest on the first loan to become delinquent before taking any action to enforce its payment, but he preserved Johnson's property from sale for delinquent taxes by paying them after they amounted to over $5,400. After the making of the new note and the trust deed, Johnson was frequently delinquent in the payment of his interest, but Casey took no action toward foreclosing the trust deed until Johnson apparently ceased entirely making payments on his interest and allowed over three months to go by without meeting a single installment of interest. We hardly see how Johnson could have expected treatment more generous than that accorded to him by Casey. It is true that Casey did not pay, as the court found he had agreed, the delinquent taxes amounting at the time of the new note to $1,974.16. In explanation of his neglect to pay this amount, Casey testified that he agreed to pay it as soon as he was able; that he had just paid out in satisfaction of other delinquent taxes against said real property $5,400, and he was unable to meet this additional payment of $1,974.16. As long as he agreed to pay these taxes, he should be held to his agreement. He should hold Johnson harmless for his failure to perform his agreement, and should be made to answer to Johnson for all damage sustained by reason of this failure on his part. This damage to Johnson has been adjusted by us in the manner set forth in previous portions of this opinion. This is the only instance in which Casey has failed in his engagements during the many years these parties have dealt with each other. On the other hand, there has been during all these years hardly any appreciable period of time in which Johnson has not been in default in meeting one or the other of his agreements with Casey. That he may lose his property, which is apparently of considerable value, through foreclosure proceedings, is to be deplored, but this result must necessarily follow the course of conduct pursued by him, and is due solely to his own failure to meet his lawful and legal engagements.

The judgment is reversed.

(MOLONY et al., Interveners).

L. A. 10786.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 31, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 24, 1931.

1. Action ☞6.

Statute authorized action to annul building restrictions on plaintiff's property because of change in character of neighborhood, notwithstanding plaintiff had not violated restrictions (Code Civ. Proc. § 1060).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1060 provides that any person interested under a deed, will, or other written instrument, or under a contract, or who desires a declaration of his rights or duties with respect to property, may, in cases of actual controversy, bring an action for a declaration of his rights and duties, which declaration shall have the force of a final judgment and "may be had before there has been any breach of the obligation in respect to which the declaration is sought."

2. Action ☞6.

In action to annul building restrictions in deeds, evidence sustained finding that change in character of neighborhood made it unjust, oppressive, and inequitable to give effect thereto (Code Civ. Proc. § 1060).

Evidence disclosed that plaintiffs' lot was worth about $40,000, without restrictions against erection of any building except residences; that it was on a business street and could be used practically for business purposes only; that a business building thereon would increase the value of every lot in the tract and would not damage residences therein; that taxes on the lot were between $300 and $400 per year; and that street lighting assessments were $360 per year. Parties stipulated that the lot had been placed by city zoning ordinance in a district wherein only business buildings could be erected and exhibits showed that there were business places in both directions therefrom on the same street.

3. Injunction ☞62(3).

Equity may decline to enforce building restrictions where change in neighborhood property uses makes enforcement unjust, oppressive, and inequitable.

4. Appeal and error ☞1010(1).

Trial court's findings, supported by substantial evidence, are binding on appeal.

WASTE, C. J.

This is an action to quiet title and to annul certain building restrictions contained in the deeds through which the plaintiffs deraign their title to lot 31 of tract No. 1600 in the city of Los Angeles. Plaintiffs seek to avoid the effect of the restrictions by reason of an asserted change of condition in the character of the neighborhood, it being alleged that their property is no longer useful for residential purposes. The action was brought against the defendant Country Club Park, a corporation, the original owner and subdivider of the tract. Thereafter a complaint in intervention was filed by the remaining defendants who are owners of other lots in the tract. In due course the pleadings were amended and the interveners made parties defendant. Following a trial before the court sitting without a jury, judgment for plaintiffs was entered as prayed for. From this judgment all of the defendants, save and except the corporation, have appealed.

Citing the case of Strong v. Shatto, 45 Cal. App. 29, 37, 187 P. 159, 162, the appellants contend that the respondents are not, under the allegations of their complaint, entitled to the relief granted. That case declares, in part, that: "The doctrine that equity will not enforce restrictions on the use of property, we think, only applies to cases where it is sought to enforce such restrictions by equitable proceedings, where the reason and justification for them has failed through changed conditions. In other words, under such circumstances a court of equity may deny the relief sought. But the rule does not go to the extent of permitting parties whose land is subject to the legal restraint of such limitations to bring action to quiet their title against such contractual obligations, because of changed conditions. Contractual obligations do not disappear as circumstances change. It is only the granting of equitable relief, and not the binding force of the restrictive covenant, that is affected by a change in the conditions. * * * As there has been no breach of the conditions here, and no attempt to enjoin such a breach or to enforce a forfeiture, we think it premature, at least, to determine the equities of the parties as they might exist at some future time in the event of such breach."

This court denied a petition for hearing in the Shatto Case. However, subsequent to that decision, and in the year 1921 (St. 1921, p. 689), section 1060 of the Code of Civil Procedure was enacted. In brief, this section provides that: "Any person interested under a deed, will or other written instrument, or under a contract, or who desires a declaration of his rights or duties with respect * * * to, in, over or upon property * * * may, in cases of actual controversy * * * bring an action * * * for a declaration of his rights and duties in the premises. * * * He may ask for a declaration of rights or duties, either alone or with other relief. * * * The declaration may be either affirmative or negative in form and effect, and such declaration shall have the force of a final judgment. Such declaration may be had before there has been any breach of the obligation in respect to which said declaration is sought." (Italics ours.)

In the case of Strong v. Hancock, 201 Cal. 530, 542, 543, 258 P. 60, 65, counsel presented the question whether or not the enactment of section 1060, supra, required an abandonment of the rule, announced in Strong v. Shatto, that prior to the breach thereof an action would not lie at the suit of the owner of the servient tenement to quiet his title as against covenants or restrictions running with the land. We found it unnecessary to pass upon the point in that case for the reason that there had been filed by the defendant therein a cross-complaint alleging facts, found to be true by the trial court, entitling the defendant and cross-complainant to affirmative relief by way of approval and enforcement of the restrictions there involved. By reason of our conclusion to affirm the trial court's findings and decree in that case we stated in the opinion that: "We do not find it necessary to consider what the said plaintiff's remedies might have been had we arrived at the conclusion that the cross-plaintiff was not entitled to the relief which the trial court accorded her." However, in a special concurring opinion, Mr. Justice Shenk expressed himself as satisfied that the declaratory relief statute set out above was sufficiently broad and comprehensive in its language to have application to this sort of action. He there stated: "This change in the law [the enactment of section 1060, supra] was * * * sufficient to enable the substituted plaintiff to proceed thereunder and to have his status declared under the conditions as were then shown to exist, and this, notwithstanding the old rule which required him to be hazardingly active in the breach of such restrictions and passive in litigation." We are inclined to agree with the views of Mr. Justice Shenk so succinctly stated in his concurring opinion in the Hancock Case.

[1] The pleadings in this case present a practical situation which calls for declaratory relief. The owner of a lot in a tract of land claims that certain restrictive covenants and conditions are no longer enforceable because of a change in the character of the neighborhood. The original grantor and the owners of other lots in the tract claim, on the contrary, that the covenants and conditions are still enforceable, that they constitute easements upon the lot in question, and that their violation will be ground for injunctive relief and the forfeiture of the lot owner's title. If the lot owner can obtain a declaration in his favor, he may safely proceed to improve his property as he wishes. If such a declaration is refused, he is put in the hazardous position of being obliged to violate the terms of the restrictions before he can know whether or not he must suffer the penalties mentioned. It is inconceivable that he must run the risk of forfeiting any further investment, or even his title to the land, in order to obtain an adjudication of his rights. It seems clear that the declaratory relief statute was intended to relieve a party from exactly such a dilemma. Unless it can be availed of in a situation such as this, it will lose a large part of the value which, upon its enactment was supposed to attach to it. Under the terms of the statute the declaration may be either affirmative or negative in form and effect, and in a case such as this the trial court is therefore empowered either to make a declaration, at the plaintiff's request, that he is not under a duty to comply with the restrictive covenants, or, at the request of the defendants, to make a declaration that he is. That an "actual controversy" exists in such a case goes without saying.

This brings us to a consideration of the propriety of the findings and conclusion of the court below that the character of the neighborhood surrounding the plaintiff's lot has sufficiently changed to leave their property no longer useful or practical for residential purposes, thus rendering it inequitable and unjust to enforce the restrictions or to declare them to be valid subsisting easements. We have examined the entire record in this cause and find that upon this phase of the litigation the decision of the District Court of Appeal (First Appellate District, Division 2) accurately narrates the situation developed before the trial court. For this reason we adopt as and for the decision of this court the following portion of the opinion prepared by Mr. Justice (pro tem.) Burroughs (296 P. 300, 301):

"On January 23, 1912, the defendant Country Club Park, a corporation, was the owner of all the lands embraced in the tract No. 1600, hereinabove referred to. On said date, the corporation, having previously subdivided said tract of land, filed a subdivision map thereof, as provided by law. On May 31, 1916, said corporation conveyed to one Edwin B. Sword lot No. 31 of said tract, and through mesne conveyances respondents are now the owners of said lot. Each one of the appellants owns a lot in said tract No. 1600. In the several deeds, by which both the appellants and respondents obtained their respective titles, there is inserted certain restrictions as to the purposes for which said lots may be used. So far as necessary to a decision of the questions involved on this appeal, it is sufficient to say that the use is limited to residences only, to cost not less than $6,000, and to be located within certain lines. There are provisos attached to said conditions and restrictions by which, if there be any violation thereof by the grantee or his successors in interest, the premises revert to the grantor, its successors or assigns; 'and as to the owner of and the successors in interest of any owner of any other lot or lots in said tract, all and singular said conditions are and shall be covenants running with the land for the benefit of the grantor herein and for the benefit of each and all of the lots in said tract, and of the owners of such lots in said tract and their respective successors in interest, and the breach of any of said covenants and conditions or the continuance of any such breach may be enjoined, abated or remedied by appropriate proceedings by any or either of such owners, their heirs, assigns, or successors in interest.' It is also provided that the restrictions are of no effect after January 1, 1935; that the restrictions and conditions subsequent and the date of termination thereof 'apply to and bind only the property hereinabove described and hereby conveyed and the owners thereof, and the grantor expressly reserves the right to make and/or apply the same or varying or different restrictions and conditions subsequent or to omit the same entirely, respecting other lots in said tract, and/or property owned by the grantor.' The court found, among other matters, that since the execution and delivery of the said deeds and conveyances, the conditions in the neighborhood where said tract is situated have changed, and that the value of said lots have greatly increased; that said property, and particularly said lot 31, is in a section devoted exclusively to and essentially useful for business purposes; that the plaintiffs are ready, able, and willing to improve said lot for business purposes, and that the improvement thereof will not injure or damage the property of the defendants or any thereof, but on the contrary such improvements will make the property in that vicinity more valuable; that the conditions and restrictions are no longer beneficial for the purposes for which they were placed on said property, and that they have now become oppressive and inequitable, and to enforce them would be inequitable and unjust. The exhibits in the case show that said lot 31 is situated on the northeast corner of the intersection of Pico street and Wilton place; that the appealing defendants own lots on Wilshire place north of said lot 31, but not facing on Pico street. Charles B. Felts testified that he has been sales manager for the defendant Country Club Park for about thirteen years last past; that the last residence on said tract to be erected on Pico street was about eight years prior to October, 1927, the time of the trial; that lot 31 sold in 1912 for $4,000, and at the time of the trial, without the restrictions, had a value of about $40,000 and that other property there has a similar value; that Wilton place has many valuable homes. It was stipulated by the parties that Pico street is a business street from this tract on east. W. C. Skaggs testified that Pico street is a business street, and that the only practical purpose for which lot 31 could be used was for business purposes; a business house on this lot would increase the value of every lot in the tract; it would not harm the tract. F. S. Kadletz testified that his occupation was a real estate appraiser; that he had a large experience in that line of work for the city and county and also for individuals; that he was familiar with the Country Club Park tract of land and with said lot 31; that said lot was only suitable for business purposes; that no other property in the tract would be damaged if it were used for business purposes; that it would not damage the residences in this tract to erect a store building on said lot, because the character of the property as business property was already fixed. The plaintiff Arthur C. Hess testified that the taxes on said property were between $300 and $400 per year; that the assessments for the street lighting system was $360 per year; that the property was not desirable as residence property. It was stipulated that in 1912, when the tract was subdivided, the immediate neighborhood in which lot 31 and the adjoining property was situated was strictly residential district; that at that time Pico street had a width of 50 feet and since then has been widened to 80 feet; that since 1921 said lot and the lot immediately adjoining it to the north and for two lots deep on each side of Pico street from east of Western avenue westerly to the city limits has by an ordinance adopted by the city council of the city of Los Angeles been placed in a zoning district; that by virtue of said ordinance the only class of buildings that may be erected in said district, which includes said lot 31, are certain defined places of business. The exhibits attached to the transcript show that to the east of said lot on Pico street are many business places, to the west of said lot on said Pico street there are a number of business houses, such as a drug store, market, barber shop, oil stations, etc. It is true that none of these buildings is within said tract No. 1600, and that there have been no violations of the building restrictions in said tract. It further appears from the evidence that the said tract contains a total of 165 lots; that the defendant Country Club Park, a corporation, still owns 14 lots; that three lots have been sold by the last-named defendant without any restrictions contained in the deeds; that said tract contains 75 lots, the restrictions upon which expired January 1, 1925; leaving a total of 73 lots upon which, under the covenants contained in the deeds, the restrictions expire on January 1, 1935."

[2-4] A careful review of the record and an inspection of the several exhibits introduced convinces us there is ample evidence to support the findings of the court below that it would be unjust, oppressive, and inequitable to enforce or give effect to the restrictions or easements relied on by the appellants. That courts of equity may under such circumstances decline to lend their aid is now well settled. Downs v. Kroeger, 200 Cal. 743, 747, 254 P. 1101, 1102; Strong v. Hancock, supra, page 551 of 201 Cal., 258 P. 60. In the case first above cited it is held that: "Where there has been a change in the uses to which the property in the neighborhood is being put, so that such property is no longer residence property, it would be unjust, oppressive, and inequitable to give effect to the restrictions, if such change has resulted from causes other than their breach." The case is also authority for the proposition that the findings of the trial court are binding upon appeal when, as here, they are supported by substantial evidence.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment must be, and it is hereby, affirmed.

PER CURIAM.

This is an appeal by several individual defendants from two orders of the lower court, one confirming a commissioner's sale of property and another settling the final account of a receiver. The issues which are determinative of the appeal were decided in prior litigation between the parties, culminating in the decision of this court in California National Bank v. El Dorado Lime & Minerals Company, 207 Cal. 676, 279 P. 775. A detailed review of the facts may be found in that opinion. It is sufficient at this time to state that this judgment decreed that George A. Starkweather had title to all of the property of defendant corporation, as trustee for various creditors, including plaintiff; that the rights of the individual defendants (appellants herein), who were the owners of the business prior to its incorporation, were subordinate to the rights of Starkweather as trustee. The account of said trustee was approved, and the judgment further provided that the creditors were subrogated to the rights formerly exercised by him. Priorities among the creditors were determined. In the event of failure to pay the indebtedness, a sale of the properties was ordered. Pursuant to this order, a sale was had, resulting in a purchase of the whole for $140,539, and in a deficiency of $218,091.89. The court entered a deficiency judgment against the defendants with the exception of Leeper, who became interested in the litigation after the business was involved in difficulties, and was not one of the original owners. During the course of the proceedings, a receiver was in charge of the property. At their conclusion, he had on hand cash in the sum of $32,107.46. The court ordered this paid to the creditors.

[1, 2] The first contention of the present appeal is that the money in the hands of the receiver belonged to the defendants as owners of the property and should have been paid to them. The trial court found that the money did not represent profits of the business, but was simply the result of the sale of lime ore constituting capital assets of the corporation, title to which assets was, of course, in Starkweather for the benefit of the creditors. A receiver takes control of property subject to all existing interests. Bories v. Union Building & Loan Ass'n, 141 Cal. 74, 74 P. 552; Rickman v. Rickman, 180 Mich. 224, 146 N. W. 609, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1237; 1 Clark on Receivers, 469, § 354; 23 R. C. L. 56, § 60. The court credited defendants with this sum on their liability. They are entitled to nothing more than this.

It is next contended that certain accounts receivable, warehouse supplies, and broken ore reserve should not have been sold; but, under the judgment, title to all such property was in Starkweather, and was properly sold for the benefit of the creditors.

Another claim is that defendant Leeper paid out the sum of $500.52 for services and compensation of a referee, in the original action, and that he was entitled to reimbursement. However, as a defendant in the action he was liable for the costs thereof, which amounted to $551.30, and the court directed that the money due him be applied on his liability for the costs.

No other points are worthy of mention. We are satisfied that the court acted correctly in the acts complained of, and the orders are hereby affirmed.

WASTE, C. J.

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff in a collision between the defendant Eslow's automobile, in which plaintiff was riding as a guest, and a bus belonging to and operated by the Great Western Motorways, a corporation. In their respective answers the defendants denied the allegations of the complaint, the defendant bus company alleging the defense of contributory negligence. For the purposes of this decision we will assume that this special defense is also available to the defendant Eslow because of certain allegations in the complaint, denied by him, and because the case was apparently tried on this theory. At the conclusion of the trial the jury brought in a verdict in the sum of $10,000 against both defendants, each of whom has appealed from the judgment entered thereon.

The accident occurred on the morning of March 1, 1928, in the city of San Bernardino at the intersection of Sixth street, which runs east and west, and Arrowhead avenue, which runs north and south. It is a blind intersection at which the permissive speed is fifteen miles an hour. The defendant Eslow's car, in which plaintiff was riding, was proceeding east on Sixth street, while the bus was going north on Arrowhead avenue. The vehicles approached or entered the intersection at or about the same time, the bus being to the right of Eslow's car. As Eslow approached the intersection his view was partially obstructed by three other cars in the immediate vicinity, all going in different directions. Our examination of the record discloses that there is evidence from which the jury might reasonably have concluded that, in spite of the fact that it was a blind intersection and that each driver's view was further obstructed by the three cars mentioned, the defendant Eslow drove his car through or into the intersection at twenty miles an hour and collided with the bus without seeing it until the moment of impact, and that the bus at the same time was traversing the intersection at a speed estimated between thirty and forty miles an hour, and that the driver failed to keep the necessary lookout and was oblivious to the presence of Eslow's car. A few seconds prior to the collision the plaintiff, who was sitting to the right of Eslow, noticed the bus and immediately screamed or cried out to him to look out. The vehicles came together at a point within the southeast quarter of the intersection.

[1-3] Each defendant disclaims all negligence and responsibility for the accident and urges that the fault lay with the other. These contentions are without merit. Viewing the case in its aspect most favorable to plaintiff, there is ample evidence from which the jury might believe that, although Eslow's car could have been stopped in ten feet had it been going at twelve miles an hour, as he testified, yet it traveled approximately fifty-five feet after plaintiff had called his attention to the approaching bus; while as to the defendant bus company the jury might well have concluded that its bus was passing through the intersection at a speed in excess of thirty miles an hour, causing it to travel approximately one hundred and fifty feet north of the north curb line of Sixth street before it was brought to a stop. Whether the negligence of two defendants is independent or concurrent is generally a question for the jury whose finding, if there be evidence to support it, is conclusive on appeal. Gett v. P. G. & E. Co., 192 Cal. 621, 625, 626, 221 P. 376; Springer v. Pac. Fruit Exchange, 92 Cal. App. 732, 738, 739, 268 P. 951; Dougherty v. Ellingson, 97 Cal. App. 87, 93, 275 P. 456. In this case, if we judge by the verdict it rendered, the jury concluded, upon substantial evidence, that the negligence of the defendants was concurrent and so simultaneous as to allow no break between cause and effect.

[4-7] The case was apparently tried on the theory that contributory negligence was an issue, for all of the parties, including plaintiff, requested certain instructions on this doctrine. Both defendants predicate error on the giving of two so-called "formula" instructions in which no reference is made to the fact that before finding for plaintiff the jury must find her to be free from contributory negligence. It is well settled that instructions purporting to contain the conditions necessary to a verdict for one party must contain all of those conditions and not overlook defenses on which substantial evidence has been introduced. Beyerle v. Clift, 59 Cal. App. 7, 9, 209 P. 1015; Douglas v. S. P. Co., 203 Cal. 390, 393-394, 264 P. 237; Starr v. L. A. Ry., 187 Cal. 270, 278, 201 P. 599. However, the failure of a "formula" instruction to contain a reference to a defense upon which no substantial evidence has been introduced cannot be said to be prejudicially erroneous. As we read the evidence there was no issue of contributory negligence in the case at the time the instructions were given, and the trial court might well have omitted all reference thereto. We find nothing in the evidence admitted on behalf of the plaintiff, or that introduced by the defendants, that would tend to show that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The defense is very meager, the defendant Eslow alone taking the stand in his own behalf, while the bus company failed to put in any defense other than the introduction of two photographs showing the damage done to its bus. Plaintiff was riding as a guest of Eslow and had no power of control over the car in which they were traveling. It does not appear either that she was guilty of independent negligence. There is no showing of any prior negligence on Eslow's part to indicate that he was not driving his car in a proper and careful manner. There was no reason, therefore, for the plaintiff to be apprehensive of her safety while riding with him, or to take any unusual precautions against their running into danger. That plaintiff was attentive to and not heedless of her well-being is shown by the fact that she discovered the presence of the bus a few seconds prior to the collision and by warning Eslow of its approach sought to avert the impending accident. There apparently was no appreciable time between the discovery of the danger and the occurrence of the collision. Whatever may have been the negligence of the defendant Eslow at the moment of collision cannot be imputed to plaintiff either by Eslow or his codefendant. Smellie v. S. P. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 299 P. 529. As there is nothing in plaintiff's conduct which would tend in the least to prove that she was guilty or contributory negligence in causing the injuries sustained by her as a result of the collision, it necessarily follows that any omission of the instructions to refer to this doctrine does not require a reversal of the judgment. The inadvertence in plaintiff's first instruction to the effect that the burden was upon her to prove the absence of contributory negligence could have been prejudicial to plaintiff alone.

[8] The defendant bus company complains of three instructions given at the request of defendant Eslow, having to do with the right of way as between two vehicles entering an intersection at or about the same time. It is contended that these instructions erroneously state that under certain circumstances the automobile on the left may have the right of way. The bus company urges that these instructions are correct statements of the law as it existed prior to the 1925 amendment of section 131 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 560), but that they do not accurately state the law as it existed at the time of the accident. Granting all that the defendant bus company advances in this regard, we fail to see wherein the instructions complained of could have been prejudicial to it. At the time of the accident section 131, supra, read as follows: "When two vehicles approach an intersection of public highways at approximately the same time, the vehicle approaching from the right shall have the right of way, provided such vehicle is traveling at a lawful speed." St. 1925, p. 398, § 15. This section was set out for the guidance of the jury in the bus company's ninth instruction. It is immediately apparent that under the quoted section the vehicle on the right (the bus in this case) has the right of way only so long as it is proceeding at a "lawful speed." An excessive rate of speed on the part of the vehicle on the right deprives it of the right of way otherwise given to it by the statute, and while such excessive rate of speed may not, as urged by the bus company serve to transfer the right of way to the vehicle approaching from the left, a point we need not now decide, the question of negligence under such circumstances would at least be an open one for the jury to determine from the whole of the evidence. Here there is evidence that the bus traversed the intersection at an excessive rate of speed and the defendant bus company made no effort to controvert this showing. The bus did not therefore have the right of way under the law, and the jury may well have concluded that the collision was the result of the joint and concurring negligence of both defendants, regardless of which one had the right of way. The three instructions complained of, assuming them to have been erroneous and all too favorable to the defendant Eslow, could only have been prejudicial to the cause of the defendant bus company if they had resulted in a verdict favorable to Eslow, for then the entire responsibility would have been shifted to the bus company despite Eslow's negligence. On the contrary, however, a verdict was brought in against both defendants, the jury apparently concluding that the negligence of each had proximately contributed to the accident. Moreover, the effect of these instructions is greatly minimized when it is considered that Eslow himself came into the intersection at a speed in excess of the permissive speed. The jury had section 131 before it and undoubtedly concluded that the right of way was confined solely to vehicles proceeding at a "lawful speed." We find no other instructions requiring consideration. The charge on the whole fairly covers the issues and consists of instructions given at the request of all of the parties.

[9] Over objection of counsel, plaintiff was allowed to testify as to the speed of the bus and Eslow's automobile. We find no error in the trial court's ruling. A person having the opportunity to observe the speed of a moving vehicle is qualified to give his opinion as to such speed, and his previous experience or lack of experience goes to the weight rather than to the competency of the testimony. Bowman v. Motor Transit Co., 208 Cal. 652, 655, 284 P. 443; Kramm v. Stockton Elec. R. Co., 22 Cal. App. 737, 755-756, 136 P. 523; Hutchinson v. Miller & Lux Inc., 60 Cal. App. 1, 5, 212 P. 394.

[10] Nor do we find error in the ruling permitting a lay witness to testify regarding the condition of plaintiff's health. Lay witnesses having the requisite opportunity for observation may testify as to the health of another. Robinson v. Exempt Fire Ins. Co., 103 Cal. 1, 4-5, 36 P. 955, 24 L. R. A. 715, 42 Am. St. Rep. 93; Chicago, etc., v. Van Vleck, 143 Ill. 480, 32 N. E. 262, 263.

[11] Urging that internal injuries were not within the issues as framed, the defendant bus company contends that plaintiff was improperly allowed to testify that she had suffered from vaginal bleeding (a term used by the physician) for a long time after the injury. Among other things, the complaint alleges "that the said plaintiff herein received severe bruises, gashes and injuries as a result of said collision." This allegation is sufficiently broad to admit the testimony complained of. Samuels v. Cal., etc., Ry. Co., 124 Cal. 294, 296, 56 P. 1115; Martin v. P. G. & E. Co., 203 Cal. 291, 302, 303, 264 P. 246; Dullanty v. Smith, 203 Cal. 621, 626, 265 P. 814.

The evidence supports the jury's implied findings of negligence on the part of both defendants and absence of contributory negligence on plaintiff's part. We have examined the entire record and the briefs and have found nothing warranting a reversal.

The judgment is affirmed.

SLAUGHTER v. VAN WINKLE.

Sac. 4397.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 31, 1931.

1. Appeal and error ⇐1004(1).

Verdict will be set aside where so large as to suggest at first blush existence of passion, prejudice, or corruption.

2. Husband and wife ⇐334(3).

$6,000 to husband against wife's aunt for alienation of wife's affections held excessive, and was reduced to $2,500 compensatory and $500 punitive damages.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by George E. Slaughter against Emma Van Winkle. Judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

Affirmed on condition of remittitur; otherwise judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

Brown & Chamberlain and L. J. Maddux, all of Modesto, for appellant.

Vernon F. Gant, of Modesto, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

The plaintiff brought an action for damages for alienation of his wife's affections by the defendant, the wife's aunt. The jury returned a general verdict in plaintiff's favor for $6,000, and divided it, by answers to special interrogatories, into $3,000 compensation for actual and $3,000 for punitive or exemplary damages. A motion for a new trial was denied.

The appellant's principal contention is the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; the special point stressed being that plaintiff failed "to prove malice by that high degree of testimony required by the law."

At the time of their marriage the respondent's wife was a widow, 37 years of age. She owned a twenty-acre walnut orchard and other interests, and occupied the lower apartment of a residence owned jointly by herself and the defendant aunt, who occupied the upper portion with her husband. After a courtship of eight months, the plaintiff and the widow were married, apparently to the great mental distress of the aunt, who seemingly assumed a foster mother attitude toward the plaintiff's wife. After the marriage, the couple took up their abode in the portion of the house theretofore occupied by the wife, and there followed a hectic period of hostility on the part of the aunt toward the plaintiff, with accompanying discord, intrusions, interferences, threats, arrest upon criminal and insanity charges, and physical encounters. Finally the respondent was asked to leave the premises by his wife, because of threatened litigation between her and her aunt over the property. Respondent thereupon took up his residence with his parents near by, but after a period resumed marital relations in the former home. Respondent and his wife finally separated, although communicating with each other and interchanging visits. Finally the wife sued respondent for a divorce.

The record presents a case of conflicting inferences and conclusions. The evidence is such that the verdict of the jury could have been either for the plaintiff or the defendant, and this court would have been compelled to sustain it.

[1, 2] Appellant also urges that the amount of the verdict is excessive. In answer thereto the respondent relies on the well-settled rule that it is only where the excess appears as a matter of law, or where the recovery is so grossly disproportionate to any compensation reasonably warranted by the facts as to shock the sense of justice and raise at once a presumption that it is the result of passion, prejudice, or corruption, rather than honest and sober judgment, that either a trial or an appellate court may exercise its power to set aside the verdict on the ground that it is excessive. 8 Cal. Jur. 834, § 88, and cases cited. We have no quarrel with this rule, but, upon an examination of the entire record, we are of the view that any amount in excess of $2,500 as actual and $500 as punitive damages can be ascribed to no other cause than passion or prejudice. Our power to thus interpose our judgment has often been recognized where upon the record the amount of the verdict is so large as to suggest at first blush the existence of the above conditions. Livesey v. Stock, 208 Cal. 315, 322, 281 P. 70; Simoneau v. Pac. Elec. R. Co., 166 Cal. 264, 277, 136 P. 544, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 737.

The judgment is accordingly reversed, and the cause remanded to the lower court for a new trial unless, within thirty days from the filing of the remittitur in the court below, plaintiff shall remit from the judgment all except the sum of $3,000 and the costs as at present adjudged therein, neither party to recover from the other costs on this appeal. If such remission be made, then, in that event, the judgment shall stand affirmed; otherwise it shall stand reversed.

COLLIER v. MERCED IRR. DIST.

Sac. 4379.

Supreme Court of California.

August 31, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 28, 1931.

1. Eminent domain ⇨79, 80.

Facts held to disclose that public use had intervened as to whole of irrigation project as against riparian owner's claim.

Public use had intervened as to the whole project as against riparian owner's contention that, as the irrigation district had not in any one season stored 850,000 acre feet of water as authorized by water permit, but at most only 296,110, a public use had not intervened as to the full 850,000 acre feet, and that, as the irrigation district had not constructed canals sufficient to carry 2,125 second feet of water, its right to divert any amount in excess of 1,600 second feet previously diverted had not attached, since the riparian owner had with actual knowledge for five years or more of the intention of the irrigation district and with knowledge of effect that irrigation works might have on stream and his riparian right permitted an outlay at great cost for construction of dam, power house, and diversion works without protest, and the dam which closed the entire stream was erected and total yield of the stream to the capacity of the reservoir was diverted to public use.

2. Waters and water courses ⇨87.

Where riparian owner, with actual knowledge for more than five years of irrigation district's intention, permitted construction of dam, power house and diversion works without protest, owner held barred by laches from preventing alleged encroachment on riparian rights.

3. Eminent domain ⇨293(2).

In riparian owner's action for damages for invasion of riparian right, irrigation district, having right to invoke power of eminent domain, could tender such issue by answer and cross-complaint.

4. Payment ⇨9.

Damages for tort may not be satisfied by enforced acceptance of property or anything other than money.

5. Waters and water courses ⇨40.

Riparian right is usufructuary one in stream, part and parcel of land itself.

6. Stipulations ⇨19.

In cross-action to determine damages to riparian owner, permitting jury to consider irrigation district's stipulation guaranteeing riparian owner specified quantity of water held proper.

7. Eminent domain ⇨307(3).

In cross-action to determine damages to riparian owner as if in eminent domain proceedings, instruction respecting special benefits held proper.

The court instructed jury that, in determining compensation, if any, to be awarded the riparian owner, jury should consider any special benefits accruing to riparian owner's land by reason of the regulation of the stream by the construction and operation by the defendant irrigation district of its dam, and, having determined those special benefits, to apply the same in reduction of the amount of compensation which jury might otherwise award to the riparian owner.

8. Eminent domain ⇨303.

Injury caused by invasion of riparian owner's right is measured by ascertaining depreciation in market value of physical property.

9. Eminent domain ⇨303.

In determining injury done by invasion of riparian owner's right by irrigation district, special benefits may be considered (Code Civ. Proc. § 1248, subs. 2, 4; Const. art. 1, § 14).

10. Eminent domain ⇨316.

Where action was converted into condemnation proceeding, riparian owner, having been paid in benefits, held entitled to costs (Const. art. 1, § 14).

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Action by William Collier against the Merced Irrigation District, in which defendant filed cross-complaint. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals.

PRESTON, J.

In this cause the pleadings tender both equitable and legal issues which have arisen out of the conflicting claims between plaintiff, a riparian proprietor, and the defendant, an irrigation district, which itself owns certain lands riparian to the stream in question.

The Merced river is a natural stream of this state of considerable capacity, rising in the Sierra Nevada Mountains and flowing westerly through the San Joaquin Valley and Merced county in its course toward the sea. Defendant is a public corporation irrigation district, organized in 1920, and owning in said county and valley about 189,000 acres of land susceptible to irrigation and cultivation, 10,000 acres of which lie to the north and the balance to the south of said stream. The lands are productive with irrigation and comparatively unproductive without it, as the natural rainfall in the valley is insufficient for profitable agricultural production. Like many other California streams, the run-off of said river varies widely during the different periods of the year and likewise varies widely from year to year. In some seasons it has been known to carry a flow of as much as 3,700 cubic feet per second; at other times it has been known to be as low as 25 cubic feet per second. The average run-off is 1,069,000 acre feet per annum. There are, however, periods of high flow in every year, occurring between the months of April to October, inclusive. They are due in part to rainfall, but more properly to the melting snows in the upper reaches of the stream in the said mountains. These periods of flood are usual and ordinary and constitute a part of the normal flow of the stream. There are in the stream no extraordinary flood, storm, or unusual freshet waters, but all of the water therein is properly classified as part of the usual and normal flow thereof.

The basic facts involved in this action are not in dispute. Plaintiff owns and for many years last past has owned some 527.86 acres of land in the San Joaquin Valley, patented to his predecessors in ownership in several separate lots or parcels. The main channel of said Merced river traverses these lands. There is also a branch or slough channel which takes out of said river at the easterly end of these lands and flows entirely through them, returning to the river. All plaintiff's lands are riparian either to the main channel of the river or to said branch channel, or to both. The branch channel itself, while a natural water course, receives water only at comparatively high stages of the river.

Plaintiff, for an indefinite period, has made use annually of the seepage of said main and branch channels of the stream, as well as of the overflow thereof at times, in growing upon his said lands and producing therefrom various crops of alfalfa and perhaps other grasses, and he has made beneficial use of the whole stream in its natural state, except such use thereof as has been subject to a preferential appropriative right owned by defendant district to divert and use on nonriparian lands, when present, the continuous flow of said stream to the extent of 1,600 cubic feet per second. This water is diverted from the stream above plaintiff's lands by means of two main canals; 1,500 cubic feet per second being carried in what is known as the south side canal and 100 cubic feet per second in what is known as the north side canal. The existence of this prior and preferential right is not in dispute, but it is subject to the limitation that, when 300 second feet or more of water are in the stream, 225 second feet thereof must be left undisturbed flowing down the channel thereof, but, when less than 300 second feet are present, three-fourths thereof must be allowed to remain in the channel of the stream. Until this controversy arose, however, plaintiff's riparian right, subject to said right above mentioned, was intact, and had all the elements and strength inherent in such a property right.

But this immediate controversy has arisen from the following additional facts: In 1919 the predecessor of defendant district lodged with the division of water rights certain applications having for their object the securing of a permit to erect upon the upper reaches of this stream, in Mariposa county at a place called Exchequer, a dam across the stream 326 feet high, creating a reservoir with a capacity of 289,000 acre feet and to obtain the right to fill and refill this reservoir during the year to the aggregate extent of 850,000 acre feet and to drain the water from said reservoir at the rate of 2,125 cubic feet per second and pass it through a power house to be erected below said dam and, after using it for power purposes, convey it to headgates of canals then existing or thereafter to be constructed, and thereafter to divert the major part of it through said canals upon non-riparian lands for irrigation uses thereon. Said permits were issued about July 1, 1922, and thereafter recorded in the office of the county recorder of said Mariposa county, followed by the securing of a permit to the same effect from the federal Power Commission.

On or about said last-mentioned date actual work on said project was begun, and the same was prosecuted with diligence to completion. Prior to April 21, 1926, said dam and diversion works and said power plant were completed and during that year there was stored in said reservoir 159,152 acre feet of water, and in the year 1927 there was stored in said reservoir 296,110 acre feet, and in the year 1928, up to the time of the filing of the complaint herein, 27,038 acre feet. Said power plant has a capacity for generating electrical energy of approximately 42,000 horse power or 130,000,000 kilowatt hours of electrical energy per annum. Defendant also has contracted to sell and dispose of said electrical energy to the San Joaquin Light & Power Company for a period of some twenty years, greatly to the benefit of said district. For the purchase of the original water right and for the construction of the diversion works and improvements above mentioned, defendant in 1921 voted a bond issue of $12,000,000, on March 31, 1924, voted an additional bond issue of $3,250,000, and on April 1, 1926, an additional bond issue of $1,000,000, making a total of $16,250,000. A large portion of these sums was used in the construction of said dam and power plant and in the construction and extension of canals and in the betterment of the system generally.

In anticipation of this event the owners of large areas in the district leveled their lands and prepared them for the reception of irrigation water, and planted trees, vineyards and crops. It is even claimed that small towns sprang up in the district and that the population of other towns materially increased because of the anticipated operation of this project. Plaintiff not only had constructive notice, but he had actual notice of these proposed improvements and of the extent of the proposed invasion of his riparian rights. He had such knowledge for more than five years prior to the commencement of this action, and he never registered a protest.

Upon this state of facts, on March 7, 1928, plaintiff commenced this action. The complaint is in two counts—one containing a prayer for $100,000 for damages already suffered to plaintiff's riparian rights in the said above-mentioned lands; the other, a prayer for an injunction against threatened additional encroachment upon his said riparian rights. The theory of the complaint is that on April 21, 1926, defendant appropriated for said use plaintiff's riparian rights to the extent of taking the right to store and divert 300,000 acre feet of water per annum, but that defendant has not yet stored the full contemplated amount of 850,000 acre feet and therefore plaintiff has the right to enjoin the annual storage of the additional 550,000-odd acre feet of water of said stream; also that, inasmuch as the limit of capacity of the diversion canals is 1,600 cubic feet per second, the contemplated additional diversion of 525 cubic feet per second may properly be enjoined.

Defendant answered and set forth various and sundry defenses to plaintiff's claims; the principal one being that a public use had intervened as to the whole of its claim, to wit: The right to store, when produced by the stream, 850,000 acre feet per annum, by filling and refilling said reservoir and by diverting the original 1,600 acre feet therefrom evidenced by the prior water right and the additional amount of 525 cubic feet per second from the water so stored, subject, of course, to the limitation above specified when there is a small amount of water only in the stream. Defendant also alleged the right to generate electrical energy by means of said power house as above stated. It urged the above allegations as a complete defense to the injunction feature of plaintiff's complaint, and also pleaded that plaintiff had suffered no damage, but on the contrary had been benefited by the manipulation of the stream in the manner proposed by the reclaiming of his said lands. But in that respect it also pleaded, in the alternative, in each special defense to the action, as follows: "Defendant alleges, however, that if it has invaded any right of plaintiff that the damage, if any, suffered by the plaintiff can be readily estimated in terms of money, and defendant under such circumstances hereby offers to pay to plaintiff all lawful damages sustained, said damages to be fixed in this proceeding. Defendant further offers, stipulates and agrees under such circumstances, and as determined and fixed by the evidence and the court herein, to provide plaintiff, and to make available for his land, during the irrigation season of each year such amount of water as may be reasonably required by plaintiff by reasonable methods of diversion, said obligation of defendant to be made a part of the judgment in this case."

Defendant then ended with a prayer as follows: "Wherefore, defendant prays that plaintiff take nothing by this action but that defendant have judgment herein. In the event that any right of plaintiff is found to be invaded by defendant, defendant hereby offers to pay all lawful damages and prays that the compensation therefor be fixed in this suit. Defendant further prays for such further, other and additional relief as to the court may seem proper or appropriate."

The cause proceeded to trial. The court heard and determined the equitable issues first, and held that a public use had intervened as to all claims of defendant district, specifying them, as above outlined, and for that reason held that an injunction should be denied, but it confirmed the riparian right of plaintiff. At the request of plaintiff it then summoned a jury to try the legal issue of damages. On the trial of the case defendant was allowed to meet this issue by a stipulation which should be and become a condition precedent to the exercise of any additional rights in the stream and should become part of the judgment in the case, which said stipulation, so far as here material, is as follows: "That Merced Irrigation District shall never impound in the Exchequer Reservoir and/or divert from the Merced River by means of its canals or other diversion works, or otherwise, any of the waters of the Merced River until and unless, and only so long as, there is flowing in said main channel of the Merced River at and along the riparian lands of Plaintiff William Collier, described in the amended complaint, and at and along the whole thereof, and at and along every part thereof, water to the extent and quantity of eighteen (18) cubic feet per second, which water and all of said water shall be available for diversion by plaintiff and shall be suitable for irrigation of said lands of plaintiff described in the amended complaint, and all parts and portions thereof, without diminution by other riparian proprietors or by appropriators or by diversioners of any kind, or character or in any respect whatsoever."

The jury were instructed to give full credence to the weight and extent of this stipulation and to base their verdict upon its existence, enforceability, and inviolability. Expert and lay witnesses were heard by both sides and the jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant. Judgment passed accordingly; plaintiff was denied his costs of suit. He promptly appealed. On this appeal he urges the questions which will now be discussed.

[1] The first contention is that the court erred in holding that a public use had intervened as to the whole of said project. Appellant's contention in this respect is that, as above outlined, respondent not having in any one season stored 850,000 acre feet of water of said stream, but at most only 296,110, a public use had not intervened as to the full 850,000 acre feet, and, moreover, inasmuch as defendant had not yet constructed canals sufficient to carry 2,125 second feet of water, its right to divert any amount in excess of 1,600 second feet had not yet attached.

We think this is entirely too narrow a view to take of the situation. As above pointed out, with full actual knowledge for a period of five years or more of the specific intention of respondent, as disclosed by the several state and national permits, and with knowledge of the effect the works might have upon the stream and consequently upon his riparian right, appellant permitted an outlay, at great cost, for the construction of this dam, power house and diversion works, without protest, and it is not unreasonable to hold that respondent thereby put itself in charge of a public use, as to all that portion of the stream covered by its expressed and known intention within the capacity of the reservoir. The closing of the stream by the dam under these circumstances should allow the use of the reservoir to its capacity during any one season up to the limit of respondent's permits. It utilized during the years 1926-1928 practically the whole yield of the stream, and it is but a fair construction of the effect of its action to say that it secured the right to take all the yield up to its claim of 850,000 acre feet, and that appellant, by his inaction, waived his right to equitable relief.

"It is perfectly true that not even a corporation possessing the power of eminent domain may under the Constitution (article 1, § 14) take or damage private property without first making adequate compensation. But this right may be waived by the owner, and, in order to prevent the obstruction of progress, he must be held to diligence in asserting his right as against a concern administering such a public use. If he allows his property right to be invaded and either taken or damaged for a public use, and the public right has so far intervened as to justify the belief that objection has been waived, then in law the property right so taken or damaged is to that extent dedicated to the public use." Conaway v. Yolo Water & Power Co., 204 Cal. 125, 131, 266 P. 944, 946, 58 A. L. R. 674.

If this right to store is conceded, the ability to divert in any certain quantity would seem to be largely a false factor, for, if the appellant is not allowed to object to the amount of storage, he may not be allowed to object to the manner of diversion thereafter unless a special injury results to him thereby. The injunction in the Herminghaus Case (Herminghaus v. Southern California Edison Co., 200 Cal. 81, 252 P. 607) was not against existing reservoirs nor against the filling and refilling of them during a season, but was against the future use of water in an unfinished and unused set of reservoirs existing in mere contemplation. Neither is the case of Turner v. East Side Canal Co., 169 Cal. 652, 657, 147 P. 579, controlling here. It was there held that, where a utility had taken extra water into its canal and had allowed it to go to waste, no public use had intervened. But here a dam which closed the entire stream was erected, and the total yield of the stream to the capacity of the reservoirs was devoted to public use, and this would seem to distinguish it from either of the above-cited cases.

[2] Besides, it fairly appears on the face of the complaint that appellant was guilty of laches. Conaway v. Yolo Water Co., supra. And laches abundantly appears from the evidence and facts found by the court. Inasmuch as appellant was put on notice of all the essential features of such a plea by the allegations of the intervention of a public use and the statute of limitations, it does not seem to be a harsh act to invoke the doctrine here for the first time to sustain the action of the court below. Garrity v. Miller, 204 Cal. 454, 268 P. 622. Stevinson v. San Joaquin, etc., Co., 162 Cal. 141, 121 P. 398; Akley v. Bassett, 189 Cal. 625, 648, 209 P. 576; Scott v. Symons, 191 Cal. 441, 457, 216 P. 604. We therefore fully approve of the ruling of the court in this respect.

[3] Appellant next claims that the pleadings of respondent are an attempt to invoke the special procedure outlined in section 534 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and urges that this may not be done, as the section is unconstitutional and void. The contention here is that, inasmuch as private property may not under the Constitution be taken or damaged without compensation being first fixed and paid, a property owner may not be denied an injunction to prevent a violation of this guaranty and that such is allowed by the section. This and other questions raised we regard as serious, but, in view of the fact that the property has already in effect been taken, the question of the validity of said section does not arise. For we think the proceeding here involved is allowable upon settled principles of equity. This cause is in effect the reverse of a condemnation proceeding—a proceeding to fix damages after the taking and not before the taking of the property as enjoined by the Constitution. As early as City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 124 Cal. 597, 57 P. 585, it was settled in this state that in a proceeding in eminent domain, the conflicting claims to the rights of the condemning party in the property could be determined as well as the conflicting rights of the parties defendant thereto. There was, therefore, no objection to respondent here, who has the right to invoke the power of eminent domain, tendering the issue by answer or cross-complaint of its own claims to the property and after these were settled to allow the action to be tried as if in an eminent domain proceeding. The answer of respondent contained every element of a cross-complaint in such an action. It was treated as sufficient to raise this issue and that is all that is required. Turner v. East Side Canal Co., supra. We regard the case as also being similar to the situation in Newport v. Temescal Water Co., 149 Cal. 531, 538, 539, 87 P. 372, 375, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1098, and the following language from that authority seems appropriate: "And, finally, upon this proposition it may be said that, where the interests of the public are involved and the court can arrive in terms of money at the loss which plaintiff has sustained, an absolute injunction should not be granted, but an injunction conditional merely upon the failure of the defendant to make good the damage which results from its work. Such an action, if successful, should be regarded in its nature as the reverse of an action in condemnation. The defendant in effect would be held to be damaging private property without just compensation first made to the owner, and, failing to make such compensation, should be enjoined from further damage."

This holding is but an application of the well-known equity rule which Mr. Pomeroy states as follows (1 Pomeroy, Equity [4th Ed.] § 242): "It was a fundamental conception of the equity jurisprudence, from the earliest periods as soon as its jurisdiction had become established * * * to determine the entire controversy, to award full and final relief * * * and thus to bring all possible litigation over the subject matter within the compass of one judicial determination."

Appellant at this juncture urges that respondent took his property for a public use on April 21, 1926, and his damages are the difference between its market value with and without this property right. From this premise he urges serious and far-reaching error arising from the so-called stipulation above quoted respecting a so-called guaranty of the presence continuously at his land of 18 cubic feet per second of water available for his sole use and benefit. The argument is that to allow the jury, in measuring his damages, to predicate its action upon the existence and inviolability of said guaranty was to pay his damages in property or "chips and whetstones" and not in money as the law demands.

[4] It is, of course, not open to question that damages for a tort may not be satisfied by the enforced acceptance of property or any other thing than money. In other words, the law does not countenance the payment of damages by a substitution of their equivalent in property or in valuable privileges. But does this properly characterize the issue here?

[5] The riparian right is a usufructuary one in the stream, a part and parcel of the land itself. Any injury short of a complete dives-titute of the right leaves a quantum in kind in the proprietor thereof. If the intruder relinquished a part of the right to the channel of the stream, to that extent he restored the right to its rightful owner. We have here then a partial taking, with a relinquishment to the stream of a portion of the right selzed. We have seen above that under the ruling of the court the action became in effect a cross-action to determine damages as if in eminent domain proceedings. Appellant concedes that in eminent domain proceedings a stipulation of this character would be proper, and in this connection it may be profitable to cite from a few of the mass of cases from outside jurisdictions on this question.

In the case of Tyler v. Hudson, 147 Mass. 609, 18 N. E. 582, 583, a leading case, the following language is found: "The right to take the land, by purchase or otherwise, does not involve the obligation to take the whole interest in land purchased or otherwise taken. That a right of way could be reserved in land taken by purchase, will not be questioned; the objection to reserving a right in the owner in land taken in invitum is technical, rather than substantial. It is true that, in a sense, it may be said to create a new estate in him without his assent. A technical answer might be that, the estate being for his benefit, his consent and acceptance, simultaneous with the taking, will be presumed. The real answer is that the refinements and nomenclature of conveyancing will not be applied to a taking by right of eminent domain. No more land and no greater interest in it need be taken than the public use requires. If the right to make a particular use of the land is of benefit to the owner, and puts no new burden upon him, and does not interfere with the public use for which the land is taken, there is no reason that he should be deprived of that use, and be paid its value as damages. All the right to use the land, except that, may be taken, and that be left in him to enjoy or not, as he pleases."

The above holding was followed with express approval in the case of St. Louis, etc., Co. v. Clark, 121 Mo. 169, 195, 25 S. W. 192, 906, 907, 26 L. R. A. 751, 752, wherein commissioners appointed for the purpose made a report allowing the property owner $87,510 as damages. The railway company paid the award, entered into possession, and then a jury trial followed and they assessed the damages at $72,000. No crossings were contemplated at the time of the award by the commissioners, but, on the trial later and after possession had been taken, crossings in lieu of money compensation were tendered, and it was there objected, as here, that, as the property had already been taken, it was too late to make a relinquishment of any estate therein. The court quoted from and approved the case of Tyler v. Hudson, supra, and said: "No good reason can be seen why the condemning company should not have the right to announce, upon the trial, and have made a matter of record, if not done in its petition, the manner in which the right of way should be used; otherwise, the jury would have the right to make the award on the basis of the most injurious use to which the easement could be lawfully applied in the construction and operation of the road."

And again, in disposing of the same argument made here, the court said: "We do not think that defendants observe the distinction between the appropriation of the land itself and the plans and methods that may be adopted for the construction, maintenance, and operation of the road thereon. We think it true, as claimed, that the appropriation of the land is complete when the amount of damage awarded by the commissioners is paid and possession is taken. * * * Upon an assessment by a jury, in case the road has already been constructed, it seems too plain to require more than a statement of the proposition that the damage should be ascertained in view of the condition in which the unappropriated land is left by the use actually made of the easement. This in no sense constitutes a payment of damages in privileges, but is simply a reduction or increase, as the case may be, of the damages on account of the manner of constructing the road."

The case of Spokane Valley Land, etc., Co. v. Jones, 53 Wash. 37, 101 P. 515, 517, seems much in point. There a riparian owner claimed that its right had been invaded by the construction of a dam and diversion of the waters of a lake. It brought suit after the dam was built and secured an injunction which was stayed for thirty days to allow the filing of a condemnation proceeding, which was done. On the trial, the company offered a similar stipulation conceding the owner certain privileges and rights in the lake similar to those tendered appellant here. The owner objected on several grounds, among which was the claim that "the offer is an effort to reduce the damages by tendering to respondents something in lieu of money, in contravention of article 1, § 16, of the Constitution." The court then said: "We next come to the principal question, whether the effect of this offer is to give the respondents some right or easement as compensation rather than money, in contravention of article 1, § 16, of the Constitution. Is it not rather an effort on the part of the appellant to appropriate a part of the water of Liberty Lake, reserving to the respondents so much thereof as shall be found necessary for the irrigation of their land, such quantity to be made definite by the court after hearing the evidence?" This case reviews the authorities to a great extent.

A later and similar case was Olympia L., etc., Co. v. Harris, 58 Wash. 410, 108 P. 940, wherein a like holding was made.

The cases cited by appellant are in the main distinguishable from the above principles. Although appellant insists that the situation is that of a taking of property and a recompense in other property, to this we cannot subscribe for the reasons above set forth.

[6] Still not satisfied, appellant further urges that respondent in this situation is paying him with water under such guarantees that it is not riparian water, but privately owned water that may be from some other stream. We think a fair construction of the stipulation is that the waters shall be a part of the natural flow of the stream. It is true that the stipulation contains guarantees that savor of a priority right as distinguished from a riparian right, but the ability of respondent to respond to its guarantees seems not to be doubted. A right of priority is a constant quantity, and is superior in efficacy to a riparian right in the same quantity of water. But it is still water of the stream and it still washes the appellant's lands, and, while more stable, it is at the same time a kindred right and a part and parcel of the same land. We think it is carrying the refinements of logic too far to sustain this contention of appellant.

The same observation is applicable to appellant's further claim that being in possession of a greater right, he may not release or cede away any of this right without setting up a substitution of one piece of property in payment of damages done to another.

The further contention that the damages should be allowed as of April 21, 1926, is disposed of by the above discussion.

[7] The next major attack of appellant is upon the instructions of the court to the jury respecting special benefits. It is complained that the court fell into error in giving an instruction upon this subject as follows: "In determining the compensation, if any, to be awarded plaintiff, William Collier, in this action you are entitled to take into consideration any special benefits accruing or to accrue to plaintiff's lands by reason of the regulation of the stream flow of the Merced River by the construction and operation by the Merced Irrigation District of its Exchequer Dam and having determined those special benefits to consider and apply the same in reduction of the amount of compensation which you might otherwise award plaintiff in this proceeding. Special benefits are such as are peculiar to the land of plaintiff and result from the mere construction of the dam. They are to be distinguished from general benefits, the latter being enjoyed by the public at large as the result of the construction of the improvement. General benefits, accordingly, are not to be considered by you in your deliberations. But special benefits may be so considered and accordingly you may take into consideration benefit if any to the Collier land which is direct and special as to that land and not enjoyed in common with the public at large."

The language of article 1, § 14, of the Constitution, in this behalf is: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having first been made to, or paid into court for, the owner, and no right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation, except a municipal corporation or a county or the state until full compensation therefor be first made in money or ascertained and paid into court for the owner, irrespective of any benefits from any improvement proposed by such corporation. * * *"

Section 1248, subd. 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure, provides in this connection as follows: "4. If the property sought to be condemned be water or the use of water, belonging to riparian owners, or appurtenant to any lands, how much the lands of the riparian owner, or the lands to which the property sought to be condemned is appurtenant, will be benefited, if at all, by a diversion of water from its natural course, by the construction and maintenance, by the person or corporation in whose favor the right of eminent domain is exercised, of works for the distribution and convenient delivery of water upon said lands; and such benefit, if any, shall be deducted from any damages awarded the owner of such property."

This provision of the statute was followed by the court. Under the constitutional provision it would seem at most that special benefits were to be excluded in right of way cases except those involving a municipal corporation or county. In other words, except in favor of municipal corporations and counties in right of way proceedings, benefits are to be excluded, but there is no inhibition respecting special benefits in any other kinds of taking under the eminent domain law. This interpretation was practically conceded in Yolo Co. v. Hudson, 182 Cal. 48, 186 P. 772. The following from Hicks v. Drew, 117 Cal. 305, 314, 315, 49 P. 189, 192, seems to be in point: "The jury was instructed as follows: 'If the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiff has sustained any damage by the act of defendant, as she has complained against him, and that by the same act she has received benefit, then, in estimating such damage, such benefit should be deducted.' This instruction was correct." See, also, Eachus v. L. A., etc., Co., 103 Cal. 614, 37 P. 750, 42 Am. St. Rep. 149; Beveridge v. Lewis, 137 Cal. 619, 67 P. 1040, 70 P. 1083, 59 L. R. A. 581, 92 Am. St. Rep. 188.

[8, 9] Moreover, the question of benefits seems to be an immaterial factor in the class of cases to which this one belongs. Respondent was permitted to prove that the storage above appellant's lands would practically prevent overflows on said lands and would have a tendency to reclaim them and make them useful for ordinary cultivation; also that in the operation of the power plant about one-half the water would be restored to the stream; also to show the measurement of the stream at appellant's lands during the operation of the dam; also that seepage from the canals into the stream was unavoidable. The court, however, expressly instructed the jury to disregard seepage waters as an element of benefit. It will be noticed that each item of evidence throws light upon the extent of the taking by respondent. Besides, while the riparian right is a part and parcel of the land in a legal sense, yet it is a usufructuary and intangible right inhering therein and neither a partial nor a complete taking produces a disfigurement of the physical property. The only way to measure the injury done by an invasion of this right is to ascertain the depreciation in market value of the physical property. But the only way to show that depreciation is to show the consequences to the land from the construction and operation of the public works. Therefore, in a case of this type, it is impossible to separate or disregard the item of benefits in making up a verdict or judgment. Were it a case where the property taken had a physical independent existence and an independent value and was a part of a larger area, it would then be possible to disregard the item of benefits when appraising the specific property appropriated. Section 1248, subd. 2, Code Civ. Proc. There was no error in the instructions or rulings with respect to the item of benefits. There was a distinct conflict in the evidence as to whether the lands of appellant had a greater or a less market value after the taking by respondent, but there is no question of law arising on the evidence.

This cause, ably handled by counsel on both sides, represents a contest between opposing schools of thought. We cannot refrain also from commending the trial judge for his very efficient handling of the difficult issues presented to him.

[10] There is, in our opinion, no need of further discussion except as to the item of costs in the court below and in this court. The cause having been converted practically into a condemnation proceeding and appellant having been paid in "benefits," the constitutional provision above quoted seems to be sufficient to vouchsafe the award to him free from the costs of respondent and with his own costs as well. San Joaquin, etc., Co. v. Stevinson, 165 Cal. 540, 132 P. 1021.

Accordingly, the judgment is modified so as to allow appellant his costs in the court below and on appeal. As so modified, said judgment is affirmed.

Devlin & Devlin & Deipenbrock and Irving D. Gibson, all of Sacramento, and A. L. Weil, of San Francisco (Harris F. Shaw, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

WASTE, C. J.

Appeal from a judgment permanently enjoining defendants, and each of them, their agents, employees, and servants, during the pendency of a lease, from interfering with the leasehold rights of plaintiff in property at the southwest corner of Thirty-First and M streets in Sacramento used as a gas and oil station and of which the plaintiff is the lessee under a recorded "Advertising and Facilities Lease" entered into with the defendants Beilby & Foster, holding a lease from the owners of the property. The sublease was entered into with the implied consent of the owners and for a period beginning May 28, 1928, and ending June 30, 1935, and thereafter until canceled by ninety days' written notice from either party of intention to terminate. Advertising rights, surface and sub-surface rights, and rights to the use of tankage, pumps, containers, pipes, and other facilities on said leased premises or thereafter to be installed for the storage, delivery, and sale of petroleum products, were exclusively leased to respondent corporation for an agreed rental of $5 a month and 1 cent a gallon for each gallon of gasoline sold on the premises during each preceding month. Their immediate lessors, Beilby & Foster, were constituted the agents of the respondent for the sale of its products and were licensed during the period of said lease without charge to the exclusive use of the storage and distributing facilities of said station for the storage, sale, and delivery of gasoline or other motor fuel consigned to them by respondent corporation. Said agents, however, were not given a license to all the rights enumerated in the lease to respondent. The agents agreed to diligently advance the sale of respondent's petroleum products, to hold the moneys received therefor, less 4 cents a gallon allowed commission on the sale of gasoline, as trustee for respondent, to be paid over from time to time. The agency agreement was superseded by a duly executed similar agreement executed in March, 1929, but effective as of the date of the former agreement. This agreement provided that, in addition to the 4 cents a gallon commission, the agents should receive an additional 1 cent a gallon on all gasoline and motor fuel sold in excess of 500 gallons each month.

In April, 1929, Beilby & Foster became dissatisfied with the service of respondent and entered into an arrangement solicited by defendants Growney and Blachly, distributors of "Western" gasoline, by which said Growney and Blachly were to supply them with gasoline, and thereupon Beilby & Foster began to use the leased premises and their advertising, storage and distributing facilities for the sale of the "Western" product, in violation of respondent's leasehold rights in said premises.

The plaintiff thereupon brought suit against Beilby & Foster and said Growney and Blachly, as joint tort-feasors in aiding and abetting the repeated trespasses on their leasehold rights constituting an irreparable and continuing injury for which a remedy at law was inadequate, and praying that such trespasses be enjoined. A meritorious prima facie case for injunctive relief was pleaded. The defendants Beilby & Foster and Growney and Blachly separately filed amended answers alleging that said lease and agency agreement was in reality but a contract for the sale of respondent's petroleum products and as such was not of equitable cognizance, and upon this contention base an exhaustive argument, and assail the judgment of injunction here appealed from, upon various grounds, one of them being that a new and existing agreement between defendants Beilby & Foster and respondent under which said parties are now operating is, in effect, the same agreement upon which the injunction judgment was based and is not a new agreement.

The facts are that after the judgment of injunction was rendered respondent and appellants Beilby & Foster on December 26, 1929, entered into a new agency agreement similar in form to the original agreement but differing materially therefrom in several particulars, and which by its express terms modified and superseded all former agreements, constituted a novation and an extinguishment of the contracts upon which the judgment of injunction was based, and has now become the agreement of the parties under which they are actually operating.

Upon the appeal being taken the respondent filed a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the questions involved therein had by the entering into of the new agreement between the parties to the action become moot. The motion was supported by the affidavit of J. F. Walsh, Northern California division manager of the respondent corporation, and incorporated copies of the original advertising and facilities lease of May 28, 1928, the agency agreement of May 28, 1928, the agency agreement of March, 1929, substituted therefor, and which documents constitute the basis for the injunction judgment rendered on December 19, 1929. The affidavit also sets forth the new agency agreement of December 26, 1929, which differs materially from the original agreement of May 28, 1928, in that it provides that said agents shall be allowed 2 cents a gallon on all gasoline or motor fuel sold in excess of 250 gallons each month, and an additional commission of 3 cents a gallon on all gasoline or motor fuel sold; a new arrangement as to price to cover tank truck delivery in Sacramento instead of price at the nearest bulk delivery plant of respondent, a new method of accounting eliminating the old agreement that proceeds of sales should be held by the agent as trustee and paid over from time to time. The agreement also provides for an amendment of the description of the recorded lease to conform to the correct description of the leased property from the owners to respondent's lessors, Beilby & Foster. Appellants Beilby & Foster filed no counteraffidavits. Appellants Growney and Blachly, who were neither parties to the lease nor to the agency agreements, did, and claimed that the old agreements have not been superseded as far as they are concerned, and that they have a right to be heard upon the merits of the appeal.

[1, 2] The motion to dismiss was denied without opinion, this court not being in a position to determine without a more mature consideration whether or not the appeal had really become moot. The court has now examined the record in considering the appeal on its merits and is satisfied that there is no longer any real controversy existing between the respondent and the appellants Beilby & Foster as to any matter upon which the injunction judgment was based, and that the appeal therefore has become moot. Authority is ample to the effect that, where all differences respecting the subject-matter of a controversy are adjusted during the pendency of the appeal, the appeal will be dismissed. Nelson v. Nelson, 153 Cal. 204, 94 P. 880; Bernard v. Weaver, 23 Cal. App. 532, 138 P. 941; California Prune Ass'n v. Orchard Co., 195 Cal. 264, 232 P. 463; Armstrong v. Sacramento Valley Ry. Co., 179 Cal. 648, 650, 178 P. 516.

[3] Counsel for appellants contend, however, that the rights of Growney and Blachly are entirely distinct from those of Beilby & Foster, and, since they have in no way changed their position, that the appeal should not be dismissed as to them, and assert that the effect of the injunction is to prevent them from selling their wares to Beilby & Foster. From the very nature of the suit, that of irreparable injury resulting from continuing trespasses upon the leasehold rights of respondent, and the injunctive relief awarded, this contention is more fanciful than real and is directly contrary to the findings of the trial court. As we read the judgment of the lower court, it merely protects the respondent in such leasehold and property rights as it has lawfully acquired under its lease, and enjoins the defendants Beilby & Foster, their agents, employees, and servants, within which category may very properly be included Growney and Blachly, tort-feasors, from further trespassing upon the leasehold and property rights of the respondent. The injunction in no way prevents them from freely conducting a lawful business, but does enjoin unlawful trespass upon the leasehold rights of respondent of which rights they had both actual and constructive notice.

In the counteraffidavits filed on behalf of Growney and Blachly upon the motion to dismiss, there are no denials of the averments of the affidavit of Mr. Walsh that the new agreements between appellants Beilby & Foster and respondent are now in full force and effect, or that the parties thereto are now duly performing all of the terms, conditions and obligations of these new agreements. Under such circumstances, a reversal or affirmation of the judgment would have no legal effect, since the facts upon which the injunction judgment was based have no longer any existence in fact.

We conclude, therefore, that the material questions involved upon this appeal have become moot, and that the appeal should be dismissed, and it is so ordered.

1. Jury ⇨13(18).

Trial ⇨374(2).

If only equitable issues are raised, jury trial is unnecessary, and verdict is only advisory.

2. Contracts ⇨264.

Rescission, as for fraud, may be effected by notice and restoration or tender of consideration; action being unnecessary (Civ. Code, § 1691).

3. Trial ⇨374(2).

Where vendor sued for balance of price, issue of fraud raised by purchaser was legal, not equitable, issue; hence verdict was not merely advisory.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. R. Hughes, Judge.

Action by K. Ito against Kiyoshi Watanabe. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Busick & Leeper, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Lee Gebhart, of Sacramento, for respondent.

LANGDON, J.

Plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract by the terms of which plaintiff agreed to sell to defendant an hotel business, furniture, and other equipment, and to procure a new lease for him. This action is for the balance of the purchase price. The answer of defendant alleged misrepresentations inducing the making of the contract and partial failure of consideration. It further alleged a notice of rescission and offer to restore the consideration received. In addition the answer set forth a delivery by defendant of an undorsed certificate of the Yokohama Specie Bank, San Francisco branch, as security for the payments to be made, and prayed that plaintiff be required to return this certificate and the sum of $1,600 already paid on the contract. Defendant demanded a jury trial, which was granted over the objection of plaintiff. Eleven special interrogatories were submitted to the jury, and the parties stipulated that the court could make findings on all other issues. On four of the questions given to the jury, involving the issue of fraudulent representations, their answers were in favor of defendant. Plaintiff thereupon moved that the court disregard this verdict and enter judgment in favor of plaintiff, which it did. This appeal is taken by defendant on the judgment roll alone.

[1-4] The first question presented by these facts is whether the court acted within its powers in disregarding the jury's verdict. Its action appears to have been based chiefly upon the theory that the answer raised only equitable issues, and that therefore, under the well-settled rule (see Brichetto v. Raney, 76 Cal. App. 232, 245 P. 235), the jury trial was unnecessary and its verdict was only advisory. This rule would doubtless apply to an action brought by the buyer to cancel or to rescind the agreement. But a rescission may be effected by notice and restoration or tender of the consideration, without the necessity of an action. Cal. Civ. Code, § 1691; Zeller v. Milligan, 71 Cal. App. 617, 236 P. 349; see 19 Cal. Law Rev. 424. The present action is brought by the seller for the balance of the purchase price, and the buyer is defending on the ground of fraud, and alleging a prior rescission by notice and offer to restore the consideration. Fraud is the issue, and, as raised in this case, it is a legal issue. No equitable doctrine is involved and no equitable remedy is sought. See American Sign Co. v. Electro-Lens Sign Co. (D. C.) 211 F. 196. A buyer may defend on this ground without pleading either affirmation or rescission of the contract (Paolini v. Sulprizio, 201 Cal. 683, 258 P. 380), and the fact that he alleges a rescission already completed does not change the nature of his defense.

[5-7] It follows that the court was in error in its view that the jury's verdict was advisory only if such was its view. It is urged, however, that the court was justified in ignoring the answers to the special interrogatories on the ground that they were uncertain and incomplete. Their uncertainty is plain, for, as submitted, they did not include the essential elements of materiality and reliance, so that the jury found merely that plaintiff made certain false representations with the intent to deceive defendant, and did not find that the subject of the representations constituted a material inducement to enter into the contract, or, indeed, that they were relied upon at all. It was for this reason that the District Court of Appeal, Third District, denied a petition for a writ of mandate to compel the court to enter judgment on the verdicts. Watanabe v. Superior Court, 280 P. 135. A hearing by this court was denied in that proceeding. The situation, therefore, appears to be this: Defendant agreed to the submission by the court of certain issues to the jury, and stipulated that the court might find on all the other issues. The jury found that there were intentional misrepresentations, but the court expressly found that it was not true that defendant was induced to enter into the agreement on the basis of any such misrepresentations. We are unable to perceive any proper ground upon which to reverse this judgment. The error of the court in disregarding the jury's verdict was not prejudicial, for that verdict has already, in a prior proceeding between these parties, been judicially determined insufficient to support a judgment; and, even if it were not so determined, it would be necessary for us to make the same determination. There is nothing in the record before us to indicate that the defendant objected to the form or content of the special issues, and it clearly appears in that record that counsel for defendant contemplated and agreed to the court's finding on the other issues. It would be unreasonable and unjust under these circumstances to require plaintiff to submit to a new trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

U. S. Amend. 18).

The cause of action is referable only to Volstead Act tit. 2, § 20 (27 USCA § 32), and is not in any way fettered by any provision of the Workmen's Compensation Act of California. The act of Congress contemplates a trial in a court where common-law procedure prevails, such as the superior court of California, not the Industrial Accident Commission.

PRESTON, J.

The petition for writ of prohibition is denied, and the alternative writ is discharged.

One reasoning briefly is: First, that we are concerned here necessarily with questions of jurisdiction only and not with defects in pleadings, nor with difficulties, even if well-nigh insuperable, which may be encountered in proving the facts necessary to a recovery.

The action in the court below is by the wife and minor children of one Joseph C. Wheeler to recover from the petitioner herein actual and exemplary damages growing out of the loss of support by reason of the addiction on the part of said husband and father to the use of intoxicating liquors, brought about, it is claimed, by the unlawful acts of the petitioner herein in providing him with liquor while in its employ. Apparently, the said Wheeler was for many years a trustworthy employee of petitioner and while in such employ acquired the liquor habit to such a degree that he was discharged by petitioner.

The action is grounded upon section 20 of title 2 of the so-called Volstead Act (section 32, title 27, U. S. Code [27 USCA § 32]), which purports to give certain classes of persons a right of action when they have been injured by addiction to the liquor habit of one from whom they have the right of support through unlawful acts of others. Numerous questions are discussed, but the principal one is the validity of said provision. Several instances are cited where causes of action have been sustained under this section: Smithers v. Brunkhorst, 178 Wis. 530, 190 N. W. 349; Stein v. Rainey, 315 Mo. 535, 286 S. W. 53; Karterman v. Sogura, 140 Wash. 195, 248 P. 417; The Westmoor (D. C. Or.) 27 F.(2d) 886; Hoyt v. Tilton, 81 N. H. 477, 128 A. 688. In none of these cases has the validity of this section been called into question, but on the contrary it has been assumed. The section, of course, is an attempt to exercise the powers conferred by the Eighteenth Amendment, which prohibits "the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors * * * for beverage purposes. * * *"

[1] Who can say that the conferring of a cause of action upon a dependent who has been injured in his means of support by another, when due to a violation of this amendment, will not aid in the accomplishment of its object, to wit, the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors? The rule in this respect is not in doubt. It has been well stated in Everard's Breweries v. Day, 265 U. S. 545, 558, 559, 44 S. Ct. 628, 631, 68 L. Ed. 1174, as follows: "The Constitution confers upon Congress the power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution all powers that are vested in it. Article 1, § 8, cl. 18. In the exercise of such non-enumerated or 'implied' powers it has long been settled that Congress is not limited to such measures as are indispensably necessary to give effect to its express powers, but in the exercise of its discretion as to the means of carrying them into execution may adopt any means, appearing to it most eligible and appropriate, which are adapted to the end to be accomplished and consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution."

This quotation is supported by a long and consistent line of federal court cases, beginning with McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. Ed. 579. It has also been confirmed in the more recent case of Lambert v. Yellowley, 272 U. S. 581, where at page 593, 47 S. Ct. 210, 213, 71 L. Ed. 422, 49 A. L. R. 575, the court approves further language of the Everard Case as follows: "We cannot say that prohibiting traffic in intoxicating malt liquors for medicinal purposes has no real or substantial relation to the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment, and is not adapted to accomplish that end and make the constitutional prohibition effective. The difficulties always attendant upon the suppression of traffic in intoxicating liquors are notorious."

[2] The first of these recent cases had to do with preventing physicians from prescribing intoxicating malt liquors for medicinal purposes and the other with the provision: "Not more than a pint of spirituous liquor to be taken internally shall be prescribed for use by the same person within any period of ten days and no prescription shall be filled more than once." These provisions were held to be within the powers conferred by the Eighteenth Amendment. It is easily seen that the provision here in question would lend even more aid to the suppression of the unlawful use of intoxicating liquors. We therefore entertain no doubt whatever as to the validity of this provision.

[3] If its validity be assumed, under article 6 of the Constitution of the United States, the Eighteenth Amendment and all laws passed in pursuance thereof is the supreme law of the land. The state courts have a plain duty to perform in that respect as has been well stated in Robb v. Connolly, 111 U. S. 624, 637, 4 S. Ct. 544, 551, 28 L. Ed. 542, where the court says: "So that a state court of original jurisdiction, having the parties before it, may, consistently with existing federal legislation, determine cases at law or in equity, arising under the constitution or laws of the United States, or involving rights dependent upon such constitution or laws. Upon the state courts, equally with the courts of the Union, rests the obligation to guard, enforce, and protect every right granted or secured by the constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof, whenever those rights are involved in any suit or proceeding before them; for the judges of the state courts are required to take an oath to support that Constitution, and they are bound by it, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made under their authority, as the supreme law of the land, 'anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding.'"

[4] From the above premise it is easily seen that the question as to whether or not the Wright Act of California adopted section 20 of title 2 of the Volstead Act is a false quantity. Neither are we impressed with the contention that the plaintiffs in the court below must resort to machinery provided by the Workmen's Compensation Act for relief. The cause of action here in question is referable only to the act of congress and is not in any way fettered by any provision of the Workmen's Compensation Act of California. If it be assumed that the Legislature of California is competent to provide that actions of this kind be heard by a special court or commission, a ready answer is that such action has not been taken. The section in question contemplates a trial in a court where common-law procedure prevails; the Industrial Accident Commission is not such a court; the superior court of California is such a court. It has assumed jurisdiction of the action, and, unless restrained, will proceed with a trial of the cause. This to us seems entirely proper. The fact that the provision in question declares the damages resulting from such action to be the separate property of the plaintiffs or that the rule of damages is otherwise varied by the provision is not here material. As above stated, the California courts are charged with the duty of enforcing within their jurisdiction the cause of action conferred by a valid act of Congress; hence the conclusion first announced.

Appeals from Superior Court, Butte County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Separate actions by J. C. Henderson against the Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District and by J. E. Rutherford and another against defendant named. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

CURTIS, J.

These two actions, which have been consolidated on appeal, were instituted under the provisions of sections 1060 to 1062a of the Code of Civil Procedure by the plaintiffs on behalf of themselves and other landowners and water users situated outside of the exterior boundaries of the defendant, the Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District, for a determination of their rights and duties and those of the said irrigation district in the service of water to them by said district and the rates to be charged therefor. These actions have been before this court on a prior appeal wherein this court reversed the action of the trial court in sustaining demurrers to the complaints of the plaintiffs. Henderson v. Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District, 207 Cal. 215, 277 P. 487; Rutherford v. Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District, 207 Cal. 786, 277 P. 489. Thereafter a trial was had in the superior court of the county of Butte, and the plaintiff in each action was awarded judgment. From these judgments the defendant district has appealed. After the commencement of the present actions, Charles Dankert instituted in this court a proceeding against said irrigation district requiring it to furnish to said plaintiff and other landowners and water users situated like himself water from the irrigation system of the defendant district at certain rates set forth in the petition filed therein. After giving due consideration to said petition, we declined to decide the merits of the questions involved therein on the ground that they were the same as those presented on the joint appeal now before us. Dankert v. Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District (Cal. Sup.) 293 P. 785.

The defendant Oroville-Wyandotte irrigation district was organized on July 8, 1919, as a public corporation and irrigation district under the laws of the state of California, and has continued to exist and operate as such since the date of its organization. For some time prior to the organization of said district the Palermo Land & Water Company, which we will hereafter refer to as the Palermo Company, and the South Feather Land & Water Company, hereinafter referred to as the South Feather Company, owned and operated two separate and distinct systems of canals in the vicinity of Oroville, Butte county, and supplied water, owned by them respectively, as public utilities, subject to the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission to fix the rates charged to consumers under their respective systems, for irrigation, domestic, and mining purposes. After the organization of the defendant district, negotiations were begun looking to the acquisition by said district of the water rights and irrigation systems of the Palermo and South Feather Companies. Two applications were filed before the Railroad Commission on June 30, 1922, one by the Palermo Company entitled application No. 8000, and the other by the South Feather Company entitled No. 8018, asking for the authorization of the Railroad Commission to the transfer to the district of the two public utility water systems owned and operated by said companies. These applications were filed in pursuance of section 51 (a) of the Public Utilities Act (St. 1915, p. 149, § 51 (a), which requires the consent of the Railroad Commission to the sale and transfer of any public utility property. It appears that a portion only of the lands served with water from these two public utilities were included within the boundaries of said irrigation district. The outside users naturally became apprehensive regarding this proposed change in ownership of the water systems from which they were being served with water for their said lands, and appeared before the Railroad Commission and filed their protest against this transfer of said public utility systems to the irrigation district until the district should give "guaranties as to future rates to be charged for water and the service to be rendered and also that some provision be made for water users (without the district) to join the irrigation district." Hearings in these proceedings were held before Examiner Satterwhite at Oroville and San Francisco at which all interested parties were notified and given an opportunity to appear and be heard. Pending these hearings and prior to the final order of the Railroad Commission granting authority to make said transfers, the defendant irrigation district, at a duly called meeting of its board of directors held on the 20th day of October, 1922, adopted two resolutions, one applicable to the Palermo Company and the other to the South Feather Company, in which it set forth the terms and conditions upon which it would furnish water to the outside water users in the event authority was granted by the Railroad Commission to make the transfer to it of said two irrigation systems. These resolutions will be hereafter referred to more in detail. Certified copies of these resolutions were filed with the Railroad Commission, whereupon it granted authority to the two public utilities to transfer their property to the defendant district upon the conditions specified in the two resolutions of the district. The opinion and order of the Railroad Commission are quite lengthy, and we will set forth herein only the parts thereof that are material to the questions involved upon these appeals. After reciting that the applications were made by the utilities to transfer their properties and that the same were opposed by water users residing outside of the district, that hearings were held, and that "the matter was submitted without any definite proposal from the district," the opinion continues:

"After a number of conferences between representatives of the Commission, the companies, the district, and the protestants, the district and the protestants agreed on a form of proposal to be submitted, whereupon the Commission ordered the matters reopened and set a day for hearing, that the proposal could be submitted and made a part of the record in these proceedings.

"This proposal, applying to the water users of the Palermo system, is in the form of a resolution of the Board of Directors of the district, and is set out in full below:

"On motion duly made, seconded and unanimously carried, the following resolution was adopted:

"Whereas, on the 30th day of June, 1922, there was filed Application Number 8000 with the Railroad Commission of the State of California, which application is entitled: In the matter of the application of Palermo Land & Water Company, a corporation, to sell its water system, and F. F. Ford and Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District to purchase the same,

"And whereas, said application was filed for the purpose of said Palermo Land & Water Company receiving permission from the Railroad Commission of the State of California to sell its water system to the Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District, and

"Whereas, a public hearing on said application was held at Oroville, California, on the 22nd day of August, 1922, and

"Whereas, at the said hearing the present water users of the Palermo Land & Water Company did file a protest against the granting of the said application, and

"Whereas, in consideration of the said present water users withdrawing their said protest the said Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District does agree to enter into contracts with each of said water users accepting this offer as herein set forth within six months from date hereof,

"Whereas, the term "present water users" is hereby declared to mean the owners, their heirs, successors, grantees and assigns of land supplied with water from the water system of the Palermo Land & Water Company and which lands are not now in the Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District,

"Now, therefore, be, and it is hereby resolved that the president and secretary of the Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District, be, and they are hereby directed and empowered to enter into the above mentioned contract or contracts, for and on behalf of the said Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District and in its name, and in accordance with the terms and conditions herein contained.

"First.

"That the said water users, and each of them shall be entitled to and shall receive one (1) inch of water, continuous flow, for every four (4) acres of land. The amount of water now supplied to said water users shall continue to be so supplied by the said Irrigation District and shall be part of the said one (1) inch of water for every four (4) acres of land, and the additional water necessary to make one inch of water continuous flow for every four (4) acres of land shall be available to said water users from the first water developed by the said District.

"Second.

"That the present rate of twenty-two cents (22 cts.) per miner's inch continuous flow per day of twenty-four hours of water for irrigation purposes, with a minimum charge of five dollars ($5.00) per acre per year, shall be the rate charged by the District and paid by the water users for the said water until January first, 1928. The District shall not charge any rate for said water in excess of the rates above specified.

"Third.

"If at any time, five (5) years after the first construction work has been started by said Irrigation District, any of the present water users shall make a legal application to have their lands included in the said Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District, and said application shall be rejected by said Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District, then and in that event the said water user shall pay the same charge for water on his land as is paid for water within the Oroville Wyandotte Irrigation District. The said Irrigation District shall act upon said application within ninety (90) days from the date of the filing thereof.

"Fourth.

"That the above mentioned rates specified in paragraph two hereof shall not be raised after January first, 1928, provided however that should the charge paid for water within the said District exceed the sum of twenty-two cents (22 cts.) per inch, then and in that event the present water users shall pay the same charge as is paid within said district.

"Fifth.

"All the existing rights of the present water users shall continue and this agreement is an addition to all the rights and benefits they now possess.

"Sixth.

"Should any of the present water users at any time have their lands included within the Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District, then and in that event this agreement shall be null and void, as to such water users.

"Be it further resolved, that the secretary of the Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District be, and he is hereby directed to file a certified copy of this resolution with the Railroad Commission of the State of California, as part of the records of Application Number 8000, as a stipulation by the District in said proceedings to the end that the said commission may proceed to make its order in said matter.

"[Signed] J. A. Wisner (attest),
"Secretary.

"Approved:

"[Signed] R. C. Tyler,
"Chairman."

"The proposal applying to the water users of the South Feather system is identical in terms with the above, with the exception of the rate, which has been made $50 per miner's inch per season. This is a reduction of $10 per miner's inch per year from the present rate established by this Commission. The reduction in rate on the South Feather system makes the charges for the quantity of water the same on both systems, as the Palermo Land and Water Company delivers and sells water on the basis of 50 miner's inches per second-foot, while the South Feather Land and Water Company uses 40 miner's inches per second-foot.

"Upon the presentation of this proposal at the further hearing of the matter, the protestants formally withdrew their objections to the transfer. * * *

"Inasmuch as the applications filed with the Commission did not specifically set out the status of the water users outside the district or indicate the rates to be charged and service to be rendered, but only generally referred to same as set out in the deed of conveyance hereinbefore referred to, the Commission believed that a transfer under such conditions would not have properly safeguarded the rights of the water users, and purposely delayed authorization of the transfer until something more definite was offered the water users. Now that a method has been proposed whereby the water users outside the district are given reasonable protection as to service and rates, and because of which the protestants withdrew their protest to the transfer, the Commission now believes that public convenience will best be served by granting the authority sought, subject to the conditions contained in the applications and in the proposals submitted in connection therewith.

"Order.

"Palermo Land and Water Company and South Feather Land and Water Company, public utility water corporations, having filed applications with this Commission for authority to transfer their public utility properties to F. F. Ford and Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District, and F. F. Ford having indicated in writing his desire that the Commission authorize the transfer of these properties to the District direct, the Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District having joined in these applications, hearings having been held and the matters having been submitted.

"It is hereby ordered that the applications designated above be and the same are hereby granted, subject to the following conditions:

"That the present water users of the two water companies parties hereto, and those persons or firms desiring to become water users within ten (10) years from the date hereof, shall receive service from the Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District at the rates and under the conditions recited in Application 8000 and Application 8018 and in the resolutions of the directors of the Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District dated October 20, 1922, submitted and marked as Exhibit 4 in Application No. 8000 and Exhibit 5 in Application No. 8018. * * *

"Within thirty (30) days after its execution the Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District shall file with the Commission a verified copy of the deed under which it has secured and holds title to the properties authorized to be transferred."

Thereafter the two public utilities conveyed to the district their respective water rights and irrigation systems. After the acquisition of these rights and the irrigation systems, the district continued to operate them, and delivered water to the plaintiffs and other outside water users according to the terms and at the rates specified in its said resolutions and in the order of the Railroad Commission up to the year 1928. In January of that year, the district fixed a charge of $7.50 per acre foot to the outside water users, while the charge fixed for water users within the district was $5 per acre foot. Plaintiffs and the other outside water users contended that the district could not lawfully charge them a rate for water greater than that charged water users within the district, and that a charge of $7.50 per acre foot, in so far as the same exceeded the charge to users within the district of $5 per acre foot, was unlawful.

These actions were thereupon brought, one by plaintiff Henderson, who since 1892 has been a water user and a landowner under the Palermo system, and the other by plaintiff Rutherford, who possessed a water right agreement and has been a water user under the South Feather system since 1913. The fact that there were two public utility water systems serving two different groups of water users made it necessary to bring two actions, one by Henderson acting in a representative capacity in behalf of himself and other outside water users formerly supplied with water from the Palermo system, and the other by Rutherford, acting in a representative capacity on behalf of himself and other outside water users formerly supplied with water from the South Feather system.

The purpose of the two actions, as set forth in said complaints, was to have the court adjudge, declare, and determine the rights and duties of plaintiffs and those similarly situated.

ed and the duties of the defendant district under the contracts and written instruments by virtue of which the defendant district acquired the two irrigation systems from the former owners. The real issue presented by the pleadings of the parties to this action is whether the district may lawfully impose upon the outside water users a charge for water in excess of that charged by the district for water supplied to users within the district. The actions were tried by the court, and at the conclusion of the trial the court made findings and entered judgments in favor of the plaintiffs. The court held that the term "charge" as used in the opinion and order of the Railroad Commission authorizing the transfer of the property of said utilities to the district, and as used in the resolutions of the defendant district, referred to and set out in the said opinion and order of the Railroad Commission, meant, "rate to be paid for the use of water." The court accordingly held that the district could not legally charge plaintiffs or other landowners similarly situated a rate for water greater than the rate paid for use of water by members of the district. It further held that the charge of $7.50 per acre foot to outside users was unlawful to the extent that it exceeded $5 per acre foot, the rate charged for use of water by members of the district, and such excess was in violation of the resolutions of the defendant district and said opinion and order of the Railroad Commission. From these judgments, the defendant has appealed.

No serious contention is made by the district as to the meaning of paragraph fourth of the resolution of the district, setting forth the terms and conditions upon which it would purchase said public utilities. This paragraph reads as follows: "That the above mentioned rates specified in paragraph two hereof shall not be raised after January first, 1928, provided however that should the charge paid for water within the said District exceed the sum of twenty-two cents (22 cts.) per inch, then and in that event the present water users shall pay the same charge as is paid within said district." No point is made by either party hereto that the district could not after January 1, 1928, charge the outside users an amount in excess of $5 per acre foot, provided the same charge was made to users of water within the district. It is, however, the contention of the district that under all the facts and circumstances brought out by the evidence its power to fix charges for water owned by it and under its control is not restricted or limited in any manner whatever by the resolutions of its board of directors above referred to or by the order of the Railroad Commission authorizing the transfer of the two utility systems, or by any other act, resolution, or order of said district, or of said Railroad Commission. It claims to possess and hold the water rights and other property transferred to it by the Palermo and South Feather Companies subject only to the dedication of such portions of said irrigation systems to public use as had been made by either of said companies prior to said transfer, and that any contractual obligations assumed by it, or any conditions fixed by the Railroad Commission in its order granting authority to make said transfers, beyond the pre-existing dedications, are of no binding effect upon the district and cannot in any manner affect its control and management of the affairs of the district.

In support of this position it first contends that neither the plaintiffs nor any outside water user ever entered into contracts with the district pursuant to the resolutions of its board of directors, and consequently they have no rights against the district beyond those attaching by operation of law under the pre-existing dedications. The provision of said resolution relied upon by the defendant district is as follows: "Whereas in consideration of the present water users withdrawing their said protest, the said Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District does agree to enter into contracts with each of said water users accepting this offer as herein set forth within six months from date hereof." It is conceded that no formal or written contracts were ever entered into under this provision of the resolutions. Upon this issue of the case the trial court found in each case as follows: "That plaintiff and other owners of land similarly situated, were within the six months period provided in the resolution of the defendant district, ever since have been, and now are ready, able and willing to execute a contract with defendant upon the terms set forth in said resolution and offered within said period of six months to execute such an agreement, but that defendant then refused and still refuses so to do."

[1-4] This finding is unquestionably supported by the evidence before us. Some time after the transfer was made the defendant district, through its attorney, prepared a printed form of contract, purporting to conform to the provision of the resolutions above quoted. It contained, however, a radical and material departure from the terms of said resolutions, in that it provided that "party of the second part (the outside water user) shall pay yearly the same total costs for water as is paid within the Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District, said total cost to consist of the same rate per inch of water as is paid by landowners within the district, plus the same assessment paid by the landowners of similar land within the district for the year said water is being used." The plaintiffs and the other outside water users refused to sign the contract as prepared by the defendant, and prepared a form of their own following the precise provision of the resolutions providing for such contracts. This they presented to the attorney for the district and asked that it be accepted and executed by the district. The attorney refused to accept the draft of the contract proposed by the plaintiffs or to have the district sign or execute it or any one similar thereto. The rather technical objection is now made by the district that this draft of the proposed contract of the plaintiffs while presented to the attorney was never formally presented to the board of directors, the body empowered by law to act for the district. The evidence, however, shows that the board of directors had committed the preparation of these contracts to the attorney for the district, and that the board of directors was acting under the advice and direction of their attorney in this matter, and was fully informed of the negotiations between their attorney and plaintiffs. It is apparent, therefore, that the finding of the trial court that the failure of the parties to enter into said contracts was due to the refusal of the district to execute the same finds ample support in the evidence. The defendant should not, therefore, after its refusal to sign the contracts called for by its own resolutions, be permitted to gain any rights growing out of its said refusal. That the defendant district considered that it was bound by the terms of its resolutions, although no formal contracts had been executed in accordance with their provisions is shown by its subsequent action in furnishing water to the outside users in accordance with the terms of its resolution for five years and until January 1, 1928. The defendant district having accepted transfers of the two utility systems under the express agreement that it would enter into contracts in conformity with the terms of said resolutions, cannot by its refusal to comply with its agreement after it has acquired said property, escape the obligations assumed by it in the resolutions under which it agreed to purchase said property. It is bound by this contract as effectively as if it had in accordance with its agreement entered into formal contracts with the outside water users. This is particularly so in the present action, where the obligations thus assumed by the district were those imposed by the Railroad Commission as conditions upon which the Railroad Commission granted authority to the utilities to transfer their properties to the district. The position of the defendant regarding its contract obligations with the outside water users is similar in principle to that of a party to an informal agreement with the understanding that the parties thereto will later execute a more formal contract, and the failure of said party to enter into the formal contract does not release him from his obligation incurred under the informal agreement. "The mere fact that a written lease was in contemplation does not relieve either of the contracting parties from the responsibility of a contract which was already expressed in writing. When one party refuses to execute the lease according to the contract thus made, the other has a right to fall back on the written propositions as originally made, and the absence of the formal agreement contemplated is not material." Levin v. Saroff, 54 Cal. App. 285, 201 P. 961, 963.

The defendant district accepted conveyances from the two public utility companies upon the conditions imposed by the Railroad Commission, and expressly agreed that it would enter into written contracts with the outside water users whereby it would obligate itself to perform said conditions. Its subsequent refusal to enter into such contracts with the outside water users did not entitle it to hold the property conveyed to it free from the conditions imposed by the Railroad Commission, and which it had consented to by its said resolutions. In such a case, the outside users may rely upon the agreement of the district as set forth in said resolutions followed by the district's acceptance of conveyance of said property and its later retention and use of said property as its own. If we are correct in this conclusion, then it is apparent that the district holds said property conveyed to it by the two utility companies subject to the pre-existing dedications to public use and safeguarded and protected by the conditions imposed by the Railroad Commission and accepted by it at the time of the transfer of said utilities. These conditions not only governed the charge which the district might make for water delivered to the outside users, but also the quantity of water which these users were entitled to receive under previous contracts made with their respective companies. These contracts had been in force many years prior to the conveyance of the utilities to the district. The terms set forth therein were made conditions upon which the Railroad Commission granted its authority to make such conveyances, and, as the district accepted such conveyances subject to such conditions, it cannot now refuse to carry out its contract upon the ground that the contracts were beyond the power of the utility companies to make, or that the district itself exceeded its powers in agreeing to carry out these contracts after its acquisition of the properties from the utilities. In our former opinion in the Henderson Case we referred to this matter, and there said: "The further contention of respondent seems to be that, inasmuch as the Railroad Commission admittedly is without supervisory power over defendant irrigation district (citing authorities), and further asserting the passage of such resolution of the district was an act ultra vires its powers, the said district thereby acquired the water rights in question without restriction or condition, and plaintiff and others in like situation are thereby foreclosed from questioning the unregulated supremacy in the premises of said district. In other words, the contention is that the exemption, weakness, and infirmities of the district are now to be claimed elements of strength as against the claims of plaintiff and others. We, of course, are not required to finally dispose of this question, and do not do so, but we do not hesitate to say that a water right was in 1892 dedicated to the lands of plaintiff and others in like situation, and they have enjoyed such right continuously up to this time, and it is difficult to see how, by any transfer of franchises or property from the utility to the district, these rights can be said to have been destroyed or consumed—rights of which each of the contracting parties admittedly had full notice. Byington v. Sacramento Valley, etc., Co., 170 Cal. 124, 130, 148 P. 792.” Henderson v. Oroville-Wyandotte Irrigation District, 207 Cal. 215, 219, 277 P. 487, 488. Having acquired ownership of the utilities subject to these contracts and having expressly agreed to carry out the same, the district is now bound by its contract. City of San Diego v. La Mesa, L. G. and S. V. Irr. Dist. (Cal. App.) 292 P. 1082.

[5] The district further asserts that the Railroad Commission has no jurisdiction over the purchaser of a public utility, and that in a transfer of property of that character its jurisdiction operates solely upon the seller and not upon the buyer. From the foregoing it makes the deduction, if we correctly understand its position, that the purchaser or buyer is not bound by the action of the Railroad Commission fixing the conditions upon which a transfer of public utility property may be consummated. In Hanlon v. Eshleman, 169 Cal. 200, 146 P. 656, 657, this court held, “with the rights of an intending purchaser the commission has nothing to do.” That, however, was an action brought by a prospective purchaser against the members of the Railroad Commission in which he sought to compel the Railroad Commission by mandamus to authorize a sale in accordance with his agreement with the owner of a public utility. Very properly the court held that the prospective purchaser had no standing in such an action. The point decided in that action is very different from that made by the district in this case. While it is true that the purchaser is not in any manner under the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission, and has no standing in any proceeding instituted before said commission brought for the purpose of authorizing a sale to him, if, after the commission has acted and has fixed the conditions under which it would authorize a sale to him, he then purchases the property under the conditions fixed by the Railroad Commission, we know of no law, and none has been called to our attention by the district, which would permit the purchaser after acquiring the property to disregard the conditions under which he made his purchase.

[6-9] Another assertion made by the district is that the sole interest of the Railroad Commission lies in protecting the existing public use, and the contention is then made that any attempt on the part of the Railroad Commission before granting authority to sell a public utility, to enlarge or extend this public use, is void as beyond the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission. Section 51 (a) of the Public Utilities Act requires the consent of the Railroad Commission to the sale and transfer of any public utility. No sale of property burdened with a public use is legal, or of any validity whatever, except the authority to make such sale is first given by the Railroad Commission. In approving or authorizing such a sale, the Railroad Commission has jurisdiction to impose such conditions as will in the judgment of the Railroad Commission protect and safeguard the pre-existing rights of those entitled to service under said public utility. Glenn-Colusa Irrigation District v. Paulson, 75 Cal. App. 57, 242 P. 494, 500. In that case the court expressly held that, “in making its decision relative to the discontinuance of its public utility functions by the West Side Canal Company and the permitting of a transfer of its properties to the Glenn-Colusa irrigation district, the Railroad Commission was confronted with the fact that the irrigation district was not a public utility subject to the regulations and control of the Railroad Commission (see City of Pasadena v. Railroad Commission, 183 Cal. 526, 10 A. L. R. 1425, 192 P. 25), and therefore was under the necessity of making its orders conditional, as in that way only could the use of the water for irrigation purposes, as formerly furnished by the Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Company, be insured.” The language of this decision is strikingly applicable to the situation before the Railroad Commission when the two utilities, the Palermo and South Feather Companies, petitioned for authority to transfer their properties to the defendant district. After these properties were once conveyed to the district, the Railroad Commission lost all authority and jurisdiction over them, including the power to fix rates for the use of water by outside consumers as well as those within the district. The Railroad Commission was therefore confronted with the duty of protecting the rights of these outside users after the systems under which they were being served with water had passed out of its jurisdiction. It accordingly imposed the conditions set forth in its order authorizing the sale before it would grant such authority. It may not be said that these conditions enlarge or extend the rights of the outside water users, or add anything to such rights beyond those enjoyed by the outside water users prior to the transfer. The quantity of the water received by them under the conditions imposed by the Railroad Commission was the same as that which they had for years previously been receiving under their public utility right. As the Railroad Commission would be without authority after the transfer to fix the rates to be charged the outside users, it is serted in its order authorizing the transfer conditions which, if they were not suggested by the district, they were by the district agreed to, would protect in the future the rights of the outside users then existing. We are not called upon to decide whether these conditions imposed by the Railroad Commission resulted in fixing reasonable rates for the use of water by the outside users. The order of the Railroad Commission has become final in that respect, and determines that question beyond the power of this court to modify or set aside, at least in a proceeding like that now before us. In view of the fact that the district consented to these rates, in fact, as far as the record before us shows, took the initiative in having them incorporated in the order of the Railroad Commission, it is now in no position to complain that they are unreasonable or that it should not be governed by them in its dealings with the outside water users. We therefore conclude upon this branch of the case that the Railroad Commission in safeguarding the rights of the outside users in the manner and to the extent it did by its order authorizing the sale, merely sought to preserve to the outside users their pre-existing rights under the two public utilities. There is nothing to be found either in the case of Hanlon v. Eshleman, 169 Cal. 200, 146 P. 656, or Baldwin v. Railroad Commission, 206 Cal. 581, 275 P. 425, 429, which militates against this conclusion. The former case we have already referred to and stated its purpose and the ruling of the court therein. In the Baldwin Case the properties of a privately owned public utility company was by the authority of the Railroad Commission conveyed to a water storage district, organized under the laws of this state. Stats. 1921, p. 1727, and acts amendatory thereof. Some of the consumers under the public utility were not included within the storage district, and the Railroad Commission in granting permission to transfer the property of the utility imposed certain conditions in its order safeguarding the rights of these outside consumers. In this connection the court said: "When the commission has safeguarded, as it has in its order authorizing the transfer, the rights of consumers of the canal company outside the district, and has provided that the consumers within the district shall be served as provided in the Storage District Act, it is clear that the commission has properly performed its functions." That case, instead of holding that the Railroad Commission is without power to exact conditions upon which it would authorize a sale of a public utility, expressly holds that such an exercise of power is a proper function of the commission in order to safeguard the rights of outside consumers.

[10, 11] Finally the district contends that the judgments of the trial court confiscate the properties and systems of the district without due process of law and deny to it the equal protection of the law. The judgments of the trial court simply construe the several instruments and documents under which the district acquired the properties of the two utilities, and declare the rights and duties of the parties thereto under these documents and instruments. They in fact merely construe the contracts under which the district acquired and now holds these properties. The effect of these judgments is that the district is held to its contracts. If there is any confiscation of the property of the district, it is due to the contracts which the district made at the time it acquired this property and not to any judgment of the court construing these contracts. In support of this final contention that the judgments of the trial court confiscate the property of the district, the latter refers to certain evidence given at the trial of these actions which shows, or at least tends to show, that the members of the district are paying more for their water than are the outside users. In fact it is contended that the members of the district for less than half of the water available and delivered since the acquisition of the two utilities by this district pay more than two-thirds of the actual cost of furnishing such water to the users. This cost of water to the members of the district, however, includes the revenues from taxes and assessments paid by the members of the district in addition to the acre foot rate charged all water users. The weak link in the district's argument is that the revenues raised by taxes and assessments are not wholly and perhaps not at all used for the purpose of furnishing and delivering water to the users thereof. On the other hand, it clearly appears from this evidence that these revenues are largely used for the purpose of paying the interest on its bonded indebtedness and other expenses incurred by the district in extending its water system. The district comprised 24,200 acres, only 2,068 of which were receiving water at the time the district acquired the properties of the two utilities. A portion, the record fails to show just how much, of these 2,068 acres within the district receiving water was under the irrigation system of the two utilities prior to the transfer. There were 2,757 acres outside the district receiving water from these two irrigation systems at the time of the transfer and after the transfer they continued to receive water from the district. As there were over 20,000 acres in the district without water at the time the district acquired the two utilities, it is apparent that in order to carry out its plans it would be necessary to expend very large sums of money in securing additional water rights, constructing canals, ditches, and laterals, and purchasing rights of way for the same. As to the advisability of making these extensions in the irrigation system of the district the outside users had no voice, and with these plans they were not seriously concerned. They would receive only slight and probably no benefit from the large expenditures of money necessary to perfect an irrigation system adequate to the needs of the whole district. It was this burden—this large expense which would be necessary if the district carried out its plans to supply all of the lands of the district with water—that the outside users sought to protect themselves against when it was proposed that the district acquire the properties of the Palermo and South Feather Companies. In the light of these facts we think it may well be doubted whether the members of the district are actually paying more for their water service than those outside the district. At the time of the organization of the district it is apparent that there was considerable diversity of opinion among the landowners residing in the locality where the district was subsequently organized as to whether it was advisable to organize the district, and as to the advisability of having their lands included in the district. The result was, as we have already seen, that the plaintiffs and those whom they represent remained out of the district. Those who consented to become members and have their lands included in the district, it may well be assumed, knew of the plans of the organizers of the district to include therein a large body of land without water with the object and purpose of acquiring additional water rights which might be brought upon and used upon these heretofore nonirrigated lands. With this knowledge they became members of the district and thereafter the district began to carry out the plans of developing a water system sufficient in capacity to irrigate as far as possible all of the lands in the district. These members of the district are of course liable for the expense thus incurred. They stand in an entirely different position from the plaintiffs who decided to remain out of the district and to receive water from the district under the plan outlined above. That those in the district are compelled to meet higher charges for water they receive than the outside users is not surprising. In fact, it must have been contemplated by them that such would be the result if they became members of the district, and the district should put into execution the plan of extending its water system to all the irrigable lands in the district. The fact that the members of the district under these circumstances are required to pay higher charges for the water used than the outside users does not to any extent amount to a confiscation of the property of the district. The two classes of water users stand in entirely different positions regarding their respective rights to have water supplied to them by the district. There is in our opinion no merit in the contention of the district that the judgments herein confiscate the plants or property of the district.

From a review of the record in the two cases we are satisfied with the construction placed by the trial court upon written instruments and other documents by which the transfer was consummated of the two public utilities from the Palermo and South Feather Companies to the defendant district, and, furthermore, that the trial court in its judgments in these actions correctly determined and declared the rights and duties of the parties hereto under said written instruments and documents.

The judgments are affirmed.

PRESTON, J.

The judgment of nonsuit herein is affirmed. Two of the many reasons which seem to justify the action of the court below will be found in the brief narrative following:

The action is by plaintiff corporation, an insurance broker, for damages by way of loss of prospective profits in the form of commissions which were to accrue over a period of fifteen years, lost to it because of the failure of defendant corporation to place through it the insurance on apartment house and hotel structures under its control during said period of time.

Plaintiff, at all times herein prior to July 1, 1924, was a licensed insurance broker, but after said date it did not secure such license. It was a one-man corporation, being the alter ego of one Craig Carrier. Defendant corporation was engaged extensively in the business of underwriting and marketing mortgage bond securities, floated principally for the building and construction of apartment houses, hotels, and office buildings, and it was extensively engaged in such business on the Pacific Coast. But to protect the security behind the bond issues it was sponsoring, defendant controlled the amount and classes of insurance in force upon the structure both during the construction period and thereafter during the period representing the life of the bond issue, which was usually about fifteen years. Defendant apparently also had an insurance department of its own, but frequently in insurance matters dealt through other brokers, requiring such brokers, however, to surrender to it one-half of the commissions customarily received on such insurance business.

On October 25, 1921, plaintiff wrote defendant soliciting "fidelity and surety insurance" on a "reciprocity basis" and concluded by soliciting authority to act as defendant's "insurance brokers," stating it "would place buying and selling orders for securities" with it. This letter brought a visit from a representative of defendant, and evidently the parties reached some understanding respecting the insurance on a contemplated apartment house building to be erected at the southeast corner of Powell and Sacramento streets, San Francisco, and to be known as the Francesca building. This is evidenced by a letter of November 10 in which plaintiff wrote defendant confirming the arrangement as covering the fire, compensation, liability, and surety bond insurance. In this letter appeared the following: "In consideration of our handling this insurance as the owner's or your brokers the writer hereby places an order with you for $5,000.00 of your 7% bonds; long maturities are preferable and at an early date the particular bond and maturity will be arranged."

On November 14, 1921, defendant replied to this letter, making no dissent from its terms except to say that it had its own insurance department: "We, however, will divide the regular commissions due us for the placing of this business, with your firm, which is the basis we use in the placing of all of our insurance on the Pacific Coast." During the period between this time and the fall of 1924, plaintiff and defendant did some brokerage business together, and plaintiff's commissions were $5,953.88, half of which it gave to a person designated by defendant. During this period also plaintiff subscribed to bond issues being marketed by defendant to the extent of some $65,000 and instigated purchases of such issues by others to the extent of $24,000. It is clear that during this period of time defendant was not allowing plaintiff to place the insurance on all the buildings it was financing or, indeed, all the kinds of insurance on any one building at all. However, on August 12, 1924, it became evident that a disagreement was about to arise concerning the arrangement between the parties. On August 21, 1924, plaintiff undertook to put its oral understanding with defendant into the form of a letter, the important clause of which was as follows: "It is that we were, and are, to have the complete insurance both during the construction, and for the life of the bonds after completion, on some building financed by you over which you have the control of the insurance (on building equivalent to Francesca Apartment Building and in proportion to less or more expensive building) for every $5,000.00 of bonds purchased by us or through our influence (with the exception of the Senator Hotel, on which a special arrangement was made) we, in turn, to pay to you one-half of the regular commission."

Defendant repudiated this claim at once. This suit followed in which the existence of such an understanding was put in direct issue. The essence of plaintiff's claim is that said bond purchases authorized it to place the insurance on sixteen existing or future buildings yielding commissions during fifteen years, equivalent in amount to those that might be yielded to the brokers who handled the placing of insurance on the Francesca building. Plaintiff for some reason did not even handle that business for defendant nor purchase the specified bonds. The damages arrived at in this highly uncertain, hearsay, and speculative manner were to be the sum of $155,000, one-half of which sum was made the prayer of the complaint. The answer denied plaintiff's claims in toto as to the contract, and pleaded the absence in plaintiff of a license to act as a broker, setting up also the statute of limitations and finally offering to repurchase at cost all bonds purchased by plaintiff or at his instigation.

The case went to trial. Plaintiff's evidence consisted largely of his own testimony. He testified to the existence of an understanding in all respects similar to that claimed in the letter above quoted. At the conclusion of his evidence, defendant moved for a nonsuit upon a variety of grounds. This motion was granted, and a formal judgment was entered. Plaintiff has appealed therefrom.

It will be noted at the outset that the so-called reciprocity agreement contended for by plaintiff rests entirely in parol. The writings passing between the parties related only to certain specific structures and dealt not at all with any general understanding between them. If it be assumed that the contract was in existence between the parties, a breach thereof did not occur until August, 1924. It has been noted above, however, that on July 1, 1924, plaintiff ceased to be a licensed insurance broker under the laws of this state and was not such broker at the times herein involved subsequent to said date.

It is the contention of defendant that the contract is too vague and uncertain to be enforceable. As we understand it, plaintiff's testimony, giving it the most favorable construction allowable, is that, for each $5,000 purchase of bonds through defendant, defendant was to give to it the placing of insurance of all classes on some structure, which insurance would yield substantially the equivalent in commissions to the insurance carried by said Francesca apartments, on which structure a bond issue of some $500,000 was placed, the period of harvest to be fifteen years. It must be evident that such a contract is vague and speculative, and also that the existence of such a contract taxes greatly human credulity—that the mere subscription to a one one-hundredth part of a bond issue, presumably worth and marketable at par, could bring about such far-reaching and comprehensive privileges with such continuing emoluments.

[1] We do not feel called upon, however, to dwell upon this contention, for defendant urges that, inasmuch as the contract by its very nature was not to be performed within one year, and inasmuch as plaintiff's duties thereunder were not to be performed within one year, the statute of frauds comes into operation and renders such an agreement, if admitted to exist, unenforceable. The reply made to this contention is that all plaintiff had to do was to subscribe for bonds to the extent of $5,000 for any one issue and its duty in that respect was thereby performed; hence the statute of frauds would not operate.

It is clear, however, that the insurance required by defendant during construction and thereafter during the life of the bond issue was of various types, such as fire, earthquake, boiler, plate glass, elevator, workmen's compensation, public liability, property damage, surety bonds, fidelity bonds, etc. The period of the bond issue being for approximately fifteen years, it is clear that, with respect to renewals, changes in rate, and other matters relating to such insurance, the active constant attention during the whole period on the part of plaintiff, in order to earn its compensation, was required. In other words, it is too clear for controversy that plaintiff did not, by its mere subscription to the bond securities, end its duties to the defendant, and the statute of frauds does apply. Section 1624, subd. 1, Civ. Code. This section provides that "an agreement that by its terms is not to be performed within a year from the making thereof" is invalid unless the same, or some note or memorandum thereof, is in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his agent. It is apparent also that the contract, by its terms, was to be a continuing one and could not from the nature of the subject-matter have been performed within one year. For this reason also it is within the statute of frauds.

[2, 3] The objection that raising the question of the statute of frauds for the first time on the motion for nonsuit came too late cannot be allowed. The point could have been raised by a motion to strike after the reception of the evidence. Hanley v. Murphy, 70 Cal. App. 157, 232 P. 767. The cause was in no different condition when the motion for nonsuit was made. If plaintiff was embarrassed in any way by the delay in the making of the point, it could have sought a reopening of its case. But nothing is urged to show such prejudice or that it was denied the privilege of reopening the cause.

[4] We think it is equally clear that, when plaintiff prior to any breach of the contract and on July 1, 1924, ceased to become a licensed broker, it thereby placed itself where it could not insist upon performance of the contract by defendant. This follows from the observations made above, for, if its services were required during the full period of the mortgage upon the property, it should have maintained itself in a position to carry out its duties, and its failure or neglect to maintain such status estops it to claim a breach of the contract on the part of defendant, and, moreover, would prevent the collection of commissions on insurance placed subsequent to said date.

We are satisfied to rest our views upon the matters above set forth without entering in to further discussion.

Peter Farrington was convicted of murder, and he appeals.

WASTE, C. J.

Peter Farrington, accused of the crime of murder in having, on or about April 29, 1930, killed John Malcolm, a police officer of the city and county of San Francisco, was convicted of murder in the first degree, and the death penalty was imposed. It was also charged in the information that, prior to the present offense, Farrington, under another name, had been convicted of assault with intent to commit robbery in San Francisco, and, under still another name, had been convicted of the crime of "violently stealing" in British Columbia. Farrington at first denied that he had suffered the two prior convictions of felony, but subsequently withdrew his denial and admitted the two priors. Motion for a new trial was made and denied.

On April 29, 1930, Max Kahn, office manager of the California Stevedore & Ballast Company, and Maurice Murphy, paymaster of the same company, alighting from a taxicab near the office of the company on Pier 26 on the waterfront in San Francisco, were held up and robbed of $3,200, the amount of the pay roll just drawn from a bank. Two men perpetrated the actual robbery, while one remained in an automobile close by. During the course of the robbery John Malcolm, a San Francisco police officer, sought to aid Kahn and Murphy, and was shot and killed. The murderer and his accomplices escaped from the scene in the waiting automobile. Some time later, the appellant was arrested in the state of Washington and afterwards returned to San Francisco for trial. From the judgment of conviction and order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

The most important question presented for consideration on appeal concerns the sufficiency of the identification of the appellant. Certain other objections to the legality of the conviction are advanced, but the real question is whether or not there is, in the record, evidence upon which the jury was warranted, as a matter of law, in finding that the appellant was the actual perpetrator of the crime.

The appellant was identified by the witness Gibson, driver of the taxicab which took Kahn and Murphy to the office of the stevedoring company, and who stated that the defendant answered the description of one of the two men who perpetrated the actual holdup; and was the one who asked him if he had a "rod" (pistol), and searched him for a gun. The appellant was definitely identified by the witness as the "one that did the shooting," and also by another witness, Brehmer, in the employ of the freight department of the American-Hawaiian Steamship Company, who watched the struggle between the police officer and the appellant, at which time the appellant had a gun in his hand. William Hales, another witness, who saw the officer shot, identified the defendant in the courtroom. Christian Clausen, superintendent of the stevedoring company, identified the appellant as the man he saw pull a gun "out of his pocket and put it in Kahn's stomach." He was very positive that the defendant was the man. Henry Hade, a clerk in the employ of the American-Hawaiian Steamship Company, was another witness to the robbery who testified "he heard a scuffle and ran to the door from which he saw the officer and a fellow with a gun * * * an armed man holding the officer's arm and * * * telling the officer to turn around." He identified the appellant as the man who fired the gun.

[1, 2] The appellant testified that he was not present on the occasion of the shooting, but was in the city of Stockton visiting an unnamed woman. He could only show, however, that he registered at a hotel in Stockton about noon of the day following the killing of Malcolm. He challenges the sufficiency of the identification, and analyzes various parts of the testimony in support of his contention that the identification witnesses testified in a manner "and to things incompatible with their assertion to that effect." Uncertainties in the testimony of other witnesses are pointed out, and discrepancies in the testimony of others are referred to. The strength or weakness of the identification, the incompatibility of and discrepancies in the testimony, if there were any, and the uncertainties of witnesses in giving their testimony were matters solely for the observation and consideration of the jurors in the first instance, and for the consideration of the trial court on motion for a new trial. It has approved the finding of the jury, and on appeal this court may not disturb such finding and the action of the trial court unless we can say, as a matter of law, that there was no evidence to support the conviction. People v. Erno, 195 Cal. 272, 283, 232 P. 710. On the record before us, we cannot say that this is such a case.

[3] Complaint is made by the appellant that the court unduly denied him the right to test the degree of certainty of the witness Gibson as to the identity of the robbers whom he saw on Pier 26 just preceding the shooting of the policeman. The specified questions, to which objections of the prosecution were sustained, were addressed to what the witness would do if he sat as a juror in the case, and whether or not, if he had been asked, he would have sworn to a complaint in the case charging appellant with the commission of murder. While these questions, if answered, might in an indirect way have tested the faith of the witness in his own testimony, we deem the questions irrelevant. The matter was sufficiently gone into, and no prejudicial error resulted to the defendant.

[4] The defendant, on cross-examination, having brought out the fact that Murphy, the paymaster, talked to the manager, Kahn, who was with him at the time of the occurrence, about what had transpired in connection with the holdup and shooting, was, we think, entitled to a wider range of cross-examination on that subject. The trial court sustained the objection of the prosecution without giving any reason, and the prosecution now offers no sufficient reason why the cross-examination was curtailed. However, as Murphy and Kahn were the victims of the holdup, and if having been brought out that they did talk about the happening, as might readily be presumed they would, common knowledge of the jurors no doubt enabled them to appreciate the fact that the two men had probably gone fully into all that transpired, and compared notes as to what occurred.

[5] The court refused to give an instruction submitted by the defendant in which were closely related the question of the sufficiency of the identity of the assailant of the deceased and the question of reasonable doubt in the minds of the jurors. The court, however, did give an instruction of its own covering the duty of the jurors in considering the evidence as to the identity of the defendant, and in other parts of the charge sufficiently covered the questions of presumption of innocence, reasonable doubt, and the duty of the jurors in considering all the evidence in the case.

[6, 7] The court properly refused to give an instruction requested by the defendant to the effect that, if the jurors entertained a reasonable doubt whether defendant was guilty of manslaughter or murder, they might find the defendant guilty of manslaughter. It is neither necessary nor proper for the court, on a trial on an indictment for murder, to give the definition of manslaughter or to tell the jury that it may find the defendant guilty of manslaughter, unless there is evidence in the case tending to prove that the crime was or may have been manslaughter. Instructions are always to be given with reference to the facts proved before the jury. People v. Byrnes, 30 Cal. 206, 207. The deceased police officer was killed by an assailant engaged in the perpetration of a robbery, and, under the facts in evidence, the defendant was guilty of murder in the first degree (Pen. Code, § 189), or not guilty.

[8, 9] When the appellant was arrested in Washington, a number of personal articles were found in a suitcase in his room, among them a .38 caliber pistol, a holster, and belt. The pistol was admitted in evidence on the offer of the prosecution, apparently in connection with the testimony of Brehmer, an eye-witness to the shooting, that, "having served in the army, he was able to recognize the gun on the day as a .38 caliber gun," and that the weapon introduced in evidence "resembled it." A bullet removed from the body of the dead police officer by the autopsy surgeon was merely marked "for identification." Just before the close of the trial the defense reopened its case and offered the bullet in evidence, also without any explanation or giving any reason for the offer. It was admitted, whereupon, and just as the evidence in the case was being closed, counsel for the defendant requested permission to submit the bullet to "some person who is either an expert on ballistics or an expert with the microscope," for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the bullet "could possibly have been ejected from a pistol having the riflings" of the pistol in evidence. The court denied the request on the ground that the case had been set for trial for more than a month and a half, and the defense had had ample time in which to make such an experiment if it had desired to do so, and that such action would delay the trial. Such requests are addressed to the discretion of the trial judge, and, in the absence of a prejudicial refusal, such a denial will not work a reversal on appeal. We have read all the evidence about the pistol and the bullet, and cannot see that the denial of appellant's request resulted in any prejudicial or material harm to his case.

[10, 11] The shooting of the police officer occurred in San Francisco on April 29, 1930. It was therefore not error for the trial court to sustain the objection of the prosecution to the testimony of appellant's father that he knew where the appellant was going from the city of Los Angeles about eighteen days before the killing took place. Such evidence was irrelevant and immaterial. Questions propounded to the witness Brehmer by the defense, on cross-examination, as to whether or not he was subpoenaed to appear at the coroner's inquest in the matter of Malcolm's death, were addressed to another irrelevant and immaterial matter, and the trial court properly sustained the objection of the prosecution thereto.

[12] By the verdict the jury found the defendant "guilty of murder of the first degree," but did not decree in their verdict that he should suffer the extreme penalty. Because of this form of the verdict, appellant challenges the jurisdiction of the trial court to impose the death sentence. The contention is without merit. When the crime of murder of the first degree is found by the jury, without recommendation as to the punishment the defendant shall suffer, the law imposes the death penalty. Pen. Code, § 190; People v.

La Verne (Cal. Sup.) 297 P. 561. The jurors were fully instructed as to the form of the verdict they should render if they decided that the defendant should suffer death as punishment for the crime he committed.

By the use of excerpts from the transcript, appellant seeks to challenge the fairness and impartiality of the trial judge. Read alone and in the way appellant would have us read them, such extracts from the record appear to sustain appellant's charge. But read with the context and in the light of the entire record of the trial, these excerpts fail of the purpose for which they are quoted. We find that the trial judge was fair and just to both the prosecution and the defense. He conducted the trial with commendable expedition, but without he was patient and even kindly disposed toward all the parties and counsel for both sides.

Appellant has been fairly and justly convicted of the wanton killing of a peace officer in the discharge of his duty. The judgment of conviction and the order denying the motion for a new trial are, and each is, affirmed.

Reversed with directions.

Bronson, Bronson & Slaven and Goldman & Nye & Reed M. Clarke, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Charles J. Janigan, of San Francisco, for defendant Tatosian.

Vincent W. Hallinan, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

This is an action for wrongful death. The deceased, Mrs. Bridget Bowler, a woman sixty-two years of age, was riding in an automobile driven by her son, Edward Bowler, when a collision occurred between the said automobile and one driven by defendant Larson for his employer, defendant Roos. The heirs of Mrs. Bowler, nine in number, joined in this action, and the jury returned a verdict in their favor in the sum of $7,000. The evidence satisfactorily establishes negligence on the part of defendant Larson and contributory negligence on the part of Edward Bowler.

[1] Counsel for defendant urge that the action for wrongful death should be barred by the contributory negligence of any heir, on the theory that the action is single and indivisible (Code Civ. Proc. § 377), and if recovery by one heir is barred, the bar must necessarily apply to all. The argument is without substance and it is not, as counsel suggest, newly raised in this state. It was presented, fully considered, and rejected in Bowen v. Kizirian, 105 Cal. App. 286, 287 P. 570. The court there said (page 290 of 105 Cal. App., 287 P. 570, 571): "It is established that the failure of one of the plaintiffs to prove loss will not defeat recovery by another of the plaintiffs whose pecuniary loss has been proved. And this, notwithstanding the fact that under the statute, as interpreted by our courts, only one action may be brought and only one judgment recovered. So far as the interpretation of this statute is concerned, no reason appears why the rule should be any different where the evidence discloses that one of the parties is not entitled to recover, not on account of a failure to prove pecuniary loss, but because of the intervention of another rule, such as contributory negligence. In Estate of Ricconi [185 Cal. 458, 197 P. 97, 14 A. L. R. 509], supra, it is said it would be absurd to hold that because two heirs must join in one action, the one proving damage must share the proceeds with the one suffering no injury. It would seem equally absurd to hold that an innocent party cannot recover because another party, with whom he is required by law to be joined as plaintiff, is not innocent."

[2] Defendants contend, however, that the trial court should have granted their motion for a new trial, and this contention must, we think, be sustained. Of the nine heirs who brought this action, all were adults, and only three lived with the deceased. Two of these, James and Bernice Bowler, worked and supported her. Practically all of the children were self-supporting. The only heirs who can possibly be deemed to have suffered substantial loss appear to be Mary Cruise and Nora Bowler. The former is a nurse, divorced from her husband, having the custody of three minor children, all of them of school age and attending school. She testified that the deceased took care of the children when she was away on a case, giving them food, and at other times making clothes and washing clothes for them. Nora Bowler was, according to the testimony, a woman of twenty-eight, but mentally incompetent, subject to epileptic fits, and requiring constant care and attention. Evidence offered by plaintiffs tended to show that the deceased took care of her.

Defendants moved for a new trial, and in support of their motion offered the affidavit of Mrs. Rose C. Ray stating that Nora Bowler had been employed by her as a household servant for several years, including the period covered by the testimony of plaintiffs already referred to; that she had received wages of $50 per month; that her health was good; and that she did her work in a satisfactory manner. Defendants made a showing of diligence, and in this connection called attention to the testimony of plaintiff Edward Bowler in his deposition taken before the trial, wherein he stated that Nora Bowler was employed in domestic service. This statement, of course, was contradicted by other evidence offered by plaintiffs at the trial. The affidavit tended to establish perjury on a material issue in the case, and no counter affidavit was filed. The only defense to the motion was the testimony of a physician to the effect that Nora Bowler was feeble-minded. This might be true and still in no way overcome the charge made in the affidavit.

Although the trial court is vested with a broad discretion in the matter of granting new trials, we think this is a case where the denial of such relief cannot be justified.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, with directions to the lower court to grant a new trial to defendants.

GRIFFIN, Justice pro tem.

Appellant was found guilty of murder in the first degree and sentenced to life imprisonment.

onment. A large number of witnesses testified at the trial. The testimony on the part of the witnesses for the state tended to show that appellant was guilty of murder in the first degree. Testimony of witnesses for appellant substantiated his plea of self-defense.

The evidence discloses that appellant, with his family and a number of relatives, including Monroe Hicks, the deceased, was residing in an auto camp on the outskirts of the city of Redlands in the county of San Bernardino. Appellant and his family lived in one tent and the relatives in other tents near by. They were there for the fruit-picking season. No trouble of any consequence had occurred between appellant and Monroe Hicks and there was no evidence of any ill feeling between them prior to the day of the homicide.

On Sunday, March 22, 1931, at about 10 o'clock in the morning, an altercation occurred in appellant's tent, his daughter screamed "Monroe," and presently Monroe Hicks came out of his tent near by and over in front of appellant's tent. Appellant, who had been shaving, came out of his tent with an open razor in his hand, saying, "What did you come up here for, interfering with my family affairs?" To which Hicks replied, "Don't you come saying anything to me or you will get the worst of it."

The evidence as to what took place following this verbal altercation is conflicting. Witnesses for the state contend that appellant came out of his tent with an open razor in his hand and by striking and slashing at deceased forced him back to his own tent. Appellant denies this and claims that deceased put his hand to his right hip pocket, but that when he discovered that deceased had only a pair of orange clippers in his pocket they both went back to their tents.

Nothing of any consequence occurred during the day until about 4 o'clock in the afternoon when several of the relatives and appellant were out in front of the tents repairing an automobile tire. Appellant was sitting on the running board of one car and several of the relatives were just opposite him and within eight or ten feet.

Deceased came out of his tent and walked up to where the others were grouped at the rear of the car. According to the evidence, appellant opened the conversation by saying, "You needn't look so hard," and deceased replied, "Who wouldn't." Appellant arose from the running board and started towards his tent, saying, "If you're not satisfied, I'll make you satisfied." As appellant walked toward his tent, deceased reached over into the automobile and picked up a portion of an automobile spring, or tire iron, and stood holding it with both hands behind his back. A heated conversation ensued. Appellant walked back about forty feet and took a pistol either from his tent or out of the trailer where his wife testified he had always kept it. Appellant came back towards Hicks carrying his pistol in front of him and demanded that deceased put the tire iron down. He snapped the pistol, but it failed to discharge. When the pistol snapped deceased "ducked forward." As he raised his head appellant shot him, the bullet piercing the heart and passing through his body. Deceased fell forward on his right side and face and appellant fired another shot into his left shoulder, and then as he rolled over on his face appellant stooped over him and fired a third shot into the center of his back. After the shooting appellant walked back to his tent and reloaded his gun. He talked to several persons, stating in substance that he had to kill the deceased to protect himself. He contends that deceased drew the tire iron back in a threatening manner and came toward him. There is evidence to show that deceased made no movement toward appellant and no words were spoken by him after appellant came towards him with the pistol.

[1] Appellant presents six grounds for a reversal of the judgment. He contends, first, that the court erred in instructing the jury. He urges that people's instruction No. 7, which is a general instruction on a long printed form consisting of several pages, was erroneous and misleading.

In this instruction the court correctly instructed the jury on murder and malice as defined in sections 187, 188, Penal Code, respectively, and on the degrees of murder as defined in section 189 of the Penal Code, and also manslaughter as set forth in section 192 of the Penal Code. Then it explained fully the distinguishing features and degrees of the several offenses.

Appellant's most serious contention appears to be based on the following portion of this instruction: "If the unlawful killing is done without the provocation and sudden passion which reduces the offense to manslaughter, or is done in the commission of an unlawful act, the natural consequences of which are dangerous to life, or is committed in the attempt to perpetrate a felony other than those mentioned in the description of murder in the first degree, or the circumstances of the killing show an abandoned heart, this is murder of the second degree, unless the evidence proves the existence in the mind of the slayer of the specific intent to take life. If such specific intent exists at the time of such unlawful killing, the offense committed would of course be murder in the first degree."

While it may be true that this last sentence, when isolated from the remainder of the instruction and read alone, and omitting the elements of premeditation and deliberation, would not be a complete and correct definition of murder of the first degree, yet when read in conjunction with the whole instruction, and the other instructions, it could leave no question in the mind of any juror as to all of the elements of, and the definition of murder of the first degree. The jury was told several times in other portions of the instruction in no uncertain terms that deliberation and premeditation were necessary elements of first degree murder. Substantially this same contention was presented in the case of People v. Watts, 198 Cal. 776-800-801, 247 P. 884, 893. In that case the court said: "There is no basis for the claim that the trial court charged that defendant could be found guilty of murder in the first degree without including in the charge the essential elements of deliberation and premeditation. * * * Before the court gave the instruction * * * it had carefully charged the jurors that to constitute murder in the first degree the killing must be preceded by and be the result of a concurrence of will, deliberation, and premeditation on the part of the slayer. They were also told that, to justify a conviction, every element of the crime must be established by the prosecution beyond a reasonable doubt."

This is just the situation in the case before us, and we may adopt the language of the court set forth in the Watts Case as follows: "All the instructions, read and considered together as one charge, without straining the language, show a fair, harmonious, and correct statement of the law applicable to the facts of the case, and contain all the conditions and limitations which are omitted from the isolated excerpts selected by appellant for criticism."

[2] Appellant contends that no sufficient definition of murder in the second degree was given and that the refusal of his instruction thereon was error. The jury was given the statutory definition as heretofore stated which would of itself be sufficient. In addition to this the general instruction above referred to elaborates upon this definition sufficient to leave no doubt as to the meaning of murder in the second degree.

[3] Appellant further contends that the court misdirected the jury on the question of reasonable doubt. The statutory definition of reasonable doubt was given verbatim and was in itself sufficient. Section 1096a, Pen. Code. It was supplemented by another instruction repeating the statutory definition and elaborating thereon which in substance was a correct statement of the doctrine. People v. Lewandowski, 143 Cal. 574-580, 77 P. 467.

[4] Appellant further contends that the court erred in refusing his instructions numbers 11 and 19; and that no sufficient instruction on the principle of self-defense was given and that by reason of such refusal the court erred. The jury was correctly, fully and completely charged upon the definition of murder and manslaughter in all of its phases in the general instruction. As to self-defense, the jury was fully and correctly charged thereon in three of the state's instructions and in four of appellant's given instructions. The court is not required to state the law to the jury more than once, but may refuse requested instructions which are fully covered by other instructions. 8 Cal. Jur. 314.

We have examined all of the instructions given by the trial court and we find that taken as a whole they were full and fair, and that, read as a whole, they are not to be held subject to the criticism which appellant aims at portions of particular ones. The particular instructions against which appellant directs such criticism are not fairly subject thereto, nor could the jury in considering the same have been misled thereby.

[5] Appellant's second ground of appeal is that the court erred in refusing to direct a mistrial by reason of misconduct of the district attorney. The first assignment of error under this point arose out of a remark made by the district attorney in his opening statement to the jury, which related to the actions of appellant's wife and intimating that appellant was disagreeable and quarreled with her in the forenoon of this particular day. Appellant's attorney immediately objected and asked that the court admonish the jurors to disregard the statement. The court very promptly and emphatically admonished them to disregard it and the district attorney to refrain from alluding to it further. This cured the error, if any there was. Other objections were made throughout the trial to remarks by the district attorney and the court. The court on many occasions instructed the jurors to disregard any remarks made by counsel or the court and not to consider them as evidence or proof of any fact.

[6] In his third ground of appeal appellant makes objection to remarks in the district attorney's closing argument upon the ground that they were improper conclusions and there was no evidence to support them. In this argument the following took place:

"Mr. King: These boys will be better men when they grow up if they are not in the environment of this father, and this mother's life will be better and a few years longer if this defendant is not living with her day after day; so he is not entitled to very much sympathy, ladies and gentlemen. He is a great man, as Mr. Bates calls him, and the head of the whole outfit.

"Mr. Eckhardt: I submit to your Honor that it is not in the evidence, and I object to it and assign it as prejudicial misconduct, and not based on the evidence.

"Mr. King: That is a conclusion deducted from the evidence.

"The Court: It is a conclusion deducted from the evidence. Proceed.

"Mr. King: So I say, gentlemen of the jury, this man was the head of the outfit. He had boys of his own. This man's leadership capacity was shocked, and he shot that man as he would have shot a dog that was barking at his heels."

Appellant contends that the court not only failed to rule properly but added judicial commendation to the argument of the district attorney. This argument, and the reason given by the court for its ruling, might better have been unsaid, yet counsel has a right to present to the jury his views of the proper deductions or inferences to be drawn from the evidence. People v. Willard, 150 Cal. 543-552, 89 P. 124.

Appellant also objected to certain questions as leading. The record shows that many of the objections to the questions cited in the brief were sustained by the court, and that when overruled, the ruling thereon was proper. Other points raised are without merit.

Appellant has presented to this court on appeal a lengthy but comprehensive brief reflecting much energy and diligence. Considering all the facts in the case, and all of the instructions read and considered together as one charge, they show a fair, harmonious, and correct statement of the law applicable to the facts of the case. This has repeatedly been held to obviate such objections as are now made. People v. Doyell, 48 Cal. 85; People v. Dennis, 39 Cal. 625; People v. Nelson, 56 Cal. 77; People v. Watts, supra.

[7] The record discloses that the trial consumed approximately five days. It likewise reveals that appellant was given every opportunity to present his case. We believe, after a careful examination of the entire record, that he was accorded a fair and impartial trial and that his conviction of murder in the first degree is amply supported by the evidence. We find no errors that would justify a reversal.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: JENNINGS, Acting P. J.; MARKS, J.

Agreement terminating lease held properly construed as intended to terminate provision obligating lessors to return deposit made by lessees.

Lease provided that deposit in question was consideration and compensation to lessors for entering into lease, but if lessees performed covenants, then money should be returned at termination of lease, whether by expiration of five-year term or by mutual agreement; and it appeared that lessees' assignee, notwithstanding reduction in rent, found it necessary to demand further reduction which lessors refused to make, whereupon parties entered into agreement providing that lease, of which over two years remained, was terminated, and that lessors would buy certain personalty located on premises, and although this agreement was executed in March and final installment on purchase price of property was not paid until August, no mention of the deposit was made during that time.

2. Contracts ⇨169.

Where agreement was ambiguous, court in ascertaining parties' intention properly looked beyond terms of instrument and considered circumstances and dealings showing parties' interpretation (Civ. Code, § 1647; Code Civ. Proc. § 1860).

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨184(2).

Lease contemplating deposit as compensation for lessors' executing lease, even if deposit were security, held valid, except perhaps to extent that it involved forfeiture.

SPENCE, J.

Plaintiff sought to recover the sum of $1,000 deposited by his assignors with defendants as lessors under the terms of a lease. The cause was tried without a jury, and from a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals.

[1] The lease, executed on May 1, 1926, by defendants and Michael McGuinn and Robert W. Lawton, plaintiff's assignors, was for a term of five years commencing July 1, 1926. It covered a garage and service station and provided for a monthly rental of $250. It further contained the following provision: "Mr. Michael McGuinn has deposited with the lessors the sum of One thousand ($1,000) dollars, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged. Said money is not deemed any part of the rental herein reserved, but is a flat consideration and compensation to the lessors for entering into this lease, but said lessors agree that if the lessees shall well and truly perform all of the covenants and conditions herein contained, and continuously occupy the said premises for the period herein reserved, then said money shall be returned to said Michael McGuinn at the termination of this lease, whether said termination be by the expiration of the lease term or by mutual agreement of the parties hereto, whether by assignment or otherwise, as long as the lessee shall not be in default in the performance of the covenants herein created. The lessors will pay the said Michael McGuinn six per cent. per annum payable monthly, on the first day of each and every month, on said deposit."

On July 1, 1927, the lease was assigned to plaintiff with the consent of defendants. Shortly thereafter plaintiff refused to pay the $250 per month as rental and stated that "he would walk out" if the rent was not reduced. The parties then orally agreed upon a reduction of the rent from $250 to $200. The latter amount was paid by plaintiff up to March 11, 1929. Shortly prior to that date plaintiff told defendants that if the rent was not reduced to $150 per month "he would have to walk out, he could not make it." Defendants refused to make a further reduction, but it was finally agreed that the lease should be terminated and that defendants would purchase certain equipment from plaintiff. The parties entered into a written agreement on March 11, 1929, the pertinent portion of the agreement reading as follows: "The above lease on Southgate Garage & Service Station, is hereby mutually and agreeably terminated this date, and the Lessor, H. J. Krogh, further agrees to pay the Lessee, J. A. Giddens, the sum of five hundred dollars ($500.00) for the personal property of the Lessee, J. A. Giddens, which is listed below, and now located on said premises. * * *" After unsuccessfully endeavoring to raise the $500, defendants on April 10, 1929, gave plaintiff an installment note for that amount, payment of which was finally completed on August 10, 1929. Neither during the negotiations of the parties nor at the time they signed the agreement providing for the termination of the lease and the purchase of the equipment was any mention made of the $1,000 deposit. Nor was it mentioned thereafter at the time of signing the $500 note or any other time until September, 1929, about one month after the last installment on the note had been paid. The original lease provided for interest on the $1,000 payable monthly. This interest was paid by defendants up to February 1, 1929, but not thereafter and no demand was subsequently made for interest or for principal until written demand upon defendants was made by plaintiff's attorney on September 10, 1929.

It appears to have been conceded in the trial court that any rights which appellant's assignors had with respect to the deposit passed to appellant on the assignment of the lease. It was further conceded that appellant and his assignors had performed all of the conditions of the lease up to the time of the agreement of March 11, despite the fact that for some time prior thereto, appellant had paid a smaller rental than that provided in the written lease under an oral agreement between the parties. In the trial court and on this appeal appellant had contended that the agreement of March 11, 1929, constituted a termination within the meaning of the original lease entitling him to the return of the $1,000 deposited with respondents. The record discloses that the trial court construed the agreement with reference to the surrounding circumstances and the course of dealing between the parties and concluded and found that the agreement was understood and intended to be a termination of all further rights and liabilities of the parties under the lease including the provision above quoted. In our opinion the trial court properly construed the agreement.

[2] Appellant argues that the language of that agreement is clear and free from doubt and "there therefore was no room nor any need for determining the intent of the parties by any other criterion than the language of the agreement itself." Standing alone the language of the agreement terminating the lease does appear perfectly clear but ordinarily such an agreement would terminate every right and liability of the parties under the lease. But the doubt which arises in the meaning of that language is caused by the very provision of the lease under which appellant claims to be entitled to the return of the money. Reading the lease and the agreement terminating the lease together, it is doubtful whether the latter was intended to terminate all of the rights and liabilities of the parties under the lease or whether it was intended to terminate all of those rights and liabilities save and except those claimed under the provision relating to the $1,000 deposit. Under such circumstances it was proper for the trial court to look beyond the terms of the instrument in arriving at the intention of the parties (6 Cal. Juris. p. 252, § 163); and to consider the surrounding circumstances (Civ. Code, § 1647; Code Civ. Proc. § 1860; 6 Cal. Juris. p. 294, § 180), and the course of dealing between the parties showing the meaning which the parties themselves placed upon the agreement. Cabrera v. Thannhauser & Co., 183 Cal. 604, 616, 192 P. 45; Mitau v. Roddan, 149 Cal. 1, 15, 84 P. 145, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 275.

The evidence shows that on the second occasion when appellant threatened to abandon the lease and "walk out," he was refused a second reduction in the rental. At that time the lease had twenty-six months to run and appellant's business was not a paying enterprise even with the rental at the reduced figure theretofore orally agreed to by respondents. He sought to terminate the lease and to sell his equipment to respondents, and after several days had elapsed respondents consented and signed the agreement of March 11. Appellant testified that before respondents had signed the agreement Mr. Krogh stated that "he would go down and get the money and bring it back and pay me and relieve me," but as Mr. Krogh was unable to get the money an installment note for $500 was finally accepted. Appellant vacated the premises and ceased paying rent. Respondents ceased paying interest on the $1,000. In speaking of the transactions to one of the witnesses appellant said "that he did not sell out; that he turned it back to Mr. Krogh." It is highly significant that no mention of the $1,000 deposit was made during any of the dealings of the parties over a period of several months. Under the evidence the trial court correctly concluded that the entire course of dealings between the parties both before and subsequent to the signing of the agreement showed that they intended that the execution of the agreement and the payment of $500 therein provided should terminate all of their obligations under the lease. Referring to the importance in cases of doubtful construction of the practical interpretation of agreements by parties as shown by their course of dealings, the court said in Mitau v. Roddan, supra, at page 15 of 149 Cal., 84 P. 145, 150: "Parties are far less liable to have been mistaken as to the intention of their contract during the period while harmonious and practical construction reflects that intention, than they are when subsequent differences have impelled them to resort to law, and one of them then seeks a construction at variance with the practical construction they have placed upon it. The law, however, recognizes the practical construction of a contract as the best evidence of what was intended by its provisions."

[3] Appellant further contends that the provision of the lease relating to the $1,000 deposit is invalid and that he is entitled to recover regardless of any failure to comply with the conditions of the lease and without reliance upon the termination agreement. He cites and relies upon Green v. Frahm, 176 Cal. 259, 168 P. 114; Knight v. Marks, 183 Cal. 354, 191 P. 531; Redmon v. Graham (Cal. Sup.) 295 P. 1031. Each of these cases involved a clause providing for a deposit as security and further providing for a forfeiture of the deposit in case of breach. These cases are authority for the proposition that the portion of the clause providing for a forfeiture is invalid; but as pointed out in Green v. Frahm, supra, at page 262 of 176 Cal., 168 P. 114, 115, that portion of the clause providing for a deposit as security is valid. Even if the clause in the present lease is construed as one providing for a deposit as security for the lease and not as a "flat consideration and compensation to the lessors for entering into this lease," the clause is nevertheless valid to that extent under the authorities cited by appellant. We therefore find no merit in this contention.

The judgment is affirmed.

PER CURIAM.

Plaintiff corporation, which has its principal place of business in Los Angeles, was at all times material to this case and until about January 25, 1926, a member of an unincorporated association of merchants known as the San Francisco Board of Trade (which will be hereinafter referred to as the board). For some time prior to the month of August, 1925, William R. Davis & Bro., Inc., a corporation (hereinafter called the defendant), had been engaged in the conduct of a department store on Mission street in San Francisco. On August 5, 1925, a meeting of the creditors of the defendant was held at the office of the board at San Francisco for the purpose of considering defendant's affairs. The creditors represented at the meeting consisted of both members and nonmembers of the board, and their claims comprised approximately 80 per cent. of defendant's indebtedness. At this meeting a committee, consisting of the representatives of both the members and nonmembers, was appointed. The committee proceeded to take an inventory of defendant's property, and negotiations commenced which resulted in an offer of settlement being made to the committee by the defendant of a sum sufficient to pay 40 per cent. of the claims of all its creditors. A majority of the committee recommended that the offer be accepted; and following meetings of the creditors held on various dates between November 10, 1925, and January 14, 1926, inclusive, but at which plaintiff was not represented, it was resolved to accept the offer. These amounts were in January, 1926, paid to each of the creditors except the plaintiff, and a sum equal to 40 per cent. of the latter's claim was deposited with the board. The plaintiff, whose claim amounted to $6,643.57, had on September 25, 1925, brought suit against defendant and attached. The attachment was later released upon security being given. On January 15, 1926, defendant answered plaintiff's complaint, alleging payment, the facts constituting this defense being that the committee had full power to bind the creditors and to enter into an agreement for a composition; that defendant offered to pay to the committee 40 per cent. of its entire indebtedness in cash, this being in full payment of its entire indebtedness and in full satisfaction of any and all liability of any stockholder, officer, or director of defendant; that the committee accepted the offer in full payment of all claims, including that of the plaintiff, and that the agreed sums were paid to and accepted by the plaintiff and the other creditors in full satisfaction of their claims.

On February 19, 1926, a complaint in intervention was filed by J. H. Newbauer & Co., for whom J. H. Newbauer was afterwards substituted, and Levi Strauss & Co. This complaint was on behalf of other members of the board than the plaintiff who were creditors of the defendant. It alleged that by the attachment suit plaintiff sought to obtain a preference over other members of the board, and that under the board's constitution and by-laws members who were creditors were entitled to share ratably with plaintiff in any recovery effected in its action. Plaintiff answered to the interveners' complaint, denied the construction placed upon the constitution and by-laws of the board, or that plaintiff sought to obtain a preference. As a special defense thereto plaintiff alleged, in substance, the facts of the transaction above set forth, and that before the present action was brought plaintiff caused an investigation to be made, and found that defendant's assets would yield a higher return to the creditors than the amount offered; that the committee was proceeding without proper investigation; that the proposed settlement was inequitable and fraudulent within the meaning of the constitution of the board and permitted a portion of defendant's assets to be reserved for distribution to its stockholders; that plaintiff conveyed this information to the board and protested the proposed settlement, but the latter and the creditors' committee notwithstanding consummated the settlement; that the administration of the matter by the board was inefficient and uneconomical and was concluded without the fullest or proper investigation.

The cause was first tried on the issues between the plaintiff and the defendant by a jury, and resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff. The action as between plaintiff and the interveners was then tried by the court without a jury, and was submitted and decided upon all the evidence adduced at the first trial with certain additional evidence. Thereafter the court, pursuant to its findings, rendered a judgment that interveners take nothing. No appeal was taken by the defendant, but the interveners have appealed from the judgment entered against them.

The court found in accordance with the allegations of plaintiff's answer to the complaint in intervention, and also against interveners' allegations that plaintiff sought to obtain a preference or advantage in the collection of its claim over other creditor members of the board, or that under the constitution or by-laws of the board the creditor members were entitled to share with plaintiff any sums recovered by it; also that assets of the defendant of the value of $112,000 were not applied on its indebtedness, but were distributed to its stockholders.

As grounds for the appeal it is contended that the trial court's construction of the constitution and by-laws was erroneous, and that the findings are unsupported by the evidence.

The facts disclosed by the evidence are as follows: The defendant commenced business in 1924; 300,000 shares of its preferred and 350,000 shares of its common stock were issued, and all the common stock except the qualifying shares was held by William R. and Harry C. Davis. The company fell into financial difficulties in May, 1925, when it called upon the Mercantile Trust Company for assistance, and this concern ultimately became a creditor to the extent of over $100,000. During May, 1925, a representative of the trust company became a member of defendant's board of directors and its treasurer, and continued his connection with defendant until July, 1925, when its affairs became so involved that he advised an application to the board for assistance. Certain of defendant's creditors were members of the board, and as above stated the first meeting of creditors was held on August 5, 1925. Creditors holding about 80 per cent. of the claims against defendant were represented at the meeting, and it was then resolved that the representatives of a committee consisting of certain creditors be sent to defendant's store "for the purpose of taking an inventory," and a letter from the board to the creditors on August 8, 1925, after reciting the appointment of the committee, stated that "representatives of this committee are taking inventory and preparing an accurate statement of the assets and liabilities"; also that "pending completion of this work and a definite arrangement with the creditors the net cash receipts are being impounded. This report when completed will be submitted to you together with its recommendations."

According to plaintiff's representative he was offered a position on the committee, and accepted, and was told that he would be notified of any further meetings of the committee. He was not made a member, and it was testified that with the exception of the above letter plaintiff received no notification from the board of any action by the committee until September 23, 1925. In the meantime, however, plaintiff, under date of September 10, 1925, had written the board requesting advice with regard to the condition of defendant's affairs, but received no reply.

The inventory was completed on August 31,

1925, the value placed upon defendant's assets, including cash on hand in the sum of $53,326, being a total of $327,326. The committee estimated the "realizable value" of the assets to be the sum of $210,000, stating in their report that "the estimated realizable values are arbitrary figures, and are made for the purpose of arriving at an approximation of the maximum recovery which may be expected." Defendant's liabilities, according to the minutes of a meeting of the committee held on September 1, 1925, at which time the report of the appraisers was considered, were estimated to be $366,000; and at this meeting it was stated by the chairman that after exact figuring the value of the merchandise had been placed at $177,000. At meetings of the committee held on September 14 and 16, 1925, various offers of settlement by defendant were considered, and finally the offer of 40 per cent. was made by defendant. This offer all the representatives of the members of the committee except the representative of the Mercantile Trust Company expressed themselves satisfied to accept, and on September 19, 1925, one Albert Baer deposited with the committee the sum of $10,000 with his accepted order for $92,548.65, the minutes of the committee reciting that these sums, with $57,750 or thereabouts then on hand, would be approximately the amount necessary to pay the 40 per cent. offered. It appears that the sum mentioned as being on hand was money collected on sales since the appointment of the creditors' committee, and was the "cash on hand" shown in the inventory.

No action in connection with the offer appears to have been taken by the board or the creditors until November, 1925; and in the meantime the defendant caused to be filed a notice which led to the commencement of the present suit. On September 23, 1925, there appeared in the McCord Daily Notification Sheet, a trade publication, the fact that defendant had filed a notice of its intention to sell to Albert Baer on September 25, 1925, its stock in trade in bulk, with its fixtures, furnishings, equipment, and outstanding accounts receivable. Plaintiff learned of this on the same day, and telegraphed the board asking information as to the proposed sale, and whether all claims would be paid in full, to which no reply was made. Plaintiff then communicated with a mercantile concern in San Francisco, which procured from the board a summary of the report made by the committee showing defendant's assets and liabilities, and the information that defendant proposed a 40 per cent. settlement with its creditors without assignment. On September 24, 1925, plaintiff's representative, accompanied by one Sugarman, who was engaged in the business of purchasing bankrupts' stocks, arrived in San Francisco from Los Angeles. They visited the office of the board, where Sugarman offered $177,000 for defendant's stock in trade, not including cash on hand or accounts receivable. The evidence supports the conclusion that Sugarman was ready, willing, and able to purchase and pay the amount offered. Moreover, it shows that before bringing suit plaintiff protested to the attorney for the board that the proposed settlement was not for the best interests of the creditors, but was told that, should any action be brought to prevent consummation of the transfer to Baer, "the case would be immediately thrown into bankruptcy and the forty per cent settlement forced through regardless," it being further stated by the board's representative that there had been no assignment by defendant to the board, and that the latter consequently had nothing to sell.

Sugarman's offer being refused, and the plaintiff, being dissatisfied with the amount of the offer of settlement, in order to protect itself against the proposed sale to Baer, brought suit on its claim and attached.

During the negotiations for a settlement, defendant's officers had been endeavoring to find a purchaser for the store. Several concerns were approached, including the firm of Whitthorne & Swan, who ultimately became the buyers. On September 18, 1925, said William R. Davis and Harry C. Davis entered into a contract with Baer, which recited that defendant had authorized the sale of its merchandise, outstanding accounts receivable, furniture, fixtures, and equipment to Baer for the sum of $108,000, and had directed a notice of sale thereof, as required by section 3440 of the Civil Code; and had further directed that such part of the above sum as might be necessary for a settlement with all its creditors at 40 per cent. net cash, with expenses in the sum of $5,000, be paid to the board of trade. These amounts Baer agreed to pay, it being further provided that Baer should go into possession of the store and conduct a sale of the merchandise, he agreeing to resell the stock, etc., to the Davises or any one designated by them on or before January 15, 1926, for $15,000, with the sum of $108,000, with interest at 6 per cent. It was also agreed that Baer should be reimbursed for all expenses in conducting the sale and replenishing the stock, and credit upon the repurchase price all receipts from sales, and that, should the sums agreed to be paid to him be realized from the sales before December 1, 1925, the sum of $5,000 should be deducted from the repurchase price.

Pursuant to the contract Baer took possession on September 25, 1925, and continued in possession until about November 12, 1925, when a sale of the stock, fixtures, outstanding accounts, and good will was made to a representative of Whitthorne & Swan for $185,097.13. The notice of sale given under section 3440 of the Civil Code was dated November 4, 1925, and signed by defendant by William R. and Harry C. Davis and Albert Baer. At this time there was unpaid to Baer under his contract with the Davises the sum of $72,624.15, and this amount he received by check from Whitthorne & Swan, the balance of $112,472.98 being paid to defendant corporation, which in turn distributed to its preferred stockholders the sum of $77,211.36, the balance of $35,261.62 being received by William R. and Harry C. Davis, the owners of its common stock. In addition it appears that accounts receivable amounting to over $17,000 were retained by defendant, the buyers being of the opinion that they were not collectible. The estimated value of these, however, according to an application made to the corporation commissioner by defendant's officers in January, 1926, was about $9,000.

The evidence shows sufficiently that the Baer transaction was merely an advancement for the purpose of settlement with defendant's creditors, secured by a transfer of a part of its assets. As stated, no further meetings of the creditors or their committee appear to have been held until November 9, 1925, on which date there was a creditors' meeting, at which plaintiff was not represented. The attorney for the board called attention to the filing of the notice of intention to sell to Whitthorne & Swan, and also to the fact that the Mercantile Trust Company had levied an attachment on the store for $120,000. After considerable discussion with defendant's attorney regarding the terms and effect of the proposed sale it was resolved not to interfere therewith, and that the settlement offered by defendant be approved. The matter was further discussed on November 11, 1925, when it appeared that a payment had been made by defendant or the Davises to the Mercantile Trust Company and its attachment released, and on January 14, 1926, when the creditors again resolved to accept defendant's offer. Following this meeting, distribution to the creditors filing releases was made by the board.

[1] As shown, the board received from sales of defendant's stock in trade up to the time Baer took possession about $57,750, which was applied as part of the amount to be paid in settlement of the claims. The exact amount of the stock sold by Baer while in possession does not appear, as neither he nor the defendant was able to produce the accounts covering this period. It is a fair conclusion, however, from the fact that Baer under his contract was to be paid $108,000 with interest at 6 per cent. and the further sum of $10,000 in case of a repurchase before December 1, 1925, and that he was paid by Whitthorne & Swan the sum of $72,624.15 for his interest—the difference, as he testified, having been received from the sales—that the amount of stock sold by him amounted to nearly $50,000. After these amounts had been sold, Whitthorne & Swan paid for the balance of the stock with the accounts receivable, furniture and fixtures, and good will, the sum of $185,097.13; and this evidence tends to support the court's conclusion that an efficient and economical administration of defendant's estate would have resulted in the payment to the creditors of an amount greatly in excess of the sums received by them, and that defendant was permitted to dispose of its assets and effect a settlement without the fullest investigation as provided by the constitution of the board.

Article II of its constitution provided that "its objects shall be to consider all subjects pertaining to the interests of the wholesale merchants; to prevent settlements by insolvent debtors without the fullest investigation; to resist all inequitable and fraudulent settlements; * * * to bring about joint action in dealing with embarrassed or insolvent debtors and in the collection of debts other than in the usual course of business, and to secure efficient, economical and expeditious administrations of insolvent estates." The by-laws provided that members should be obligated, among other things, to commence suits against common debtors through the attorney of the association or his correspondents, and not to resort to any act, device, secret understanding, connivance, or collusion whereby they might obtain, claim, or seek to obtain any preference or advantage over each other in the collection or settlement of any claims or demands against common debtors. Further, that all payments received or recoveries effected in violation of these provisions should be for the ratable benefit of other creditor members; also that any member might procure the calling of meetings of member creditors of common debtors, at which a committee should be chosen to direct and control whatever action the creditors might agree upon; or, where the creditors referred the case to the committee, to take such action as might seem advisable. Another section provided that "in the administration of cases all questions respecting the action to be taken shall be determined by a majority of the committee, or, if the matter is before the creditors for decision, by members representing a majority in amount of the claims." As to compromises with common debtors, however, section 2 of the by-laws provided as follows: "The unanimous consent to compromises with common debtors shall be necessary, provided, however, that when a composition instrument or release in consideration of a transfer of assets shall have been signed by members representing ninety per cent. of the indebtedness owing to members, or shall have been signed by creditors representing ninety per cent. of the total indebtedness owing to members and nonmembers, the secretary shall sign the instrument or release for and on behalf of members whose claims singly and not collectively are less than $250.00, and such members shall be bound thereby."

Appellants concede that by the last section of the by-laws plaintiff could not be compelled to consent to a compromise of its claim by reason of the acceptance by the other members of defendant's offer; also that, while plaintiff might after the committee ceased to act in the matter maintain an action for the enforcement of its claim, it was its duty in the meantime to act jointly with the other creditors or not at all; and this notwithstanding a transfer of defendant's assets might render valueless a subsequent judgment.

[2-4] As urged by appellants, the constitution and by-laws of the board constituted a contract between its members and in their relation to the association. Hogan v. Pacific Endowment League, 99 Cal. 248, 33 P. 924; Dingwall v. Amalgamated Ass'n, etc., 4 Cal. App. 565, 88 P. 597. The by-laws, however, contain no specific requirement that a creditor member who is not bound to compromise with a debtor shall refrain from action pending the satisfaction of the claims of his fellow members who enter into such an arrangement. And whatever the obligation of a member who joined with others in actions against common debtors, or to abide by the decision of other creditor members or their committee in ordinary cases, where, as here, the other members do not wish to sue, and resolve upon a course which admittedly the plaintiff was not bound to follow, no reasonable construction of the by-laws supports the conclusion that his right of action was suspended pending payment of the claims of the other creditors. The by-laws should be given a reasonable construction (14 Cor. Jur., Corporations, § 439, p. 350); and to give them the effect contended for by appellants where it is clear that the other creditors were not prejudiced by plaintiff's action, or where the debtor would thus be permitted to make away with assets largely in excess of the amount necessary to meet appellants' claims, and as a reasonable probability render fruitless any judgment recovered by plaintiff after the payment of these claims, would work a manifest injustice, a result which the language of the by-laws does not require.

We are satisfied that the trial court correctly construed the constitution and by-laws of the board; that its conclusions that the plaintiff did not resort to any act whereby it obtained or sought to obtain any preference or advantage over its fellow members within the meaning of the by-laws, and that the committee proceeded without the full investigation of the condition of defendant's affairs contemplated by the constitution, were fully sustained; and that plaintiff under all the circumstances shown was justified in bringing and maintaining its action.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

1. Municipal corporations ⇨185(6).

Notice of discharge of police officer for "misconduct and violation of rules and regulations" held sufficient under charter without being stated in language of indictment (Oakland City Charter, § 81).

Oakland City Charter, § 81, provided that all persons holding positions in the classified civil service should be subject to removal from office for misconduct, incompetency, or failure to perform their duties under or observe the rules and regulations of the department or office.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨185(6).

Notice of discharge of police officer for "misconduct and violation of rules and regulations" held sufficient under civil service rules.

Civil service rules provided that, when an employee in the classified service of the city was discharged for any cause from which he has a right to appeal to the civil service board, the commissioner should cause a written notice to be served on the affected employee, such notice to set forth in general the cause for discharge.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨185(14).

Reinstatement of civil service employee not appealing from order of discharge as provided for by charter held unauthorized (Oakland City Charter, § 82).

Oakland City Charter, § 82, provided that any person discharged might within five days from the making by the commissioner of the order discharging him appeal therefrom to the civil service board. The employee took no appeal, but, after six years' acquiescence, he applied to be, and was, reinstated.

Mandamus proceeding by Joseph M. Enright against Harry G. Williams, as Auditor of the City of Oakland. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Myron Harris, Leo A. Sullivan, and John Jewett Earle, all of Oakland, for appellant.

C. Stanley Wood, City Atty., and Homer W. Buckley, Deputy City Atty., both of Oakland, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J.

Claiming to be a member of the police department of the city of Oakland, the plaintiff applied to the trial court for a writ of mandamus commanding the defendant as auditor to draw his warrant in payment of two salary claims. His application was denied. He made a motion for a new trial, and the motion was denied, and he has appealed from the judgment.

Plaintiff set forth a cause of action to recover two salary claims as a police officer. The defendant as auditor filed an answer denying that the plaintiff was a police officer during the period within which the alleged claims arose. He also set forth certain affirmative defenses. He pleaded the plaintiff's discharge from the service on January 3, 1924—six years before the alleged claims for salary arose. He also pleaded several statutes of limitation. The court made findings sustaining the defendant's claim that the plaintiff was discharged on January 3, 1924, and was not, thereafter, a member of the police department. If that finding was supported by the evidence, other points made in the briefs need not be discussed. The plaintiff vigorously contends that said finding is not supported. He claims that the civil service board duly adopted rules, one of which provided that when an employee is discharged he must be given notice thereof. Continuing the plaintiff claims he was not given any notice. The defendant replies that he was, and that the court not only so found the fact to be, but went further and made a finding that the notice was in writing in the form of a letter which is set forth in the findings, as follows:

"January 3, 1924.

"Mr. Joseph M. Enright, Assistant Inspector of Police, Oakland Police Department, Oakland, California.

"Dear Sir: After analyzing the transcript of testimony of the preliminary hearing held at Martinez, Contra Costa County, California, December 4, 1923, in the matter of charges against you, and after careful consideration of the facts of the case and thorough discussion of the same with the Chief of Police, I have come to the conclusion that for the best interests of the Police Department you should be removed from your position therein.

"Therefore, this is to notify you that the order of suspension made on October 12, 1923, is this day terminated and you are hereby discharged from your position of Assistant Inspector in the Oakland Police Department for misconduct and violation of the rules and regulations of said department.

"Yours very truly, Frank Colbourn,
"Commissioner of Public Health and Safety."
(Italics ours.)

[1-3] Section 81 of the Charter of the City of Oakland provides: "All persons holding positions in the classified civil service shall be subject * * * to removal from office or employment, by the commissioner in whose department they are employed * * * for misconduct, incompetency or failure to perform their duties under or observe the rules and regulations of the department or office. * * *" At this time we pause to remark that the grounds of the discharge of the plaintiff, as stated in the above letter, are clearly within the provisions of the law just quoted, and that the law did not require the specific charge to be stated in the exact language of an indictment. Andrews v. King, 77 Me. 224, and Lindblom v. Doherty, 102 Ill. App. 14. This is particularly true as to the statute we are considering. The charter does not expressly require a trial either before or after a discharge. If no trial is to be had, then there is no object in placing of record any harsh accusations against one who is so unfortunate as to be discharged. But the plaintiff cites section 3, rule VII, enacted by the civil service board, and claims the letter did not comply with said section. That section provides as follows: "When an employee in the classified service of the city is * * * discharged * * * for any cause from which he has a right to appeal to the Civil Service Board, the Commissioner * * * shall within twenty-four hours after the making of the order cause a written notice to be served on the affected employee, said notice to set forth in general the cause for the * * * discharge * * * and the day of the month and the year when same takes effect. * * *" A comparison discloses that the rule does not purport to require the notice to state the specific elements of the offense, but says the notice will "set forth in general the cause." If and when a discharged employee is dissatisfied with the order of discharge, he is given a full and complete remedy. Section 82 of the charter provides: "Any person * * * discharged * * * may within five days from the making by the Commissioner * * * of the order * * * discharging him * * * appeal therefrom to the Civil Service Board, which shall fully hear and determine the matter. The accused shall be entitled to appear personally, and to have counsel and a public hearing. The finding and decision of the Board shall be certified to the official from whose order the appeal is taken, and shall forthwith be enforced and followed by him." The plaintiff took no appeal, but after about six years of acquiescence he applied to be, and was, reinstated. But, as we have shown, the plaintiff was legally discharged and his purported reinstatement was unauthorized.

The defendant contends that section 3 of rule VII enacted by the civil service board conflicts with section 81 of the charter of the city of Oakland and is therefore void. While we have treated it as valid, we do not wish to be understood as expressing any opinion on the subject. Much can be said both for and against the validity. We prefer to wait until a time when the subject can be more fully argued.

[4] When the plaintiff first presented his claim, it was allowed by the council, but it was rejected by the defendant. Thereafter the claim was allowed by a four-fifths vote of the council. This procedure was in accordance with section 122 of the charter. The plaintiff contends that the second allowance was in its nature final. The contention may not be sustained. The point has been decided (Nightingale v. Williams, 70 Cal. App. 424, 233 P. 807) and is not an open one.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: NOURSE, P. J.; SPENCE, J.

Rehearing Denied July 31, 1931.

Mandamus ☞60.

Mandamus to require court to issue citation for alleged contempt, relating to orders contained in court's judgment, in serving and filing notice of intention to move court to set action for trial, held properly denied, since not constituting claim or assertion of interest, title, or equity in violation of injunction contained in judgment.

Petition by B. D. McAlvay for a writ of mandate to the Superior Court in and for Los Angeles County and another.

Petition denied.

Harry M. Irwin, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM.

On petition for writ of mandate to require that respondent court issue its citation in a proceeding wherein certain persons are accused of an alleged contempt in relation to orders contained in a judgment of respondent court. This court being of the opinion that the act of the accused persons in serving and filing notice of intention to move the court to set for trial the action numbered 209683, mentioned and described in the petition herein, is not sufficient to constitute a claim or assertion of any interest, title, or equity in violation of the injunction contained in said judgment, it follows that the petition for writ of mandate should be, and the same is, denied.

HOUSER, J.

Defendant appeals from a judgment rendered against him in an action for damages for personal injuries.

The injuries sustained by plaintiff were the result of a collision between him personally and an automobile owned and operated by defendant at a time when defendant was backing his automobile a distance of twenty-six feet out of his private driveway across a public sidewalk on which plaintiff was a pedestrian.

The first question presented to this court for its determination is whether the trial court was justified in its conclusion that the acts of defendant in the premises were negligent. Among other facts adduced on the trial of the action appeared the following: Besides defendant, the automobile with which plaintiff collided contained four passengers, three of whom occupied the back seat. Although both immediately prior to the time when such persons became occupants of the automobile, as well as at some time very shortly after they entered the automobile and preceding the time when the accident occurred, each of them gave some attention to ascertain the fact whether any person was on the sidewalk in the vicinity of its intersection with the private driveway of defendant, none of them saw plaintiff, who was in plain and unobstructed view, in broad daylight, and approaching such intersection. The automobile "was going about as slow as a car could go; * * * just moving and that is about all; * * * couldn't possibly have been more than a mile or a mile and a half an hour. * * *"

The specific "care" taken by defendant to see that the automobile operated by him during its course of twenty-six feet should collide with no pedestrian who was using the sidewalk consisted of the fact (as testified by defendant) that his "head was out of the window, backing out; * * * not with the intention of looking up and down the street to see if anybody was there; * * * didn't particularly look for that purpose." No information was given to defendant by either of his passengers relative to the situation of plaintiff, nor did defendant request either of them "to see if the way was clear." As far as defendant could remember, no "warning" was given by him of the approach of his automobile to the intersection of the private driveway with the sidewalk.

[1, 2] It is well-settled law that in the use of a public sidewalk a pedestrian thereon has a superior right of way over an automobile attempting to cross the sidewalk, and that in crossing such sidewalk the driver of an automobile is obligated to use reasonable care to avoid injury to any pedestrian who then may be in the exercise of his preferential right to the use of such sidewalk.

[3] Considering the facts herein relative to the conduct of defendant immediately preceding the happening of the accident, it is apparent that he used no care as far as the particular safety of plaintiff was concerned. He neither saw plaintiff nor knew of his presence in the vicinity where the accident occurred. With reference to the manner in which the automobile of defendant was operated by him, as far as it had any relation to the prevention of injury to plaintiff, defendant might as well have closed his eyes during the time that he was backing his automobile out of his driveway. It was the legal duty of defendant to observe plaintiff's use of the sidewalk and, even to the point of entirely stopping the progress of the automobile, yield to plaintiff his superior right of way at such intersection. The evidence is conclusive not only that defendant did not see plaintiff at all, but that defendant took no care to avoid injuring plaintiff. It is apparent that the failure of defendant to see plaintiff, and thereupon to so operate the automobile as to avoid injury to him, clearly establishes defendant's negligence in the premises.

The second point urged by appellant as a sufficient reason for reversal of the judgment is that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and hence was precluded from a recovery of damages.

Relating to the conduct of plaintiff on the occasion in question, from testimony given by a witness on the trial of the action it appears that immediately prior to the happening of the accident plaintiff was on the sidewalk "walking with his head down—seemed to be looking down at his feet." When the witness first observed the automobile plaintiff was "about the middle of the driveway; * * * he was nervous and he didn't know just what to do; * * * he went forward just a little and then he went backward, * * * hesitating to decide just what to do; * * * his right shoulder was towards the car to a certain extent and he wasn't directly facing onto the car; he was kind of sideways. * * *" Plaintiff testified that he was going home from his work and was walking on the sidewalk on the opposite side of the street from that on which his home was located, and that: "I was walking on the sidewalk and when I got nearer to my home I looked on the other side, I thought probably some of my family would meet me, which they generally do, and at that time I was hit there. That is all I know."

Combining the salient features of the evidence relating to the asserted negligence of plaintiff, the problem presented to this court is whether, without being considered legally guilty of negligence contributing proximately to a collision between him and an automobile crossing a public sidewalk, a pedestrian thereon may, in broad daylight, and having a clear and unobstructed view, walk "with his head down—looking at his feet," and immediately preceding the accident, caused by curiosity on his part, or otherwise, look "on the other side" of the street.

[4-8] The law appears to be well established that when using a sidewalk in a residential district a pedestrian has a right to assume that at least no one not possessing an equal right to its use will do so without using due care to protect such pedestrian from injury. The sidewalk is a part of the street set apart for the use of pedestrians, and no other traveler or user of the public street is privileged to use the sidewalk adjacent thereto either to the exclusion of a pedestrian desiring to use the same, or in such manner as will render the sidewalk unsafe for the use of the pedestrian; in other words, although not entitled to an exclusive use of the sidewalk, the pedestrian is granted a preferential right to the use thereof to the extent that any other person who may use the same for a different purpose must do so subject to the superior right therein of the pedestrian by at least giving timely and appropriate notice or warning of his intention so to do, and then only with such safeguards to the pedestrian as will adequately and reasonably protect him from injury.

On the other hand, although the pedestrian is possessed of a preferential right in the use of the sidewalk, he may not exercise such right in an arbitrary or unreasonable manner, or without regard to the lesser right of other possible users of the sidewalk. The superior right of the pedestrian to the use of the sidewalk for the purpose of traveling thereon does not go to the extent of legally entitling him to ignore the inferior right of others to put the sidewalk or a portion thereof, to a different use. The pedestrian is obliged to recognize and to permit the use of the sidewalk by others, not only fellow pedestrians, but also by those who may desire to and do use the sidewalk for other legitimate purposes, among which is the crossing thereof by automobiles. And so it comes about that in the use of a sidewalk even by persons whose respective rights to such use are unequal one with the other, each of such persons is bound to take not only reasonable precautions to protect himself from injury, but as well to prevent injury to the other. Manifestly, in a thickly populated residential district in which at least by the owners of a majority of the homes an automobile is owned and operated, ordinarily necessitating the maintenance of a private driveway connecting the garage with the street on which the property of the owner thereof faces or fronts, ordinary care on the part of a pedestrian on a sidewalk to prevent his being injured by an automobile being backed out of such driveway would not be obvious where it appeared that the pedestrian was walking backward on the sidewalk, with his eyes blindfolded. On the other hand, even when about to cross a busy business thoroughfare, no positive duty rests upon a pedestrian to "stop, look and listen." Mann v. Scott, 180 Cal. 550, 554, 182 P. 281; Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 342, 208 P. 125, and authorities there respectively cited. Applicable to circumstances falling between such extremes of conduct may be found the elastic rule that the conduct of the average prudent person in similar circumstances is the guide for a determination of whether the pedestrian has been guilty of negligence which contributed proximately to the happening of the accident; and that the duty of determining whether the pedestrian has followed such a course conclusively rests with the jury; or, in its absence, with the trial judge. In the instant matter, with reference to the care exercised by plaintiff at the time in question and the legal consequences thereof, in part the trial judge expressed his views thereon in the following apt, if not legally correct, language: "A pedestrian using the sidewalk in his home neighborhood has a right of way over one who drives a vehicle across the same, and such pedestrian has the perfect right to assume that the sidewalk is safe for him to walk upon. Crawley v. Jermain, 218 Ill. App. 51. It cannot be claimed that it is want of ordinary care for a pedestrian, homeward bound at the end of a day's labors, traveling upon a familiar sidewalk, to fail to observe the comparatively silent moving of an automobile on a private driveway. He has the right to assume that that place of passage reserved for him as a pedestrian is safe, and that no one will back an automobile across it while he is on its course, without warning sufficient to attract his attention. It follows that even though such pedestrian be daydreaming, while traveling the sidewalk under such circumstances, and unconscious of all about him, excepting only those things which present an obstacle to his forward movement, or suddenly beat in upon his consciousness by reason of unusualness, he is not doing anything unusual, nor anything different from what countless others are doing under similar circumstances. It is the common experience of tired humanity when going home after a day's work to become immersed in thought and oblivious to one's surroundings, when traveling in a place of recognized and known safety, and to so travel long distances, without conscious knowledge of one's immediate surroundings, guided safely and correctly by the subconscious mind. And therein lies no want of ordinary care, as it represents the ordinary conduct of humanity under similar circumstances."

[9] It follows that on competent and material evidence, the trial court having reached the conclusion that considering the law and the facts applicable to the instant case plaintiff was not guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to the accident in question, this court is bound thereby.

[10] Appellant raises the further objection to the judgment that it was excessive in amount; but since on an examination of the record herein, and particularly that portion thereof which relates to the injury sustained by plaintiff, it appears that the judgment was not so large as to indicate that it resulted from passion or prejudice on the part of the trial judge, the judgment cannot be disturbed by this tribunal on account of the amount of damages which was awarded to plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Stearns, Luce & Forward, of San Diego, for appellant.

Adam Thompson, Renwick Thompson, and Gordon Thompson, all of San Diego, for respondents.

Roy Downs, in pro. per.

ALLEN, Justice pro tem.

The first of these two actions grew out of the ordinary automobile accident in which the plaintiff Rosebelle King, a minor, was severely injured and was awarded judgment against both defendants. In the second case the plaintiff Lucile H. King, the mother of Rosebelle King, recovered judgment against both defendants for medical and hospital expenses. The two cases were by stipulation of all parties consolidated and tried together. From these judgments defendant Ralph Wilson urges this appeal, the defendant Roy Downs not appealing.

[1] The first error assigned by appellant is that at the time of the trial he was under the age of 21 years and that no guardian ad litem was appointed in said action in his behalf. The minority of defendant Wilson was not brought to the attention of the court until the hearing of a motion for new trial. The record in this case discloses that the defendant was past 20 years of age at the time of the trial and had no guardian ad litem appointed as provided by the code.

The first question which naturally arises is: Does such failure to have a guardian ad litem appointed go to the jurisdiction of the court? This question was presented in the case of Johnston v. Southern Pacific Co., 150 Cal. 535, 89 P. 348, 11 Ann. Cas. 841. At page 539 of 150 Cal., 89 P. 348, 350, it is said: "It has long and consistently been held in this state that a failure to appoint a guardian ad litem, or to sue by one, while irregular is only that, that the defect is not a jurisdictional one, and therefore the judgment is not void." See, also, In re Cahill, 74 Cal. 52, 15 P. 364; Foley v. California Horseshoe Co., 115 Cal. 184, 196, 47 P. 42, 56 Am. St. Rep. 87. So far as we have been able to find, this is the last word on this point which is decisive thereof.

[2] The most that can be said is that the failure to appoint a guardian ad litem was an irregularity. Was its irregularity then such as would affect the substantial rights of the minor and authorize the granting of a new trial? Section 657, Code of Civil Procedure, pertains to when new trials may be granted. Subdivision 1 thereof is as follows: "Irregularity in the proceedings of the court, jury or adverse party, or any order of the court or abuse of discretion by which either party was prevented from having a fair trial."

Before a judgment is reversed under this paragraph, it must be made to appear that the irregularity is such as to affect the substantial rights of the moving party. The facts as disclosed by the record fail to show any irregularities by the court which would justify such reversal. The defendant Wilson, being past 20 years of age, came into court by the filing of his answer to the complaint, announced ready, and proceeded to trial with an attorney; sat all through the trial with the knowledge of his nonage; did not disclose this fact to the court nor to his attorney; and then, when judgment was rendered against him, for the first time advised the court on his motion for a new trial that he was a minor. In other words, had the jury found in his favor nothing would have been said as to his age, but since it found against him he now seeks to get out from under the judgment by reason thereof. Such actions are most reprehensible, to say the least. He was willing, by silence, to deceive the court. Such actions should not be countenanced by the court to the extent of declaring it such an irregularity as to warrant a new trial.

The courts in many jurisdictions have held that the failure to appoint a guardian ad litem must affect the substantial rights of the infant. Harris v. Bennett, 160 N. C. 339, 76 S. E. 217; Grauman, etc., v. Krienitz, 142 Wis. 556, 126 N. W. 50; Martin v. Gwynn, 90 Ark. 44, 117 S. W. 754. What loss of substantial rights did the defendant in this case suffer? He was ably represented by counsel in every stage of the proceedings. A trial was had by jury, before whom he submitted his evidence, and his case is ably presented on appeal. Wherein are his rights affected and what different judgment would have been rendered, had he been represented by a guardian ad litem? None is pointed out. It is said in Childs v. Lanterman, 103 Cal. 387, 390, 37 P. 382, 383, 42 Am. St. Rep. 121: "Although it is provided in section 372, Code Civ. Proc., that, when an infant is a party, he must appear either by his general guardian or by a guardian ad litem appointed by the court, yet a judgment rendered against an infant in which no guardian ad litem has been appointed is not for that reason void (citing cases); and a judgment rendered against him in an action in which he has appeared by an attorney will be upheld as fully as though he had appeared in person (Barber v. Graves, 18 Vt. 290; Marshall v. Fisher, 1 Jones [46 N. C.] 111; Townsend v. Cox, 45 Mo. 401)."

The failure to be represented by a guardian was no such error as would warrant the court in reversing the trial court on this ground.

[3] The next complaint charges that counsel for plaintiff is guilty of unprofessional conduct in placing before the jury the fact that defendant Wilson was covered by insurance. During the trial the attorney for the plaintiff Rosebelle King questioned her relative to a conversation she had with defendant while she was in the hospital. In answer to the question, "Well, do you remember any particular conversation you had with him on the second or third time you talked with him?" the plaintiff answered: "Well, I remember before he left the hospital that he phoned. He had been talking quite often and Dr. O'Neill asked him to quit. It was bothering me. I couldn't hold the phone, and before he left he phoned and said he was sorry it all happened but he had insurance to pay for everything." After the answer counsel for defendant promptly moved to have the answer stricken out and urged the court to declare a mistrial. The jury was excused, and after some argument by counsel the court sustained the objection and admonished the jury to disregard it. Appellant claims that plaintiff's attorney knew what the answer to the question would be, as the same answer was made by the same witness in her deposition taken a few months before the trial and that such error could not be cured by any admonition given the jury. The rule laid down by this court is that when an answer is coupled with an acknowledgment of liability, prejudicial error cannot be assigned. In the case of Rowe v. Rennick (Cal. App.) 297 P. 603, 607, the court said: "We think it sufficient to establish the following rules: First, that where the answer disclosing the insurance is inextricably coupled with an acknowledgment of liability, the answer is admissible; second, that, where it appears from the testimony in the record that no verdict could have been rendered for the defendant, the admission of testimony relative to insurance is not alone sufficient to authorize a reversal of the judgment. It must further appear that the judgment returned was the result of passion or prejudice."

[4] We think there might well have been added one other rule where such evidence would be proper, and that is when the evidence is relative to some material issue properly in the case. In automobile damage cases, where it becomes a material issue for plaintiff to prove that the automobile causing the injury was owned by defendant, many courts admit evidence that the defendant made a report to the casualty company wherein he admitted ownership of the automobile. Upon the same issue it has been held competent for plaintiff merely to show that liability insurance had been taken out by the defendant upon the automobile in question. This evidence was offered on the theory of a declaration against interest and therefore comes within the rule stated. Where the evidence does not come within this rule, we think the question propounded to plaintiff would be error.

The remaining question for decision is: Did the answer tend to disclose acknowledgment of responsibility, and would its admission be such as to create a prejudicial error that would warrant a reversal of the judgment of the trial court? It will be noted that the answer purported to relate a conversation had with defendant some time after the accident and was as hereinbefore set out. The last four words of the answer, "to pay for everything," would lead us to conclude that no other inference could logically be drawn therefrom and would constitute such an acknowledgment of responsibility and declaration against interest. This being true, such evidence was admissible. McPhee v. Lavin, 183 Cal. 264, 269, 191 P. 23; Nichols v. Nelson, 80 Cal. App. 590, 596, 252 P. 739; Maberto v. Wolfe, 106 Cal. App. 202, 289 P. 218; Lahti v. McMenamin, 204 Cal. 415, 268 P. 644. In an action where there was evidence that a defendant driver of an automobile had made a statement shortly after the accident which was reasonably capable of being construed as an admission of his responsibility for the accident, the trial court did not err in permitting counsel for defendant to introduce in evidence the entire statement, even though it revealed the fact that the defendant driver carried indemnity insurance. Harju v. Market Street Ry. Co. (Cal. App.) 290 P. 788. There would be no prejudicial error in admitting the testimony in question.

[5] The final error urged by appellant is that there is not sufficient evidence to justify the verdict. We have gone over the record and find that there is a substantial conflict in the testimony. Where there is a conflict in the testimony, it is for the jury to judge the credibility of the witnesses and the weight and effect to be given their testimony. The jury having decided this fact, the same will not be disturbed by this court.

For the reasons stated herein the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

SHANNON v. FLEISHHACKER et al. *
Civ. 7843.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Aug. 24, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 23, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 23, 1931.

1. Officers ⇨119.

Plaintiff suing public officers for alleged negligence held required to bring complaint within statute imposing liability on officers (St. 1923, p. 675; St. 1919, p. 756, § 1).

2. Officers ⇨116.

Statute imposing liability on public officers for injuries sustained under specified circumstances must be construed as limitation upon officers' liability (St. 1919, p. 756, § 1).

3. Statutes ⇨224.

Statutes respectively imposing liability on public officials and on municipal corporations for injuries sustained under specified circumstances must be construed together as stating rule of procedure for enforcement of liability therefor (St. 1923, p. 675; St. 1919, p. 756, § 1).

4. Officers ⇨119.

Plaintiff suing public officials for wrongful death, having failed to plead or prove that deceased was using public property with due care, failed to make case for jury (St. 1919, p. 756, § 1).

5. Officers ⇨119.

Presumption that one exercises due care for his safety is not sufficient in actions against public officers to satisfy statutory requirement that plaintiff plead and prove exercise of due care in use of public property causing injury (St. 1919, p. 756, § 1).

6. Municipal corporations ⇨1016.

Officers ⇨119.

States ⇨191(1).

State, its political subdivisions or officials, may not be sued for damages for alleged negligence without state's consent.

7. Municipal corporations ⇨1016.

Officers ⇨119.

States ⇨191(1).

Legislature may impose reasonable restrictions on actions against state, its political subdivisions or officials, for injuries (St. 1919, p. 756, § 1).

8. Municipal corporations ⇨744.

Park commissioners, being agents of public corporation, held not liable to third persons for negligence of subagents or coservants (Civ. Code, § 2351).

9. Master and servant ⇨95.

Fifteen year old boy, employed to take tickets at Ferris wheel and to start and stop machine, held not employed in dangerous work in violation of Child Labor Law (St. 1919, pp. 415, 416, §§ 1, 4).

10. Master and servant ⇨96(1).

That 15 year old boy was employed at Ferris wheel without permit from school authorities held not proximate cause of injury sustained when minor disobeyed instructions and went to place of danger; hence no liability resulted (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 7487).

11. Appeal and error ⇨1056(1).

Exclusion of evidence showing dangerous character of Ferris wheel held nonprejudicial to plaintiff suing for minor employee's death (St. 1919, pp. 415, 416, §§ 1, 4).

Evidence disclosed that there was no controversy but that the Ferris wheel at which the minor worked, as a whole, was a dangerous piece of machinery within meaning of St. 1919, pp. 415, 416, §§ 1, 4, Deering's Gen. Laws, 1923, Act 3625, §§ 1, 4, but all the evidence demonstrated that place where deceased was employed was free from danger, and that his death was caused solely by his disobedience of orders in going into a place where he was not employed.

12. Appeal and error ☞1056(1).

Excluding evidence showing other minors had been employed in park system with officers' knowledge held nonprejudicial to plaintiff suing for minor's death, in absence of showing of causal connection between deceased's injuries and failure to obtain working certificate from school authorities (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 7487).

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Nettle Shannon against Herbert Fleishhacker and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Everette C. McKeage, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Humphrey, Searls, Doyle & MacMillan, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued for damages for the death of her minor son, who was employed in the playfield of the Golden Gate Park operated by the city and county of San Francisco. The defendants are the park commissioners, the park superintendent, the superintendent of playgrounds, and the manager of the "Fleishhacker Playfield." The cause was tried with a jury. At the close of plaintiff's case the trial judge granted defendants' motion for a nonsuit. The appeal is presented on type-written transcripts.

The deceased was a boy of fifteen years, who was employed on Saturdays and holidays in and about the "Fleishhacker Playfield." On May 19, 1929, he was assigned to take tickets at the "Ferris Wheel" operated in said playfield and to start and stop the machine and to open and close the gates to permit the children to enter and leave the cars or carriages on the wheel. The machine was started and stopped by a lever located at the entrance gate where deceased was stationed. The operating machinery was inclosed in a shed on the opposite side of the wheel from the entrance gate, and this shed, as well as the wheel, was surrounded by a high wire fence. A man by the name of Hancock had direct charge of the operation of the machine with the special duty of oiling and greasing its parts and of performing such mechanical work as became necessary. The deceased was frequently instructed not to enter the inclosure where the machinery was housed and not to attempt to oil, grease, or repair any of its parts. On the day of his death he asked defendant Brandon for a rag, saying he wanted to tighten a grease cup. He was told to leave the grease cup alone and to report to Hancock. He asked Hancock for a rag and Hancock told him to leave the grease cup alone and that he (Hancock) would attend to it. Shannon disregarded these instructions, entered the fenced inclosure, and climbed around behind the wheel while it was in motion. He was struck on the back of the head by some portion of the wheel and died soon after.

In the final analysis appellant bases her cause of action upon the theory that all the defendants were guilty of negligence per se because the deceased minor was employed in violation of the Child Labor Law and the compulsory school attendance law. The appeal is argued on the theory that if a violation of either of these statutes is shown a case of negligence per se is made which should have gone to the jury. However, we are not satisfied that the decision should rest upon this ground. By the Act of June 13, 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 675, Deering's Gen. Laws, 1923, Act 5619), the Legislature changed the entire policy of the state in regard to actions for injuries sustained upon public property. This act made counties, municipalities, and school districts liable for the negligence of their officers in certain instances and prescribed the method for enforcing such liability. Prior to this act no action would lie against a municipality for injuries suffered in connection with the operation of a municipal playground. Kellar v. City of Los Angeles, 179 Cal. 605, 607, 178 P. 505. Therefore, by the Act of May 18, 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 756, Deering's Gen. Laws, 1923, Act 5618), the Legislature declared the conditions under which public officers, as distinguished from the public corporation, were liable for such injuries. The pertinent provisions of this act are that: "No officer of any district, town, city * * * shall be liable for any damage or injury to any person * * * resulting from the defective or dangerous condition of any public street * * * or property, unless it shall first appear: (1) That the injury sustained was the direct and proximate result of such defective or dangerous condition, (2) that such officer had notice of such defective or dangerous condition, (3) * * * (4) * * * and then only when it shall further appear that such damage or injury was sustained while such public * * * building, work or property was being carefully used, and that due care was being exercised to avoid the danger. * * *" Section 1. The act was declared not to be an enlargement of the duty or liability of any public officer.

[1] Having elected to sue the officers rather than the municipal corporation, it was incumbent upon appellant to bring her complaint within the terms of the statute which imposed a liability upon those officers. Three acts of negligence were specified in her complaint—the violation of the two employment statutes and negligence in the maintenance of the grounds which was stated in the following language: That the respondents “negligently maintained said Ferris wheel and carelessly and negligently permitted said Ferris wheel to be operated, due to the fact that said Ferris wheel was not equipped with, at the time of its installation or afterwards or at all, a guard to protect persons from coming in contact with the revolving lower part of said Ferris wheel.” Two essential elements of the statute are lacking: Respondents’ knowledge of the alleged defective condition of the property, and the exercise of due care on the part of deceased. In the recent case of Gorman v. County of Sacramento, 92 Cal. App. 656, 668, 263 P. 1083, 1088, the District Court of Appeal say, in reference to this statute: “An examination of the 1919 act shows that a person suing an officer for negligence has not only to plead, but also to prove, that the injury and damage complained of was sustained while such public street * * * or property was being carefully used, and that due care was being exercised to avoid damage due to such condition, or, in other words, this act changes the general rule that the burden of showing contributory negligence is upon the defendant, and requires an affirmative showing on the part of the plaintiff that he was using the road, bridge, or street with due care.”

The “Pridham Act” (Stats. 1911, p. 1115) contained the same language and was given the same interpretation in Ham v. County of Los Angeles, 46 Cal. App. 148, 160, 189 P. 462, as is found in the Gorman Case. And to the same effect is McCain v. City of Oakland, 52 Cal. App. 639, 642, 199 P. 841. The 1911 statute was held unconstitutional upon other grounds in Brunson v. City of Santa Monica, 27 Cal. App. 89, 148 P. 950. The 1919 statute was enacted to cure this constitutional defect and expressly repealed the 1911 statute. In Moore v. Burton, 75 Cal. App. 395, 402, 242 P. 902, 905, the District Court of Appeal, after quoting with approval the language of the Ham opinion upon this phase of the case, say: “This provision having been substantially re-enacted by the repealing act, and having been construed as above, the same construction may reasonably, and on the authority of the case cited should be, given to the later statute.”

[2-4] In the three cases cited—the Ham Case, the Burton Case, and the Gorman Case

—petitions for hearings were denied by the Supreme Court, and, finding no authority to the contrary, we may take them as stating the controlling rule of law in proceedings of this character. As the statute expressly declares that it is not to be construed as enlarging the duty or liability of any public officer, we must construe it as a limitation upon the liability of such officers for injuries incurred under the circumstances therein enumerated. And this construction becomes the more sound since the enactment of Act 5619 in 1923, which for the first time imposed a liability upon the public corporation for such injuries and which so closely follows the 1919 act in its language as to indicate that the Legislature had that act before it when the later one was enacted. These two acts should, therefore, be read together as stating the statutory rule of procedure for the enforcement of liability for injuries incurred under the circumstances therein mentioned, so that, if the injured party seeks recovery against the public corporation, he must proceed under the 1923 act, and, if he seeks to hold the public officers to their personal liability, he must proceed under the 1919 act (except in the limited cases mentioned in section 1 of the act of 1923). The appellant having failed to plead or prove that the deceased was using the “property” with due care, she has utterly failed to make a case to go to the jury.

[5] The only answer suggested to the foregoing is that, under the rule of Smellie v. Southern Pac. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 299 P. 529, the law presumes that the deceased exercised due care for his safety and hence any evidence of negligence on his part would merely create a conflict which should go to the jury. These considerations were before the court in the Ham Case, where it was said that to so hold “is to offset by a legal presumption the declaration of the statute that the burden is on the plaintiff in such cases to show that due care was used by him.” Page 161 of 46 Cal. App., 189 P. 462, 468. To this it might be added that to so hold is to render that portion of the statute nugatory because, if the plaintiff can rely upon that presumption alone, there would be no need of his pleading or proving due care. The proper rule, as we understand the decisions, is that this presumption, which is available to the plaintiff generally, is not sufficient, in actions brought under this statute, to satisfy the demand that the plaintiff must plead and prove the exercise of due care in the use of the public property causing the injury.

[6, 7] There is a justifiable reason for this distinction. Public property is open to the use of the public generally; and the general use of such property is a constant source of danger to the public. To encourage the exercise of due care in the use of public property, the Legislature might well limit the public liability to those who exercise such care. And, as the state and its political subdivisions and officials may not be sued for damages in such cases without the consent of the state, the Legislature may properly impose such reasonable restrictions upon actions of this character.

[8] There is another point of difficulty which, like the foregoing, has not been discussed in the briefs, but which effectively stops the case in so far as the respondents, the park commissioners, are concerned. The park commissioners were all officers and agents of the city and county of San Francisco, a public corporation. The park superintendent, his assistant, and the manager of the playfield were all subagents employed in the service of the common principal. As original agents the park commissioners are not liable to a third person for the negligence of their subagents, or coservants. Section 2351, Civil Code, provides: " * * * The original agent is not responsible to third persons for the acts of the sub-agent." In Hilton v. Oliver, 204 Cal. 535, 539, 269 P. 425, 426, 61 A. L. R. 297, the Supreme Court, having this question before it, say: "The rule laid down or approved by the decisions in this state is that an agent is not in general liable to third persons for the misfeasance or malfeasance of a subagent employed by him in the service of his principal, unless he is guilty of negligence in the appointment of such subagent, or directs or authorizes the particular wrongful act of the subagent, or improperly co-operates in the latter's acts or omissions. Dobbins v. City of Arcadia, 44 Cal. App. 181, 186 P. 190; Baisley v. Henry, 55 Cal. App. 760, 204 P. 399. The defendant trustees can be held liable under the facts shown herein only by reason of the application of the doctrine of respondeat superior. This doctrine has no application as between a public officer and his subordinates, who are likewise in the public service, unless the public officer has directed or countenanced the tortious acts to be done, or has co-operated therein. Michel v. Smith, 188 Cal. 199, 205 P. 113; Whiteman v. Irrigation District, 60 Cal. App. 234, 212 P. 706." This general principle is recognized in Act 5619, where it is provided that supervisors, city trustees, and school trustees are not liable for the negligence of any appointee or employee unless they knew that such appointee or employee was inefficient and incompetent to perform the services delegated to such.

In so far as the respondents the park superintendent and the superintendent of playgrounds are concerned, there is neither pleading nor proof that they had any power or duty to appoint the manager of the playfield, or to employ the deceased, or that they had any knowledge of his employment, or of the alleged defective condition of the Ferris wheel. The allegation is that the deceased was employed by Brandon as manager of the playfield. But Brandon was also an employee, or agent, of the public corporation, and, as such, a coservant of these other respondents. Though he may not have been a "sub-agent" of the park superintendent or of his assistant within the terms of section 2351, Civil Code, he was their subordinate, or "co-agent." It would seem, therefore, that the same rule would apply to these respondents as was applied in Michel v. Smith, 188 Cal. 199, 201, 205 P. 113, 114, where the Supreme Court held that a sergeant of police was not responsible for the negligence of a member of his squad, saying: "A public officer is not responsible for the acts or omissions of subordinates properly employed by or under him, if such subordinates are not in his private service, but are themselves servants of the government, unless he has directed such acts to be done, or has personally co-operated therein. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 382; Story on Agency, 319; Robertson v. Sichel, 127 U. S. 507-515, 32 L. Ed. 203, 8 S. Ct. 1286; see, also, Rose's U. S. Notes." Similar holdings have been made in relation to special police officers employed by private persons in Redgate v. Southern Pacific Co., 24 Cal. App. 573, 581, 141 P. 1191, and Maggi v. Pompa, 105 Cal. App. 496, 499, 287 P. 982. There is here neither allegation nor proof that any of the other respondents directed Brandon to perform any of the acts complained of or that they "personally co-operated therein."

In the instant case the failure to plead the exercise of due care might have been excused if the appellant had made proof of that fact; but her proof is all one way—that the machinery was properly safeguarded and that the injury was caused solely by the disobedience by the deceased of the direct orders of his superiors. In this respect the case is analogous to Scott v. City of Long Beach (Cal. App.) 292 P. 664, a suit directly against the corporation under the statute of 1923. The District Court of Appeal affirmed a judgment for defendant, notwithstanding the jury's verdict for plaintiff, holding that plaintiff had not made a case of negligence within the terms of the statute.

For the reasons given the appellant wholly failed to make a case against any of the respondents, other than Brandon, as public officials or in their private capacities and, as to all those respondents, the nonsuit was properly granted.

[9] As to the respondent Brandon the allegation of the complaint being that he employed deceased in violation of the Child Labor Law and the Compulsory Education Law, a consideration of those acts becomes necessary. The provisions of the Child Labor Law (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 3625, St. 1919,

p. 415) upon which reliance is placed prohibit the employment of any minor under the age of sixteen years "in or in connection with any * * * place of amusement * * *" (section 1) except as may be provided by the provisions of the compulsory school attendance law. Section 4 of the act provides that: "No minor under the age of sixteen years shall be employed, permitted or suffered to work * * * oiling, wiping or cleaning machinery * * * or in proximity to any hazardous or unguarded belts, machinery or gearing, * * * or in any other occupation dangerous to the life or limb, or injurious to the health or morals of such child." This section lists twenty-four different kinds of machines and nineteen separate places of employment where such minors may not be employed and authorizes the bureau of labor statistics to list other places of employment which should be prohibited. Neither the machine nor the place of employment where the deceased met his death is banned by any of these specific regulations. All the evidence, without any shade of conflict, is that the deceased was engaged to perform a safe and nonhazardous duty in connection with a machine that was protected by every known safeguard. He was not employed to oil or clean any machinery and was not employed in proximity to any unguarded machinery or in any occupation dangerous to life, limb, health, or morals. Thus it is apparent that appellant was not employed in violation of this statute in so far as the machine he was hired to operate is concerned, first, because the Ferris wheel is not a machine listed in any of the regulations, and, second, because this machine was not "unguarded machinery," which is the only general regulation found in the act. All the evidence demonstrates that the wheel was guarded by every known safeguard and that the minor was explicitly directed not to go behind those guards. The exhibits which have been brought up with the transcript plainly show that if deceased had followed these instructions and had remained where he was employed to remain there could have been no possible chance for an injury. Negligence cannot therefore be predicated upon the mere employment of the minor to work the harmless lever of the machine and to take the tickets from the customers. As this was all he was employed to do, the fact that he disobeyed instructions and went over the guard to a place of danger has no relation to any liability of the respondents under the labor statute. To hold that a minor may not be employed in a place of safety because perchance he might disobey orders and wander into a place of danger would make the labor law ridiculous.

In so far as the statute relates to the place of employment, it is true that such minors may not be employed in any "place of amusement" without a permit from the school authorities as required by the Compulsory School Attendance Law. If it is negligence per se to employ a minor in such a place of employment without a working permit then appellant has a case. Otherwise not.

[10] This brings us to a discussion of the second point—the effect of the failure of the deceased to present a certificate to work from the school authorities. The Compulsory Education Law upon which appellant relies is the act of March 24, 1903 (Stats. 1903, p. 388, as amended, Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 7487). Though this act was repealed by the School Code adopted in 1929 (page 303) and its main provisions were incorporated in that Code, the repealing act did not become effective until after this cause of action arose. The pertinent provisions of this act required a minor under the age of sixteen years to procure a permit from the proper school authorities permitting him to work and required the employer to ask for and retain the permits so issued to such minors in his employ. It provided that no one should "suffer or permit" a minor to be employed in violation of the terms of the act, and it would thus seem to apply to an agent of the employer such as the respondent Brandon. The act prescribed certain regulations to be followed in the issuing of such permits within the discretion of the school authorities, and these were followed with specifications for the issuance of "vacation permits" which also authorized the minor to work on the regular weekly school holiday. The issuance of such "vacation permits" appears to be mandatory.

Here it is conceded that the deceased minor did not deliver to the respondents a permit to work. For this reason the appellant insists that she has a case of negligence per se. The respondents argue that there is no causal connection between the fact of the absence of the permit and the injuries sustained by the minor. This should also be conceded because it is self-evident. The rule of law applicable is succinctly stated in Arrelano v. Jorgensen, 52 Cal. App. 622, 624, 199 P. 855, 856, where the District Court say: "But it is well settled that the act or omission constituting the violation of law must have contributed directly to the injury, or, however improper or illegal it may have been in the abstract, no action for damages can be founded upon it." In Williams v. Southern Pacific Co., 173 Cal. 525, 539, 160 P. 660, 666, the Supreme Court had a case of damages for the death of a minor employed by it under a contract which violated some terms of the Child Labor Law. But the violation of the act did not contribute to the injuries of the employee, and the court say: "So far as that particular accident was concerned, notwithstanding his violation of the statutory duty, the employer was not only not guilty of any negligence per se, but he was not guilty of any negligence at all." And on page 541 of 173 Cal., 160 P. 660, 666, the court say further: "But this connection [the violation of the statute] is not the causal connection—the contributing cause—which the law declares. So fundamentally true is this that even in statutes like this, where the hours of labor are limited by law, it must be shown not only that the employee was laboring during the forbidden or excessive hours, but that his injuries in some proximate way resulted from this fact."

Similar holdings have been made in reference to violations of the California Vehicle Act—that they must have proximately contributed to the injury complained of to be actionable. Ormston v. Lane, 90 Cal. App. 481, 487, 266 P. 304; Berges v. Guthrie, 51 Cal. App. 547, 549, 197 P. 356; Skaggs v. Wiley (Cal. App.) 292 P. 132; Burt v. Bank of California, etc. (Cal. Sup.) 296 P. 68. We need not go into the niceties of the decisions which question whether in every case the violation of a penal statute constitutes negligence per se, but may accept the principle stated in Inland Steel Co. v. Yedinak, 172 Ind. 423, 87 N. E. 229, 232, 139 Am. St. Rep. 389, where the court, assuming that it was negligence per se, said: "But to make such negligence actionable it must be a proximate cause of the injury for which the action is brought."

[11, 12] We have purposely confined the foregoing discussion to the two theories upon which appellant sought to recover—the alleged violation of the Child Labor Law, and the alleged violation of the Compulsory Education Law. We have shown that she failed to prove a violation of the Labor Law and that she failed to prove that the admitted violation of the Compulsory Education Law was a contributing cause of the injuries. We have not overlooked any of the many assignments of error on the exclusion of evidence. There was no controversy but that the Ferris wheel as a whole was a dangerous piece of machinery within the meaning of the Child Labor Law, but all the evidence educed by the appellant demonstrated that the place where the deceased was employed was free from danger and that the injury arose solely from his disobedience of orders in going into a place where he was not employed. Hence, the appellant was not prejudiced by the exclusion of additional evidence offered to show the dangerous character of this machinery. Having failed to show a causal connection between the absence of a working certificate and the injuries complained of, she was not injured by the exclusion of the proffered evidence tending to show that other minors had been employed in the park system and that some of the respondents had knowledge of that fact. The criticism of the trial judge in refusing to dismiss the jury while the motion for nonsuit was argued falls with the granting of that motion. The same may be said of the complaint that appellant was not permitted to argue that motion fully. She has had full opportunity to argue it here, and if we are correct in our conclusions, further argument in the trial court could not have availed appellant.

Judgment affirmed.

CLINE v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

Civ. 8032.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Sept. 1, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 1, 1931.

Prohibition ☞ 13.

Application to prohibit reopening of compensation proceeding, because made without notice, would be denied, where question presented thereby has become moot (St. 1917, p. 850, § 20 (d)).

Application would be denied as presenting a moot question where, since the application to reopen the compensation proceeding was denied, the Industrial Accident Commission had vacated its order to reopen the case and had taken the necessary steps to afford the petitioner an opportunity to be heard on the question of whether or not the case should be reopened.

Application by Thomas Cline for writ of prohibition to be directed to the Industrial Accident Commission to prevent it from proceeding with the rehearing of a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Writ denied.

Charles A. McClory, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

A. I. Townsend, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

The petitioner has applied for a writ of prohibition to prohibit the Industrial Accident Commission from proceeding with the rehearing of his case before said commission upon the ground that the order granting the petition to reopen said case was made in violation of the requirements of section 20 (d) of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 850), in that it was granted without notice to petitioner and without giving him an opportunity to be heard; also upon the ground that the commission had lost jurisdiction to reopen the case.

Since the application was presented, however, the commission has vacated its order to reopen the case and has taken the necessary proceedings to afford petitioner an opportunity to be heard upon the question of whether or not the case shall be reopened. That being so, the question sought to be determined by the application for the writ of prohibition has become moot; and upon that ground the application is denied.

J. Irving McKenna and Catherine A. McKenna, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J.

[1] In this motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment, the record shows that the judgment was entered on December 2, 1930; that the notice of intention to move for a new trial was filed on February 28,

1931, which motion was denied on March 31, 1931; and that the notice of appeal from the judgment was not filed until the 27th day of April, 1931. It thus appears that considerably more than 60 days elapsed after the entry of the judgment before appellant either filed notice of his intention to move for a new trial, or filed notice of appeal from the judgment.

As far as affects the instant matter, section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that: "An appeal may be taken from any judgment * * * within sixty days from the entry of said judgment. * * * If proceedings on motion for a new trial are pending, the time for appeal from the judgment shall not expire until thirty days after entry in the trial court of the order determining such motion for a new trial, or other termination in the trial court of the proceedings upon such motion."

Section 953d of the Code of Civil Procedure is as follows: "Any notice of entry of judgment, or of order granting or denying a motion for a new trial, required by the provisions of section 650, section 659 or section 953a of this code, must be given in writing, unless written notice thereof be waived in writing or by oral stipulation made in open court and entered in the minutes."

Construing the provisions of said section of the Code with reference to the effect of a notice of intention to move for a new trial upon the right of appeal, in the case of Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Beggs, 185 Cal. 279, 196 P. 487, it is held that (syllabus): "The provision of section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure extending the time for appeal from the judgment if proceedings on motion for a new trial are pending has no application unless such proceeding is instituted within the sixty days after entry of judgment within which an appeal may be taken from the judgment, in the absence of any new trial proceeding, and if within such sixty days no such proceeding be instituted and no appeal from the judgment is taken, the right of appeal from the judgment is forever lost." To the same effect, see Smith v. Questa, 58 Cal. App. 1, 207 P. 1036.

It therefore becomes apparent that in the circumstances hereinbefore set forth, the filing by appellant of his notice of intention to move for a new trial did not have the effect of extending the time within which he might appeal from the judgment.

[2] But it is contended by the appellant that under the provisions of section 953d of the Code of Civil Procedure, in the absence of any waiver by him in writing of a written notice to him of the entry of judgment, or by oral stipulation made in open court to like effect and the same entered in the minutes, he was entitled to a written notice of the entry of the judgment before the statutory time within which an appeal from the judgment, as provided by the terms of section 939 of said code, would start to run. However, it appears that the authorities are clearly against the position assumed by appellant in that regard.

In the case of Cook v. Cook, 208 Cal. 501, 282 P. 385, it is held that (syllabus): "Section 953d of the Code of Civil Procedure does not relate to notices of appeal which must be filed within sixty days after the entry of the judgment, * * * but applies only to the notices required by the provisions of section 650 of said code relating to settlement of bills of exceptions, section 659, of said code relating to motions for a new trial, and section 953a of said code relating to preparation of transcript on appeal." See, also, Bley v. Board of Dental Examiners, 101 Cal. App. 666, 282 P. 19.

It follows that the motion to dismiss the appeal herein should be granted. It is so ordered.

GALLOWAY v. GALLOWAY et al.
Civ. 7993.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Sept. 2, 1931.

1. Husband and wife ⇨298(1, 2).

In suit for separate maintenance, husband's ability to pay when award is made determines reasonableness of award.

2. Divorce ⇨329.

Divorce obtained in another state through fraudulent residence simulated for purpose, and not in good faith, is open to attack in state of true matrimonial domicile.

3. Divorce ⇨329.

Fraud in establishing residence for purpose of divorce is not presumed, but must be proved like any other fact.

4. Divorce ⇨329.

Mere suspicion of fraud in establishing residence for purpose of divorce is not sufficient to attack divorce.

5. Divorce ⇨329.

Evidence of one witness that she thought husband stated he had gone to Mexico to get divorce held insufficient to show fraudulent residence, to set aside Mexican divorce.

6. Divorce ⇨329.

Good faith of husband in obtaining divorce in Mexico and integrity of judgment of foreign court is presumed in attack on foreign divorce.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas C. Gould, Judge.

Action by Minna Galloway against Dallas L. Galloway and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Fred W. Morrison, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Harry K. Sargent, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued for separate maintenance. The defendant answered setting up a divorce from plaintiff in the courts of the Republic of Mexico. The trial court awarded plaintiff $75 a month, and defendant appeals upon a bill of exceptions.

[1] Appellant insists that there is no evidence of his ability to pay the amount of the award. The only evidence found is that the appellant was without property, without funds, and without employment. Respondent concedes her failure to make a showing in this respect, but suggests that the court should take into consideration the testimony that appellant had been engaged in the real estate business in Los Angeles prior to his departure for Mexico in 1925. It is the husband's ability to pay when the award is made that determines the reasonableness of the award, and in this respect the record is silent.

[2-6] Appellant also complains of the finding adverse to the decree of the Mexico courts dissolving the marriage. The rule is well settled that when a divorce is obtained in another state through a fraudulent residence simulated for the purpose and not in good faith, such divorce is open to attack in the state of the true matrimonial domicile. Bruguere v. Bruguere, 172 Cal. 199, 155 P. 988, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 122; Kelsey v. Miller, 203 Cal. 61, 89, 263 P. 200. But it is as equally well settled that fraud is the basis of the attack (Kelsey v. Miller, supra); that fraud is not presumed but must be proved like any other fact (Truett v. Onderdonk, 120 Cal. 581, 588, 53 P. 26); and that a mere suspicion of fraud is not sufficient (Everett v. Standard Accident Ins. Co., 45 Cal. App. 332, 338, 187 P. 996; Noll v. Baida, 202 Cal. 98, 100, 259 P. 433. Here there is no proof of fraud. One witness was called who testified that she thought the appellant had told her that he had gone to Mexico to get a divorce. No other testimony was taken. The decree discloses that summons was issued and that the default of the wife was duly entered. Whether she was personally served does not appear. However, in the absence of evidence, we must presume the good faith of the husband and the integrity of the judgment of the foreign court, and with no competent evidence to rebut either presumption, the judgment appealed from falls for want of proof.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO
et al.

Civ. 7954.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California.

Aug. 31, 1931.

Criminal law ☞1218.

Trial court could not sentence defendant convicted of attempt to commit second-degree burglary to imprisonment in place other than state prison (Pen. Code, §§ 461, 664).

This was so, since under Pen. Code, § 461, burglary of second degree is punishable by imprisonment in state prison and not elsewhere, and section 664 merely fixes the maximum punishment for attempt to commit a crime at one-half maximum penalty that may be inflicted for completed offense; hence punishment for burglary in second degree being imprisonment in state prison for maximum term exceeding five years, the provisions of section 664, subd. 1 providing that, if the offense so attempted is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for five years or more, or by imprisonment in a county jail, the person guilty of such attempt is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison or in county jail, as case may be, applied.

Application for writ of mandate by the People against the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco and Louis H. Ward, Judge thereof, to compel respondents to arraign a certain defendant for punishment and sentence him according to law.

Writ granted.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and W. R. Augustine, Deputy Atty. Gen., for petitioner.

Frank J. Egan, Public Defender, James A. Toner, and George T. Kerr, Asst. Public Defenders, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM.

An information was filed in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco which charged one Leo Buckbee with the commission of a felony, to wit, burglary, and with a prior conviction of a felony in the state of Utah. Upon his arraignment in such cause Buckbee entered a plea of not guilty and denied having suffered a prior conviction. Subsequently on the day set for the trial, with the permission of the court, he withdrew the plea of not guilty and thereupon entered a plea of guilty of attempting to commit burglary, a felony. Thereafter, by stipulation by the district attorney, the court found the degree of burglary to be the second, and upon motion by the district attorney ordered the prior conviction to be dismissed. The court then pronounced judgment, sentencing the defendant to imprisonment in the county jail of the city and county of San Francisco for a term of one year.

It is claimed by the people, represented by the Attorney General, that the court was without authority to sentence a defendant convicted of an attempt to commit burglary of the second degree other than to imprison in the state prison, and that its judgment is therefore void.

The present proceeding, in which the people are the petitioners, is for a writ of mandate, directing the court to arraign the defendant for judgment and pronounce sentence according to law.

Section 461 of the Penal Code reads as follows: "Burglary is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison as follows: 1. Burglary in the first degree for not less than five years. 2. Burglary in the second degree for not less than one nor more than fifteen years." And section 664 of the same Code provides: "Every person who attempts to commit any crime, but fails, or is prevented or intercepted in the perpetration thereof, is punishable, where no provision is made by law for the punishment of such attempts, as follows: 1. If the offense so attempted is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for five years, or more, or by imprisonment in a county jail, the person guilty of such attempt is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, or in a county jail, as the case may be, for a term not exceeding one-half of the longest term of imprisonment prescribed upon a conviction of the offense so attempted. * * * 2. If the offense so attempted is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for any term less than five years, the person guilty of such attempt is punishable by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year."

Respondent claims that the word punishable as used in section 664 of the Penal Code means "may be punished"; and, since burglary of the second degree is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison from one to fifteen years (Pen. Code, § 461), a defendant convicted of an attempt to commit the crime may be punished by a term of imprisonment less than five years, and therefore the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 664 are applicable.

Under section 461 of the Penal Code burglary of the second degree is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison and not elsewhere; and the people contend that section 664 merely fixes the maximum punishment for attempts to commit crime at one-half the maximum penalty that may be inflicted for the completed offense; and that, punishment for burglary of the second degree being imprisonment in the state prison for a maximum term exceeding five years, the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 664 of the Penal Code apply, and defendant was punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, and not elsewhere, for a maximum term of seven and one-half years.

Webster's International Dictionary defines punishable as "deserving of or capable or liable to punishment * * * capable of being punished by law or right * * * said of persons or offenses." The word, as used in similar statutes where the same refer to the offender, has been held to mean liable to punishment or liable to be punished (The Thrasher [C. C. A.] 173 F. 258; State v. Paisley, 36 Mont. 237, 92 P. 566); or, where the reference is to the offense, the same word has been held to mean "may be punished" (Benton v. Commonwealth, 89 Va. 570, 16 S. E. 725; People v. Hughes, 137 N. Y. 34, 32 N. E. 1105; People v. Godding, 55 Colo. 579, 136 P. 1011). And in State v. Culberson, 143 La. 565, 78 So. 941, 942, the court said: "The word 'punishable,' said of offenses or offenders, means liable to punishment."

In State v. Paisley, supra, the court was considering the effect of a statute fixing the punishment in cases where the defendant had suffered a prior conviction. The statute read as follows: "Every person who, having been convicted of any offense punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, commits any crime after such conviction, is punishable therefor as follows: (1) If the offense of which such person is subsequently convicted is such that, upon a first conviction, an offender would be punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for any term exceeding five years, such person is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than ten years. (2) If the subsequent offense is such that upon a first conviction the offender would be punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for five years, or any less term, then the person convicted of such subsequent offense is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding ten years." Defendant Paisley was convicted of the crime of robbery, the verdict also finding that the charge of a prior conviction of a felony was true, and he was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for five years. The Montana statute provided that robbery should be punishable upon a first conviction by imprisonment in the state prison for a term not less than one year or more than twenty years. It was claimed that subdivision 1 of the statute, which we have quoted above, was only applicable to crimes the minimum punishment for which exceeded five years' imprisonment; and that, since robbery might be punished by imprisonment for a term of one year, the defendant could only be punished under the second subdivision of the act, which provided a maximum of ten years' imprisonment. The court in affirming the judgment, said: "As used in this section (subdivision 1 of the act) we think it ['punishable'] means liable to punishment. * * * In other words, we think this subdivision means that, if the maximum punishment is more, but not less, than five years' imprisonment, then the punishment for the offense for which appellant was being tried * * * could not be less than ten years, and might be extended to life imprisonment."

The same construction was given subdivision 1 of section 664 of the California Penal Code in the case of Ex parte Hope, 59 Cal. 423, where the defendant was convicted of an attempt to commit burglary of the first degree, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of seven and one-half years, this being one-half of the longest term of imprisonment prescribed for a conviction of the offense so attempted. Defendant applied for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that, burglary of the first degree being then punishable by imprisonment in the state prison from one to fifteen years, the offense of which he was convicted was punishable under subdivision 2 of section 664 of the Penal Code. The court held that the case came within the provisions of subdivision 1 of the section for the reason that burglary of the first degree was punishable "by imprisonment in the state prison for a term which may extend to fifteen years." An indeterminate sentence is in legal effect a sentence for the maximum term (In re Lee, 177 Cal. 690, 171 P. 958); and we are satisfied that the construction placed upon section 664 contended for by the people, viz., that the section merely fixes the maximum punishment that may be inflicted for attempts to commit crime, is correct.

We find no merit in the claim that this construction would result in greater punishments being inflicted for attempts than completed offenses, or that the trial court will be deprived of discretionary power in dealing with attempts, it being clear that, where the trial court has discretion with respect to the punishment for completed offenses, it will likewise have discretion with respect to attempts to commit such offenses.

No other matters require discussion; and in view of the above conclusion we are of the opinion that the trial court was without authority to sentence a defendant convicted of an attempt to commit burglary of the second degree to imprisonment in a place other than the state prison.

It is therefore ordered that a writ of mandate issue, directing respondent court to set aside the judgment entered in the action of the People of the State of California v. Leo Buckbee, No. 2494, in the superior court of the state of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco, to arraign said defendant Leo Buckbee for judgment according to law, and to hear and determine such motions as may properly come before the court.

SANCHEZ v. PACIFIC AUTO STAGES et al.
Civ. 7446.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.
Aug. 29, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 28, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 23, 1931.

1. Carriers  $\Rightarrow$ 336.

If bus company's agent undertook to conduct passenger across highway to bus, passenger could use less care than would otherwise have been necessary.

It appeared that, after passenger bought ticket at one of customary places of sale, she started to cross highway to reach point of departure of bus and was accompanied by bus company's agent, and that passenger was struck by automobile operated by third person unconnected with company.

2. Carriers  $\Rightarrow$ 336.

Although bus company's agent assumed responsibility of protecting passenger in crossing highway to bus, passenger was required to use ordinary care.

3. Carriers  $\Rightarrow$ 347(14).

Passenger's contributory negligence in accompanying bus company's agent across highway to bus held for jury.

4. Carriers  $\Rightarrow$ 346(1/2).

Evidence sustained verdict that passenger who, having started across highway accompanied by bus company's agent for purpose of reaching bus, did not look to left or right, was not contributorily negligent.

5. Carriers  $\Rightarrow$ 320(8).

Negligence of bus company and agent held sufficient for jury where passenger, to reach bus, started across highway accompanied by agent.

6. Carriers  $\Rightarrow$ 320(8).

Whether bus company's agent negligently conducted passenger across highway, and whether company provided safe place to board bus, held for jury.

7. Carriers  $\Rightarrow$ 317(10).

In injured passenger's action against bus company, custom of stopping at particular points or stations of vehicle carriers held competent.

8. Carriers  $\Rightarrow$ 239.

Carrier passenger relationship arises when passenger pays for entrance into conveyance or enters with intent to pay.

9. Carriers  $\Rightarrow$ 247(1).

Notwithstanding hiatus occurs in carrier passenger relationship, such relationship again exists when buyer of passenger rights is in position to be accepted as passenger.

10. Carriers  $\Rightarrow$ 247(1).

Carrier passenger relationship exists when one intending bona fide to become passenger goes at appropriate time to place designated for departure and carrier takes some action indicating acceptance of passenger as traveler.

11. Carriers  $\Rightarrow$ 286(1).

Carriers need exercise only ordinary care regarding condition of station at which passengers are received.

12. Carriers  $\Rightarrow$ 247(1).

If carrier assumes responsibility of conducting buyer of passenger rights to point of departure, carrier passenger relationship exists, requiring carrier to exercise more than ordinary care.

13. Carriers  $\Rightarrow$ 306(1).

That bus company had agreement whereby transit company honored bus company's tickets did not affect bus company's liability to its passenger injured when accompanying bus company's agent across highway to transit company's bus.

14. Carriers  $\Rightarrow$ 287(1).

Absence of express authority from carrier to agent did not relieve carrier from liability to passenger injured while crossing highway accompanied by agent.

15. Carriers ⇐247(1).

Person who, after buying ticket, was injured while crossing highway to reach bus, held "passenger," obligating carrier to use utmost care and diligence (Civ. Code, § 2100).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Passenger," see Words and Phrases.]

16. Carriers ⇐280(1).

Carrier must guard passengers against dangers which might be reasonably anticipated (Civ. Code, § 2100).

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by Mary Sanchez against the Pacific Auto Stages, a corporation, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Archer Bowden, of San Jose, for appellants.

Alfred Aram, of San Jose, for respondent.

WARD, Justice pro tem.

[1-4] This is an action for personal injuries. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $2,500. The defendant Pacific Auto Stages, a corporation, operates auto stages upon the San Francisco-San Jose highway. The defendant Gallimore is an employee of the defendant corporation, in charge of a bus running from the center of the town of Mountain View to the San Francisco-San Jose highway. The Peninsula Rapid Transit Company also operates stages upon the main highway and transports passengers holding Pacific Auto Stages' tickets. Just prior to the accident, plaintiff purchased a Pacific Auto Stage ticket from its representative, Gallimore. This token entitled plaintiff to transportation from Mountain View to San Jose. The purchase was made at one of the customary places of sale near the point of departure of the San Jose stage, to wit, the stopping site across the highway of the Mountain View bus. Plaintiff inquired the time of the arrival of the next bus from San Jose and the agent replied, "Soon * * * It is coming—it is here now." Thereupon Gallimore walked with plaintiff in crossing the highway. There is some conflict in the evidence whether Gallimore grabbed or held plaintiff's arm or simply walked beside her as she crossed the highway. Near the point of destination, plaintiff was struck by an automobile and received injuries therefrom. The automobile that struck the plaintiff was operated by a party unconnected with the stage company. Plaintiff testified that after starting to cross the highway she looked straight ahead. If defendant Gallimore, as the agent of defendant corporation, undertook to conduct plaintiff from the point where the corporation had accepted her fare for the purpose of placing plaintiff into or upon the conveyance provided for her transportation, then it would not be necessary that plaintiff use the same degree of care she would be called upon to exercise if she had crossed without the protection of the defendant corporation's representative. Agent Gallimore assumed a responsibility to protect the plaintiff. This did not relieve plaintiff from the use of ordinary care, but it was for the jury to determine if plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The cases cited by appellant deal with pedestrians, bicycle riders, and expassengers of vehicles. The evidence under all the circumstances of this case is not sufficient to warrant a disturbance of the views of the jury upon this issue.

[5, 6] At the conclusion of plaintiff's case, the trial judge was not in a position to say, as a matter of law, that no negligence had been proved. Whether Gallimore negligently conducted plaintiff, and whether a safe and suitable place to board the conveyance had been provided, were questions of fact. The motion for a nonsuit was properly denied.

Appellant contends that the trial court erred in excluding from the evidence an operating agreement between the Pacific Auto Stages and the Peninsula Rapid Transit Company and in permitting testimony with reference to the customary place of stopping of the busses. The terms of the agreement in so far as applicable to the facts in this case were covered by the testimony of the witness Gallimore. The jury received therefrom a clear and true picture of the relationship between the companies.

[7] The custom of stopping at particular points or stations of vehicle carriers is proper evidence. Delmonte v. S. P. Co., 2 Cal. App. 211, 83 P. 269. Through the evidence it was established that the bus that this plaintiff would have entered if she had reached the point of boarding was a bus of the Peninsula Rapid Transit Company. The ticket sold by the defendant company would have been honored by the Peninsula Company; hence the place where the Peninsula bus stopped was material.

Appellant contends that error was committed in twenty instructions in the sixty-odd given to the jury. The opening brief contains the instructions, with portions objectionable to appellant italicized. Brief comments follow each instruction. Many of the comments are found in substance to be repetitions of preceding comments. Only three citations are presented in support of appellant's position. The objections to the instructions may be epitomized as follows: That the court erred in instructing the jury: First, that the case involved the relationship of common carrier and passenger; second, that portions of the Public Utilities Act were applicable to the case; third, that the common carrier is required to afford protection commensurate with the risks involved when a person resorts to that station or stopping place with the intentions of becoming a passenger; fourth, that certain of the instructions omitted the element of proximate cause; fifth, that the agreement between the two companies had no bearing on the duty of the defendant company to exercise care for the safety of its passengers; sixth, that it was an admitted fact that Gallimore undertook to assist the plaintiff across the highway.

[8-12] The relationship of carrier and passenger arises when the passenger enters with intent to pay or pays for entrance into the vehicle or carriage. There may be a hiatus in the relationship in instances too numerous to mention, but, when the purchaser of the rights to be conveyed is in a position to be accepted as a passenger, the relationship is again in force. It is not necessary, in order to create the relation of carrier and passenger, that the passenger should have actually entered the vehicle. The relation is in force when one, intending in good faith to become a passenger, goes to the place designated as the site of departure at the appropriate time and the carrier takes some action indicating acceptance of the passenger as a traveler. It is true that carriers of passengers are bound simply to exercise ordinary care as to the condition of the station at which passengers are received (Falls v. San Francisco & Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company, 97 Cal. 114, 31 P. 901), but, if the carrier assumes the responsibility of conducting the purchaser of passenger rights to the point of departure, then the relationship of carrier and passenger exists during such period. In the Falls Case the injured party had been waiting for a train. The defendant did not assume to accept her as a passenger until she should board the train. In this case the action of defendant corporation's agent was an invitation to plaintiff to be conducted from the point of sale of the ticket to the point of departure of the stage. The evidence discloses that upon other occasions this plaintiff had been escorted or assisted and other passengers likewise, by Gallimore. Under such circumstances a greater degree of care is imposed upon the carrier.

[13, 14] Appellants claim that the provisions of the Public Utilities Act (St. 1915, p.

115, as amended) are not applicable to this case. The inapplicability has not been pointed out, but counsel leaves us with the mere statement that the instructions are not applicable. The element of proximate cause, though absent from certain instructions, was fully covered in other instructions. The statement of the court that the agreement between the companies did not affect the defendant corporation's liability was correct. If the court erred in instructing the jury that it was an admitted fact that Gallimore undertook to assist the plaintiff across the street, the error consisted only in the use of the word "assist." The evidence proves that he escorted or assisted or led or conducted or accompanied the plaintiff, and in several other instructions the jury was plainly told "that, if they found that Gallimore conducted," etc. The jury was properly instructed as to the degree of care a carrier owes to the passenger. Lack of instructions or the absence of express authority from the master to the servant is immaterial. "Where the carrier through its employees undertakes to assist a passenger to board or alight from its cars, the passenger has a right to rely on its careful performance of such undertakings and may recover of the carrier for injuries caused by the failure to use proper care." 4 Ruling Case Law, p. 1236, and cases cited. Plaintiff having paid the full price for her transportation, with the knowledge, presumptive or actual, that such red cap porter service was part of the consideration entering into the purchase, such service must be held to have been covered by and included in the fare paid for transportation, and the fact that such service might have been dispensed with did not make it gratuitous. Franklin v. Southern Pacific Company, 203 Cal. 680, 265 P. 936, 937, 59 A. L. R. 118. Carrier having knowledge of the custom is liable "though the custom was in violation of its rules." Wieland v. Southern Pacific Company, 1 Cal. App. 343, 82 P. 226. The court instructed the jury that they were to find whether or not Gallimore was within the express or ostensible scope of his employment.

[15, 16] From what has been said before we feel justified in determining from all the facts and circumstances of this particular case that the plaintiff became a passenger upon the payment of the fare; and that immediately the carrier was bound to use the utmost care and diligence for the passengers' safe carriage. See Civ. Code, § 2100. The carrier was bound to guard her "against such dangers as might be reasonably anticipated or naturally expected to occur." Southern Pacific Company v. Ward (C. C. A.) 208 F. 385; Glennen v. Boston Elevated R. Co., 207 Mass. 497, 93 N. E. 700, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 470. The evidence indicates the dangers of crossing this particular highway. It was the duty, therefore, of the defendant corporation to supply a reasonably safe place for the departure of the plaintiff passenger.

Judgment affirmed.

Verified answer disclosing good defense satisfies requirement for affidavit of merits on motion to vacate default judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

8. Judgment ☞162(4).

Petitioner's counsel's affidavit and unverified amended petition held to warrant order vacating default judgment denying mandamus to compel restoration of petitioner to position as school teacher entered after demurrer to petition was sustained (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Affidavit was to effect that petitioner did not have a fair trial before the board of trustees; that the charges against her were frivolous and untrue; that hearsay testimony and rumors of all sort were admitted in evidence to petitioner's prejudice, and in accordance with the advice of counsel who acted as prosecutor as well as counsel for the board of trustees.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clair S. Tappaan, Judge.

Petition for writ of mandamus by Ethel D. Phillips Greenamyre against the Board of Trustees of Lugo Elementary School District in the County of Los Angeles and others. From an order vacating a judgment denying writ of mandate, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and Gordon Boller, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Tanner, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

A petition for the writ of mandamus was filed by plaintiff in the court below. The defendants interposed a demurrer on general and special grounds which was sustained. Judgment was thereafter entered, and this is an appeal from an order vacating that judgment.

The points now raised by appellants will be more readily understood if we set down all the facts surrounding the making of the order. The petition alleged the removal of respondent, who was classified and employed as a permanent teacher in the Lugo elementary school district, by the board of education of that district upon charges which it was alleged were untrue, frivolous, and concocted for the purpose of depriving her of her means of livelihood; that such removal was null and void, and asking that she be restored to her position. The petition was filed December 7, 1928. As stated, a demurrer was interposed on the grounds that the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action and on the further ground that C. F. Mercer, the superintendent of the district, was improperly joined as a party defendant, with the members of the board of education. The demurrer was submitted on briefs, and on January 14, 1929, an order was made in the following words: "Demurrer to petition is sustained." Judgment was entered thereon on January 28, 1929. On April 30, 1929, the respondent gave notice that she would move to set aside the judgment on the ground that it was entered after a minute order sustaining a demurrer without any notice having been served on her of the ruling thereon as required by law, and on the further ground of inadvertence and excusable neglect. The motion was supported by an affidavit of one of her counsel to the effect that the order sustaining the demurrer was made after the issues of law had been submitted on briefs and was not without leave to amend; that the defendants did not serve any notice of the ruling on plaintiff or her lawyers; that the judge did not designate whether the general or the special demurrer was sustained; that counsel relied upon the law and the rules of court to the effect that the time to file an amended petition commences to run with the service of a notice of the ruling on the demurrer; that as a consequence plaintiff did not know until April 8, 1929, that judgment had been signed and filed; that the neglect, if any, was excusable for the reason that the law governing the procedure in cases similar to the one of the respondent was not certain or clear or decided; that an appeal from the decision of the appellants had been taken to the county superintendent of schools, which required a great deal of time and attention; that in the meantime an action involving identical questions was pending before the Supreme Court entitled Saxton v. Board of Education of the City of Los Angeles, which proceeding had been determined within the preceding ten days, holding that the superior court had jurisdiction to try the charges de novo; that, while it was not stipulated between counsel that no proceedings would be taken pending the appeal to the county superintendent, yet counsel for plaintiff relied upon counsel for appellants to notify him of any action taken in court and therefore made no examination of the record until the decision in the Saxton Case; that in forty-two years of practice affiant had never taken a default on an attorney without first serving him with actual notice or calling him on the telephone and he believed that to be the universal custom among practicing attorneys; and that the demurrer was sustained on the ground of misjoinder of parties and plaintiff was desirous of amending. An unverified amended petition, dropping the superintendent of the district as a party defendant, was tendered with the motion. Affidavits in opposition were filed by appellants, but it is unnecessary to set forth their contents. Respondent also filed counter affidavits in which it was made to appear that the trial judge, in ruling upon the demurrer, felt himself governed by the opinion of the District Court of Appeal in the Saxton Case, not knowing that the Supreme Court had transferred the cause to itself for decision; and that it was not true that counsel for plaintiff ever received any notice of the entry of the judgment, although they did receive a notice from the clerk of the court stating that the demurrer was sustained. It does appear that a decision was rendered by the District Court of Appeal on August 16, 1928, in Saxton v. Board of Education of the City of Los Angeles (see 269 P. 764), holding that mandamus would not lie, and that a plain and adequate remedy at law was provided by an appeal to the county superintendent of schools. However, the case was transferred to the Supreme Court (206 Cal. 758, 276 P. 998) prior to the hearing of the demurrer in the instant case, and the opinion rendered therein was set aside and was of no force or effect. The trial court, therefore, as subsequently developed, erred in its ruling on the demurrer. With this background we turn to an examination of the contentions advanced by the appellants.

[1,2] Grouping the first two arguments together it is said that the judgment taken against the respondent was not a default judgment, and for that reason it could not be set aside upon a motion made under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure for the reason that it was not entered as the result of inadvertence or excusable neglect on the part of the respondent. Our attention is directed to section 6b of rule XX (as it existed on January 14, 1929), of the "Rules Regulating Business of the Superior Court" adopted by the judicial council. It reads as follows: "When a demurrer is sustained, with leave to amend, the court shall fix the time within which such amendment or amended pleading may be filed. Except upon good cause shown, such time shall not exceed ten (10) days."

Rule XXVIII of the same origin as it existed at the time says: "The foregoing rules shall supersede all rules of the Superior Court of the State of California in conflict therewith."

Rule XXI of the superior court of Los Angeles county adopted by the judges thereof and in effect at the time, unless superseded by the judicial council rule already quoted, reads in its pertinent part as follows: "When a demurrer to a pleading shall be sustained, the adverse party shall have ten days in which to amend, unless otherwise ordered by the court." Assuming without deciding that the council has the authority, by virtue of the provisions of subdivision 5 of section 1a of article 6 of the state Constitution which confers upon it the power to "adopt or amend rules of practice and procedure for the several courts not inconsistent with laws that are now or that may hereafter be in force," to supersede or set aside a rule adopted by the judges of the superior court who have acted pursuant to the provisions of section 129 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which says: "Every court of record may make rules not inconsistent with the laws of this state, for its own government and the government of its officers, * * *" the first question which arises is: Are the two rules in conflict, or, to put it in another way, does that portion of rule XXI, which we have quoted merely supplement section 6b of rule XX adopted by the council? The one says that the court shall fix the time for amendment when permission to amend is granted; and the other says that, when no further order is made that "demurrer sustained," permission to amend is granted, and the time is fixed at ten days. In the interest of clarity we may assume a county with but one judge who, reading the rule of the judicial council already quoted, adopts and promulgates a rule in the words of the rule of the superior court under consideration. In effect the judge would be saying: "To me is left the discretion of saying when permission shall be granted to amend and how much time shall be given therefor. I now say generally that whenever I sustain a demurrer without further order the adverse party may amend and time therefor is fixed at ten days. If I feel that the party should not have leave to amend I shall say so or if I feel that he should have less or more than ten days to amend I shall say so." We find no conflict between the two, hence the last-quoted rule is still in effect and the respondent had ten days within which to file an amended petition for the writ of mandate, which time began to run from actual notice or the service of notice of the order of the ruling on demurrer. Section 476, Code Civ. Proc.; Barron v. Deleval, 58 Cal. 96; In re Estate of Keating, 158 Cal. 109-114, 110 P. 109. From this it follows that the judgment taken against the respondent was due to the neglect and failure of her counsel to present an amended petition. We are then faced with the question of whether any excuse was shown justifying the court in its action and also whether it was necessary for the respondent to present an affidavit of merits or a verified petition with her motion or whether a sufficient showing was made.

[3-5] Preliminarily it may be said that, if any questions of fact were raised by the affidavits, they must be resolved in favor of the respondent. It is for that reason that we did not set forth the contents of the counter affidavits filed by the appellants. Also it should be added that a motion to set aside a default is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court and will not be set aside in the absence of a showing of a clear abuse of discretion, it being the policy of the law as well to favor a hearing on the merits. Waybright v. Anderson, 200 Cal. 374, 253 P. 148. We are inclined to believe that, had the motion been denied, it would have been clearly within the discretion of the trial court. But having been granted, we find it difficult to say there was a clear abuse of discretion. The affiant says that in forty-two years of practice he has never taken a default on an attorney without giving him actual notice either oral or written and he believes that to be the universal custom among members of the ancient and honorable profession. That he did so believe is to a degree supported by a quotation he makes in his affidavit from his closing brief filed with county superintendent long after the judgment was in fact filed, a part of which reads as follows: "Counsel has not yet had judgment entered on the demurrer of Judge Tappaan. We presume he has been waiting for the decision on this appeal, which we think is a proper course to take, for if the county superintendent vacates the judgment of the Board of Trustees, there will be no need of further proceedings in mandamus." Furthermore, it is patent that not only the judge but also the attorney was unaware (at least at the time the demurrer was sustained) of the fact that a transfer to the Supreme Court had been ordered in the case of Saxton v. Board of Education. The procedure to be followed in the case, i. e., whether an appeal to the county superintendent was the sole remedy or whether a writ of mandamus in the superior court was the proper remedy, as he says in his affidavit, was greatly in doubt until the decision of the Supreme Court. Taking the entire situation into consideration, we are unable to say that there is a showing of that clear abuse of discretion which would warrant us in overturning the order.

[6-8] The question remains: Was it essential that respondent present an affidavit of merits, or was a sufficient showing of merits made? Under the authority of Saxton v. Board of Education, 206 Cal. 758, 276 P. 998, the original verified petition stated a cause of action although demurrable on account of the misjoinder of parties, and the amended petition, although unverified, stated a cause of action. Had it not been for the mistake of fact under which counsel and the court labored in believing the opinion of the District Court of Appeal to be an existing opinion, the order sustaining the demurrer would probably have indicated that it was sustained solely on account of the misjoinder of parties. The reason for the rule requiring an affidavit of merits is that a valid judgment should not be set aside unless it is made to appear, prima facie, that a different result would probably be reached. Bailey v. Taaffe, 29 Cal. 422; Parrott v. Den, 34 Cal. 79; Nickerson v. California Raisin Co., 61 Cal. 268. Of course an affidavit of merits is not required where the judgment is invalid for want of jurisdiction. Martz v. American Bran Gold Co., 161 Cal. 531, 119 P. 909. Nor is it necessary in a divorce case where the public interest is involved. Reh fuss v. Reh fuss, 169 Cal. 86, 145 P. 1020. Also a verified answer which discloses a good and meritorious defense satisfies the reason for the rule. Sampanes v. Chazes, 54 Cal. App. 612, 202 P. 462; Waybright v. Anderson, supra. This last statement of the law brings us to a point where, if the order is to be sustained, it must rest. Counsel for petitioner and respondent swore that respondent did not have a fair trial before the board of trustees, for the reason that two of them (naming them) "had decided to dismiss her as the evidence shows" (referring of course to the evidence taken before the board). He also swore as follows: "That the charges against" respondent "were frivolous and untrue, as she claims; hearsay testimony and rumors of all sorts were admitted in evidence to the prejudice of Mrs. Greenamyre and in accordance with the advice of * * * counsel, who acted as prosecutor as well as counsel for the Board of Trustees. This is one of the cases mentioned in the Saxton Case in which it was necessary to have a fair, just and impartial trial in a court of competent jurisdiction where the prejudices of members of the school board and political influences shall have no bearing. It will be a denial of justice to refuse to set aside the judgment entered in this case." In order to distinguish this case from some others where the attorney has attempted to subscribe to an affidavit of merits, let us observe that here the statement is unequivocal that the charges were frivolous and untrue; that hearsay and all kinds of rumor were admitted; and that respondent did not have a fair and impartial trial. In the case of Gray v. Lawlor, 151 Cal. 356, 90 P. 691, 692, 12 Ann. Cas. 990, there was an application to set aside a judgment by default in an action to quiet title. The motion was denied and the Supreme Court reversed the order, saying: "From the fact that the relief to be afforded is the privilege of answering 'to the merits of the original action,' the condition is implied that the defendant must have a sufficient answer to present; that is, he must have a good defense to the action on the merits. This being one of the conditions of the statute, the defendant must show that such defense exists. The defendant in this case has complied with this rule. He avers in his affidavit that he is now, and at all times mentioned and for more than 10 years last past has been, the owner of, and entitled to the possession of, the property described in the complaint. This, if true, is a complete defense to the cause of action sued on." In other words, the allegations of fact were a sufficient showing prima facie that a different judgment would probably result. Again the Supreme Court in Re Van Loan, 142 Cal. 423, 76 P. 37, 39, accepted recitals in an affidavit as a sufficient showing of the merits. In that case the paternal grandmother had been appointed as guardian of a four year old minor. The mother made a motion to set aside and vacate the order, and in her affidavit stated "that she was a fit and proper person to have the control, custody, and care of the minor, and could and would, with the assistance of her parents, furnish the minor with a comfortable home, and bestow upon her a mother's affection, care, attention, and control." The Supreme Court in passing upon the appeal from the order granting the motion first said: "The showing thus made by the mother was clearly sufficient to justify the court in vacating the order appointing appellant as guardian, and the letters of guardianship issued to her, so as to enable the mother to be heard upon the question as to the necessity of the appointment of a guardian, and as to whether she should be deprived of the custody of her child." Again it said: "The court could not thereon [upon the motion] determine any question as to the ultimate custody of the child, and the sole question properly before the court was as to whether the mother should be relieved from the proceedings taken against her by surprise and through her excusable neglect. The statements in her own affidavit as to her competency were a sufficient showing of merits in this behalf." So here, if it be true that the respondent was discharged upon charges that were frivolous and untrue and upon hearsay and rumor, and if two of the trustees were prejudiced against her, she ought to have her day in court. From the entire situation we are satisfied that a sufficient showing of merits was made out to warrant the order.

Order affirmed.

MOE et al. v. GIER et al.

Civ. 7907.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Aug. 31, 1931.

I. Covenants ⇨84.

Where common owner of subdivision sells some lots with restrictions and others without, purchaser without restrictions could not be forced to build within restrictive limits.

2. Covenants ⇨72.

Where common owner of subdivision sells some lots with restrictions and others without, restricted owner in action to cancel restrictions would be successful as to grantor's right to enforce restrictions against him.

3. Covenants ⇨72.

Owner of restricted lots, where common owner conveyed other lots without restrictions, would be entitled to remove any claim interfering with unrestricted use.

4. Quieting title ⇨46.

In action to quiet title and cancel restrictions on use of lots and restrain grantees from enforcing them as to other lots, plaintiff held entitled to have entire controversy adjudicated (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 738, 1060).

5. Covenants ⇨79(1).

To create equitable servitude, there must exist general scheme of uniform restrictions indicating adopted plan throughout common to all purchasers.

6. Covenants ⇨79(1).

To create equitable servitude, general scheme of restrictions and express declaration of mutual and reciprocal rights must appear in all deeds.

7. Covenants ⇨79(1).

To create equitable servitude in other lands of subdivision, deed should designate servient and dominant tenement.

8. Covenants ⇨79(1).

To create equitable servitude in other lots of subdivision, intent to create mutual and reciprocal rights of restrictions must appear in deed.

9. Covenants ⇨79(1).

Terms of deeds from common owner of lots in subdivision held not to create equitable servitude in unrestricted lots in favor of owner of restricted lots.

Various deeds from common owner of lots in subdivision did not contain sufficiently uniform scheme or plan for restrictions as to use of lots and character and value of improvements to be erected. Some of deeds contained restrictions while others did not, and restrictions in several deeds varied from each other. Deeds contained no statement that restrictions were for benefit of other lands in tract, and the dominant tenement was not designated. Intent to create mutual and reciprocal rights of restrictions between grantees did not appear when all deeds were considered together.

10. Deeds ⇨144(1).

"Condition" is qualification annexed to estate by grantor upon happening of which estate granted is enlarged or defeated.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Condition," see Words and Phrases.]

11. Covenants ⇨1.

"Covenant" is an agreement of covenantor only.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Covenant," see Words and Phrases.]

12. Deeds ⇨144(1).

"Condition" is created by mutual agreement of parties to conveyance, and is binding upon both.

13. Deeds ⇨153.

In construing condition in deed, entire context and not a single clause will determine intention of parties.

14. Covenants ⇨53.

Covenants that run with land are distinguishable from servitudes (Civ. Code, §§ 1460, 1468).

15. Covenants ⇨69(1).

Various restrictions in deeds from common owner of lots in subdivision held conditions personal to each lot owner and not covenants running with land (Civ. Code, §§ 1460, 1468).

16. Quieting title ⇨44(2).

In action to quiet title, judgment roll in former action decreeing defendants, common grantors, had no right or title or right of forfeiture based on restrictive covenants as against plaintiffs' predecessors in title, held not admissible.

17. Appeal and error ⇨1052(5).

In action to quiet title, admitting judgment roll in former case between plaintiffs' predecessors in title and some of defendants held not reversible error, in view of findings.

Findings disclosed that trial court did not find that certain grantees of the common owner had waived and relinquished their rights to enforce the purported restrictions, and that the order in the former case was directed against the common grantors only.

WARD, Justice pro tem.

This is an action to secure a decree quieting title to real property and to cancel restrictions. In April, 1922, defendant C. W. Boden, the owner and entitled to possession of a tract of land situated in the city of Oakland, county of Alameda, subdivided the tract into lots numbered 1 to 24, inclusive, and 37 to 65, inclusive, as appear upon a map designated as "Lake Knoll." Lots 25 to 35, inclusive, are designated upon a second map as "Resubdivision of Lot No. 25, Lake Knoll." Subsequently, by deed dated January 8, 1925, C. W. Boden retained two lots and conveyed all of the remaining lots to Agnes Boden. In some of the deeds of conveyance there was no provision or statement that the lot thereby conveyed was restricted as to the use of said lot, as to the character or value of improvements to be placed thereon or the position on the lot in which such improvements could be located, or as to the use or uses to which such lots could be put. In some of said deeds there were provisions inserted providing for the character and value and location of improvements which could be placed thereon and the uses to which said lots could be put. In some of the conveyances it was specified that a structure might be erected within four feet of the side line. In one deed five feet was specified. Other deeds did not contain side line restriction. Certain of the deeds contain restrictions relative to the height of fences and hedges prior to January, 1940. Some of the deeds provide that "it is expressly agreed that said parties of the second part take said real property subject to and upon said conditions and restrictions, that the same run with the land, and that in case of the violation of any of said conditions or restrictions by said parties of the second part, their heirs, executors, administrators, successors or assigns, all the right, title and interest of said parties of the second part, their heirs, executors, administrators, successors and assigns, in and to said real property, shall immediately cease and determine, and revert to and vest in said parties of the first part, their heirs, and assigns; it being further expressly agreed that forbearance by the parties of the first part, their heirs, or assigns to take advantage of any breach of said conditions or restrictions shall not constitute or be construed as a waiver of the rights of the parties of the first part, their heirs and assigns, by reason of such or any subsequent breach or default. And the said parties of the second part by the acceptance of this conveyance covenant and agree faithfully to observe and abide by all said conditions and restrictions. That the right to enforce the covenants and restrictions set forth in this deed shall run to each owner of any lot described on the aforesaid map." Many of the deeds are silent relative to restrictions, and, except for the provision above set forth as to certain lots, it is not stated that the land conveyed by the deed is a part or portion of a larger tract, or that the restrictions contained in the deeds are for the benefit of other lands, nor was there in any of the deeds any description or designation of the land which was the dominant tenement, nor was there in any of the deeds, any statement that the restrictions imposed upon each or any of the parcels of land were part of a general plan of restriction common to all the parcels in the tract or designed for the mutual benefit of all the parcels contained in the tract, nor was there in any of the deeds any statement that the parcel thereby conveyed should be subject to restrictions in accordance with any plan for the benefit of all other parcels in the tract, or that all other parcels in the tract should be subject to such restrictions for its benefit. Neither the defendant Boden nor his successor ever made public a formulated and uniform plan for restricting the use of the lots except that a pamphlet was presented to the defendants Thomas M. and Grace Gardiner. There have been erected twenty-one apartment houses, twelve single family residences and at the time of the trial there were thirty-one vacant lots in this tract. Some of the apartment houses are built right up to the property line and others are back from the property line from two to eight feet.

Plaintiffs and respondents are the owners of a certain lot, and seek to have the restrictions canceled. All defendants served permitted a default to be entered except the defendants and appellants Gardiner, who assert the right to enforce the restriction against the lots of respondents. Appellants are grantees of Boden prior to his deeding away the balance of the tract without restrictions. Appellants contend that plaintiffs were not entitled to a decree quieting title as against these restrictions; that the language in the deeds created equitable servitudes; that the language in the deeds constituted covenants running with the land; that the restrictions are enforceable though not running with the land; and that the court erred in admitting the judgment roll of the case of Oakland Title Insurance and Guaranty Co. v. Boden. The decision in Strong v. Shatto, 45 Cal. App. 29, 187 P. 159, 163, cited by appellants, is based primarily upon Brown v. Huber, 80 Ohio St. 183, 88 N. E. 322, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 707, and note, wherein it was held: "A change of circumstances cannot be considered, on a petition at law to ascertain the limits of a restriction in a deed, as equitable ground for not enforcing it," and "the covenant will not for that reason, and in advance of a breach, be declared a nullity in a suit instituted by the covenantor." In Strong v. Shatto the court also said: "As there has been no breach of the conditions here, and no attempt to enjoin such a breach or to enforce a forfeiture, we think it premature, at least, to determine the equities of the parties as they might exist at some future time in the event of such breach." The extent of the holding in Strong v. Shatto, supra, is that an action to quiet title against contractual obligation because of changed conditions will not lie. The court there was dealing with changed conditions outside but near the restricted area. The court did not hold that quiet title would not apply under different facts and circumstances. Subsequently one Albert was substituted for plaintiff Strong. A supplemental complaint was filed which has a marked resemblance to the complaint in the instant case. Upon the second hearing (Strong v. Hancock, 201 Cal. 530, 258 P. 60) the trial court gave undue importance to the decision on the former appeal (see concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Shenk), and ordered judgment practically as in the first trial. The Supreme Court held that there was sufficient evidence to sustain the trial court in denying relief, and affirmed the decision, but Strong v. Hancock, supra, did not hold that the supplemental complaint was insufficient.

[1-4] If the common owner sell some lots with restrictions and subsequently sell others without restrictions, surely it cannot be contended that those purchasing without restrictions could be forced to build, etc., within the restrictive limits. An action, under such circumstances, by a restricted property owner against the grantor alone, to cancel the restrictions, would be successful as to the grantor's right to enforce the restrictions against such restricted owner. The restricted owner would have the right to remove any cloud from his property, and any claim by any other restricted owner that might interfere with the privilege of building or using the land unrestrictedly. Hence a suit to quiet title against the remainder of the tract tenants. That quiet title is a proper action in a proceeding such as the instant case, see Bernstein v. Minney, 96 Cal. App. 601, 274 P. 614. The supplemental complaint in Strong v. Hancock, supra, was a quiet title proceeding wherein the court was asked to render a declaratory judgment. In Strong v. Shatto, 201 Cal., at pages 557-559, 258 P. 71, 72, a case growing out of the action of Strong v. Hancock, supra, the court said: "This action in its original inception was an action to quiet title and it retained this character throughout, notwithstanding its amplification both as to parties and as to the relief sought through the filing and service of the substituted plaintiff's supplemental complaint * * * since the terms, restrictions, reservations, and conditions subsequent of each and all of the deeds of each and all of the defendants to this action were fully set forth in the supplemental complaint filed herein, and the court was thereby asked to determine the respective rights and interests of each and all of said defendants thereunder and to render a declaratory judgment so doing, the court * * * did not * * * go beyond the issues tendered in said supplemental complaint." In the case at bar there can be no doubt that there is an actual controversy relating to legal rights between parties interested in a deed or deeds. Plaintiff seeks an adjudication that the purported restrictions are invalid and that defendants be restrained from attempting to enforce them. Section 1060 of the Code of Civil Procedure, enacted subsequent to the original decision in Strong v. Shatto, 45 Cal. App. 29, 187 P. 159, provides in part as follows: "Any person interested under a deed * * * may, in cases of actual controversy relating to the legal rights and duties of the respective parties, bring an action in the superior court for a declaration of his rights and duties in the premises, including a determination of any question of construction or validity arising under such instrument or contract. He may ask for a declaration of rights or duties, either alone or with other relief. * * * Such declaration may be had before there has been any breach of the obligation in respect to which said declaration is sought." Under the provision of section 738, Code of Civil Procedure, and section 1060, Code of Civil Procedure, plaintiffs are entitled to have the entire matter adjudicated at this time.

[5-9] The language in the deeds involved herein did not create equitable servitudes. To create an equitable servitude in the grant of lands in a large area, it is essential that there must be a general scheme of restrictions sufficiently uniform in character to indicate unmistakably a designated and adopted plan throughout common to all purchasers of lots. The restrictions must not only appear in one deed, but in all the deeds, and must expressly declare that such restrictions are for the benefit of and run with all other lots in the designated area. In other words, the restrictions must be for the mutual benefit of all parcel owners and each lot imposed with a servitude for the benefit of each and every other lot. It is necessary to state in the deed what is the servient and what is the dominant tenement. See Berryman v. Hotel Savoy, 160 Cal. 559, 117 P. 677, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 5; Werner v. Graham, 181 Cal. at page 174, 183 P. 945; McBride v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 152, 215 P. 678. The intent of the parties to create mutual and reciprocal rights of restrictions between the grantees of the original grantor must appear in the deed. Gamble v. Fierman, 82 Cal. App. at page 182, 255 P. 269.

The deeds provide that the restrictions run with the land and also provide that the right to enforce the covenants and restrictions set forth in a particular deed run to each owner of any lot. To enforce what? To enforce one parcel holder to keep his building five feet away from the side line; to enforce the next holder to keep away four feet from the side line, while many others need not, according to their deeds, pay any attention to side lines? Can it be said that one holder could be forced to erect a $10,000 home while a near neighbor may, unrestricted as to value, erect a shack? The deeds do not contain a sufficiently uniform scheme or plan. Some deeds are silent relative to restrictions; others contain restrictions, but differ in many respects from restrictions in other deeds. No statement appears that the restrictions are for the benefit of other lands in the tract, and the dominant tenement is not designated. The intent to create mutual and reciprocal rights of restrictions between the grantees does not appear when all the deeds are considered which is a requisite to the creation of equitable servitudes.

[10-15] In the deed in question here and in all the deeds except the deed of Boden to his wife, the word "condition" and "covenant" are used referring to the same subject-matter, namely, the restrictions set forth in the deed. "There is a decided distinction between the creation and effect of a condition and a covenant. A condition is a qualification annexed to an estate by the grantor, upon the happening of which the estate granted is enlarged or defeated; and it differs from a covenant in this: That it is created by the mutual agreement of the parties, and is binding upon both, whereas a covenant is an agreement of the covenantor only." Knight v. Black, 19 Cal. App. page 522, 126 P. 512, 514. The entire context, and not a single clause, will determine the intention of the parties. "Condition" is used in the deed synonymously with "restriction." "Conveyance" is used synonymously with "agreement." Covenants that run with the land are distinguishable from servitudes. The qualifications of covenants running with the land are set forth in section 1460, Civil Code. Section 1468, Civil Code, provides: "A covenant made by the owner of land with the owner of other land to do or refrain from doing some act on his own land, which doing or refraining is expressed to be for the benefit of the land of the covenantee, and which is made by the covenantor expressly for his assigns or to the assigns of the covenantee, runs with both of such parcels of land." There is no expression in the deed—"for the benefit of the land." The varied restrictions in these deeds are not benefits but detriments. The restrictions are not alike as to all purchasers. They are personal to each lot owner, and therefore cannot be enforced against other lot owners. Under such circumstances, no matter how expressed, they cannot run with the land. There is authority in this state holding: "These authorities undoubtedly sustain the proposition that where a proper case is presented, equity will enforce a personal covenant or agreement relative to land as effectually as would a court of law had the covenant been one clearly running with the land." Hunt v. Jones, 149 Cal. 297-301, 86 P. 686, 688. In that case there was every equitable reason to enforce the rule. In this case the varied restrictions in different deeds makes the whole project unfair and discriminating. Of course, it is not contended that the restrictions set forth in the Gardiner deed could be enforced against every lot holder in the tract. To enforce the restrictions against some of the lot owners and not against the others or to enforce the restrictions as they appear in each deed would result in a tract of land insufficiently uniform in character, would create a monopoly as to some lot owners, and would be inequitable.

[16, 17] In this case the judgment roll in Oakland Title Insurance and Guarantee Co. v. C. W. Boden and Agnes Boden was introduced. Therein the court decreed that the Bodens did not have any right, title, claim, or interest or right of reversion or right of forfeiture in or to said lots owned by plaintiff in that action, the predecessors of plaintiffs in this action. Its introduction against these defendants was inadmissible, but we think that the findings herein make it plain that the court did not find that the Gardiners had waived and relinquished their rights to enforce the purported restrictions, but that such order in that case was against the Boden defendants.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Mechanics' liens  $\hookrightarrow$ 305.

General contractor must pay all lien claims arising by reason of contract with owner.

2. Mechanics' liens  $\hookrightarrow$ 307.

In subcontractor's action against contractor for labor and materials furnished, defendant held not entitled to deduction of attorney's fees in materialman's action or amount of materialman's judgment against plaintiff (Code Civ. Proc. § 1193).

Defendant was general contractor to whom plaintiff's assignor, as subcontractor, furnished labor and materials on several jobs. On three of such jobs materialman filed mechanic's lien and brought action thereon against plaintiff's assignor, defendant and owner. In present action, defendant contended that, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1193, there should be deducted from total amount owed by him to plaintiff's assignor attorney's fees paid by defendant in such materialman's actions, together with amount of judgment rendered in favor of materialman against plaintiff's assignor and owner in one of such actions. However, Code Civ. Proc. § 1193 is applicable only in actions by contractor against owner on lien filed by contractor; and to permit defendant to recover attorney's fees in action in which it was determined he was liable would be to assist him in taking advantage of his own wrong.

3. Interest  $\hookrightarrow$ 37(1).

In subcontractor's action against contractor for labor and materials, balance due bore interest at 7 per cent.

Action by L. C. Kennedy against Norville L. Dutton for labor and materials furnished. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Modified and affirmed.

HOUSER, J.

From the record herein it appears that defendant was a general contractor to whom plaintiff's assignor (as a subcontractor) furnished labor and material on each of several different jobs, amounting in the aggregate to an ascertained balance of $2,320.22; that on each of three of such jobs a certain materialman from whom plaintiff's assignor had purchased paint supplies which had been used on such job filed his mechanic's lien, and thereafter brought an action on such claim of lien against plaintiff's assignor, defendant and the owner of the premises upon which such job was being done—and in which action the materialman duly recovered judgment; that in one of such actions defendant was the owner of the property to and for which such labor and materials were supplied; and as to the judgment recovered therein and a judgment in the second of said actions, which in the aggregate amounted to the sum of $1,127.79, defendant herein paid and satisfied the same; but that at the time judgment in the instant action was rendered the judgment rendered in the third of such actions remained unpaid and unsatisfied. However, the last-mentioned judgment ran as against plaintiff's assignor and the owner (not the defendant herein) of the property only. It also appears that for defending each of such actions this defendant paid the sum of $50 as attorney's fees, making a total of $150 paid by defendant herein for such purpose. From a judgment rendered by the trial court in favor of plaintiff for the amount found due, to wit, $2,320.22, less the aggregate sums represented by the said two judgments which were satisfied by defendant, to wit, $1,127.79, defendant appeals to this court.

[1, 2] It is urged by appellant that under the provisions of section 1193 of the Code of Civil Procedure the trial court erred in failing to deduct from the total amount owed by him to plaintiff's assignor the attorney's fees paid by defendant in the three aforesaid actions, together with the amount of the judgment rendered in favor of the materialman against plaintiff's assignor and the owner of the property in the third of such actions. However, on reading the statute to which appellant has directed attention, it becomes plain that it is applicable only in an action brought by a contractor against an owner of property to recover on a lien thereon filed by such contractor. The instant action was brought neither against such an owner of property, nor for the purpose of foreclosing a lien on property; but was for "money due" for labor and materials furnished by plaintiff's assignor to defendant at his instance and request and for which defendant promised to pay an agreed price; besides which, clearly, it was the duty of defendant as general contractor to pay and discharge all just lien claims which arose by reason of the contract entered into between defendant and the owner of the property regarding the job in question. In addition thereto, in the instant action, no pleading was presented by defendant regarding either of such items of claimed damages. Aside from the lack of statutory authority therefor, to permit defendant to recover attorney's fees in an action in which it was determined that he was liable in damages would be to financially assist him in taking advantage of his own wrong—which situation cannot be countenanced in a court of justice.

[3] Appellant also complains that in rendering judgment the trial court erred in allowing interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum on the balance found due to plaintiff. In his reply brief respondent concedes the point thus presented by appellant. It appears that the money difference between the interest computed at the lawful rate of 7 per cent. per annum and that allowed by the trial court is the sum of $25.84.

It is ordered that the judgment be modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $25.84. As thus modified, the judgment is affirmed; each party to the appeal to bear and pay his own costs.

1. Steam ☞6.

As regards liability of one furnishing steam, manner of receiving notice that steam was escaping into storeroom held immaterial.

2. Steam ☞6.

Notice, to one furnishing steam, of leak in pipe with request for repair, required furnisher to take reasonable precautions to prevent steam causing injury.

3. Appeal and error ☞197(3).

Complaint that allegation was too narrow to admit of recovery could not be made for first time on appeal.

The action was for damages from escaping steam, and the record failed to show any objection made by defendant either regarding insufficiency of pleading or evidence introduced respecting omission by defendant either to shut off steam or take any other action to protect plaintiff's property. The issue as to general negligence of defendant was fully recognized by both parties and evidence was freely presented regarding such situation.

4. Appeal and error ☞1008(1).

Under circumstances, reviewing court held powerless to disturb implied finding that loss to plaintiff was attributable to his own acts.

5. Appeal and error ☞757(4).

Alleged error in instructions cannot be considered, where appellant's brief did not contain all other instructions given which have bearing on point (Rule 8 of District Court of Appeal).

6. Damages ☞186.

Owner of clothes cleaning and pressing business complaining of damage from escaping steam held under evidence not entitled to damages for extra labor or loss of business.

In the evidence, the vital element of profit, if any, in plaintiff's business, was entirely lacking, and plaintiff testified that his books of account showed no entries of payment for extra help.

HOUSER, J.

Plaintiff was the owner and operator of a clothes cleaning and pressing business which he conducted in a storeroom which was a part of a certain building to and for the use of which the defendant furnished steam for heating and other purposes. By means of a tunnel the steam was conveyed in an 8-inch pipe to a point beneath a basement of the building of which plaintiff's storeroom was a part and which basement was directly underneath the storeroom occupied by plaintiff. From the 8-inch pipe in the tunnel the steam was carried by a 2-inch pipe to a boiler in the basement and from which boiler the steam was distributed by the owner of the building, not only to plaintiff for his use in the clothes cleaning and pressing business, but as well to other tenants on the premises. A return pipe about 1½ inches in diameter from the boiler conducted the "dead steam" back through the tunnel to the premises of the defendant.

It appears that a break occurred in a part of the return pipe which was located in the basement, which had the effect of allowing large quantities of steam to escape into the basement, and which break, after notice thereof to the defendant, not having been repaired by it for a continuous period of several months following its occurrence, had the result that, as alleged in plaintiff's complaint, great damage was done not only to the interior of the storeroom occupied by him, but as well resulted in a very considerable loss of patronage to his business. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, from which the defendant appeals.

On behalf of the defendant it is contended that the steam was delivered by it in the main 8-inch pipe only to the tunnel beneath the basement of the building of which the storeroom was a part; that neither the boiler, the 2-inch pipe, nor the return pipe from the boiler to the tunnel was owned by the defendant; and consequently that it was not liable for any damage which resulted to plaintiff by reason of the steam which escaped from the broken return pipe. However, on the trial of the action some evidence was introduced from which the conclusion might have been reached by the jury that the defendant both installed and paid for all such pipes.

[1-3] But assuming that because all such smaller pipes were so attached to the land they constituted fixtures (section 660, Civ. Code), and consequently were the property of the owner of the land upon which rested the building to which the steam was furnished, it is urged by plaintiff that, notwithstanding such assumed situation, upon notice being given to the defendant that the return pipe had broken, it became its duty to shut off the steam so as to prevent injury from resulting to plaintiff.

In 28 Corpus Juris, at page 594, the rule as to the liability of a corporation furnishing gas to consumers thereof for damages resulting from failure of the gas company, after notice, to remedy a leak in the gas service pipe, is stated as follows: " * * * When the gas company has received actual notice of a leak in a main, or in a service pipe, the company must use reasonable care to discover the cause of the leak and appropriate means to remedy it, and, if necessary, must give sufficient notice of the impending danger. It is immaterial in such case that the pipe where the leak occurred was owned by the consumer." (Citing cases.)

In the syllabus of the case of Memphis Consol. Gas & Electric Co. v. Creighton (C. C. A.) 183 F. 552, the following statement of the law occurs: "A gas company, which through its pipes supplies gas to a house and has control of the apparatus for cutting it off, when notified that gas is escaping in the house and informed of injury and danger to the inmates therefrom, owes a duty to the occupants of the house to exercise reasonable diligence in shutting off the gas therefrom, and it is immaterial that the pipes where the leak occurred were owned by the owner of the house."

And it is likewise immaterial in what manner the gas company may receive information regarding the fact that gas is escaping from its pipes and by reason thereof is causing, or is likely to cause, injury or damage. 28 C. J. 594, and authorities there cited; Luengene v. Consumers' L., H. & P. Co., 86 Kan. 866, 122 P. 1032.

It would seem clear that the doctrine announced in the foregoing authorities respecting the liability of an owner and distributor of gas should apply with equal force in an analogous case wherein the liability of an owner and distributor of steam is concerned.

However, the defendant contends that by the terms of the complaint in the action plaintiff limited himself to a recovery of a judgment against the defendant on a claim that the damages suffered by plaintiff were caused by reason of the failure of the defendant to repair the broken return pipe. With reference to such pleading, it is noted that the allegation therein was as follows: "That plaintiff immediately notified the defendants and each of them regarding the said leak and break in said pipe and further notified them and each of them to remedy and repair the said leak, but that the said defendants and each of them failed, refused and neglected to repair the said leak for a long period of time, to-wit, about six months, and that as a consequence of their neglect to repair the leak, the plaintiff has been and now is damaged in the sum of $25,000.00."

On examination of such allegation it becomes apparent that the notice to the defendant was to the effect that a "leak and break in said pipe" had occurred; "and further notified them (defendants) and each of them to remedy and repair the said leak."

As in substance has hereinbefore been indicated, the manner in which the defendant received notice of the fact that steam furnished by it was escaping in large quantities into the storeroom of plaintiff was immaterial; and manifestly it was not merely the fact itself that a leak had occurred in a steam pipe that was of such moment, not only to plaintiff but to the defendant as well, but it was the injury or damage that would or might result to plaintiff by reason of such leak that was of importance to each of them. It is evident that if loss or damage to plaintiff was to be avoided, action of some sort, either in the way of repairing the leak in the steam pipe, or by closing the valve which controlled the entrance of the steam into the pipe which was broken, was an undeniable necessity, and the conveyance of information to the defendant that a "leak and break in said pipe" had occurred and requesting the defendant "to remedy and repair the said leak," constituted not only a notice of the conditions then existing, but, in accordance with the principle of law announced in the authorities to which reference herein has been had, placed the duty on the defendant to take such reasonable precautions in the premises as would prevent the steam furnished by it from causing loss or injury to plaintiff. Presumably the defendant was in possession and control of its own plant used for the production and distribution of the steam which was furnished by it to the building in which the storeroom and business of plaintiff was located, and its knowledge of the proper steps which should be taken in the existing circumstances to reasonably protect plaintiff from loss was certainly as great, if not greater, than that of plaintiff; and a direction or request by the latter to the defendant that it adopt any particular means of preventing loss to plaintiff undoubtedly would have been regarded by the defendant as unnecessary, if not presumptuous and wholly gratuitous. Although the allegation in the complaint regarding the situation was not as specific as might have been desirable, nevertheless it was sufficient to place the defendant on notice as to the particular act of the defendant which plaintiff asserted constituted negligence, and which situation, if not remedied, was likely to cause loss or damage to plaintiff. Moreover, the record herein fails to disclose that on the trial of the action any objection was made by the defendant either regarding the insufficiency of the pleading, or to the evidence introduced by plaintiff respecting the omission by the defendant either to "shut off the steam," or to take any other action to protect the property of plaintiff from injury. The issue as to the general negligence of the defendant in the premises was fully recognized by both parties to the litigation, and evidence was freely presented regarding such situation. In such circumstances, the claim by the defendant that in effect the allegation of the complaint was too narrow to admit of the recovery of a judgment cannot be sustained.

[4] As a separate defense to the action, in effect the defendant pleaded the contributory negligence of plaintiff. It appears that in operating his business the exhaust steam from two clothes-pressing machines was discharged into the same basement into which escaped the steam from the broken return pipe of the defendant. On the trial of the action evidence was introduced by each of the parties relative to such issue, and the defendant urged the point that plaintiff was not entitled to recover damages if the exhaust steam from the clothes-pressing machines operated by plaintiff contributed in any degree to the injury or loss sustained by him. In substance, at the request of the defendant, the trial court instructed the jury in accordance with such contention of the defendant. It is manifest that by its verdict the jury impliedly found as a fact that no portion of the injury or loss of which plaintiff complained was attributable, even in part, to his own acts or conduct; and in the circumstances herein outlined this court is powerless to disturb such implied finding of fact.

[5] Appellant also complains that the trial court committed prejudicial error in giving to the jury for its consideration certain specified instructions.

Rule VIII of this court in part provides that: " * * * where instructions given to a jury are attacked as erroneous, all other instructions given, bearing upon that subject, must be printed in full in appellant's brief."

Since it appears that appellant's brief fails to contain "all other instructions given" which have a bearing upon the point presented by appellant, it follows that the error suggested by appellant cannot be considered by this court.

[6] The complaint in the action contained no specification of the several items of damage alleged to have been suffered by plaintiff. On demand of the defendant, a bill of particulars was furnished by plaintiff to the defendant, which contained an itemization of his various claims of damage, among which were cost of repairs, etc., to the interior of the storeroom occupied by plaintiff, amounting to the sum of $2,044; extra labor in conducting the business of plaintiff, $840; and for loss of business, good will and patronage, $20,916. The verdict of the jury in favor of plaintiff was for the sum of $3,500. Appellant here complains that the evidence adduced on the trial of the action was insufficient to sustain a verdict in such amount, and the attention of this court is directed, first, to the evidence which related to the damage to the interior of the storeroom, as to which appellant contends that no witness fixed the amount at a greater gross sum than $1,930.50. On the part of respondent, no claim is made to the contrary. As to the item of $840 for extra labor in re-pressing clothes, plaintiff testified: "To tell you the truth, I haven't got any expenses down here at all. I can't find any. My books of account show no entries of payments for extra help employed in re-pressing clothes, and I am not able from any record that I have to make any statement as to what I paid for extra help employed to re-press clothes during the six months June, 1925, to December, 1925."

With reference to the combined items which relate to the loss of business, good will, and patronage, plaintiff produced figures which showed the volume of business transacted by him not only throughout the six months during which the escaped steam was causing the damage to plaintiff's business, but also for a like period both preceding the time when the steam started to enter the storeroom of plaintiff, as well as succeeding the date after the leaky steam pipe had been repaired. In addition thereto, it was shown that the normal and customary increase in volume in the clothes cleaning and pressing business in general, during the particular months in which the damage was suffered by plaintiff, amounted to approximately 40 per cent. more than it did during a like period in the remaining months of the year. However, plaintiff testified that he had no records by which it might appear how many suits of clothes or dresses had been pressed or cleaned by his establishment during any particular period of time; and that: "I lost between 50 and 100 customers and that is how I arrived at the first item of $12,000 in the bill of particulars furnished by me in this action."

From the foregoing it will be noted that in the evidence the vital element of "profit," if any, in such business was entirely lacking. In no part of the evidence introduced in behalf of plaintiff may be found a statement by any person to the effect that the business as conducted by plaintiff ever produced any profit. As far as the evidence discloses, it is not impossible that the business of plaintiff may have been conducted at a loss.

In the case of Gibson v. Hercules Mfg., etc., Co., 80 Cal. App. 689, 703, 252 P. 780, 785, it is said: "In 8 Cal. Jur., p. 777, the distinction is clearly drawn by the text-writer as to when loss of profits may be allowed. If the business is established and is interrupted, past profits furnish the basis for calculating the damage. If the business is unestablished, such anticipated profits are held to be remote, uncertain, and speculative, on the ground that no satisfactory statement of the loss can be made. To state it in different language: No one can say that any profits would ever have been realized. The rules which we are here stating relative to loss of future profits are also clearly set forth in Shoemaker v. Acker, 116 Cal. at pages 244, 245, 48 P. 62. The substance of the holding there is that when the business prevented or interrupted is an established one, a basis for allowing damages is found in the past profits of the concern, but, if no business has ever been done, no profits earned, the possibility of proving profits does not exist, and no court can determine whether there would be profits, or whether the prospective business would not rather result in losses." (Citing cases.)

And in the case of Bird v. United States (C. C. A.) 24 F.(2d) 933, 936, the following statement appears: "Moreover, it is elementary that, to recover for the loss of future or anticipated profits, the burden is upon the plaintiff, not only to show the probable gross income, but the probable cost to him of producing it. The difference between the two is the measure of his loss. * * *

It follows that neither as to the item of extra labor nor the item which related to the loss of business, etc., is plaintiff entitled to recover any damages from the defendant.

Accordingly, it is ordered that the judgment of the lower court be modified so as to show a total damage to plaintiff in the sum of $1,930.50; and as thus modified, the judgment is affirmed; appellant to recover its costs on appeal.

Action by Joseph A. Richardson against B. D. Davis. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Norman A. Eisner, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John R. Tyrrell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued upon a written contract for advertising. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment went for plaintiff as prayed. The defendant appeals upon typewritten transcripts.

On February 20, 1928, the parties executed a contract in writing under which plaintiff agreed to run thirty feet of advertising film six days a week alternating weekly between the Southern Pacific and Key Route waiting rooms in the Ferry building at San Francisco for the term of fifty-two weeks. The defendant agreed to pay therefor the sum of $30 a week, payable monthly after the first exhibit, which was to start March 1, 1928. The contract provided: "Films may be changed twice monthly."

On February 21, 1928, defendant wrote to the plaintiff that the contract was canceled. On February 27 the parties entered into an oral contract under which plaintiff agreed to furnish the same advertising for a period of two years at $15 a week, or $65 a month, films to be run three days a week instead of six. On April 26, 1928, defendant sent written notice to plaintiff that this contract was terminated as of May 1 following. Plaintiff continued to run the film for the full period of two years, carrying without change an advertisement of a special sale of automobiles conducted by defendant at his places of business at 1521 and 690 Van Ness avenue in San Francisco. This sale was advertised to commence March 1, 1928. The business at 690 Van Ness was discontinued in October of that year.

Plaintiff sued upon the written contract of February 20, alleging however, that there became due under the contract $65 a month, whereas the contract provided for payments of $30 a week. Defendant answered, admitting the execution of the contract pleaded, denying generally that any sum was due under it, and pleading specially that the contract was abandoned and rescinded by mutual consent.

During the trial plaintiff was forced to admit the abandonment of the written contract, and then asked for and was granted leave to amend to conform to the proofs by pleading a new or modified contract in the terms of the oral agreement of February 27. The defendant then proved the cancellation of this contract on April 26 in the manner above set forth. The complaint having been filed before the end of the two-year period, the trial court limited its findings to the fourteen months preceding May 1, 1929, and found that the plaintiff had performed all the terms of the contract as modified, and gave judgment for plaintiff for $780 upon the conclusion of law that said sum was due "for services rendered under said contract."

[1-3] On this appeal the appellant attacks the judgment on the ground that, the contract having been canceled or repudiated by him, respondent's only remedy was to sue in damages for the breach. Appellant rests his case on the well-accepted rule that a party to a contract has the power to stop performance on the other side by explicit direction to that effect, subjecting himself to such damages as will compensate the other party for the breach, and that the party thus forbidden cannot go on and thereby increase the damages. 6 R. C. L., p. 1029; Davis v. Bronson, 2 N. D. 300, 50 N. W. 836, 16 L. R. A. 655, 33 Am. St. Rep. 783; Danforth v. Walker, 37 Vt. 239, 244; Dugan v. Anderson, 36 Md. 567, 11 Am. Rep. 509; Spratt v. Brown-Petzel Lumber Co., 105 Or. 672, 210 P. 700, 701; Southworth v. Rosendahl, 133 Minn. 447, 158 N. W. 717, 718, 3 A. L. R. 468; Thomas v. Clayton Piano Co., 47 Utah, 91, 151 P. 543, 544; Peck & Co. v. Kansas City M. R. & C. Co., 96 Mo. App. 212, 70 S. W. 169, 170.

The remedy for such a breach is declared in section 3300, Civil Code, to be the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby. And section 3358 of the same Code declares that no person can recover a greater amount of damages for the breach of a contract than he could have gained by the full performance.

Under the authorities, the conclusion is unescapable that the respondent's right of action was for damages only, that he could not enhance these damages by continued performance after notice of repudiation, and that the judgment for "services rendered" is contrary to law.

[4] Respondent does not question these principles of law. His only defense of the judgment is that the point was not raised in the trial court. In this he is in error. He pleaded and rested on a written contract. Appellant alleged that this contract was abandoned. The proof showed conclusively that such was the fact. Respondent then obtained leave to plead another contract. No special pleading was filed in answer to this amendment, but all the evidence showing its repudiation was received without objection. There is no doubt that the issue of repudiation was fully tried, and, though the trial court found that the contract was not "mutually abandoned," it did not find on the issue of repudiation. The evidence was there, not merely uncontradicted, but admitted, that the contract was repudiated.

When such is the case, the action must be for damages for the breach and not for services rendered under the contract after repudiation. In a similar case, Thomas v. Clayton Piano Co., supra, the court say: "It is true that the damages may equal the amount stipulated in the contract under certain circumstances; but, if that be so, then the fact must be established by proper evidence. It cannot be established by merely proving that the plaintiff proceeded to perform after the renunciation had been made."

The judgment is reversed.

SCRIMSHER et al. v. RELIANCE ROCK CO.
Civ. 6713.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.
Sept. 3, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 1, 1931.

1. Trial ☞165.

As against motion for nonsuit, every favorable inference from evidence must be considered in plaintiff's favor.

2. Trial ☞165.

As against motion for nonsuit, plaintiff must be given benefit of evidence which tends to sustain his averments.

3. Trial ☞139(1).

If plaintiff has introduced proof sufficient to make out prima facie case, nonsuit should be denied.

4. Master and servant ☞284(2).

As against motion for nonsuit, evidence in action for death of employee caused by negligent operation of power shovel hired by employer held sufficient to establish that operator of shovel was shovel owner's servant.

5. Master and servant ☞301(4).

Generally, employer who lends his employee, together with some instrumentality within his control, to another for performance of some undertaking, is liable for employee's negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by Mamie E. Scrimsher and another against the Reliance Rock Company. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal.

Reversed.

F. Ray Risdon, J. L. Kearney, and James D. Randles, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Bauer, Wright & Macdonald and Fred E. Pettit, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J.

From the record herein it appears that one Scrimsher while working in the course of his employment received injuries (which later resulted fatally to him) from the negligent operation of a power shovel, which Scrimsher's employer, Oswald Brothers, had rented from the defendant Reliance Rock Company. On the trial of the action brought by the widow and guardian ad litem of the children of the deceased against one Robert C. Barnes, who was the workman in charge of the power shovel (and who hereinafter is termed the operator or engineer), and the Reliance Rock Company, at the close of the evidence presented by the plaintiffs, an order of nonsuit was entered in favor of Reliance Rock Company; and it is from the resultant judgment that the appeal herein is prosecuted.

From an examination of the reporter's transcript of the record of proceedings at the trial of the action, for the purposes here involved, it appears that the power shovel in question was the property of the defendant Reliance Rock Company; that about three weeks prior to the date of the accident Oswald Brothers rented the power shovel from Reliance Rock Company at an agreed compensation of $5 per hour, which included the services of an engineer to operate the same. Relating to the hiring of the power shovel and its operation during the time both immediately preceding as well as at the time when the accident occurred, the testimony given by one of the members of the firm of Oswald Brothers shows that he inquired of a salesman of Reliance Rock Company if Oswald Brothers "could get the use of it (the power shovel), and he said he thought I could, so he went back to his office and came back and said I could get the use of it." At that particular time nothing was said "about whose engineer would run it." But later, "I (the witness) think I called him at that time and asked him if he could not get an operator for me, and he said he thought he could. * * * I told him to try and get one. * * * I asked him if he could get an operator for it, and he said he thought he could."

Also, as shown by the testimony given by the same witness, Oswald Brothers did not hire the operator of the shovel.

"Q. And the Reliance Rock Company furnished the engineer? A. Well, I guess they did. * * *

"Q. When did you hear from him (the representative of Reliance Rock Company), if at all, with reference to whether he could get you a man or not? A. Well, I didn't hear after that at all. The next day the shovel was operating, so I imagine the man was there."

The arrangements made between the operator of the shovel and Reliance Rock Company were shown by the testimony given by the former as follows:

"Q. How did you happen to go on the job?

A. Well, Birney Hodges (representative of Reliance Rock Company) came down to my house June 23rd, I believe it was, and asked me if I wanted to go to work, said he had a job working for Oswald Brothers unloading—unloading sand and gravel for Oswald Brothers. I asked him if it would be a pretty steady job and he said yes. * * *

"Q. What did you say to him? A. I told him I would go to work, yes.

"Q. And you went to work the next morning? A. Yes, sir."

The record further shows that the name of the operator was not carried as an employee on the books of Oswald Brothers.

"Q. And you (Oswald Brothers) never did pay for the services of the engineer aside from the rental for the shovel? A. Well, we never carried him, no. The bill came in and we paid the bill.

"Q. Whom did you pay it to? A. The Reliance Rock Company."

The fact stands admitted in the record that Reliance Rock Company originally paid for the services of the operator of the power shovel, and that the compensation later paid by Oswald Brothers to Reliance Rock Company for the use of the shovel included the compensation paid by the latter to the operator thereof for his services. The record herein is silent as to the existence of any agreement between Reliance Rock Company and Oswald Brothers to the effect that in any way the former surrendered or resigned control of its employee other than that Oswald Brothers had authority to direct him "what to do in the performance of the work." Billig v. Southern Pacific Company, 189 Cal. 477, 485, 209 P. 241, 244.

[1-3] In determining the question of whether a nonsuit should be granted, some of the settled principles of law which should be taken into consideration are that: "Every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence adduced must be considered as facts proved in favor of the plaintiff. Where evidence is fairly susceptible of two constructions, or if one of several inferences may reasonably be made, the court must take the view most favorable to the plaintiff. * * * The plaintiff must be given the benefit of every piece of evidence which tends to sustain his averments and such evidence must be weighed in a light most favorable to plaintiff's claim. * * * The evidence must be taken most strongly against the defendant, and, if the plaintiff has introduced proof sufficient to make out a prima facie case under the allegations of his complaint, the motion, if made upon the close of the case, should be denied." (Citing cases.) Rabe v. Western Union Tel. Co., 198 Cal. 290, 294, 244 P. 1077, 1078.

[4] Considering that one of the issues in the action upon which depended the case for the plaintiffs as against the defendant Reliance Rock Company was whether the operator of the power shovel at the time of the happening of the accident was an employee of said defendant, by application of the principles of law to which attention hereinbefore has been directed which relate to the determination of a motion for nonsuit, it becomes apparent that for such purpose the evidence introduced by the plaintiffs on the trial of the action, if it did not clearly establish the fact itself, readily would admit of the inference that the operator of the power shovel was an employee of the defendant Reliance Rock Company at the time in question.

[5] Although it may be admitted that in some jurisdictions an employer who lends his employee, together with some instrumentality within his control, to another for the performance either of a general or a special undertaking is freed from liability arising from the negligence of such employee, generally speaking the rule in this state, as attested by many authorities, is to the contrary.

In the case of Stewart v. California Improvement Co., 131 Cal. 125, 63 P. 177, 724, 52 L. R. A. 205, it appeared that an engineer was employed and paid by the defendant corporation to operate a steam roller which, with the services of such engineer, had been hired at a per diem rate by a city from the defendant corporation. In an action for damages for personal injury which arose from the alleged negligence of the engineer, it was held that the engineer was the servant, not of the city to which his services had been lent, together with the steam roller, but of the defendant corporation, and that the latter was liable for such damages as resulted to the plaintiff from the negligent operation of the roller.

In the case of Billig v. Southern Pacific Co., 189 Cal. 477, 209 P. 241, 244, a situation was involved similar to that here under consideration, and the doctrine announced in Stewart v. California Improvement Co., 131 Cal. 125, 63 P. 177, 724, 52 L. R. A. 205, was affirmed. Among other things, it is there said: "Whatever the rule and its variations may be in other jurisdictions, it is the settled rule of law in this state, applicable to cases of the character under consideration here, that a general employer is not freed from responsibility for the negligent acts of an employee merely because the employee has been hired out by the employer to a third person, to be used by the latter in the performance of his work. * * *

And reiterating the principle, the court also said: "It would appear, therefore to be the rule in this state that, when a master hires out, under a rental agreement, the services of an employee for the operation of an instrumentality owned by the master, together with the use of the instrumentality, without relinquishing to the hirer the power to discharge such servant, to go where and perform such work as the hirer directs, the legal presumption is that, although the hirer directs the servant where to go and what to do in the performance of the work, the servant, as the operator of the instrumentality employed in the doing of the work, remains, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the servant of the general employer in so far as concerns the manner and method of operating the instrumentality, and the negligence of the servant must be held to be that of the owner, and not that of the hirer, of the instrumentality." (Citing authorities.)

To the same effect, see Umsted v. Scofield Engineering Const. Co., 203 Cal. 224, 263 P. 799; Peters v. United Studios, 98 Cal. App. 373, 277 P. 156; Valdick v. LeClair, 106 Cal. App. 489, 289 P. 673.

It follows that the judgment herein should be reversed. It is so ordered.

NISHI v. INOUCHI et al.
Civ. 6801.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.
Aug. 29, 1931.

1. Evidence ⇨222(10).

Admissions against interest by one defendant are not admissible to establish liability of other defendant.

2. Evidence ⇨317(1).

In action for money had and received, testimony disclosing conversations between defendant who admitted liability and third party held inadmissible as against other defendant, being hearsay.

One of the defendants admitted his liability to the plaintiff. Such defendant was permitted to testify concerning conversations had between him and third party in defendant's absence regarding money received from plaintiff.

3. Appeal and error ⇨125.

Defendant who admitted liability and consented to judgment cannot on appeal question its validity on ground of alleged errors in admission or rejection of evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by K. Nishi against Fred Inoguchi and others. Motion for nonsuit was granted as to the defendant Hiroshi Nakamura, and from an adverse judgment, defendants Fred Inoguchi and LeRoy Reames appeal.

Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

James R. Jaffray and LeRoy Reames, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

J. Marion Wright, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J.

This action was brought by plaintiff to recover the sum of $3,000 alleged to have been had and received by defendants for the use and benefit of plaintiff. Motion for nonsuit was granted as to defendant Nakamura. At the time of trial, by a pleading called a "supplementary answer," Inoguchi not only admitted that he was indebted to plaintiff in the sum for which the action was brought, but as well consented that judgment be so entered against him. A like judgment was also rendered in favor of plaintiff and against defendant Reames. The evidence showed that Inoguchi received the sum of $3,000 from the plaintiff, to be used as bail for a Japanese named Fukasaka, but that instead of depositing the cash bail, Inoguchi procured a bond from a bond company for such purpose and thereafter appropriated to his own use the money intrusted to him by plaintiff.

As tending to establish the liability of defendant Reames, plaintiff introduced in evidence a certain letter purportedly signed by Reames, but regarding which Reames testified that although he dictated the letter he never signed the same, nor authorized his signature to be attached thereto, but, to the contrary, that the letter "was signed and mailed by his secretary in ordinary course of business, but without his (Reames') knowledge or consent." A copy of such letter is as follows:

"For your information and for your files please be informed that we have received the $3,000.00 bond posted in re Fukasaka. Said amount we have applied to your indebtedness to this firm leaving a balance due of $1,200.00 as per our agreement. We now have several important matters pending for you and please be advised that June 1st, it will be necessary for you to make new arrangements for the foregoing year.

"Thanking you for your patronage in the past, we remain."

Other than testimony (hereinafter referred to) given by a so-called impeaching witness, which related to certain alleged conversations had between him and defendant Inoguchi without the presence of defendant Reames, no further evidence was introduced by plaintiff relative to the liability of defendant Reames. However, both Inoguchi and Reames testified that the latter "did not receive any of the money in question from Inoguchi or at all."

Appellants urge that as to defendant Reames prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in admitting in evidence, over the objection of defendants, those certain conversations which were shown to have occurred, not in the presence of defendant Reames, but only between defendant Inoguchi and a witness named Fujii. The testimony given by the so-called impeaching witness was in narrative form and included the following: "Mr. Inoguchi told me that he got $3,000.00 from Mr. Nishi and he said that this money was given to him to put up as security for a bond for $3,000.00 for the release of his brother-in-law. The bond was exonerated and the money was refunded to his lawyer, Mr. Reames. He said, 'He keeps that money and he refuses to return that money to me. I can't pay the money back to Mr. Nishi.' He said that he had consulted some Japanese lawyer, I think he named the name of Attorney Iwamaja and Mr. Iwamaja told him in his opinion he wouldn't be able to recover this money from Mr. Reames because there was no evidence to show that the money had ever been paid to Mr. Reames, and he said 'Therefore I am very sorry that I can't get this money back for Mr. Nishi. I am willing to make a note and pay it to him some day.'" The witness also testified to other conversations to the same effect which took place between him and Inoguchi without the presence of defendant Reames.

[1, 2] Such conversations were admitted in evidence, not on the theory that they constituted admissions against interest as far as Inoguchi was concerned, but solely on the claim by plaintiff that they were in the nature of impeachment of testimony given by Inoguchi, who by his pleading already had admitted his liability and consented that judgment be rendered against him, but who, under the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, was called as a witness for plaintiff. From the record, although it appears that the testimony included in such alleged conversations was contradictory to that given by Inoguchi, for the reason that no proper statutory foundation was laid for the testimony given by the witness Fujii, it is manifest that in no proper sense did the evidence thus adduced constitute an impeachment of the testimony given by Inoguchi by a showing that at other times he had made "statements inconsistent, with his present testimony." Section 2052, Code Civ. Proc. But even if such testimony had been properly admitted in evidence for the purpose of impeaching the testimony of Inoguchi, it is clear that evidence to the effect that at some definite time and place Inoguchi made statements which were inconsistent with the testimony given by him on the trial of the action, merely reflected upon his credibility; and neither established, nor tended to establish, the truth regarding the matter concerning which Inoguchi made such alleged statements. Nor from any standpoint developed by the evidence adduced on the trial of the action was the testimony given by the so-called impeaching witness competent or admissible as against defendant Reames. He was a defendant in the case wholly independent from Inoguchi. Assuming (without conceding) that considering the fact that Inoguchi had already consented that judgment be rendered against him, any admission against interest made by Inoguchi might have been introduced in evidence as against him individually, it is universally attested by authorities that in circumstances like those here present such admissions necessarily would affect the case of Inoguchi only and could not be considered in evidence as in anywise tending to establish the liability of defendant Reames. Bituminized B. & T. Co. v. Simons Brick Co., 183 Cal. 687, 192 P. 528; Ambrose v. Hyde, 145 Cal. 555, 79 P. 64; Bell v. Staacke, 141 Cal. 186, 74 P. 774; Dean v. Ross, 105 Cal. 227, 38 P. 912.

In view of the fact that the properly admitted evidence in support of plaintiff's action against defendant Reames was very slight, it becomes apparent that the improperly admitted evidence against him probably had the effect of inducing the judge who presided at the trial to render the judgment which is the subject of this appeal. In the case of Smith v. Westerfield, 88 Cal. 374, 383, 26 P. 206, 208 (where, however, a different situation was involved), it was said: "This is not a case where an incidental and collateral fact which may not be seriously contested had been shown by incompetent evidence, but the testimony of the witness bore directly upon the main point in issue. In such a case all the evidence upon that point becomes material, and the introduction of any incompetent testimony is presumed to cause an injury to the opposite party. We cannot determine the weight which the court below gave to the testimony of this witness in reaching its conclusion upon this controverted point."

Likewise, in the case of Estate of James, 124 Cal. 653, 655, 57 P. 578, 579, 1008, it is said: "If improper evidence under objection has been admitted, it is impossible for this court to say how much weight and influence it had in the mind of the trial court in framing its findings of fact. The improperly admitted evidence may have been all-powerful to that effect. As far as this court knows, it may have been that particular evidence which turned the scale, and lost the case to the appellants. This must, of necessity, be the rule wherever improper evidence has been admitted, which, upon its face, tends in any degree to affect the final conclusion of the court."

[3] As far as concerns defendant Reames, it becomes unnecessary to consider other questions presented by him on this appeal. Defendant Inoguchi, having by his pleading admitted his liability to plaintiff for the amount for which the action was brought, and at the same time having consented that judgment might be entered against him for the amount prayed for in the complaint, is not entitled on appeal to question the validity of the judgment because of any alleged errors committed by the trial court either in the admission or the rejection of evidence.

It is ordered that as to defendant Inoguchi the judgment be and it is affirmed; but as to defendant Reames, the judgment be and it is reversed.

HOUSER, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Two actions by the Santa Ana Sugar Company against Carlin G. Smith were consolidated for trial. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Reversed.

O'Melveny, Tuller & Myers and H. R. Snyder, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Freston & Files and Charles H. King, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J.

This is an appeal from a judgment covering two cases—Nos. 162584 and 171792—which two cases were consolidated for trial and were tried together upon the same evidence.

The first of these actions was brought to recover on twenty-five promissory notes, the complaint alleging that the defendant for a valuable consideration waived any right which he (the respondent here) thereafter had to plead the bar of the statute of limitations against any and all actions which might be commenced on said indebtedness evidenced by said promissory notes, provided action should be commenced within one year from the date of the agreement of November 13, 1924. It was further alleged that, although the defendant had paid the plaintiff certain amount on account of said promissory notes, there was still due on such notes the sum of $45,190.38, together with interest at 8 per cent. per annum from the date of the notes, and reasonable attorney's fees, costs, etc.

In the second action—No. 171792—the complaint alleged that the defendant guaranteed the payment of seventeen promissory notes (other and different than those sued on in the first action) which notes were executed by the defendant's wife. It is also alleged that on November 13, 1924, defendant for a valuable consideration guaranteed in writing the payment not later than December 13, 1924, of all sums then due from defendant's wife on said notes, whether such sums were then or might thereafter become barred by the terms of the statute of limitations. The complaint then prays for judgment in the amount of $8,677.50, alleging that this was the amount unpaid on the seventeen promissory notes mentioned, together with interest, reasonable attorneys' fees, costs and other relief.

In both of these actions the defendant answered, and after admitting the execution of the promissory notes and the guaranty of the notes executed by the wife of the defendant, and after admitting the agreement purporting to waive the bar of the statute of limitations signed November 13, 1924, set up affirmative defenses in both cases which sought to avoid the liability incurred.

The first of these affirmative defenses was that, prior to and at the time of the execution of the notes sued upon, an oral agreement was entered into and in effect between the parties providing that certain advances made by appellant to respondent, evidenced by the notes in suit, should be paid only out of crop returns credited to respondent, that any deficit in one year's crop should be carried over to the succeeding crop year, and so on, until such advancements were paid; and if a deficit remained when respondent should for any cause cease growing sugar beets, the amount of the advances then remaining unpaid should fall upon appellant. It is alleged in this defense that the defendant refused to sign, make, execute, or deliver the notes in question when the same were presented for that purpose, and that plaintiff, through its agent, represented that the purpose of the execution and delivery of said notes was merely to protect plaintiff in its claim to the crops as against third parties, and that the foregoing agreement would still control and defendant would not be obliged to pay the notes in question. Upon this understanding and with that single purpose, the notes were then executed. It is also alleged in the answer that these promises and representations of the plaintiff were false and were made without any intention of performing the same. As further affirmative defenses, it was alleged by defendant that when he signed the agreement of November 13, 1924, there was no meeting of the minds of the parties, and also that the contract of November 13, 1924, was executed and delivered under duress.

The trial court in its findings found everything in favor of the defendant, and particularly: That on said day, November 13, 1924, and for some time prior thereto—without specifying the time—the defendant had been ill, and defendant's condition of mind and his nervous and physical condition were such that he did not have any clear conception of what he was doing or what it meant to him when he signed and executed the said waiver of any right to plead the bar of the statute of limitations and the said guarantee of said notes of Helen Keating Smith (his wife), as aforesaid, and that he did not freely or understandingly give assent or consent thereto, and that he did not know the nature and consequence of his act or acts.

Therefore, the only questions involved are:

1. Is appellant correct in its contention that the trial court erred in admitting evidence to prove an oral contemporaneous agreement, changing, modifying, and practically contradicting the clear and unambiguous terms of the promissory notes sued upon?

2. That even if such evidence could have been admitted, still as a matter of substantive law, can such evidence modify or vary the legal effect of the written promise?

3. Did the court err in admitting evidence to prove oral conversations between Gerhart, the appellant's agent, and one of the executive officers of the company, by which it was sought to establish that Gerhart was given authority to make any arrangement he saw fit with the defendant to induce him to raise sugar beets?

4. Did the court err in admitting oral evidence as to the conversations which occurred at the time the defendant executed the agreement of November 13, 1924?

5. Whether or not appellant is right in its contention that (irrespective of whether such evidence was properly admitted) the facts alleged as a basis for escaping from the obligations of said contract were and are, as a matter of law, insufficient to justify a finding that it was obtained under duress, or insufficient to relieve defendant from the obligations of the contract?

From an examination of the entire record, it clearly appears that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment, unless the so-called affirmative defenses were good. As stated by appellant, the whole case boils itself down, therefore, to these issues:

First. Could the court receive evidence of the alleged oral understanding, which it is claimed was made at the same time the notes were executed, to the effect that defendant would not have to pay them under certain contingencies; and even if such evidence were received, does it in law constitute a defense to the action?

Second. Can the defendant escape the legal effects of his contract of guaranty and waiver of the statute of limitations made November 13, 1924—which it is admitted he executed—on the plea that he did so under duress, because if he had not signed the same the plaintiff would have brought suit on the notes before the statute of limitations expired, or can he escape liability on the plea that he did not fully understand said contract?

[1, 2] Conditional delivery refers to conditions precedent and not to conditions subsequent, and may or may not depend upon conditions concurrent. There is no question but that the terms of a written agreement cannot be modified by parol (20 A. L. R. 421, at page 490, and annotations supplemental thereto in 54 A. L. R. 702, at page 717), although it is also true that a conditional delivery may be so proved, if not in direct conflict with the express wording of the written agreement itself. But the attempt to show that the delivery of the notes in this case was conditional fails: First, because it is in direct conflict with the written agreement (Leonard v. Miner, 120 Cal. 403, 52 P. 655; Lompoc Valley Bank v. Stephenson, 156 Cal. 350, 104 P. 449); and, second, because the only proof of conditional delivery was evidence of conversations that took place after the delivery of at least a portion of the consideration for the notes in question. Further, it appears in evidence that on November 13, 1924, an additional agreement was made guaranteeing the payment of the notes and waiving the statute of limitations, upon the express condition that a suit should be brought upon said notes within a certain length of time. And as we view it, this operated as a republication of the notes of the defendant. The claim of respondent that this agreement was signed by reason of duress, in that he was afraid that suit would be brought, is not legally good, because this in itself would not constitute duress. A threat to exercise a valid, legal right cannot be construed to be an act of duress. There is no evidence that the plaintiff was aware of the fact that the defendant had signed a false statement at his bank with reference to his indebtedness, and was, therefore, afraid if suit was brought it might cause him trouble with the bank. There is no evidence that defendant was without any understanding on November 13, 1924; in fact, the only evidence as to his mental status was that he did not remember at the time of trial what was said on the date when he signed the agreement waiving the bar of the statute of limitations against the notes, except that he was physically in bad health at or about the time he signed this agreement, no definite date being fixed as to when he was physically in such ill health. There is, in fact, no evidence whatever as to his physical condition or as to his mental incompetency or condition on the particular day when the agreement of waiver was signed.

As a part of the same agreement made on November 13, 1924, the defendant agreed as follows: "Debtor hereby guarantees the payment, not later than December 13, 1924, (or if suits aggregating more than $2500.00 are pending or instituted, as aforesaid, then at the time such suits are instituted), of all sums now due from Helen K. Smith (sometimes known as Helen Keating Smith or H. K. Smith) to Creditor, whether such claims are now or may be hereafter barred by the statute of limitations."

The consideration for this agreement was that Smith desired the creditor to defer bringing action on any of the indebtedness which he admitted was due from him at that time, and the creditor agreed to defer bringing such action only upon condition that Smith enter into the agreement in the form as signed. The creditor forbore to institute at any time before December 13, 1924, any action against

Smith based on any or all of his indebtedness, unless the action or actions pending or instituted against Smith involved in the aggregate more than $2,500. The consideration was ample and the only questions raised are: First, whether or not the agreement of guaranty is good even though made for a consideration; and, second, whether or not respondent Smith was entirely without understanding at the time he signed this agreement on November 13, 1924. As to his mental incompetency, we have covered that point in a preceding portion of this opinion.

[3] As to the question of whether or not an agreement to pay the debt of another is good when the indebtedness of the other has been outlawed by the statute of limitations, that is a question that has been determined differently in different jurisdictions, usually depending upon the particular facts and circumstances attending the particular transaction. Upon the face of the record, it appears that all of the notes of his wife that were guaranteed by the defendant had become outlawed before his agreement to pay all of these notes was made. There was ample consideration, as we have said before, for the making of this agreement. The trial court found that this guaranty in writing of the notes signed and executed by Helen Keating Smith was signed at a time when "the defendant had been ill, and defendant's condition of mind and his nervous and physical condition was such that he did not have any clear conception of what he was doing or what it meant to him when he signed and executed the said waiver of any right to plead the bar of the statute of limitations and the said guarantee of said notes of Helen Keating Smith as aforesaid, and that he did not freely or understandingly give assent or consent thereto and that he did not know the nature and consequence of his act or acts.

"That prior to November 13th, 1924, the plaintiff threatened the defendant to institute proceedings against him to recover on said notes and to issue and levy attachments in said legal proceedings.

"That the defendant was conducting his business with money borrowed from his bank and that in order to obtain such credit, it has been necessary for the defendant to submit to the said bank a financial statement, and upon making up such statement the defendant has failed to list thereon any debt or debts evidenced by the promissory notes aforesaid in that the said defendant believed at that time that the said plaintiff would not require him, the defendant, to make any payment thereon or thereunder.

"That at the time the defendant was requested by the plaintiff to enter into the contract of November 13, 1924, the plaintiff threatened the defendant that unless he entered into such contract it would cause action or actions to be commenced against him and would attach and levy upon any and all property which it could discover as belonging to him, and the defendant informed the plaintiff that such action or actions instituted against him would ruin his credit with his bank and make it impossible for him to carry on and continue his business, which was that of a real estate dealer or broker. That notwithstanding the representations made by the defendant to plaintiff as aforesaid and notwithstanding the defendant's physical and nervous condition, the plaintiff continued to threaten to commence legal proceedings against the defendant and to issue attachments, and that by reason thereof the defendant was unduly influenced by such threats and was compelled to and did sign the said contract or contracts dated November 13, 1924, and that the defendant did not understand the nature and consequence thereof or the obligation or obligations he was assuming thereby, and that by reason thereof there was no assent or consent on his part, as aforesaid."

There is, however, in the evidence before us, nothing which would justify the said findings or any part thereof, except only that the plaintiff did threaten defendant to institute proceedings to recover on his notes and to issue and levy attachments in such legal proceedings, and, as we have said before, a threat to exercise a legal right cannot in itself constitute duress. The court does not find, and it is not in evidence, that the plaintiff was aware of the fact that the defendant had concealed from his bank when borrowing money any knowledge of the notes signed by him in favor of the plaintiff. There is evidence that the defendant discussed at this time, when the court finds that he was incompetent, the fact as to what effect the bringing of the suits would have upon his credit with the bank, and also otherwise as to his business in general. There is no evidence that would justify the court in finding that the defendant did not understand the nature or consequence of the contract of November 13, 1924, or the obligation or obligations that he was assuming thereby.

Under all the circumstances shown by the evidence, we are of the opinion that the agreement of November 13, 1924, was also valid in so far as it constituted a guaranty of the notes executed by the wife of the defendant, and made him liable to the plaintiff therefor.

One judgment having been entered in the two consolidated actions, the order of this court is that the judgment of the lower court be, and the same is hereby, reversed.

CONREY, P. J.

I concur in the judgment. There are two principal questions in the case. The first relates to the admissibility of testimony offered by defendant to prove that he was not legally obligated on the notes signed by him. The second relates to the validity of defendant's guaranty of his wife's notes, these notes having been outlawed at the time when the guaranty agreement of defendant was made.

The notes executed by defendant were promises to pay money, "in gold coin of the United States." Each note contained this further statement: "All amounts hereafter coming due to me from said Santa Ana Sugar Company are hereby assigned to it to be applied in payment of this note until it is fully paid." Defendant's answer admits that the moneys received by him were advances made to him for the purposes of planting and cultivation of his beets "until the crop was ready for marketing, when the plaintiff would purchase such crop from the defendant." It is thus established that the oral evidence received by the court, to the effect that in certain contingencies the defendant would be excused from liability, was testimony received for the purpose of modifying the express provisions of the notes. The objections to such evidence should have been sustained.

The second question seems to be not very difficult, when one keeps in mind the fact that the notes given by defendant's wife had become outlawed before the guaranty agreement was made. This fact at once excludes such cases as Anderson v. Shaffer, 98 Cal. App. 457, 277 P. 185, which are authority for the proposition that where the obligation of the principal debtor has been allowed to expire by limitation after the time of making of the guarantor's promise, the creditor may not, under such circumstances, enforce the guaranty. But there is no rule or policy of law which should prevent one from entering into an agreement of guaranty of payment of a barred debt, where the guaranteed obligation is not itself tainted with any element of illegality.

I also agree with the conclusion that the evidence does not support the finding of the lower court that defendant was not competent to make the contracts, or the finding that they were made under duress.

HOUSER, J.

I dissent. In the first action it appears that, based upon a proper pleading which was supported by sufficient evidence, the trial court made specific findings of fact which constituted fraud on the part of the plaintiff in inducing defendant to sign and to deliver physical possession of each of the instruments upon which such action was founded. In addition thereto, as expressly provided by the terms of section 3097 of the Civil Code, as between the immediate parties to a negotiable instrument, "the delivery may be shown to have been conditional, or for a special purpose only, and not for the purpose of transferring the property in the instrument." Numerous authorities fully support the conclusion that, having established either fraud in the inducement of the execution of the asserted instrument, or that no legal delivery thereof was either intended or had by its maker, no recovery of a judgment may be had on such instrument by its immediate payee.

As to the second action, since it appears that the assumed guaranty by the defendant of each of the promissory notes in question was made after an action on each of such notes was barred by the statute, it is clear to my mind that the attempted guaranty created no legal obligation in favor of the payee of either of such notes as against the quasi guarantor.

J. E. McCurdy, of San Mateo, for respondent.

WARD, Justice pro tem.

These are actions for personal injuries consolidated for trial wherein judgments were entered for each plaintiff. The cases have likewise by stipulation been consolidated on appeal.

[1-3] Defendant Prukop filed a cross-complaint against the plaintiff Noles wherein he claimed damages. During the trial plaintiffs deemed it material to establish the particular hospital to which defendant had been taken after the accident. Accordingly witness Monahan, the storekeeper of the Central Emergency Hospital in San Francisco, who had charge of the records of all emergency hospitals in San Francisco, "when the books are filled up," was called as a witness. He testified that the records were correct, but it was clearly demonstrated that Monahan had reference simply to the fact that it was a record containing the names of patients. There was no testimony that the entries were made under the witness' direction or supervision or that he recognized the handwriting or even knew the party or parties who had made the various entries. The evidence does not disclose whether these entries were made by any person in the performance of a duty enjoined by law (see section 1920, Code Civ. Proc.) or under the direction or in the presence of an officer of any board authorized to make such entries (see section 1926, Code Civ. Proc.). Respondent contends that the only purpose of the introduction of this evidence was to determine if Prukop had been admitted to the Mission Emergency Hospital. Without laying the proper foundation this evidence was admitted. Up to this point defendant was not prejudiced, though the objection to the introduction of the record and the testimony of the witness Monahan should have been sustained. Plaintiff's attorney pressed the matter further after eliciting the residence of the defendant, the time of his arrival, etc., by asking the following question: "What do you find in that book of the record that is made there of the condition of John Prukop when he was brought into the hospital." This question brought forth an objection that "no foundation has been laid and that it is hearsay evidence" to which the court agreed. Later, the following appears in the transcript: "Q. The condition of the patient. A. The condition of the patient in the book is 'alcoholic breath.'" Counsel for defendant moved to strike out the answer, assigned the asking of the question as misconduct, and requested the court to instruct the jury to disregard the testimony. Further on the witness repeated "Condition of patient. Alcoholic breath." Again counsel for defendant repeated his objection motion, etc., and the court commented as follows: "As far as it goes, the testimony does not hurt you, as far as it goes now." Respondent contends that, if it was error to admit this evidence, it was cured by the statement of the court. The court is not permitted to comment upon the weight of the evidence. Respondent further contends that the witness did not testify that the defendant had an alcoholic breath, but that the record book stated that defendant had an alcoholic breath; that it was not hearsay evidence from the witness but a fact from the record. The answer to this contention is that the record was hearsay. When evidence of a descriptive physical condition borders upon opinion evidence cross-examination should be permitted. The defendant in this case was precluded from interrogating the person who wrote in the hospital record the fact or opinion that the defendant had an alcoholic breath.

[4, 5] The statement that Prukop had an alcoholic breath would immediately give rise to a conclusion that there was some lack of sobriety or that he was intoxicated. Such evidence has a tendency to raise a prejudice against the driver of an automobile and this is particularly true of a case wherein the defendant filed a cross-complaint alleging negligence on the part of plaintiff and cross-defendant. Section 1845, Code of Civil Procedure, provides as follows: "A witness can testify of those facts only which he knows of his own knowledge; that is, which are derived from his own perceptions, except in those few express cases in which his opinions or inferences, or the declarations of others, are admissible." In the case of Stevens v. San Francisco & North Pacific Railroad Company, 100 Cal. 554, the court said, at page 570, 35 P. 165, 169: "Intemperance, sobriety, and drunkenness are facts to be proven like other facts. The proffered evidence was hearsay, concerning which Greenleaf, at section 99, vol. 1, of his work on Evidence, says: 'Hearsay evidence, as thus described, is uniformly held incompetent to establish any specific fact which in its nature is susceptible of being proved by witnesses who can speak from their own knowledge.'" The hearsay rule is applicable to written instruments as well as to oral statements. 10 Cal. Jur. p. 1039. Testimony based upon memoranda made by others when the witness has no knowledge of the facts except from such memoranda is hearsay evidence. See Barlow v. Frink, 171 Cal. at page 172, 152 P. 290. The verdict of a coroner's inquisition is inadmissible. Estate of Dolbeer, 149 Cal. at page 246, 86 P. 695, 9 Ann. Cas. 795; Holister v. Cordero, 76 Cal. 649, 18 P. 855; Rowe v. Such, 134 Cal. 576, 66 P. 862, 67 P. 760; Mar Shee v. Maryland Assurance Corporation, 190 Cal. 3, 210 P. 269. The report of a grand jury of a county is hearsay. Oppenheimer v. Clunie, 142 Cal. 313, 75 P. 899.

[6] The evidence was conflicting as to the exact spot that the impact occurred. Just prior to the impact plaintiff was driving on the south-bound car track; defendant on the north-bound street car tracks. Needless to say, if they had continued on their respective way, this accident would not have occurred. Each side contended that the other driver had swerved over to the wrong side of the street. Under such circumstances a jury is very likely to decide against a driver with an alcoholic breath. There was considerable conflicting evidence relative to the proximate cause of this accident. A different verdict could have been and might have been reached if this prejudicial evidence was absent. This is not a case wherein we can apply the provision of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. The evidence was inadmissible as presented; it was prejudicial to the rights of the defendant and precluded him from having a fair and impartial determination of his case.

The plaintiff, Mary Lusardi, was a passenger in the car driven by plaintiff Noles. The main issue in her case was whether or not Prukop was negligent. If the jury had returned a verdict in favor of Prukop against Noles, they could not have reached a verdict in favor of Lusardi against Prukop. The conclusion reached upon this point eliminates the necessity of considering other assignments of error.

The judgments are reversed and the causes remanded for new trials.

CARL et al. v. THOMAS.

Civ. 902.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Aug. 25, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 17, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 22, 1931.

1. Continuance ☞7.

Generally, application for continuance is addressed to trial court's discretion.

2. Continuance ☞19.

Refusing continuance for defendant's involuntary absence where neither defendant nor his counsel were at fault held abuse of discretion (Code Civ. Proc. § 595).

Facts disclosed that the defendant was an officer of the Coastal Guard; that he had arranged his leave of absence to cover period set for trial; that defendant's counsel sent him letter, notifying him that case had been set for trial; and that defendant's statement that he did not receive such letter, and that he could and would have been at the trial if he had received it, was unimpeached.

3. Continuance ☞35.

Admission in court by plaintiffs' counsel, unaccepted by defendant's counsel, that defendant, if present, would have testified contrary to plaintiffs' testimony, held not to correct error in refusing continuance for defendant's involuntary absence.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Suit by Mary C. Carl and another against Earl J. Thomas. From adverse judgment, defendant appeals.

Reversed.

Curtis Hillyer and W. E. Hardenburg, both of San Diego, for appellants.

Edward H. Whelan, Thomas Whelan, Philip Smith, and Vincent Whelan, all of San Diego, for respondents.

FINNEY, Justice pro tem.

The original complaint in this action sets forth two causes of action: First, an action to quiet title, containing the usual averments; and second, a cause of action for cancellation, as to the defendant, of a deed from one Hartley, conveying to all of the parties, as joint tenants, the property described in the complaint, on the ground that the defendant's interest in the property had been obtained by him through fraud and deceit. The answer denied all the material allegations of the complaint, except the conveyance to and from Hartley, and set up full ownership in the defendant of the property in question.

The defendant was an officer of the Coast Guard attached to the United States steamship Seminole, with headquarters at Stapleton, New York, and the vessel was engaged in chasing rum-runners. The defendant employed his attorneys through correspondence and had never personally consulted with them.

It should be noted here that the plaintiff Thomas and the defendant Thomas intermarried November 9, 1911, and were divorced in 1927, the final decree being entered May 22, 1928. The plaintiff Carl was the mother of the plaintiff Thomas, and much of her testimony was devoted to relating the evil traits of her former son-in-law, the defendant Thomas. In fact, the unhappy domestic relations of the parties, in former years, as the plaintiffs conceived it, gave a dark color to their testimony, and in this instance, absence did not make their hearts grow fonder. No mention of the property involved in this suit was made in any of the papers in the divorce action, although the property had been acquired long prior thereto.

In November, 1928, this case, at the request of the defendant was replaced on the court's waiting list in such order that it would be called for setting at the second March call of the court's calendar and would result in a setting for trial after April 1, 1929. The defendant was duly notified thereof by his attorneys in a letter dated November 26, 1928, and in the same letter was requested to be in San Diego a few days in advance of the date of the trial, "of which we will advise you in due course." Acknowledging receipt of this letter from his attorneys, the defendant wrote, on December 17, 1928, "I will make every effort to be present at the date mentioned in your letter." In the latter part of February, 1929, the defendant wrote his attorneys that his application for a leave during the first part of April had been denied. However, on March 6, 1929, the defendant wired his attorneys as follows: "Set case, my leave approved. Will be present." And on March 12, 1929, he wrote them as follows: "My application for leave has been reconsidered and approved so that I may be present when the case is called. Therefore it will not be necessary for us to put the case off. I feel as if we have a fair chance to win." On March 18, 1929, the case was regularly set for trial on Friday, April 12, 1929, and on the same day, March 18, 1929, defendant's counsel wrote him as follows:

"This case has been set for trial on April 12, next. I would suggest that you time your departure from New York so as to reach here two or three days at least before the trial, as there are many things I want to take up with you. Be sure and bring with you all records, letters, agreements, deeds, and other papers relating to transactions between yourself and the plaintiffs concerning this property or concerning any matter relevant thereto. As you know, I have only an imperfect understanding of your version of the case and must familiarize myself with all of the facts. It is our custom to collect our fees before trial. In addition there will be some small charges for costs and possibly service of process. Hoping to see you several days before the 12th, I remain,

"Yours very truly, W. E. Hardenburg."

This communication was placed in a sealed envelope addressed to the defendant at his last known address, and with postage prepaid, deposited in the United States mail at San Diego. It has never been returned to the sender, although it bore on the outside of the envelope a request for return and his name and address. On April 12, the day of the trial, the defendant had not appeared, nor in any way explained his absence, and his counsel, appearing at the opening of court on that day on the call of this case, so stated to the trial judge and called his attention to the facts and circumstances substantially as set forth above, and to the further fact that they had already on that day sent a wire of inquiry back to New York, and thereupon counsel asked for a continuance of the case for a few days until they could find out what had become of the defendant. The court thereupon continued the trial until 2 p. m., at which time the attorneys for defendant reported they had received no reply to their telegram and thereupon the court ordered the parties to proceed with the trial. Testimony was taken during the remainder of the day and at 5 p. m. the case was continued to Monday, April 15, 1929. At the opening of court on April 15th, counsel for defendant informed the court that on April 12th they had wired defendant as follows: "Case set for today, stop, for information of court wire reason for failure to appear." And on April 13th they had received a telegram from him as follows: "I did not receive any notice from you whatsoever the case was to be called today, if so would have been present. Please inform me the action of the court and set case ahead as far as possible. I depart for sea voyage early tomorrow morning." Counsel also presented to the court a wire which they had sent to J. L. Ahern, the defendant's commanding officer, as follows: "Where is Earl Thomas: his trial is proceeding: wire answer collect." And the reply received from Ahern, as follows: "Earl Thomas is aboard this vessel: ship now at sea." Thereupon counsel urged the court to continue the case twelve or fifteen days so that the defendant would have a chance to attend the trial and offered to consent, at the expiration of said period, to proceed with the trial without objection, if the defendant did not appear. The motion for continuance was denied, and the taking of testimony was resumed. On each foregoing occasion, after the denial of their motion for a continuance, defendant's counsel asked and obtained permission from the court to prepare and file an affidavit embodying the matters orally set forth as the basis of such motions respectively, and such affidavits were duly filed.

Thereafter, on April 17, 1929, counsel for plaintiffs, having discovered the existence of a deed which purported to be signed by the plaintiffs and to convey to the defendant the entire interest of the plaintiffs in the property in question and which had been filed for record in the recorder's office on June 8, 1928, several months after the filing of this suit, asked and obtained leave to amend and supplement their complaint by adding thereto a third, fourth, and fifth cause of action, one of them—the third—being directed against, and asking for the cancellation of, the above-mentioned deed, which was received in evidence as Defendant's Exhibit A. It is not necessary to detail the fourth or fifth causes of action, except to say they raised new issues which, however, could have been added appropriately to the original complaint when it was filed.

Counsel for the defendant objected vigorously to the court's action in permitting the filing of the amended and supplemental complaint upon the ground that it worked a surprise on the defendant and that it set up several wholly different causes of action under the guise of an amendment. This objection was overruled and the defendant excepted, and thereupon his attorneys moved the court for a continuance until May 20, 1929, on the grounds of surprise, lack of opportunity to consult with their client regarding the new causes of action and the receipt of a letter from their client dated April 12, 1929, which read as follows: "I depart Saturday, April 13. Will be at sea for five days. Will be able to be present any time but now there has been a mixup, if it is put forward to May 15, I will be able to get excursion rates to California." The motion for a continuance was denied and, late in the afternoon of the same day, after taking further testimony, the plaintiffs rested. Thereupon defendant's counsel again moved for a continuance, which was denied, and an exception was taken. Being directed to proceed, the defendant's attorney, Mr. Hardenburg, then stated to the court: "The defendant will also have to rest. We have no testimony to offset this new testimony. We have already introduced this deed (Defendant's Exhibit A) in evidence, and that is a complete answer to all causes of action in the original complaint; but we have no evidence to offer on the allegations contained in the amended and supplemental complaint and the various causes of action stated therein." The court then directed the parties to proceed to the argument.

The court found that the plaintiffs did not know, until the Hartley deed had been delivered, that the defendant's name appeared as grantee therein; that upon discovery of said fact, the defendant promised to pay plaintiff Carl $25, and plaintiff Thomas $50, per month for the remainder of their lives; and that plaintiffs relied upon said representations, although they were made with the intent to deceive and defraud the plaintiffs.

As to the deed, dated December 22, 1925, received in evidence as Defendant's Exhibit A, the court found that the defendant induced plaintiffs to sign it upon the false representation that it was an application for an allotment of a portion of his pay; that the defendants were in fear of him at the time, but nevertheless believed his statement, and did not see nor understand that the paper was a conveyance of real estate; that the plaintiffs had no knowledge of the form of deeds except those written on a printed form; and that the plaintiffs never acknowledged the deed and never received any consideration for such conveyance.

The judgment ordered that the Hartley deed be canceled in part by striking out and obliterating therefrom, annulling and voiding therein the name of "Earl J. Thomas." It further adjudged that the deed identified as Defendant's Exhibit A was not the deed of the plaintiffs and "did not convey, and does not operate as a conveyance to, said real estate." The judgment concluded by quieting title of the plaintiffs as against the defendant Thomas and all persons claiming by, through or under him.

Within due time after the entry of said judgment, defendant filed and served notice of his intention to move for a new trial on the grounds of: (1) Newly discovered evidence; (2) accident or surprise; (3) irregularity in the proceedings of the court; (4) insufficiency of the evidence; (5) errors in law; the motion being supported by affidavits.

Defendant takes this appeal from the judgment entered against him pursuant to the findings and order of the court made herein.

[1-3] While many questions are raised and discussed in the briefs, in the view we take of this matter, it will not be necessary for us to consider any of them except the rulings of the court in denying defendant's several motions for a continuance. While it is true, as a general rule, that an application for a continuance is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court and that postponements of trials are not favored (Swayne & Hoyt v. Wells-Russell & Co., 169 Cal. 204, 146 P. 686), we think, nevertheless, the facts in this case disclose a clear abuse of discretion. There is no evidence in the record that the defendant received from his counsel the letter dated March 18, 1929, notifying him that his case had been set for trial April 12, 1929, except the presumption that a letter deposited in the mails will arrive at its destination and be delivered to the one to whom it is addressed, or be returned to the sender, if it bears his name and address on the outside. But we know many letters are lost in the mails, both with and without "returns" on them, and this presumption, standing alone, cannot prevail against the positive statement of the defendant, otherwise unimpeached, that he did not receive the letter, and that he could and would have come to the trial if he had received it. Neither counsel nor defendant was in any way at fault for defendant's failure to appear. Timely notice had been sent by counsel, defendant had arranged his leave of absence to fit this particular period, and we must conclude, on the showing made, that the defendant would have been on hand for the trial, if he had received the letter referred to.

We think the court erred in each instance in denying the applications for a continuance, on the showings made, the first two of which showings were, with the permission of the court, subsequently reduced to writing in the form of an affidavit by defendant's counsel, as required by section 595, Code of Civil Procedure. The defendant was the only person, except the plaintiffs, who, so far as the record shows, had personal knowledge of many of the important issues decided by the court and was, therefore, the only person who could have corrected the plaintiffs' testimony on those issues, if it was in error. The trial of this case, in the involuntary absence of the defendant, amounted to a denial to him of his day in court and the admission in court by counsel for the plaintiffs, unaccepted by defendant's counsel, that defendant, if present, would have testified contrary to the plaintiffs' testimony, will not correct the matter. Moreover, there was no showing that the plaintiffs would have suffered any injury or prejudice by a short continuance in this case, except that it appeared that the plaintiff Carl is an elderly lady and in feeble health. This situation might have been met by taking her deposition or allowing the continuance after she had given her testimony in the case, and thus the time and expense wasted in this trial would have been avoided.

For the reasons indicated the judgment appealed from is reversed.

PER CURIAM.

This action was brought by plaintiffs to recover from defendant the sum of $2500, alleged to be due under the terms of a certain written agreement. The case was tried by the court, without a jury, and judgment went for plaintiffs, as prayed. Defendant appeals.

On October 5, 1928, the plaintiffs as parties of the first part, and defendant as party of the second part, executed a certain instrument designated by its terms as an agreement of lease and option to purchase. It might be here noted that another party was associated with defendant in the beginning, but inasmuch as defendant had acquired all of the right, title, and interest of his associate prior to the events surrounding the present controversy, it is conceded here that the latter has no interest in the proceedings. Therefore, further reference to this feature of the agreement will be omitted and the discussion which follows will include only the parties to the action.

The salient parts of the agreement may be epitomized as follows: "The parties of the first part hereby lease to the parties of the second part, * * * the following described mining ground with an option to purchase same, on the terms and conditions herein set forth." The property referred to consisted of two mining claims described as: "The Patricia Mining Claim located in Quartzburg Mining District, Mariposa County, California, and recorded in Vol. 3 of Quartz Records, Mariposa County at page 333 and the Charles Mining Claim located in said district and same county and recorded in Vol. 8, at page S." (sic), the claims being further described as adjoining claims. The parties of the first part guaranteed immediate and undisturbed possession for a period of two years from date of agreement and agreed further to place in escrow a good and sufficient deed for said mining ground made to parties of the second part within six months from the date of agreement, provided that the parties of the second part began work on the ground within ten days and continued said work and paid to the escrow holder for the parties of the first part, or their order, a royalty of 15 per cent. of the gross values extracted from ores taken from said ground until such royalties should aggregate the sum of $17,500, which is the full purchase price for said claims; it being specifically provided, however, that should the royalties fail to reach the amount of the payments in the instrument provided, any difference must be made up by the parties of the second part. The payments provided for were as follows, namely: Twenty-five hundred dollars on May 1, 1929; $5,000 on October 15, 1929; and $10,000 on October 15, 1930. The remaining provisions of the contract are unimportant, as far as the present controversy is concerned.

Under this agreement defendant entered upon the property and did commence active mining, embracing exploration and extraction and such development work as the agreement required. On May 1, 1929, defendant was still in possession of the property and in compliance with the agreement delivered to the escrow holder the sum of $2500 by check, which was subsequently reduced to cash and still remains with the said depository. As will be noted from the terms of the instrument, the parties of the first part were to place in escrow a good and sufficient deed conveying the property to the parties of the second part within six months after the date of the agreement. This provision would require that the deed be so deposited on or before April 5, 1929. It is conceded that the deed was not deposited until May 22, 1929, or thereabouts. No point is made on this delayed deposit, excepting in a rather perfunctorily inclusive way. Appellant here concedes that if the deed deposited meets the requirements of a good and sufficient deed, the question of the delay is unimportant. In any event, the record discloses that all parties acquiesced in the delay and appellant made his payment to the escrow holder, to be held until the deed was deposited. Clearly, under the record before us, the date of delivery becomes unimportant, inasmuch as appellant remained in possession of the property, continued operating the same, and suffered no loss, directly or indirectly, through the failure of respondents in this respect. After the deposit of the deed, appellant refused to permit the release of the money to respondents, claiming that the deed of conveyance was insufficient and did not convey the property contemplated in the agreement. Thereafter appellant removed from the ground.

[1, 2] Appellant, in seeking a reversal of the judgment, urges several grounds which will be taken up in the order presented. First, appellant argues that the instrument in question was nothing but a mere option to purchase and was so found by the trial court; that the option was never exercised and therefore no cause of action exists against him. It is true that in the pleadings the agreement is denominated an agreement for the purchase and sale of certain property, but as a part of the allegation the agreement is pleaded in haec verba. Therefore whatever designation the parties might choose would not limit the terms of the instrument. The writing itself shows the nature of the agreement, and from that writing it is obvious that while an option to purchase was given appellant, yet also the instrument is in the nature of a lease having a fixed term, with regular payments reserved at stated intervals. These payments were independent of the purchase, though in the exercise of the option by final payment all intermediate payments would be credited upon the total price. The terms of the lease provided that appellant should operate the property and from the ores extracted should pay respondent 15 per cent. of the gross values of all ores extracted, and that should appellant determine to exercise the option contained in the lease then all such payments as royalties should be applied on the stipulated purchase price. Yet, irrespective of the royalties, there were certain definite payments provided for, upon which payments possession of the premises was conditioned. Whether these payments were in the nature of an exercise of the option to purchase or in the nature of rental under the terms of the lease could be determined only after the final payment had been made. It seems clear that if appellant had remained in possession and had made the first two payments and thereafter decided that he would not exercise the option by payment of the final installment, in which event there could have been no sale, the first two payments could not be classed as payments on the purchase, but rather as rental under the lease. On the other hand, appellant under his option was privileged to exercise the same through installment payments applying on the purchase price. Therefore the payment of $2,500 to the escrow holder under the terms of the agreement must be deemed a payment either as rental or on the purchase price. Appellant, here contending that the entire transaction was but an option to purchase, must then concede that the payment was made in the exercise of the option and if so made thereupon, at least pro tanto, and to an extent sufficient for present purposes, the transaction became one for the purchase and sale of the property. Whichever view we take, ample support is found for the trial court's conclusion that the amount of the payment, namely $2,500, was due to the respondents under the terms of the contract. Appellant next raises the question as to respondents' ownership of the property involved. It is urged the record discloses that the ground involved is still unappropriated public domain and that respondents could not by any form of conveyance transfer title thereto. And, further, that irrespective of the form of the deed, no title could thereby be conveyed by reason of respondents' lack of ownership.

[3-6] It is argued that the Charles Mining Claim is not a full claim. In other words, that the ground embraced in the Charles Mining Claim does not embrace the usual twenty acres; that it is not fifteen hundred feet long and six hundred feet wide. This contention is based upon the wording of the location notice, which reads: "Commencing at a shaft * * * and running from said shaft * * * a distance of 750 feet in a Northerly direction and thence in a Southerly direction 750 feet to a stake." It is obvious that this description would take in only seven hundred fifty feet of the lode, inasmuch as the second call was merely a retracing backward of the first line. We deem it unnecessary to go into any elaborate discussion of the rules governing construction of certificates of location. It is conceded that these notices are liberally construed and are to be read as a whole. If there are conflicting calls, it is of no consequence if there remain enough in the notice of location to identify the ground appropriated. The entire subject is discussed in Lindley on Mines (3d Ed.) vol. 2, § 379. The further description contained in the location notice would serve to identify the ground in any event. After the words quoted hereinbefore, the notice reads: "To a stake in mound of rock at each end center, * * * The corners and side lines of this location are distinctly marked by stakes in mounds of rocks, and the same is situated about 2½ miles westerly from the town of Bear Valley, and was formerly * * * owned by Angelo Sperriero and recorded by him in book H. of Quartz Records at page 363 and 364 of said book, Mariposa County Records." We know of no law or statute, and none has been cited to us, which either expressly or by construction requires that a mining claim be fifteen hundred feet long and six hundred feet wide. One may locate as much of the public domain as he desires, providing that each location shall be no larger than the area specified. In common parlance, a full claim has been deemed to be one exhausting the allotment of one location, but there is nothing to prevent a location of a smaller area. There is nothing in the agreement which specifies the Charles Mining Claim to be other than that ground located and described in the recorded notice, which notice is used as the means of description of the area involved. All that respondents agreed to do was to convey the Charles Mining Claim as the same appeared in the location notice recorded and this was what appellant agreed to accept, pursuant to the terms of the contract; the obligation of appellant being of course optional. In any event, the subject of the contract was the mining ground described, and in the absence of any effort at reformation or correction, we must conclude that appellant knew of the boundaries of the location prior to his execution of the instrument.

[7, 8] Appellant next argues that the Patricia Mining Claim did not exist at all and that there was no valid location of the ground attempted to be embraced within the location. The description of the claim is as follows: "Commencing at the Northwest center monument of the Charles Mine and running in a Northwesterly direction 1500 feet along the course of vein, lead or lode, to a stake. * * * The corners and side lines of said vein are distinctly marked so that the boundaries can be readily traced. Said location being situated in Sec. 19, Twp. 4, South, Range 17 East and is on the Easterly slope of Bear Valley Mountain about 2 miles Northwesterly from the town of Bear Valley, and being the Northwesterly Extension of said Charles Mine and was formerly known as the Golden Gate Mine." Appellant contends that there can be no such point as the northwest center monument of the Charles Claim for the reason that the latter claim, being a north and south claim, could have no northwest center monument. Referring again to the text, Lindley on Mines, and the numerous authorities therein cited, we accept the doctrine therein announced that if by any reasonable construction, in view of the surrounding circumstances, the language employed in the description will impart notice to subsequent locators, it is sufficient. If, as is true, there could be no northwest center monument, it is manifest that the descriptive word of location could not change the center. The notice did state that the claim commenced at the center monument and, as appellant points out, there could be no other center than that point actually midway between the east and west lines. The further description that the ground claimed was the northwest extension of the Charles Mining Claim would sufficiently identify the point of commencement. And, it being accepted that the course of the Charles lode or claim was northwest and southeast, the language employed was obviously for the purpose of adopting the north center monument as distinguished from the south center monument.

[9] Next, appellant claims that there was no discovery sufficient to support the location of the Patricia, the location therefor being invalid. His argument goes to the effect that the discovery must be at the point of commencement or near thereto, and that the point of commencement being on the end line of located ground there is no unappropriated ground available for discovery. If the locator had made his discovery within two feet or two inches of the end line of the Charles Mining Claim, he surely could adopt the monument of the latter claim as descriptive of his point of commencement. In any event, he is entitled to fifteen hundred feet of the lode or vein discovered, and if the north end line of the Charles Mining Claim intersected the vein we see no reason why he could not make his discovery within a thousandth part of an inch from this line, and monument his claim, and describe its boundaries, by accepting the monument of the Charles Claim as his point of commencement.

[10, 11] Passing this point, appellant then urges that, irrespective of the place of discovery, there was in fact no actual discovery made at any time or at any place upon the Patricia Claim. The only direct testimony in the record is that of the locator that he found mineral upon the ground prior to his location. The statutes contemplate the discovery shall be of mineral bearing rock, earth or quartz in place or, as the Code section words it, a discovery of "a vein or lode of quartz, or other rock in place, bearing gold, silver," etc. Civ. Code, § 1426. Here the direct testimony discloses no such discovery. However, there is the same liberality given to the construing of this section as to other provisions of the mining code or the statutes relating to the location of mines and mining claims. The location notice states the location to be in full compliance with the laws governing. The claim is an extension of another claim whereon there seems admittedly to have been a valid location subsequent to discovery. And further, the record discloses no intervening or conflicting claims to the area embraced within the location. The record further discloses that subsequent to the location and under the contract before us the property has been mined and developed, and as a result of such work there has been taken therefrom gold in the value of in excess of $1,200, aside from a quantity of specimen ores valued at approximately $500 or in excess of said amount. A location, otherwise good, with a discovery made after location and before the intervention of adverse claims or the creation of adverse rights, will validate the location from the date of discovery, and generally from the first act towards claim and appropriation; this by relation. If the location be made before discovery but is followed by a discovery before any adverse rights intervene, such subsequent discovery cures the original defect and the claim is valid. 1 Snyder on Mines, p. 354; Morrison's Mining Rights (11th Ed.) 32; Creede, etc., Mining Co. v. Uinta, etc., Mining & Transportation Co., 196 U. S. 337, 345, 25 S. Ct. 266, 49 L. Ed. 501; Tuolumne Cons. Mining Co. v. Maier, 134 Cal. 583, 66 P. 863. From the facts as hereinbefore stated, we conclude that respondents have made a sufficient prima facie case to warrant the holding that there has been a sufficient discovery to validate the location, even if we concede that there was no such discovery before location. The two claims here involved were worked together under the contract and ore was discovered and extracted in paying quantities. The appellant, in possession, as the lessee of respondents, can hardly deny this discovery, nor does he so do.

[12, 13] The foregoing disposes of the principal points urged by appellant. His attack upon the sufficiency of the deed seems to be on the theory that the deed in question is a mere quitclaim deed. Without passing upon the sufficiency of such a deed to convey title to unpatented mining claims, it will suffice to say that the deed before us is not a quitclaim deed. True, the words of conveyance include the term "quitclaim" but the full wording of the phrase of conveyance is "grant, bargain, sell, remise, release, and forever quitclaim," which phrase embraces every idea of transfer without warranty. And incidentally the deed runs to the heirs of the grantee. It is only essential that a deed or conveyance should use the word "grant" to convey an estate in fee simple absolute. Northwestern Pacific Railroad Co. v. Humboldt Milling Co., 186 Cal. 599, 200 P. 9. In the transfer of unpatented mining claims it is always to be borne in mind that the paramount title rests in the sovereign, the right of the holder or owner being classed for all purposes as the fee, subject to defeasance through failure to comply with the statutory regulations governing. In the deed before us, the grantors have conveyed absolutely whatever right or claim they may have had to the premises and in addition thereto quit-claimed their defeasible right. We think the deed sufficient to convey the entire title of the grantors, which title we have found to be a good and marketable title based upon valid locations.

[14] It is also urged that the findings of the trial court are not responsive to the pleadings, in that there is no finding on the allegations of the cross-complaint of appellant. The said cross-complaint was but a repetition of the allegations of a counterclaim interposed upon which complete findings were made. It would be an idle thing to require a repetition of the findings on the allegations of the cross-complaint, inasmuch as the findings made completely disposed of the same issues.

[15] Appellant throughout strenuously argues that if we determine that the judgment should be affirmed then it must follow that plaintiffs' only right to the money involved is conditioned upon appellant's exercise of the option, and that if the option was exercised then appellant was entitled to the continued possession of the property and is entitled to damages for his ouster therefrom. This does not necessarily follow. After the money was delivered to the escrow holder and respondents had fully complied with the conditions surrounding the delivery to entitle them to receive the money, appellant refused to permit the release of the said fund. Appellant, at that time, was indebted to respondents on account of royalties due under the agreement, and the payment was made pro tanto in discharge of this liability, as well as for rental and purchase. As we have hereinbefore pointed out, this money was due respondents whether or not appellant desired to exercise the option of full purchase, as long as appellant held the property. Appellant did make the payment to the escrow holder to be delivered to respondents when a sufficient deed was deposited. This having been done, respondents' title to the money became absolute. Thereafter, while both the money and the deed remained in the hands of the escrow holder, appellant continued in possession of the property, extracting ore therefrom or at least working to that end, all of the time refusing to permit the escrow holder to pay the money to respondents. If the situation had been permitted to remain thus indefinitely, the value of the property could have been exhausted and destroyed and, according to appellant's contention, no liability result.

The evidence is in conflict as to the actual departure of appellant from the property. However, there is sufficient in the record to indicate that, instead of appellant being put off the property, he left because he was afraid he would not be put off. The evidence sufficiently shows that respondents, upon their failure to obtain the money, repeatedly demanded that appellant release the same; that appellant refused to do so upon the claim that the locations were invalid as hereinbefore set forth. On June 7th, in a final effort to get the money, respondents informed appellant that if there were no release they would "close him up," to which appellant replied that he did not care what respondents did. Appellant in this connection testified that he could not afford to be tied up with any lawsuit, and that upon the threat of respondents to close him up, he pulled out his machinery and left the property. We think this falls short of an eviction or even of a threat to evict. A reasonable interpretation of the testimony supports the conclusion that the respondents intended to prevent further working of the property until payments had been made under the terms of the agreement and in this they were within their rights. If the appellant had released the money and withdrawn the next day, the situation would have been no different than the one before us. As we have attempted to show, appellant had no further claim on the money paid to the depository and the situation was identical with one wherein the money was paid without dispute, there being no reasonable ground for dissatisfaction or disagreement. There being no eviction, appellant's surrender of the premises was in the nature of and was an actual abandonment, and moneys theretofore paid under the contract were the property of the respondents.

The judgment is affirmed.

ALLEN, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiffs, Hans Carstensen and U. W. Hall, had judgment against E. F. Gottesburen and George Sheldon in claim and delivery. Defendant Gottesburen appeals.

A sufficient statement of the facts determinative of the errors presented is that the allegations of the complaint are for claim and delivery of personal property and are in the usual form, praying for the possession of a fishing barge known as the Point Loma. Defendant Gottesburen's answer denies the ownership of the property to be in plaintiffs, and alleges that he is entitled to the possession thereof; denies demand for possession by plaintiffs; denies refusal to deliver, and denies that at the time the action was filed he was retaining possession without the consent of the plaintiffs; admits his possession; and prays for a return of the property with damages.

Defendant Gottesburen obtained possession of said property by and under a certain lease executed by the plaintiffs. The Point Loma was to be used as a fishing barge upon the payment of certain rents. Later lessee sold a one-half interest in the lease to defendant Sheldon, who became a partner with Gottesburen in the business of operating the boat as a fishing craft for profit.

[1-3] The first error complained of is that there was no sufficient demand for possession of the property before the commencement of this action. Gottesburen and Sheldon being partners, appellant claims it became necessary to make demand for possession of the property on both defendants. Since appellant Gottesburen and his codefendant Sheldon were partners and in possession of the property, a notice or demand for possession of the property served on one of such partners was sufficient. Section 2429, Civil Code, makes an individual partner an agent for the partnership in the transaction of its business, and under section 2332, Civil Code, notice to the agent is notice to the principal. Defendant Sheldon made default in the trial court, and in so doing admitted the allegations of the complaint that plaintiff demanded possession of the property. Appellant cannot therefore raise this question as to Sheldon.

[4-7] The court found that before the commencement of this action and while defendants were in possession of the property the plaintiffs demanded possession from defendants and that defendants refused and continued to refuse to deliver possession to the plaintiffs. This finding was supported by the evidence and will not be disturbed by this court. However, appellant claims that the demand was insufficient, in that it consisted of a written notice, signed by Hans Carstensen and U. W. Hall, by Overton, Lyman & Plumb, their attorneys, and that the attorneys did not have authority to make a legal demand. The demand need not be made by plaintiff personally; it being sufficient if it is made by a person authorized to act for him.

In the instant case respondent Carstensen testified that he employed the firm of attorneys above referred to and that he authorized one Cecil Borden, who was connected with said firm, to prepare and serve the demand on appellant. This evidence is sufficient to support the finding of the court that demand was served prior to the filing of the suit, which demand and service were sufficient to comply with the law.

The next error goes to the right of appellant's possession. On February 1, 1927, respondents leased to appellant the property in question for the term of three years; the lessee (appellant herein) agreeing to pay the lessors (respondents), as rentals therefor, one-third of the gross receipts collected as admission fees to said barge charged to persons using the same. Such sums so collected were to be paid to the lessors on or before the 5th day of each month for the preceding month. The lease provided that it should not be assignable and that the lessee should not let any part of said barge without the written consent of the lessors.

On April 16, 1927, appellant sold, assigned, transferred, and conveyed to his partner and codefendant Sheldon an undivided one-half interest in the lease. Subsequently appellant failed to pay the rent provided for in the lease. Said lease contained no clause providing for a forfeiture in case of nonpayment or assignment. Time was not declared to be the essence of the contract.

[8, 9] Contracts of this character have frequently been presented to the courts for construction. The question has generally arisen in actions for determining the right of possession or ownership of the property involved in the transaction, and, when it appears from the terms of the instrument that the intention of the parties was to make a lease of the property, the courts will give such construction to the instrument irrespective of the name by which the parties have designated it. Intention, however, is to be ascertained from the terms of the instrument itself. The question is to be determined wholly by the intent of the parties expressed in and deducible from the contract itself.

The instrument is entitled "lease" and by its terms the respondents "leased" the property therein described to the appellant for the term of three years, and the appellant agreed to pay to respondents for the use of the property the amount specified in the contract, at the time and in the manner designated in the instrument. These are terms peculiarly appropriate to instruments of hire or lease, and not only do not confer upon the appellant any right in the property except to use it as bailee during the period prescribed, but expressly impose upon appellant an obligation to pay the respondents for such use. The terms of the contract are sufficient to warrant the court in determining this construction to be given to the instrument as creating a bailment to appellant without any right in the property, with the obligation upon appellant to pay for its use according to the terms of the contract.

This transaction comes squarely within the law of bailment. Bailments in California are classified under three heads: First, those for the sole benefit of the bailor; second, those for the sole benefit of the bailee; and, third, those for the sole benefit of both parties. This case falls within the third class. Under this class the courts have placed contracts of hire, of which the contract in this case is one. This class of bailments has been defined as one wherein one person gives to another the temporary use and possession of the property, other than money, for reward, and the latter agrees to return the same to the former at a future time. Civ. Code, § 1925; Oakland Barge & Lighter Co. v. Foster, 25 Cal. App. 193, 143 P. 83; Harron, Rickard & McCone v. Cutting, 19 Cal. App. 780, 127 P. 827.

[10-13] In determining the right of the respondents to terminate the lease, we must look to the instrument and the intention of the parties. The contract contains the clause that "this lease shall not be assignable nor shall the lessee sublet any part of said boat without the written consent of the lessors." There is nothing in the lease reserving in respondents the right to cancel the lease except in the event one-third of the gross receipts do not amount to the sum of $2,000 for any year during the season that the barge is to be operated. In that event the lessors "shall have the right to cancel the lease and upon the assertion of such right by lessors, the lease shall become null and void."

In the clause relative to assignment there is nothing said about cancellation in case such transfer is made. Under these facts, was the assignment of an undivided one-half interest in the lease to appellant's partner such a violation of the contract as to authorize respondents to cancel the lease, and after the violation of this clause of the contract did respondents have this right? When one holding a lease on property enters into a contract with another, agreeing to the use and possession of the property in the business, a valid interest in the lease is thereby vested in the partnership. Moropoulos v. C. H. & O. B. Fuller Co., 186 Cal. 679, 200 P. 601; Lamb v. Hall, 147 Cal. 44, 81 P. 288. The lease contained no clause for forfeiture, and this court is not permitted to read one into it. Parties who make a contract must embody therein all the terms upon which they agree and a failure to do so is at their peril. This same rule applies to the nonpayment of the consideration expressed in the contract. No penalty was specified in the event of failure to pay on the 5th of each month. We cannot read into the contract the forfeiture when not expressed therein, and when there is no evidence showing this to be the intention of the parties. It has been held that courts do not favor forfeitures. The courts will not declare a forfeiture where it is not provided in the contract, and there is no evidence to support the intention of the parties that such was to be a part of the contract.

For the reasons herein expressed the judgment of the trial court is reversed.

WARD, Justice pro tem.

Robert Marsh & Co., a corporation, gave its note, the subject of this action, to United Finance Company, for $6,496.86 indorsed by Robert Marsh. This note was transferred before maturity to J. H. Scales, the president of the United Finance Company. Scales, individually, borrowed the sum of $3,500 from the Pacific National Bank, giving his promissory note therefor and the $6,496.86 Marsh Company note as collateral security. The Scales' note was renewed. A payment of $750 was made thereon, leaving a balance of $2,750 due from Scales to the Pacific National Bank. No further payment being made by Scales, the bank, after maturity of the Marsh Company note, caused the $6,496.86 note held as collateral to be sold at public auction for the sum of $525 to an employee, E. Evans, the plaintiff in this action. As against Scales and the Pacific Finance Company, there were equitable defenses in favor of the defendants. The bank and the plaintiff were innocent holders, not having knowledge of the facts constituting the defenses. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff against Robert Marsh & Co., Incorporated, and Robert Marsh in the sum of $2,750, interest, etc. The court held that the plaintiff Evans, as well as his predecessor, the bank, would be deemed a holder for value only to the extent of the lien, i. e., the indebtedness owing to the pledgee. Defendant appealed from that portion of the judgment whereby the amount was fixed at $2,750. Plaintiff appealed from the whole of said judgment.

[1, 2] Plaintiff contends that the judgment should have been entered for the full amount of the note, to wit, $6,496.86, and not for the smaller sum which was equivalent to the unpaid balance of the loan from Scales to the bank. If the bank had instituted this action, judgment could only run for the amount pledged. See section 3108, Civ. Code. When part payment was made by Scales to the bank, the pledged note was security only for the unpaid balance. Where the maker of a negotiable promissory note has a defense not available as a bar to a recovery by the pledgee, but good as against the pledgor, the pledgee will be allowed to recover only to the extent of the debt for which the collateral is held as security. If the bank assigned this note to a stranger, the stranger could take only the rights held by the assignor. The plaintiff in this action was not a stranger but a note teller in the Pacific National Bank, the pledgee. The note was sold to the plaintiff, but he did not pay and the bank did not receive anything for the collateral note. Plaintiff is the nominal but the real holder of the note is the bank. Plaintiff did not buy this note in good faith for the full amount or face of the note. He is not therefore a holder in due course for the full value of the note. See section 3133, Civ. Code. Plaintiff simply stands in the position as the nominal holder of collateral security, the property of the bank. He may be considered a bona fide holder of the note as the agent of the bank, but the bank's property right in the collateral note is limited to the sum of the unpaid balance upon the loan note from Scales to the bank.

[3] Plaintiff contends that the purchaser of a collateral note, sold in foreclosure of a pledge, is entitled to recover the full amount of the collateral note, and cites Woolf v. Clarke, 17 Cal. App. 696, 121 P. 407. In that case the defendant gave a promissory note to one Nicklaus for $1,000. Subsequently the payee transferred the note to a bank as collateral security for a loan to him. The amount of the bank's loan to Nicklaus is not stated in the opinion, so we assume it was for a like amount, namely $1,000, and we are warranted in this assumption by the following quotation from that opinion: " * * * The maker of the note not being shown to be in any way prejudiced by the transfer and sale of the note cannot be heard to complain." In that case, if there were equitable defenses against the payee of the note and the collateral was in excess of the loan made by the bank to the payee of the collateral note, the maker would have been materially prejudiced. In Shafer v. Spruks (U. C. A.) 226 F.

922, and Turner v. Metropolitan Trust Company (C. C. A.) 207 F. 495, 500, equitable defenses against the payee were not interposed. In Turner v. Metropolitan Trust Company, supra, the opinion holds that the pledgee may sell "his own interest and all the right which the pledgor could have empowered him to sell at the time the contract of pledge was made." In the case at bar the bank may only sell the collateral because it did not have knowledge of the equitable defenses of the maker. The pledgor, Scales, could not have legally empowered the pledgee to sell the $6,496.86 note because the note was obtained from the defendants by reason of false and fraudulent representation and inducements and the court so found. In Burns v. New Mineral Fertilizer Company, 218 Mass. 300, 105 N. E. 1074, the effect of existing equities was considered, and the court held that, when the pledgee sells and the purchaser buys in good faith third party notes held as collateral, the purchaser buys under the pledgee's rights and can enforce the amount of the note, although he bought for less than par. The question of equitable defense, that is, that the collateral note was made without consideration, did not enter the case. The other citations submitted by plaintiff are not parallel with the case at bar.

The $6,496.86 note was executed without consideration. The bank, without knowledge of its fraudulent character, received it as collateral and thereby became an innocent holder to the extent of $2,750. By the judgment rendered herein the law decrees to it the right to a just, proper, and exact compensation. By selling to its own agent, it sold to itself and sold only the rights it theretofore possessed. We cannot hold that by going through the form of an auction it could gain equitable rights theretofore nonexistent. To do so would be an approval of the use of the provisions of the Code, adopted in part for the protection of lenders as a means to infringe upon the rights of others, namely, the defendant who made this collateral note through deception and fraud and had a good equitable defense against all parties up to the time that the bank as an innocent holder could obtain judgment to the extent of its lien. Bell v. Bean, 75 Cal. 86, 16 P. 521, was not a case of sale but of assignment; however, the principle involved is the same as the case at bar. The defendant in that case was induced to execute a note because of threats made by the payee upon a claim for damages, although the defendant was not liable. A renewed note was made and pledged by the payee to the plaintiffs as security for a smaller amount borrowed by the payee. The court gave judgment for the lesser sum, and at pages 90-91 of 75 Cal., 16 P. 521, 523, the court said: "We do not perceive how that tribunal could have rendered any other judgment than it did. * * * They are fully reimbursed for all they can claim by virtue of the security they held. * * * In the defendant's appeal from the judgment, it is contended that the Pacific National Bank of San Francisco was not a holder of the note in due course, having been put on notice by the fact that Scales, as an officer of United Finance Company, was pledging the company's note as security for his own personal obligation. Section 3140 of the Civil Code provides as follows: "Every holder is deemed prima facie to be a holder in due course; but when it is shown that the title of any person who has negotiated the instrument was defective, the burden is on the holder to prove that he or some person under whom he claims acquired the title as holder in due course." But the last-mentioned rule does not apply in favor of a party who became bound on the instrument prior to the acquisition of such defective title. There was evidence in the case of fraud practiced by the United Finance Company upon the Marsh Company. "Upon proof by the defendant of fraud or illegality in the inception of the instrument, the burden is cast upon the indorsee to show that he is an innocent holder. This he may do by showing that he purchased the instrument before maturity or from an innocent indorsee for value in the usual course of business. When this is done, unless the evidence shows that the instrument was taken by the plaintiff under circumstances creating the presumption that he knew the facts impeaching its validity, the burden is cast upon the defendant to show, if he would defeat the plaintiff in his action, that plaintiff took the instrument with notice of defendant's equities." 19 Cal. Jur., at p. 1039. Irrespective upon which side the burden rested from all of the facts and circumstances in this case and in particular upon the testimony of witness Wilson, we approve of the court's finding that the bank had no knowledge of the fraud perpetrated by the finance company upon the defendant Marsh Company.

[4-6] We cannot approve of the court's finding that the note was presented for nonpayment, and that due notice of presentment and nonpayment was given to each of the indorsers, and that they were duly notified that the holder of said promissory note would look to them for payment. This evidence admitted over well-timed and well-grounded objections of the defendant consisted of a copy of a communication from the Pacific National Bank to the Merchants' National Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles inclosing the note for collection with directions of protest for nonpayment. At best this was secondary evidence without a proper showing for its introduction. The reply, presumably from the Los Angeles Bank, was admitted without any identification of its authorship. Finally, a copy of the notice of protest, not properly identified and not authenticated, was introduced. Section 795 of the Political Code (as amended by St. 1927, p. 840) provides as follows: "The protest of a notary, under his hand and official seal, of a bill of exchange, or promissory note, for nonacceptance or nonpayment, specifying: (1) The time and place of presentment; (2) The fact that presentment was made and the manner thereof; (3) The cause or reason for protesting the bill; (4) The demand made and the answer given, if any, or the fact that the drawee or acceptor could not be found; is prima facie evidence of the facts recited therein." The copy of notice of protest does not specify the manner of presentment or the place of presentment. If the original contained the seal of the notary, then it was not a true or correct copy. Referring to section 795 of the Political Code, the court in Whitcomb v. Huse, 37 Cal. App. 248, 173 P. 597, 598, said: "The section makes the 'protest' prima facie evidence of things, of which it ordinarily would be no evidence at all. It allows a departure from the usual rules of evidence, and those who would avail themselves of its provisions must therefore bring themselves clearly within its terms." The presentment must be made at the address given or at the usual place of business or residence at a reasonable hour, etc. See Civ. Code §§ 3153, 3154. The record is silent as to any notice of dishonor given the defendant Robert Marsh.

The judgment against Robert Marsh individually must be reversed, and this cause remanded, with direction to the trial court to permit the plaintiff to attempt to supply the deficiency of evidence relative to the notice of presentment and nonpayment and to determine therefrom whether or not defendant Robert Marsh, under the provisions of section 3170 of the Civil Code, is entitled to be discharged from liability. Otherwise, the judgment as entered will stand affirmed. Each party to bear his own costs on this appeal.

DE MUND v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

L. A. 12674.

Supreme Court of California.

Aug. 28, 1931.

1. Trial ⇨387(1).

Party litigant is entitled to decision upon facts by judge who hears evidence.

2. Judgment ⇨564(2).

Interlocutory decree operates only until disposition of cause by final judgment.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1172(1).

Final judgment unauthorizedly entered did not permanently destroy valid interlocutory decree previously entered by another judge, and, when final judgment was reversed, parties could proceed from point where error came into proceeding, and trial de novo was not necessary.

Trial de novo was not necessary, since the error for which the final judgment was reversed occurred after the entry of the interlocutory decree, and did not affect the validity of the interlocutory decree, and it would have been error upon reversal of the final judgment upon grounds unrelated to the validly entered interlocutory judgment for the reviewing court to have directed the reversal of the interlocutory decree, in addition to which the reviewing court's order, "judgment reversed," did not show an intention to annul the interlocutory decree.

SEAWELL, J.

This proceeding in certiorari is before us upon hearing granted after decision by the District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2 (291 P. 861), refusing to annul an order of the superior court of the county of Los Angeles made by Judge Moncur of Plumas county, sitting as judge pro tempore in said court, which order appointed, or confirmed the previous appointment of a referee to take an accounting in an action brought for the dissolution of a partnership. The petitioner herein is the defendant in said action. Two previous appeals from an order and judgment made in the action have already been taken to the Appellate Court. Hughes v. De Mund, 70 Cal. App. 265, 233 P. 93; Hughes v. De Mund, 96 Cal. App. 365, 274 P. 405. The effect of the latter decision was to leave in doubt the course to be followed in future proceedings in the action. Because this uncertainty was not removed by the decision of the Appellate Court in the instant application for writ of review, this court deemed it advisable to grant the petition for hearing in order to make plain the course to be pursued in advance of further action, rather than to compel the parties to await a decision upon a later appeal.

Thomas A. Hughes, plaintiff in the action for a dissolution and accounting, alleged the existence of a partnership between himself and petitioner, Mary C. De Mund, organized to deal in real estate; the ownership of twenty-one lots as partnership property; and the misapplication of partnership funds by said petitioner and her refusal to account therefor. Petitioner denied the existence of a partnership, and also denied the charge of misapplication of funds. Judge Moncur, sitting in said superior court of Los Angeles county, upon the consideration of oral testimony covering several days, found that a partnership existed and entered an interlocutory decree dissolving said partnership and ordered that an accounting be taken. The defendant took an appeal from the subsequent order denying a new trial, which the appellate court dismissed on the ground that the order decreeing the existence of a partnership was not final, but interlocutory, and hence the motion for a new trial did not lie. 70 Cal. App. 265, 233 P. 93.

[1-3] Thereafter the superior court appointed one Charles C. Montgomery referee to take the accounting ordered. Said referee reported his findings to the court. A motion made by plaintiff to set aside said findings came on for hearing before Judge Collier of said superior court together with a motion made by defendant to confirm said findings. Judge Collier set aside the findings of the referee, and after consideration of all evidence taken in the case, including the transcript of testimony taken before Judge Moncur, as well as the referee's report and oral evidence taken upon the hearing of said motions, found, contrary to Judge Moncur, that plaintiff and defendant were not partners; that a joint adventure existed between them as to seven of the lots described as partnership property, but plaintiff had no interest in the remaining fourteen lots. The seven lots were ordered sold and the proceeds applied in accordance with the rights of the parties as determined by the decree. Said judgment was reversed on appeal on the ground that in the absence of a consent or waiver Judge Collier could not without a trial de novo determine a cause partially tried before Judge Moncur, relying in part on the testimony taken before Judge Moncur. 96 Cal. App. 365, 274 P. 405. A party litigant is entitled to a decision upon the facts by the judge who hears the evidence. It is the opinion rendered upon this judgment of reversal which casts doubt upon the future course to be pursued in the action.

Judge Moncur, who was again sitting as judge pro tempore, construed the reversal as authorizing him to take up the cause at the point he had reached when Judge Collier came into the case, and to proceed to final judgment without a trial de novo, considering the great volume of evidence previously taken before him. Relying on this interpretation, Judge Moncur entered the order which petitioner attacks in the instant proceeding. Said order makes reference to the decision of the appellate court, from which, the court states, it appears that Judge Moncur "still has jurisdiction in the above matter, and is the only judge who can proceed in the action * * * without a trial de novo." It confirms the appointment of Charles C. Montgomery, the referee first appointed, and orders him to take a full account to date. We are satisfied that Judge Moncur, who is a judge of the superior court of the state of California assigned to the county of Los Angeles, is acting in accordance with law.

Petitioner contends that the effect of the unqualified reversal of the judgment of Judge Collier, who undertook to make a final disposition of the proceeding, is to place the case in the same position as if it had never been tried, and it must be tried de novo; and that the evidence taken before Judge Moncur may not be considered for any purpose, with the result that an accounting has been ordered and a referee appointed upon the pleadings, which deny the existence of a partnership, without even a prima facie or any showing that the case is one in which petitioner may be compelled to submit to an accounting. Therefore, petitioner contends, the order is beyond the jurisdiction of the court and void. Properly construed, the judgment of reversal can have no such effect.

The judgment rendered by Judge Collier was reversed for error occurring after the entry of the interlocutory decree and not affecting the validity of said decree. It would have been error upon the reversal of the final judgment upon grounds having no application to the validly entered interlocutory judgment for the court to have also directed the reversal of said interlocutory judgment. It is not to be presumed from the order "judgment reversed," which concludes the opinion disposing of the appeal from the unauthorized final judgment, that the court, acting contrary to law, intended also to annul the interlocutory decree.

Although an interlocutory decree from its nature operates only until disposition of the cause by final judgment, an abortive final judgment entered by an unauthorized judge does not permanently destroy the effectiveness of said interlocutory decree nor impair the validity of the proceedings which led to its entry. Upon the reversal of the final judgment, the rights of the parties to proceed from the point where error came into the proceeding are revived. The cases cited by petitioner as authority for the rule that upon an unqualified reversal the case must be tried de novo did not involve an interlocutory decree which had been properly entered.

Plaintiff concedes that the interlocutory decree, which determined the existence of a partnership as grounds for appointing a referee, will not bind Judge Moncur to enter a final judgment in accordance therewith. Upon the appeal reported in 96 Cal. App. 365, 274 P. 405, plaintiff contended that although the interlocutory decree was not final and appealable in the sense that it was a complete disposition of the cause, the findings of Judge Moncur were nevertheless final and binding on the issues to which they related. The appellate court rejected this contention. One of the cases which the court cited as authority was Doudell v. Shoo, 159 Cal. 448, 114 P. 579, 582. In that case the court said in regard to a judgment similar to that in the instant case: "We are satisfied that the judgment is not to be construed as a final determination of the rights of the parties with respect to any of the matters embraced therein." In the first place, our system of procedure contemplates that there shall be but one final judgment in a cause (citing cases), and, in the absence of a clear showing, it is not to be presumed that the court would attempt to dispose of a case piecemeal by successive final judgments, each covering a part of the matters in controversy."

Petitioner places much reliance on the appellate court's statement upon the last appeal that no useful purpose would be served by passing on the questions arising out of the accounting which was had prior to Judge Collier's action because there could be no proper accounting until it had first been determined whether a partnership existed between the parties and what property belonged to the partnership. 96 Cal. App. 370, 274 P. 405. This statement does not mean that before an accounting may be undertaken in the lower court, the question of the existence of a partnership must be considered again, and a trial de novo had, but rather that a final settlement of the account cannot be had without a final determination of the partnership issue. This being the case, it would serve no purpose for the appellate court to consider questions arising on the accounting, which depend on the solution of the partnership issue, where there has been no final judgment on that issue by an authorized judge.

It would be an unjust rule which would permit unauthorized action by a judge who did not hear the evidence to place upon plaintiff the burden of commencing the proceeding anew, notwithstanding testimony has been taken covering almost one thousand typed pages, merely because in the first instance the judge may have ordered an interlocutory decree which is not necessarily conclusive against defendant as to the final issue.

For the reason that the order of Judge Moncur entered after reversal of the Collier judgment is proper in all respects, it becomes unnecessary to consider the other points raised, including the question whether a writ of review would be available as a remedy had said order been improper.

The application is denied, and the writ dismissed.

CISLER v. RAY.
S. F. 14122.

Supreme Court of California.
Aug. 31, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 28, 1931.

1. Brokers ⇨24(1).

Under contract with broker, laws, regulations, rules, customs, or usages of stock exchange were binding on customer, regardless of whether he knew of their existence.

2. Brokers ⇨24(1).

Under evidence, brokers held not negligent in delaying to inform customer of rejection of cancellation orders, and execution of buy and sell orders.

The evidence showed that an emergency verging on a panic existed, and that trading in stock in question was suspended because of emergency prevailing in trading in such stock on floor of exchange.

3. Brokers ⇨24(1).

In action to recover difference between price at which certain stock was sold and same stock bought pursuant to customer's order, evidence supported finding that five-minute period before opening of trading when cancellations were given same status as buy and sell orders was extended to 10 minutes, when rule extending period for rejecting buy and sell orders became effective.

4. Brokers ⇨24(1).

Effect of rule, giving 10-minute period before opening of trading when cancellation and buy and sell orders may be rejected, should continue when by reason of abnormal flood of orders that period was necessarily extended.

Evidence was uncontradicted that, during any period required for purpose of permitting specialists to make up a book, it was customary to refuse all orders including cancellations.

5. Brokers ⇨24(1).

Reasonableness of rule or custom of stock exchange was immaterial, where broker's customer expressly contracted to be bound by rules, regulations, customs, and usages of exchange.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John J. Allen, Judge.

Action upon a margin contract by Herman J. Cislser against Harris A. Ray. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

PER CURIAM.

After a further consideration of the merits of this appeal upon rehearing, we have concluded that the opinion written by Mr. Justice SHENK and filed herein on April 30, 1931, expresses the present opinion of this court in determining the issues presented on the appeal. Said opinion is therefore adopted as the opinion and decision of this court, and is as follows:

This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment for the plaintiff in an action to recover the sum of $8,590, which represents the difference between the price at which 100 shares of Bank of Italy stock were sold and the price at which 100 shares of the same stock were bought pursuant to orders placed by the defendant with and executed by the plaintiff's assignors on June 12, 1928, plus commissions and interest.

The plaintiff's assignors are Duisenberg-Wichman & Company, stock and bond brokers, who owned at the times herein involved a seat on the San Francisco Stock Exchange and maintained offices in Oakland and San Francisco. The defendant, according to his own testimony, spent his time and effort in investing his own funds, principally in buying and selling stocks as a business for the purpose of making a profit. He had maintained a margin account with Duisenberg-Wichman & Company since April 29, 1927, and had employed them to execute his orders for the purchase and sale of stocks on the San Francisco Stock Exchange. At the commencement of his relations with that company, the defendant had executed and delivered to it an agreement which, among other things, provided: "All transactions are subject to the rules, regulations and customs of the exchange or market (and its clearing house, if any) where executed. In all transactions wherein you act as my agent, I agree to wholly indemnify and save you free and harmless from any loss, damage or liability arising out of such transaction, howsoever same may occur. This agreement shall continue until revoked by me in writing. * * *" Prior to June 12, 1928, the defendant had closed the margin account, but early on the morning of that day he entered the Oakland office of Duisenberg-Wichman & Company for the purpose of resuming trading.

At this point it should be noted that about two years previously the "post system" had replaced what was known as the "call system" on the San Francisco Stock Exchange. By the system in operation on June 12, 1928, the trading room of the exchange was divided into posts to each of which was assigned the trading in one stock or more, each of which was in charge of a specialist who was selected from the membership of the exchange. After the commencement of this system, brokers placed the customer's order with the specialist to whom was assigned the trading in the stock desired to be bought or sold. The method of operation under the post system differs generally from the call system, in that under the latter system only one security was called and traded in at a time. Under the call system, therefore, a broker was able personally to execute the orders of his customer. Under the post system, however, the order is executed through the specialist unless the broker also has an order on the other side of the transaction, which, under the rules of the exchange, he may "cross" or "accommodate" at the market price, if the specialist makes no objection. One of the most important functions of a specialist under this system of trading is the exercise of the privilege given to him by the rules of the exchange to make the first bid or offer at the opening of trading on each market day. The exercise of this function entails the necessity of computing an opening price. The process by which the specialist computes the opening price consists in offsetting or crossing the buy and sell orders in his hands, including so-called market orders which are orders to buy or sell at the market price, and by mathematical deductions arriving at a figure which will accommodate a majority of such orders. This process is termed "making up a book."

On June 11, 1928, trading in Bank of Italy stock had assumed such proportions that the spread between the high and low prices for a share of that stock on that day amounted to as much as $155. Mr. Holt, who was the specialist in Bank of Italy stock on the San Francisco Stock Exchange at that time, testified that, by reason of the closing price of about $220 per share on the preceding day, on the morning of June 12, 1928, there was such a preponderance of sell orders in his hands that had he opened trading at the customary hour of 9:30 the opening price for a share of the stock would have been about $125. Accordingly, pursuant to a rule of the exchange, he announced sellers in that stock and delayed the opening until sufficient buy orders had been received by him to justify a higher market price. On that morning the defendant had been in the Oakland offices of Duisenberg-Wichman & Company since about 6 o'clock watching the reports of proceedings on the New York Stock Exchange. At 9:30 o'clock the San Francisco Stock Exchange ticker recorded sellers in Bank of Italy stock. At 9:36 o'clock Mr. Ray in Oakland gave an order to sell 100 shares of Bank of Italy stock at the market. This order was received by Mr. Isenberg, the representative of Duisenberg-Wichman & Company, on the floor of the exchange at 9:37. At 9:55 the specialist opened trading in Bank of Italy stock at $150.25. There being no objection on the part of the specialist, Mr. Isenberg crossed the defendant's order to sell 100 shares of Bank of Italy stock with a buy order for 100 shares at the market of the same stock, which at 9:31 he had received from a Mr. Adams, at the opening price. At 9:56 Mr. Ray in Oakland placed an order to buy 100 shares of Bank of Italy stock at the market. This order was received at the San Francisco office of Duisenberg-Wichman & Company at 9:57, and by Mr. Isenberg on the floor of the exchange at 9:58, and was immediately placed with the specialist. Between 9:56 and 10 o'clock, or approximately at 9:58, there being an avalanche of buying orders in Bank of Italy stock, and after consulting with members of the floor trading committee, the specialist in Bank of Italy declared a suspension in trading to enable him to make up a new book and announce another or second opening price in that stock. At 10 o'clock Mr. Ray in Oakland was in the act of giving another order to buy when news was received that trading was suspended. Mr. Ray thereupon withdrew the contemplated additional buy order and at 10:12 ordered his brokers to cancel his previous sell and buy orders. At 10:13 the cancellation orders were received by Mr. Isenberg's clerk who immediately handed them to the specialist who refused to accept them on the ground that it was "too late to cancel." Trading was reopened at 10:31 and at that time the execution of Mr. Ray's order to buy 100 shares of Bank of Italy stock was announced at the new opening price of $230. Information that both the sell and buy orders had been executed, and the terms thereof, was received by Mr. Ray at the Oakland office at 11:15, whereupon he immediately refused to confirm either of said orders. Subsequently this action was commenced to recover the loss sustained by the brokers by reason of the refusal of Mr. Ray to confirm the execution of his orders to sell and buy, plus interest and commissions.

The trial court found, among other facts, that the defendant, at the time he gave the orders here involved, was an experienced trader and had knowledge of the conditions affecting the trading in Bank of Italy stock on the San Francisco Stock Exchange at that time; that the written agreement executed by the defendant in April, 1927, was unrevoked and in full force and effect, and that on the 12th day of June, 1928, the following rules, regulations, customs, and usages of the San Francisco Stock Exchange were in effect: "First: That a broker having orders on both sides of a transaction may cross such orders by placing stock on record at the opening sale price, if the specialist shall not object, which transactions are known as 'accommodation sales' and may be recorded on the ticker if not objected to. Second: That a broker may entrust the execution of a customer's order to another broker or a so-called 'Specialist.' Third: That the specialist has a right to delay the opening of the market on any stock allocated to his post. Fourth: Specialists may refuse to accept orders in an emergency. Cancellations are considered as orders. Fifth: Specialists may suspend trading in an emergency. Sixth: The specialist has the right to make the opening bid and offer of stock, provided such bid and offer shall be made immediately one after the other. Seventh: Specialists may decline to receive orders for a period of ten minutes prior to the opening so as to enable the specialist to make up his book. Orders include cancellations."

The court also found that the defendant's order to sell 100 shares of Bank of Italy stock at the market was promptly executed at  $\gamma 50\frac{1}{4}$ , the opening price, and that the defendant's order to buy was received too late to participate at the opening of trading; that shortly thereafter trading in said stock was suspended because of an emergency then and there prevailing in the trading of said stock on the floor of the exchange, and that trading in said stock was not normal and was close to a panic. The court found further that orders of cancellation are included and come within the rule of the exchange which provides that a specialist may refuse orders in an emergency and that the defendant's brokers acted with the utmost diligence and care in the performance of their duty, and did everything within their power to carry out and execute promptly and expeditiously the defendant's orders.

An additional finding that the contracts of the parties contemplated actual deliveries of shares of stock and that there was no violation of the provisions of section 26 of article 4 of the state Constitution, lifts out of the case any contention that the contracts or transactions involved were illegal. It is conceded that the specialist in Bank of Italy stock was acting as the agent of Duisenberg-Wichman & Company.

The serious dispute on this appeal arises over the contention of the defendant that the evidence does not support the trial court's finding that cancellations are considered as orders within the rules, regulations, customs, or usages of the exchange so as to make the defendant liable under the circumstances here presented, and that nevertheless the brokers' delay in advising the defendant of the refusal of the specialist to honor the cancellation orders and of the execution of the sell and buy orders constituted negligence which was the proximate cause of the loss sought to be recovered.

[1, 2] It is conceded that no written rule or regulation of the stock exchange at that time contained the language "cancellations are considered as orders" or "orders include cancellations" used by the trial court in the portion of its statement of the rules, regulations, customs, and usages designated respectively as "Fourth" and "Seventh." It is not disputed that the rules or regulations passed by the governing board of the stock exchange in effect and pertinent to the privilege of the specialist to refuse to accept orders are: A rule dated April 11, 1927, providing that "the presentation of cancellation of orders to be the specialist during the five-minute period prior to the opening is subject to the same rules and limitations to which buying and selling orders are subject when presented to the specialist during that period"; a rule dated April 19, 1928, providing in part, "All orders whether or not they are for odd lot stocks must be in the hands of the specialist ten minutes prior to the opening to participate therein"; and the rules that "the specialist has the right to suspend trading in an emergency" and "specialists may refuse to accept orders in an emergency." It will be noted here that the defendant's cancellation orders were handed to the specialist and rejected by him eighteen minutes prior to the second opening. The question resolves itself then into whether the trial court's finding that the word "orders" contained in the rule that "specialists may refuse to accept orders in an emergency" includes "cancellations of orders" is supported by custom or otherwise. No contention can be made, in view of the contract of April, 1927, executed by the defendant, that the laws, regulations, rules, customs, or usages of the stock exchange would not be binding on the defendant whether or not he knew of their existence. Thomson v. Thomson, 315 Ill. 521, 146 N. E. 451. The trial court found that an emergency verging on a panic existed, and as to this finding there is no dispute. We may also add at this point that this undisputed finding compels a conclusion that we may not find as a matter of law that the defendant's brokers were negligent by reason of the delay in informing the defendant of the rejection of his cancellation orders and the execution of his buy and sell orders. Whether the result might be different in normal times is not the question here, but under the particular circumstances presented by the record we must conclude that the finding that the brokers were free from negligence is sufficiently supported by the evidence.

[3,4] The defendant, however, is asking for a reversal of the judgment against him on the ground that as the evidence showed that no emergency other than that which existed under the facts of the present case had occurred with respect to trading on the floor of the San Francisco Stock Exchange since the rules and regulations here involved became effective, no custom or usage to the effect that in an emergency cancellations may be treated as orders could have become established. Nevertheless, the record is replete with testimony to the effect that the system of post trading is impracticable and unworkable unless the specialist during the period required to make up a book may refuse any order or direction which will necessitate a change in the entries in his book during that period. The evidence substantially supports the finding of the trial court that, as a result of this condition, by implication, custom or otherwise the five-minute period before an opening when cancellations were given the same status as buy and sell orders was also extended to ten minutes when the rule of April 19, 1928, extending the period for rejecting buy and sell orders to ten minutes became effective. This period was placed at ten minutes for the reason that experience had shown that that was the time generally required by a specialist in a normal market to make up a book which would comprise all of the orders, including market orders, then in his hands. It must be obvious then that an avalanche of orders such as was presented to the specialist prior to the second opening in Bank of Italy stock on June 12, 1928, could not be accommodated without a new book being made up and the result of such an avalanche was to extend the period required by the specialist to make up his book beyond the ten-minute normal period prescribed and that this necessary extension of the normal time was in fact the emergency so created. We see no reason, and the appellant has presented none, why it was not competent for the trial court to conclude that the effect of the rule relating to the ten-minute period prior to an opening when cancellation and buy and sell orders may be rejected should not continue when by reason of an abnormal flood of orders that period was necessarily extended beyond the ten-minute regulation, inasmuch as the evidence was uncontradicted that during any period required for the purpose of permitting a specialist to make up a book it was customary to refuse all orders, including cancellations.

[5] We also fail to perceive how a question of reasonableness of the rule or custom may enter into the discussion. The defendant expressly contracted to be bound by the rules, regulations, customs, and usages of the exchange, without any limitations or restrictions or conditions, and, as indicated in Thomson v. Thomson, supra, he must therefore either conform to or repudiate and terminate his written contract.

On the record presented we must conclude that the defendant has shown no ground for a reversal.

The judgment is affirmed.

LANGDON, J.

I dissent.

It seems to be conceded, and it could hardly be denied, that the specialist, although an officer of the exchange, acts in the capacity of agent of the brokers who deal in the stocks which he handles; and the broker would ordinarily be liable to the customer for negligence or willful breach of duty on the part of the specialist. See Murphy v. Bishop, 182 App. Div. 805, 170 N. Y. S. 342; Meyer, Stock Brokers and Stock Exchanges, p. 487. It is true that the defendant entered into an express agreement to be bound by all rules, regulations, and customs of the exchange, but a study of the record reveals no custom and no rule to support the finding of the trial court. Indeed, plaintiff admits that no custom exists, not only because of the lack of any positive evidence to that effect, but because the particular situation which existed was without precedent in the San Francisco Stock Exchange, and no custom could possibly have become established. Plaintiff's theory is that the finding is an interpretation of the rules themselves, and that this interpretation is compelled by the necessities of the post trading system. It is said that the purpose of a suspension of trading is to permit the specialist to make up his book, and that it is essential that this operation be undisturbed. If a new order to buy or sell were forced upon him, his figures would have to be changed, and his computation of a new opening price would be delayed. Exactly the same result would follow, it is contended, by forcing him to accept a cancellation; and the testimony of the specialist is to this effect. But I see no reason for holding that a heavy loss should be borne by a client of a broker because the brokers operating on the exchange have adopted a system which becomes unworkable in an emergency. If the system requires, at the discretion of the specialist, a power to disregard the directions of a client, it is essential that this power be provided by express rule, so that the client may know in advance of the existence of this extraordinary modification of the usual principles of the law of agency. Of course, it is settled that the customer normally has the right to cancel any unexecuted order. Wahl v. Tracy, 139 Wis. 668, 121 N. W. 660; Meyer, Stockbrokers and Stock Exchanges, p. 273. In short, I cannot accept the proposition that the rule contended for must exist because the exchange could not function effectively without it. Our sole inquiry is as to whether such a rule was actually made and became part of the contract of defendant with his brokers. The answer to this inquiry necessitates the application of the ordinary doctrines governing the interpretation of contracts.

There are four rules of the exchange covering the powers of the specialist which are considered by plaintiff to be relevant in this connection. One provides that "all orders * * * must be in the hands of the specialist ten minutes prior to an opening to participate therein." Another provides: "The presentation of cancellations of orders to the specialist during the five-minute period prior to an opening is subject to the same rules and limitations to which buying and selling orders are subject when presented to the specialist during that period." A third gives the specialist "the right to suspend trading in an emergency"; and a fourth provides that the specialist "may refuse to accept orders in an emergency." The term "trading" is not defined in the rules, but it can hardly be deemed to include cancellations of orders, the very opposite of trading. The particular ground upon which the lower court seems to have proceeded was that the term "orders" in the fourth rule included "cancellations," and it is upon this rule that plaintiff chiefly relies.

The difficulty with this view is that the very rules which are being interpreted use the terms in a specific and not a general sense, and they distinguish clearly between orders and cancellations. The "five-minute" rule, above quoted, expressly provides that "cancellations of orders" are, under the particular conditions set forth, subject to the same rules and limitations as "buying and selling orders." Nothing could more clearly indicate an understanding of the terms as being distinct and different in their meaning. No reasonable person, reading the rules, and observing this special use of each term, could have any doubt of this intended meaning. Moreover, to refuse to accept an order to buy or sell during a suspension means to delay it until the suspension is over, and to deprive the customer of the benefit of the opening price. Ultimately it is executed and the customer merely loses the advantages which an earlier execution might have given him. But to refuse a cancellation is to act contrary to the customer's directions, and to execute an order which has been revoked. This fundamental difference in their legal effect removes all logical ground for considering that "cancellation" is included within the meaning of "order." But even if it were conceded that there still is uncertainty as to the meaning of the term "orders," which calls for its construction, it does not follow that the construction must be determined by the alleged necessities of the exchange. The rules were drafted by the members of the exchange, representing all the brokers who did business there, and an ambiguity, if any exists, must be resolved against the brokers. "The language of a contract should be interpreted most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist. * * *" Cal. Civ. Code, § 1654. See Robert Marsh & Co. v. Tremper (Cal. Sup.) 292 P. 950; Klapp v. Bache, 135 Misc. Rep. 508, 239 N. Y. S. 129; 6 Cal. Jur. 307; 13 C. J. 544, § 516.

The other ground upon which defendant attacks the judgment is that the broker was guilty of a breach of duty in failing to notify the defendant of the refusal of the specialist to accept the cancellation until about one hour had elapsed. It appears that the defendant was in the offices of the brokers throughout this entire period, and that he continuously requested a report on his cancellation. The explanation offered by the broker is that an unusual volume of business had caused them to utilize their wires almost exclusively for new orders, and that they were too busy with the orders to handle such reports. This is, in effect, to say that the opportunity to accept new and profitable business constitutes a justification for rendering poor service to customers whose business was already undertaken. Unwarranted delay in reporting the status of a customer's orders constitutes a breach of the obligation assumed by the broker, and there can be no doubt, from the explanation given by the brokers, that this delay was unwarranted. The contention that it worked no injury to defendant is absurd on its face. Had he been aware of the circumstances he might have accomplished something in the nature of a cancellation by placing a sell order to offset his buy order; and though he would not have secured the opening price, the order would probably have been executed at a figure near that price.

My conclusion is that the cancellation directed by defendant should have been given effect by the specialist, and that for his unwarranted refusal the broker is responsible as his principal. We are also of the view that the failure of the broker to report promptly to the defendant the fact of this refusal was a breach of the contractual obligations assumed toward him. On both of these grounds defendant was justified in denying liability for the loss suffered through the executed order to buy. The judgment of the lower court should have been reversed.

CURTIS, J.

This action was originally appealed to the District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, which court, upon submission of the case, affirmed the judgment of the trial court. We granted a petition for a transfer thereof to this court, for the reason that we were not satisfied with that portion of the decision of the appellate court wherein it held that, as the appliance by the use of which the plaintiff was injured was of a simple construction, he had assumed the risk thereof, and was therefore precluded from recovering for his injuries, notwithstanding he had made complaint to the conductor of the defect in said appliance and was ordered by the conductor to use the same. The following portion of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, however, we approve, and adopt the same as the opinion in part of this court. It is as follows:

This is an appeal by plaintiff from the judgment of the trial court made and entered after it had granted the motion of defendant for a directed verdict at the conclusion of the trial wherein evidence on the part of both plaintiff and defendant had been presented. The action was one for the recovery of damages for the injuries sustained by plaintiff by reason of the alleged negligence of defendant in failing to provide a safe place in which to work and safe appliances for use by plaintiff, who was an employee of defendant.

At the time when the injury of which plaintiff complains was sustained by him, he was employed by the defendant in the capacity of head brakeman on a freight train operating between San Bernardino, Cal., and San Jacinto, Cal., and while he was engaged in unloading certain merchandise from a freight car of said train onto a station platform at March Field in the county of Riverside, Cal. The merchandise which at the time was being unloaded by plaintiff was merchandise which had been shipped from some point in the state of Oregon. For the purpose of conveniently unloading freight from trains of the defendant at the March Field depot two planks had been used. These planks were approximately 7 feet long, 6 inches wide, and 2 inches thick. The ends of the planks were placed on the depot platform and the other ends extended about 6 inches into the freight car from which freight was to be unloaded, thus making a sort of runway. The planks were so placed that there was a distance of not to exceed 2 feet between their inner edges. The plaintiff had on a number of occasions made use of these boards in unloading freight at the March Field depot. However, the evidence discloses that complaint had been made by plaintiff and the rear brakeman to the conductor of the train in regard to the use of the planks and that plaintiff had asked for a bridge. On the day on which plaintiff sustained his injuries, a piece of boiler plate approximately 4 feet long, 3 feet wide, and  $\frac{1}{2}$  inch thick, and weighing about 75 pounds, was sent out by defendant to be placed on the planks. This boiler plate is generally referred to in the testimony of the witnesses as a steel apron. Plaintiff assisted in unloading it from the express car of the train onto the depot platform. This steel apron was then placed upon the two planks and it was at once apparent that it was not of sufficient length completely to cover over the aperture between the planks, and as it was finally placed, there remained an opening about 3 feet long and from  $1\frac{1}{2}$  to 2 feet wide at the ends of the planks near the depot platform. The testimony indicates that plaintiff thereupon objected to the use of the steel apron, declaring that he preferred to use the planks without the steel apron. The conductor, however, said that as long as the steel apron had been sent out they would use it, but that he would get another on the following day. Thereupon, the plaintiff procured a small merchandise truck from the depot and conducted it over the runway into the box car where it was loaded with about 250 to 300 pounds of merchandise. The plaintiff, walking backward, then pulled this truck so loaded, onto the runway and when the steel wheels of the truck came in contact with the steel apron the weight of the loaded truck shoved the plaintiff backward so that he fell in the aperture near the depot platform and sustained the injuries of which he complains.

The evidence discloses that at the time plaintiff was injured he was 23 years of age and had been employed on different railroads in various capacities for about  $7\frac{1}{2}$  years prior to his accepting employment with the defendant in the month of July, 1927.

[1-3] It is alleged in the first paragraph of plaintiff's complaint that the defendant is a corporation duly organized under the laws of the state of Kansas and engaged in the operation of an interstate steam railroad between the cities of Chicago in the state of Illinois and Los Angeles in the state of California. In the second paragraph of the plaintiff's complaint it is alleged that on August 8, 1927, the date on which plaintiff was injured, he was transferring freight from a car containing interstate shipments onto the station platform of the defendant at March Field in the county of Riverside. Neither of these allegations is denied by defendant, and the record further discloses that at the time plaintiff was injured he was engaged in transferring merchandise shipped from some point in Oregon from a freight car of defendant onto the station platform at March Field. We have here, therefore, the case of an employee of a railroad engaged in interstate commerce, who at the time he was injured, was employed in interstate commerce. This state of facts brings the instant case squarely under the operation of the provisions of the Federal Employers' Liability Act (45 USCA §§ 51-59). And this act is the exclusive remedy, as was pointed out by the Supreme Court of California in the case of Hines v. Industrial Accident Commission, 184 Cal. 1, 192 P. 859, 14 A. L. R. 720.

Since the Federal Employers' Liability Act provides the exclusive remedy in a case of this character, the question of substantive liability is to be determined by the provisions of the act and federal decisions construing such provisions. That all state laws upon the subject of the employer's liability to the employee in interstate transportation by rail have been superseded by the federal act, since congress by its enactment took possession of the field of such liability, was unequivocally announced in the case of Seaboard Air Line Ry. v. Horton, 233 U. S. 492, 34 S. Ct. 635, 58 L. Ed. 1062, L. R. A. 1915C, 1, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 475, 8 N. C. C. A. 834. Our own Supreme Court has likewise so declared in the case of Smithson v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 148, 162 P. 111, wherein numerous decisions of the United States Supreme Court were cited and it was clearly decided that in actions brought in the state courts under the provisions of the Federal Employers' Liability Act, the decisions of the Supreme Court are controlling in the construction of the act. This was also the holding of the California Supreme Court in the case of Hines v. Industrial Acc. Com., 184 Cal. 1, 192 P. 859, 14 A. L. R. 720. The same conclusion was reached by the Appellate Court of California for the Second Appellate District in the case of Werner v. Southern Pacific Co., 44 Cal. App. 76, 185 P. 1016. Authorities might be multiplied on this point, but perhaps it is nowhere more clearly stated than by the Supreme Court of Washington in the case of Bolch v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 90 Wash. 47, 155 P. 422, 426, wherein the court said: "We shall not review the many decisions of the state court cited by respondent, since in any event we are bound by the federal decisions, and especially the recent decisions of the United States Supreme Court upon the subject."

[4, 5] Having arrived at the conclusion that in the instant case the Federal Employers' Liability Act furnishes the exclusive remedy and that the question of substantive liability is to be determined by it and that we are bound by the construction placed upon its provisions by the federal courts, we shall next consider whether the trial court erred in granting respondent's motion for a directed verdict at the conclusion of the trial. The solution of this problem involves a determination of whether under the facts delineated in the record it may be said as a matter of law that the appellant assumed the risk of using the particular appliance which it is claimed was defective and through whose use appellant received the injuries of which he complains. For the purposes of this decision it may be assumed that the appliance was defective, in that the so-called steel apron was not of sufficient length entirely to cover over the aperture between the planks that were placed to form a sort of runway between the freight car and the depot platform; that an opening about 3 feet in length and not more than 2 feet in width remained near the depot platform; that appellant observed the defectiveness of the runway and objected to the use of the steel apron, declaring that he preferred to use the planks as had theretofore been done without the steel apron; that the conductor of the train, who was appellant's superior, stated that since the steel apron had been sent down it would be used, but that another apron would be provided on the following day. Under this state of the facts it is earnestly contended by appellant that he did not as a matter of law assume the risk of using the defective runway and that the trial court erred in refusing to submit to the jury the question of whether or not appellant had assumed the risk.

The rule of the common law with respect to the assumption of risks of employment is declared by Mr. Justice Pitney in the case of Arizona Copper Co. v. Hammer, 250 U. S. 400, 39 S. Ct. 553, 556, 63 L. Ed. 1058, 6 A. L. R. 1537, as follows:

"It is to be borne in mind that the matter of the assumption of the risks of employment and the consequences to flow therefrom has been regulated time out of mind by the common law, with occasional statutory modifications. The rule existing in the absence of statute, as usually enunciated, is that all consequences of risks inherent in the occupation and normally incident to it are assumed by the employee and afford no ground of action by him or those claiming under him, in the absence of negligence by the employer; and even risks arising from or increased by the failure of the employer to take the care that he ought to take for the employee's safety are assumed by the latter if he is aware of them or if they are so obvious that any ordinarily prudent person under the circumstances could not fail to observe and appreciate them; but if the employee, having become aware of a risk arising out of a defect attributable to the employer's negligence, makes complaint or objection and obtains a promise of reparation, the common law brings into play a new set of regulations requiring the employer to assume the risk under certain circumstances, the employee under others."

"When the employee does know of the defect, and appreciates the risk that is attributable to it, then if he continues in the employment without objection, or without obtaining from the employer or his representative an assurance that the defect will be remedied, the employee assumes the risk, even though it arise out of the master's breach of duty. If, however, there be a promise of reparation, then during such time as may be reasonably required for its performance, or until the particular time specified for its performance, the employee, relying upon the promise, does not assume the risk unless at least the danger be so imminent that no ordinarily prudent man under the circumstances would rely upon such promise."

It is the exception to or modification of the general rule providing that in those cases where there is a promise of reparation upon which the employee relies during such time as may be reasonably required for its performance upon which appellant relies and which he contends warrants a reversal of the judgment in the instant case.

In opposition to appellant's position, respondent contends that assuming that the record herein discloses clearly and unequivocally a promise of reparation by the employer and a reliance on such promise by the employee, nevertheless the appellant must fail in his appeal because the appliance of whose defectiveness he complains was a simple appliance with which he was entirely familiar and whose defects were patent and obvious to him. That he was aware of the defective condition of the runway can scarcely be said to be open to doubt inasmuch as the record discloses that appellant testified that he objected to the use of the steel apron, declaring that he preferred to use the planks without the apron.

It is to be further borne in mind that appellant was a man of at least 7½ years' experience in railroad work, a mature man, and that he had on a number of occasions utilized the two planks hereinabove described for the purpose of unloading freight at the place where he suffered the injuries of which he complains.

Taking all of these facts and circumstances into consideration, the question is presented as to whether this is a proper case for the application of the simple tool doctrine. The steel apron was something entirely new. It had been sent out for use at this particular station on the very day the accident happened. While the plaintiff was an experienced railroad man, there is no evidence that he had ever used such an appliance before or that he had ever seen one in use. As to whether this appliance, as made up of the two planks and the apron, was so simple in construction that the danger of using it was so obvious and imminent that an ordinarily prudent person would not undertake to do so presents a question not free from doubt. It is true that the plaintiff objected to its use, fearing that it might prove dangerous. On the other hand, the conductor, a person presumably of greater experience, directed the plaintiff to use it in unloading the freight from the car. It is inconceivable that the conductor would have given this direction had he considered the appliance so defective in construction that the danger in using it was obvious and imminent. In order to relieve the employer from responsibility for injuries that befall an employee while remaining at his work, after he has complained of defective apparatus and the employer has agreed to make reparation and has directed the employee to continue his service, a very plain case must be made out against the employee before the court will be justified in holding as a matter of law that the employee has assumed the risk of his employment under such circumstances. It was so held in the case of Seaboard Air Line v. Horton, 239 U. S. 595, 599, 36 S. Ct. 180, 182, 60 L. Ed. 458, where the court declared the law in the following language:

"To relieve the employer from responsibility for injuries that may befall the employee while remaining at his work in reliance upon a promise of reparation, there must be something more than knowledge by the employee that danger confronts him, or that it is constant. The danger must be imminent,—immediately threatening,—so as to render it clearly imprudent for him to confront it, even in the line of duty, pending the promise. The danger of the explosion of the water glass, which normally should withstand the pressure to which it was subjected, but which might probably explode at some time near or remote, cannot be said, as matter of law, to have been so imminent as to import an assumption of the risk by Horton notwithstanding the employer's promise to replace the guard glass. It would require a much plainer case than this to justify taking the question from the jury."

In that case the defect in the appliance was the absence of a small guard glass to protect the engineer from injury in case of the explosion of the water glass. This guard glass was two or three inches wide, eight or nine inches long, and about half an inch thick. Without this guard glass the engineer was exposed to the danger of an explosion of the water glass. The court, however, held that this danger from explosion was not as a matter of law so imminent as to import an assumption of risk by the engineer in continuing in his work after being directed by his employer to do so and upon the reliance of his employer to procure a guard glass in the future. So, in the case here, the appliance consisting of the two planks had been used in the past without any fatal or serious results as far as the evidence in this case shows. This appliance with the addition of the steel apron could be used without necessarily inflicting any injury upon the employee. The two planks were in their accustomed place, and the hand truck used in unloading freight could be wheeled over them after the steel apron was put in place the same as it could before. The truck, of course, ran more freely over the steel surface after the apron was made a part of the appliance than it formerly did over the planks. It would perhaps require more care and greater caution to operate this appliance after the steel apron was put in place than before, but as it could, after the addition of the apron even in its defective form, be operated with safety, although greater care might be required in its operation, it may well be questioned whether the danger in its use was so "imminent and immediately threatening" that a prudent person would not attempt its use. At least the case is not so plain that the court can say as a matter of law that in using it under the circumstances shown, the plaintiff assumed the risk of his employment.

[6] The law is well established that, before a servant can be held to have assumed the risk in using even simple tools, after complaint to his employer and promise of reparation by the latter, the danger must be so obvious and imminent that no prudent person would undertake the service. 39 Cor. Jur. p. 790, § 989. Measured by such a standard, the conduct of the plaintiff under the facts shown cannot by any reasonable construction thereof, be held as a matter of law to have amounted to an assumption of the risks of his employment.

"Although the defense of assumption of risk is established as a part of the law and will be applied in all cases fairly within the rule, it is, nevertheless, not a favored doctrine, * * * and should not be extended beyond its reasonable limits." 39 Cor. Jur. p. 689, § 891. We think this statement of the law is directly applicable to the facts before us, and that it would indeed be an extremely harsh rule that would hold that the plaintiff in executing the orders of the conductor under the circumstances shown, had as a matter of law assumed the risks of his employment. He had never before operated an unloading appliance like the one in question. He objected to its use, but was assured by the conductor that a new one would be provided on the following day, and in the meantime the one furnished by the company would be used. He was entitled to rely in a large extent upon the conductor's superior experience and greater knowledge, and it seems unthinkable under these conditions that he would be held as a matter of law to have assumed the risk of using the defective appliance.

In the case of Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Banks (C. C. A.) 288 F. 826, 828, under facts somewhat similar to those before us, the court said: "There is nothing in the case which would have justified the court below in holding that, as a matter of law, plaintiff assumed the risk of possible injury. He says he had never before handled any freight of the kind. He was entitled to rely upon his foreman's better knowledge, unless he could for himself see and appreciate the danger. Whether he could or should have done so was also a question for the jury." In Fillippon v. Albion Vein Slate Co., 250 U. S. 76, 39 S. Ct. 435, 437, 63 L. Ed. 853, the court quotes with approval from the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, Williams v. Clark, 204 Pa. 416, 418, 54 A. 315, and approves the law there stated as follows: "If the master gives the servant to understand that he does not consider the risk one which a prudent person should refuse to undertake, the servant has a right to rely upon his master's judgment, unless his own is so clearly opposed thereto that, in fact, he does not rely upon his master's opinion. A servant is not called upon to set up his own unaided judgment against that of his superiors, and he may rely upon their advice and still more upon their orders, notwithstanding many misgivings of his own. The servant's dependent and inferior position is to be taken into consideration; and if the master gives him positive orders to go on with the work, under perilous circumstances, the servant may recover for an injury thus incurred, if the work was not inevitably and imminently dangerous."

We particularly call attention to the closing words of this paragraph, "if the work was not inevitably and imminently dangerous." We think it sufficiently appears in this case from the facts stated above that the work which the plaintiff was called upon to perform was not as a matter of law either "inevitably or imminently dangerous."

In Ruling Case Law, we find the law on this subject stated as follows (volume 18, p. 704, § 187): "The fact that the employee acted pursuant to an immediate command is a cogent evidentiary fact bearing on this issue. Inasmuch as commands usually proceed from persons having superior knowledge, it may be presumed in case an employee is ordered to do certain work that the employer has superior knowledge of the perils attending performance; and in the absence of anything to the contrary, or where the case otherwise is in doubt, this presumption must prevail in behalf of the plaintiff." Concluding this subject, the author on page 705 has the following to say regarding nonsuits and directed verdicts in cases of this kind: "While there may be cases disclosing such manifest danger to the employee that the court may direct a nonsuit or verdict for the employer, it generally is held to be for the jury to say whether the employee, in acting pursuant to orders or assurances, knew and appreciated the peril. The tendency of the modern cases is to permit a recovery unless the employer's direction calls for nothing less than recklessness on the part of the employee, leaving no ground for difference of opinion as to the peril of acting pursuant thereto."

We might add to the above authorities many others from our federal and state courts expounding the same doctrine. These mentioned we think are sufficient to show that the courts have with reasonable uniformity held that a servant does not assume the risk of his employment after complaint and promise of reparation, except in those cases where the work is obviously, imminently, and inevitably dangerous. We are satisfied that the evidence before us does not present a state of facts where the dangerous character of the work was so obvious and imminent as to constitute this a proper case for the application of the simple tool doctrine.

We are not unmindful of the fact that there are many authorities from courts of the highest standing and repute holding contrary views from those above expressed, but in our judgment the rule which we have followed is more in harmony with the trend of modern decisions as well as recent legislation upon the respective rights and liabilities of employers and employees. In many instances, the doctrine of assumption of risk has been entirely repudiated by legislative enactment. The Federal Employers' Liability Act has, in certain character of actions, deprived an employer of such defense, but it has been held that its provisions in this regard do not extend to actions like the instant one. Seaboard Air Line v. Horton, 233 U. S. 492, 503, 34 S. Ct. 635, 58 L. Ed. 1062, L. R. A. 1915C, 1, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 475; Jacobs v. Southern Railway Co., 241 U. S. 229, 235, 36 S. Ct. 588, 60 L. Ed. 970. As we understand these cases, they hold that the common-law rule governing the defense of assumption of risk applies to all actions brought under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, except those brought against a common carrier for the violation of any statute enacted for the safety of employees to which the instant action does not belong.

It is somewhat singular that there is no case to be found in the reports of this state, at least none has been called to our attention and our research has failed to discover any case, which has applied the simple tool doctrine in passing upon the liability of an employer for injuries sustained by the employee. There are cases, however, to be found among the decisions of our appellate courts in which the facts might have justified the application of the rule, but which were decided without any reference to this rule of law, and in direct opposition to its terms.

In Notthoff v. Los Angeles Gas, etc., Co., 161 Cal. 93, 118 P. 436, the employee complained that a certain sump hole filled with boiling water in a basement was not covered with a platform. The employer agreed to construct a platform covering the hole. The employee was injured and was nonsuited by the trial court. This court reversed the judgment and stated the rule in such cases to be as follows (page 97 of 161 Cal., 118 P. 436, 438): "The general rule is that, where an employee has full knowledge of the unsafe condition of the premises upon which he is working, he is deemed to assume the special risk incident to the employment under such conditions. [Citing authorities.] Upon this general rule is ingrafted a well-established exception that, where 'an employee notifies the master of a special risk, and objects to continuing the work under the existing conditions, and is induced to continue such work by a promise to remove the danger within a reasonable time, then for such time the employee is not presumed to assume such risk.'" (Citing authorities.)

In Hawley v. Los Angeles Creamery Co., 16 Cal. App. 50, 116 P. 84, the defendant operated a dairy and the plaintiff was the driver of its milk wagon drawn by a team of horses. The lines used by the driver in guiding and checking his team were defective. The driver notified the manager of the creamery of such defect. The manager promised to take care of the defect. A few days thereafter, while plaintiff was driving the team, the lines broke in the defective part. The team ran away and injured the driver severely. A judgment in his favor was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal and this court refused a further hearing of the case. The District Court of Appeal held, at page 53 of 16 Cal. App., 116 P. 84, 86, that "when, however, as in this case, the master, through a vice principal, has expressly promised to repair a defect, the servant can recover for the injury caused thereby within such period of time after the promise as it would be reasonable to allow for its performance. * * *" Diehl v. Swett-Davenport Lumber Co., 14 Cal. App. 495, 112 P. 561, was also a case in which the employee recovered judgment which was sustained on appeal. The defect was simply a hole in the floor of a wooden platform. The employer promised reparation. The employee was injured when his foot slipped into the hole and he was thrown against dangerous machinery and severely injured.

From the foregoing authorities we see no escape from the conclusion that the trial court was in error in directing a verdict in this case in favor of the defendant, and for that reason the judgment based upon such verdict must be reversed.

[7] We think there is no merit in respondent's contention that the plaintiff has failed to perfect a valid appeal from the judgment in this action. It is true that the notice of appeal states that the appeal is from the judgment of nonsuit. There was only one judgment rendered in this action, and it was not a judgment of nonsuit. But it is clear that the plaintiff intended to appeal from the judgment rendered by the trial court. The words "of nonsuit" may well be disregarded as surplusage.

The judgment is reversed.

MARKS, J.

Appellant instituted this action seeking to abate an alleged nuisance and to recover damages alleged to have been occasioned thereby. At the close of appellant's case respondents made a motion for nonsuit which was granted. From the judgment entered, appellant has prosecuted this appeal.

This action grew out of a controversy over the construction to be placed upon certain provisions of a deed executed on November 18, 1898, between Alice Bennett Coffin, now Alice Bennett Gilmore, the grantor, and Frank P. Frary, grantee. The provisions of this deed which are in dispute are as follows: "It is also agreed that the grantee herein shall in the event of his building on said property leave a light well between the building constructed and the Lafayette block; the said light well to be four feet wide and to extend from the north side of the second window on the north wall to the south wall of said Lafayette block; and extending upward from the bottom of the second story windows in said Lafayette block. It is further understood that this agreement shall be in effect only so long as the grantor herein named shall retain the ownership of said Lafayette block, and this covenant shall not pass to the grantee or to successors in interest thereof. To have and to hold the above-granted and described premises unto said grantee his heirs and assigns forever."

Mrs. Gilmore originally owned lots A and B in block 46 of Horton's addition in San Diego. She sold the westerly portion of this tract (now owned by respondents) to Frary, retaining title to the easterly portion, which she still owns subject to a ninety-nine year lease. When she acquired title to these lots there was a four-story brick building upon that portion which she still owns and upon which appellant holds the ninety-nine year lease. The first floor of this building is occupied by stores, and the three upper floors are used as a hotel. There are outside windows in the westerly wall of this building on all three floors of the hotel. Appellant's interest in this property is deranged through his lease.

On November 21, 1898, Frary sold his portion of the property to P. M. Johnson and J. E. Connell, who built a two-story building upon it. This was probably erected some time prior to the year 1904 and remained thereon until the year 1929. The front portion of this two-story building was built flush to their easterly property line for a distance of twenty-one feet thereby closing certain of the windows on the second floor of the westerly side of Mrs. Gilmore's hotel building. The buildings remained in this condition until the year 1929, when the two-story building was removed and a four-story building erected in its place by the State Guaranty Corporation. The easterly wall of this new building followed the same line as that of the two-story building erected by Johnson and Connell. Its northerly twenty-one feet, which is the front end of the building, was built flush to the property line closing the windows for that distance on the westerly side of the Gilmore hotel property. A light well four feet in width was left along the balance of the westerly wall of the hotel making an offset of four feet in the easterly wall of respondents' building corresponding with the light well left in the easterly wall of the Johnson-Connell building.

Appellant maintains that the erection of the northerly twenty-one feet of the easterly wall of the four-story building flush against the hotel property thereby closing the outside windows on the two upper stories was a violation of the provisions of the deed from Coffin (now Gilmore) to Frary, which we have quoted; and, further, that these provisions constitute a covenant running with the land whereby an easement was created with the Gilmore property as the dominant tenement and respondents' property as the servient tenement, which easement would prevent respondents from closing one vertical tier of the windows by the erection of its present building.

[1, 2] The sole question presented by the record before us is whether or not the provision of the deed from Coffin (now Gilmore) to Frary did create an easement which would pass with the title to the property or was a personal restriction or covenant between the parties to the deed.

The record shows that by the terms of the deed Frary agreed to leave a light well on his property "in the event of his building on said property." This deed also contained a pertinent provision that the agreement requiring Frary to construct this light well would remain in force only as long as Miss Coffin (now Gilmore) should retain ownership of the hotel property and that it should not pass to her grantees or successors in interest. It would seem to be immediately apparent from the language used by the parties to this deed that they intended to bind only themselves and not their successors in interest and that the provisions which we have quoted created merely a personal contract between them and not an easement or covenant that would attach to the property and pass to subsequent owners thereof. The following cases make this conclusion irresistible: Los Angeles Terminal Land Co. v. Muir et al., 136 Cal. 36, 68 P. 308, 309; Berryman v. Hotel Savoy Co., 160 Cal. 559, 117 P. 677, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 5; Bresee v. Dunn, 178 Cal. 96, 172 P. 387; Pythian Castle Ass'n v. Daroux, 172 Cal. 510, 157 P. 594.

No privity of estate or contract exists between appellant and respondents. In the case of Los Angeles, etc., Co. v. Muir et al., supra, the plaintiff conveyed certain properties to the Catalina Yacht Club. The deed contained a provision as follows: "It is hereby covenanted and agreed by and between the parties hereto that, in consideration of this conveyance, no saloon business, or business of vending malt, vinous, or spirituous liquors, shall ever be carried on upon said lot; neither shall said lot be used for any business or store purposes, other than for hotel or lodging house." In deciding the case the Supreme Court used the following language: "The covenant inserted in the deed from the plaintiff to the Catalina Yacht Club for the lot mentioned therein is not one that runs with the land. It was not made for the benefit of the lot conveyed, but purported to impose a burden thereon by restricting its use; and, while a benefit will pass with the land to which it is incident, a burden will adhere exclusively to the original covenantor, unless a privity of estate or tenure subsist or was created between the covenantor and covenantee at the time when the covenant is made. [Citing cases.] Here there was no privity of estate between the parties, for by the same instrument which contained the covenant the fee was conveyed to the covenantor. Under the feudal system the transfer of every estate created privity of tenure between the parties, and hence both the burden and the benefit of all covenants made by either bound and profited the assignee of either as an incident to the land. 'But, when the statute of quia emptores abolished subinfeudation, this privity no longer existed in cases where a fee was transferred, and no reversion was left in the donor; and it became a rule that covenants which imposed any charge, burden, or obligation upon the land were held not to be incident to it, and therefore incapable of passing with it to an assignee. * * * But on the other hand, if the covenant were one intended to benefit the land, it was considered to be incident to and run with the land, and therefore whoever might become the owner of the land would also become entitled to the benefit of the covenant.' (Rawle, Cov. 314. So, our Civil Code (section 1462) provides,

'Every covenant contained in a grant of an estate in real property, which is made for the direct benefit of the property, or some part of it then in existence, runs with the land;' and section 1461, Civ. Code, provides that 'the only covenants which run with the land are those specified in this title, and those which are incidental thereto.' The covenant here in question is one which not only does not, as matter of law, run with the land, but it purports on its face to be a personal covenant, not binding upon the assigns of the covenantor, nor inuring to the benefit of the successors or assigns of the covenantee; and it is quite clear that no action at law upon the covenant in question could be maintained by the plaintiff against the defendants, or either of them."

[3] Ordinarily, personal restrictions or covenants created by deed or contract do not pass with the land where there is no privity of estate or privity of contract. In the case of Pythian Castle Ass'n v. Daroux, supra, the Supreme Court held as follows: "The facts are simple and undisputed. M. Graf was the owner of lot 5 in the block bounded by H, Eighth, I, and Ninth Streets, in the city of Sacramento. He conveyed by deed on April 21, 1888, the south 90 feet of the east 40 feet of his lot to Knights of Pythias Hall Association of Sacramento, plaintiff's predecessor in interest. The deed, in which the grantor was designated as 'party of the first part' and the grantee as 'party of the second part,' contained the following language: 'And said party of the first part hereby covenants and agrees, and this deed is given and accepted upon the express understanding and agreement, that he will never himself erect any structure upon the south ninety feet of the west forty feet of said lot 5 within five feet of the land hereby conveyed, and that in case he has any bona fide offer to purchase of him said south ninety feet of the west forty feet of said lot 5 he will give said second party the preference to purchase the same at said bona fide offer.' Defendants by mesne conveyances and after the death of M. Graf became the owners of the south 90 feet of the west 40 feet of said lot 5, and they served upon plaintiff notice of their intention to excavate and build thereon. Appellant thereupon commenced this action to enjoin them from placing any structure on the easterly 5 feet of their lot. The only question involved in the case therefore relates to the meaning and force of the quoted language. There is no ambiguity in the words of the deed. The paragraph upon which appellant relies, is a purely personal covenant which does not purport to bind any one but the grantor, M. Graf. It does not run with the land, and does not place any sort of compulsion upon the present owners. By it M. Graf merely agreed to forbear from building any structure upon the easterly 5 feet of his remaining portion of lot 5 during his ownership, and to give a preference to his grantee of the south 90 feet of the east 40 feet to purchase the adjoining land in the event of a bona fide offer being made therefor by some intending purchaser. By no twisting or turning of the quoted language may any other meaning be derived from it. There is abundant authority to support the view of the trial court that the covenant pleaded is merely a personal one, and not enforceable against respondents."

[4, 5] In some cases, where justice and equity require it to be done, the courts have held that an equitable easement which runs with the land might be created by a personal restriction or covenant made between the owners of properties. This doctrine of equitable easements is set forth in the case of Los Angeles, etc., Co. v. Muir et al., supra, as follows: "Conceding, therefore, that personal covenants imposing restrictions upon the uses of land contained in grants thereof may in proper cases be enforced in equity, the question remains whether the facts of this case justify the relief granted by the court below. The plaintiff is the grantor in whose deed to the yacht club the covenants in question were inserted. As grantor it could determine the conditions or restrictions under which it would part with the title, and the covenants it would require of the vendee. It could have inserted a condition subsequent, the violation of which would involve a forfeiture of title, and such condition would have been effective against the assigns of the grantee, or it could have inserted a covenant which would have inured to the protection of plaintiff's grantee or successor in interest, and would have expressly bound the assigns of the yacht club. It did not do either, but contented itself with a covenant, in its terms purely personal, purporting to create a restriction upon the use of the property so long only as the vendee should retain the title, and by such agreement they would, at law, each be conclusively bound; and in determining any alleged equity arising out of this covenant or agreement, or its alleged violation, its legal effect must not be lost sight of, for, where a covenantor limits, by its terms the legal duration of his covenant, there must be a clear and convincing equity to justify its continuance beyond the time so limited. It cannot be assumed that it was intended by either party to the covenant that it should be continued for all time, or 'until the island should be swallowed by the sea.' The covenant was not that the yacht club would use it 'for hotel, lodging-house, or club purposes' for any time or at all; and, even if such had been the form of the covenant, surrounding conditions might so change that a court of equity would relieve the covenantor and the property from such restriction to its use, since public policy requires that land should not be unnecessarily burdened with permanent or long-continued restrictions depreciating the value of its use to the owner, as well as its selling value in the market; and, as there is no personal contract relation between the parties to this action, the plaintiff is not entitled to relief against the defendants unless the evidence shows with reasonable certainty that the use of the lot for ferry purposes would materially injure the remaining property of the plaintiff."

We cannot apply the doctrine of an equitable easement to this case. It affirmatively appears from the language used by Coffin and Frary in their deed that the covenant or restriction therein contained was personal to the parties and was not intended by them to run with the land. Appellant must rely upon this language and his rights are limited by it. To hold that the provisions of this deed created an equitable easement, it would be necessary for us to read into it an intention that is not only not apparent therefrom but is contrary to the express language used. We would have to impose a burden upon the subsequent owners of the Frary property which was neither contemplated nor desired by Frary or his grantor.

The apparent interpretation put upon the provisions of this deed by the conduct of Mrs. Gilmore and the subsequent owners of the Frary property furnishes a powerful argument against the contentions of appellant and in favor of the position assumed by respondents and the construction placed upon it by the trial court. The easterly wall of the two-story building erected upon respondents' property by Johnson and Connell was on the identical line now occupied by the easterly wall of the present building. The former building closed the windows of the second floor in the north end of the westerly wall of the Gilmore building. This old building remained upon the property closing these windows for a period of twenty-five years without active opposition or question from Mrs. Gilmore. Her acquiescence in this condition for this period of time is evidence of the construction put upon the language used in the deed and is a strong argument in favor of the conclusion that the closing of these windows was not considered by her a violation of the terms of her deed to Frary. If the closing of these windows on the second floor of the building was not a violation of the terms of the deed, then the closing of the corresponding windows on the third and fourth floors was not a violation of its terms. Under these conditions and the other circumstances surrounding this case we cannot apply the doctrine of an equitable easement to the situation here presented.

Judgment affirmed.

JENNINGS, J.

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment denying recovery in an action instituted by it to recover damages from a notary public and the surety on her official bond. The record discloses the following pertinent facts:

For approximately 2½ years prior to December 27, 1928, one Lewis H. Homer was an attorney in fact for respondent Indemnity Insurance Company of North America in the city of San Diego. During the month of December, 1928, the said Lewis H. Homer sought to procure from appellant the loan of $15,000, and offered to secure repayment of the loan by depositing with appellant a bond executed by the Indemnity Insurance Company of North America guaranteeing repayment of the loan. The deal was consummated and the loan made. The bond which was thus given purported to have been executed by Gordon L. Eby, also an authorized agent and attorney in fact of the respondent insurance company. The bond was not in fact executed by Gordon L. Eby, and his signature appearing thereon was forged. Attached to the bond was a notarial certificate in the usual form reciting that Gordon L. Eby, known to the notary to be the person whose name is subscribed to the within instrument as attorney in fact of the Indemnity Insurance Company of North America, had personally appeared before the notary and acknowledged that he had subscribed the name of the company as principal and his own name as attorney in fact. The certificate bore the seal of a notary public. The signature of the notary is a genuine signature. The evidence discloses that the notary, who had been employed as a stenographer in the office of Gordon L. Eby in San Diego, was not so employed at the time the bond was made. It also appears that it was the custom of the notary, during the time she was employed in Eby's office to keep in her desk, available for use by any one who had access thereto, a number of blank acknowledgments signed by her as notary. The evidence discloses that the notary did not possess a seal of her own, but used a blank notarial seal which was the property of the office. This seal remained in the office when she terminated her employment with Gordon L. Eby during the month of November, 1928. It is undisputed that although the signature of the notary appearing on the certificate attached to the bond is a genuine signature, the recital contained therein that Gordon L. Eby had appeared before her on December 27, 1928, and acknowledged that he had subscribed the name of the Indemnity Insurance Company of North America to the bond as principal and his own name as attorney in fact is untrue, and that Gordon L. Eby did not subscribe the company's name as principal or his own name as attorney in fact, nor did he acknowledge that he did. The conclusion is obvious that Lewis H. Homer, who was employed in the office of Gordon L. Eby, forged Eby's signature to the bond, secured possession of one of the blank notarial certificates bearing the signature of the notary, impressed it with the notarial seal which was in the office, and attached the certificate to the spurious bond, which he deposited with appellant to secure repayment of the loan made by appellant to him. The complaint alleges that the notary had been duly appointed and was acting as such on December 27, 1928; that her official bond had been duly approved by a judge of the superior court; that appellant made the loan to Lewis H. Homer in reliance upon the bond deposited as security; that it believed the bond was valid and genuine for the reason that the purported signature of Gordon L. Eby as attorney in fact appeared to have been acknowledged before the notary; that her certificate was genuine, and by reason thereof appellant believed the bond to which it was attached and the signature of Gordon L. Eby as attorney in fact were authentic and genuine and that it had good security for the loan; that Lewis H. Homer is insolvent and the loan obtained by him has not been paid, and, by reason of the genuine certificate of acknowledgment of the notary attesting the forged signature of Gordon L. Eby as attorney in fact, appellant has suffered damage to the extent of the unpaid loan.

The answer of respondents denies that the notary took the acknowledgment of Gordon L. Eby, that Eby had subscribed the name of the Indemnity Insurance Company of North America to the bond and his own name as attorney in fact, or that the notary had prepared the certificate or impressed the notarial seal upon it, or that she had attached the certificate to the bond or that she had known of the bond or the attachment of the certificate to the bond until many months after the transaction had taken place. It is alleged that the nature of the transaction was so unusual as to put appellant upon notice of its irregularity, and that by the exercise of ordinary prudence it could have ascertained that the signature of the attorney in fact was forged and the bond spurious. The answer also contains allegations that appellant had in its possession signature cards of Gordon L. Eby, and that for a number of years Gordon L. Eby had been a customer of appellant and a depositor in appellant's bank and had engaged in numerous transactions with said bank whereby his signature had become known to appellant's officers and employees, so that appellant by the exercise of ordinary care could have ascertained the forgery and that the acceptance of the spurious bond under the circumstances was gross negligence, and any damage resulting therefrom was caused by the negligence of appellant.

The trial court found that the bond was not in fact executed by Gordon L. Eby, but that the name of Gordon L. Eby was wrongfully signed to the bond by Lewis H. Homer without authority and was a forgery. The court further found that the signature of the notary was genuine, but that she did not take the acknowledgment of Gordon L. Eby and that she did not impress the notarial seal upon the certificate nor attach the separate slip of paper containing the purported acknowledgment to the bond, and that the notary did not know of the execution of the bond or the attachment of the purported certificate of acknowledgment to the bond until more than two months after the loan was made. The court also found that the notary was negligent in signing certificates of acknowledgment in blank and allowing them to remain in the office where she had been employed, but that her negligent action in this regard was not the proximate cause of appellant's damage. It was found that the loan by appellant to Homer upon the security of the bond was a very unusual transaction, and that appellant failed to use ordinary diligence in making the loan without investigating the surrounding circumstances and without making any effort to verify the representations of Homer. The court further found that appellant did not rely upon the certificate of acknowledgment attached to the bond, but required Homer to produce special written authority from the insurance company for the execution of the bond, and that the written authority which was produced was not in fact executed by the manager of the insurance company as it purported to be, but that the manager's signature to the written authorization was forged. From the findings thus made the court concluded that the appellant was not entitled to prevail and denied recovery.

Appellant contends that the judgment of the trial court is not sustained by the evidence; that the judgment is contrary to law; that the bank was not required as a matter of law to investigate the validity of the signature of respondent, Indemnity Insurance Company of North America, because, it is said, the notary's certificate is a guaranty of the authenticity of such signature.

[1, 2] Appellant's first contention may be disposed of readily. The record discloses the production of ample evidence to support every finding of fact which the trial court made.

With respect to the second contention, appellant urges that the trial court erred in permitting the notary to impeach her certificate of acknowledgment upon which appellant was entitled to rely and did rely. The logical effect of appellant's contention is therefore that a notary, who has negligently rendered it possible for a wrongdoer to misuse a certificate of acknowledgment, is liable although the person who dealt with such wrongdoer was himself guilty of negligence which was the proximate cause of the damage sustained. It is true that appellant's complaint was not based on the negligence of the notary, but the answer of respondents alleged contributory negligence on the part of appellant, and it was an important issue in the case. The defense of contributory negligence necessarily assumed negligence on the part of the notary. The trial court found that the notary was negligent, a finding amply sustained by the evidence. The evidence was likewise ample to sustain the court's finding that appellant was negligent and that its negligence was the proximate cause of the loss incurred by appellant. Such a state of facts precludes recovery by appellant. Hatton v. Holmes, 97 Cal. 208, 31 P. 1131; Oakland Bank of Savings v. Murfey, 68 Cal. 455, 9 P. 843; Riverside P. C. Co. v. Maryland C. Co., 46 Cal. App. 87, 90, 189 P. 808; Brown v. Rives, 42 Cal. App. 482, 489, 184 P. 32.

[3] Appellant's third contention is that no legal duty was imposed upon appellant to investigate the genuineness of the signature of respondent Indemnity Insurance Company of North America by its attorney in fact because the notary's certificate guaranteed the authenticity of such signature. This contention is closely related to appellant's second contention hereinbefore discussed, and amounts to a declaration that a notary is a guarantor of the genuineness of the signature of the individual who acknowledges that it is his signature although the person who takes the instrument bearing the notary's certificate may be grossly negligent and his negligence be the proximate cause of the loss suffered. There is no rule of law that imposes so severe a burden upon a notary. Section 801 of the Political Code of California imposes a liability upon a notary and the sureties on his bond for damages sustained through official misconduct or neglect. The action was tried on the theory that the notary was negligent in leaving about her desk blank forms of acknowledgment bearing her signature which made possible the misuse of such forms in the manner in which one such form was here used to the damage of an innocent third party. To such an action the contributory negligence of the third party is a defense, and, if made out by the production of competent evidence, is a complete answer. Oakland Bank of Savings v. Murfey, supra. The evidence produced at the trial showed that Gordon L. Eby, the attorney in fact of the insurance company, had been a customer of and depositor in the appellant bank for a number of years; that the bank had cards bearing his signature; that the forged signature appearing on the bond differed radically from the genuine signature; that the bank, although it questioned his authority to execute the bond in question, made no effort to communicate with him regarding his signature, trusted to the man to whom they were making a loan of $15,000 to send a telegram to the office of the insurance company in San Francisco, inquiring as to the authority of Eby to execute the bond, and, when later shown a letter purporting to be signed by the manager of the insurance company authorizing the execution of the bond, raised no further question and completed the transaction. It is further to be noted that the trial court found that the transaction, wherein the loan was made on the sole security of a bond of an insurance company guaranteeing repayment of the loan, was an unusual transaction, a finding supported not only by the evidence of appellant's action in questioning the authority of the attorney in fact to execute the bond, but by other evidence sufficient to sustain it. The recital of the facts indicates the correctness of the court's judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by the Harbor Supply Company against the motorboat Astorian, J. V. Giaconi, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants named appeal.

Reversed in part.

Loucks & Phister, of San Pedro, for appellants.

Liggett & Liggett, of San Diego, for respondent.

MARKS, J.

Respondent is a corporation whose principal place of business is in the city of San Pedro, Cal., where it is engaged in the business of supplying gear, tackle, and supplies to ocean-going boats. The defendants J. V. Giaconi, Mrs. K. M. Giaconi, and Peter M. Hanson were the owners of the ocean-going motorboat Astorian, which was engaged in fishing along the Pacific Coast from Alaskan to Mexican waters.

On or about October 1, 1929, J. V. Giaconi, acting as managing agent for the boat, leased it to Y. Ito for the period of one year at a cash rental payable monthly in varying amounts. It was agreed that Ito should, at his own cost and expense, keep the Astorian in good, operative condition, tight, staunch, well fitted and tackled, and that he would pay all expenses of the operation thereof including the gear and the supplies used during the term of the lease. He was given the option to purchase the boat on or before October 1, 1930, which he did not exercise. By the terms of the agreement he was prohibited from selling, mortgaging, or otherwise disposing of the Astorian and agreed not to permit it to be attached or taken upon execution.

Ito and J. V. Giaconi were brought together by John Vitalich, who was vice president and a director of the respondent corporation. All negotiations for the terms of the lease were conducted through Vitalich and the document itself was prepared in his office.

Shortly after October 1, 1929, Ito took possession of the Astorian. He was introduced to respondent by Vitalich and bought goods and supplies from respondent in San Pedro, which were of the total reasonable value of $1,968.18, upon which he paid the sum of $653.97, leaving a balance unpaid of $1,314.21, which forms the basis of this action.

Within a year from the time the supplies were furnished Ito, respondent brought this action to recover the unpaid balance of the bill. It also sought to have decreed that its claim was a lien upon the boat and that the boat be sold to pay the amount of the judgment, interest, and costs. The court rendered judgment against Ito for the principal of the unpaid bill together with interest and decreed the amount a lien upon the Astorian paramount to all other liens existing upon said boat prior to October 10, 1929. It further decreed the foreclosure of said lien against the defendants J. V. Giaconi and Y. Ito and ordered the Astorian sold in liquidation thereof. No attachment has been issued upon the boat. This appeal is taken by the defendant motor boat Astorian and the defendant and claimant J. V. Giaconi.

Appellants strongly urge that in so far as this action is against the Astorian and the judgment of the court decrees the claim of plaintiff a lien upon the boat and orders it sold to satisfy such lien, it is an action in rem, of which the courts of California have no jurisdiction.

[1, 2] It is well settled that the judicial powers of the federal government extend to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction (Constitution of the United States, art. 3, § 2), to the exclusion of the state courts, in actions strictly in rem. Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Stewart, 253 U. S. 149, 40 S. Ct. 438, 64 L. Ed. 834, 11 A. L. R. 1145. Actions in persona involving supplies furnished an ocean-going boat, with ancillary attachment proceedings upon the vessel, may be brought in the state courts. Rounds, etc., v. Cloverport, etc., Co., 237 U. S. 303, 35 S. Ct. 596, 59 L. Ed. 966. Such a proceeding is sometimes denominated as an action quasi in rem. Siler Mill Co. v. Nelson Co., 94 Wash. 477, 162 P. 590.

The respondent maintains that the action is brought under the provisions of section 813 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure and is not an action in rem, but an action in personam with ancillary proceedings for the attachment of the vessel, of which the state courts have jurisdiction. The appellants reply to this argument by urging that in so far as section 813, Code of Civil Procedure, attempts to give the state courts jurisdiction to proceed against a sea-going vessel and sell the same for supplies furnished, it is an action in rem of which the courts of California have no jurisdiction. In support of this contention they cite the case of The Moses Taylor v. Hammons, 4 Wall. 411, 18 L. Ed. 397, which reversed a decision of the Supreme Court of this state and held somewhat similar provisions of the Practice Act of California unconstitutional. They further cite the case of Stephens v. Weyl-Zuckerman & Co., 34 Cal. App. 210, 167 P. 171, which they seek to construe as a similar holding upon the present provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure.

From the view we take of the case we do not find it necessary to determine these questions raised by appellants. For the purpose of this decision we will assume, but not hold, that the provisions of sections 813 et seq., Code of Civil Procedure, in so far as they permit an action to be brought against the motor-boat Astorian, its attachment and the establishment of a lien thereon, together with its sale to satisfy a judgment for supplies furnished, are constitutional and vest jurisdiction in the state courts to entertain such an action.

[3] The provisions of section 813 of the Code of Civil Procedure applicable to this case are as follows: "When vessels, etc., are liable. Their liabilities constitute liens. All steamers, vessels, and boats are liable: * * * 2. For supplies furnished in this state for their use, at the request of their respective owners, masters, agents, or consignees."

It is immediately apparent from the language here employed that the supplies which can form the basis of such a lien must be purchased at the request of either the owner, the master, the agent, or the consignee of the boat. Supplies purchased by a person not coming within one of these classifications could not furnish the grounds for any such lien.

The record discloses that the respective parties entered into a stipulation in the lower court, the material parts of which are as follows:

"That Y. Ito was not an owner and was never master of the said vessel; at least he was not an owner unless he had a sort of equitable ownership under a charter party which he had with Giaconi and the other owners; * * *

"That immediately thereafter, after the making of the charter party, the possession and control of the said vessel was delivered to the said Y. Ito, and the said Y. Ito thereupon employed a crew of two men and a master for the said vessel and commenced to use it; that Y. Ito thereafter purchased of and from the plaintiff various supplies such as are ordinarily and customarily used by fishermen in the lobster fishing business, such as groceries, hardware supplies, fishing tackle, boat equipment, rubber boots, and articles of similar character. * * *

"That all of the materials and supplies sued for herein were delivered by the Harbor Supply Company, this plaintiff, to the boat 'Astorian,' and they were all ordered by the said Y. Ito or his agents. * * *"

[4, 5] It appears from this stipulation that Ito was not the owner of the motorboat Astorian. He was simply the lessee thereof under the contract which we have referred to and had a mere option to purchase the boat. Ownership implies title. An option to purchase does not pass title to the optionee. Respondent stipulates lack of title in Ito, which excludes him from the classification of an owner.

[6, 7] The stipulation further provides that he was never master of the vessel, but hired a master to navigate it. The liability of a boat and its owners for supplies purchased by a master grows out of the doctrine of the agency of the master for the owners. As the master of the boat, during its possession by Ito, was not appointed by its owners, and as the supplies were not purchased by the master but by Ito, neither the owners nor the boat could be held for their purchase price under this classification. 24 R. C. L. 1135.

[8] The third classification of persons who may bind the owners and the boat are agents. We need only to bear in mind the facts of this case to conclude that Ito was not the agent of the owners. He was simply a lessee of the Astorian and operated it for his own use and profit.

Who may be considered a consignee of the owners of a boat presents a more interesting question. A "consignee" is defined by section 2110, Civil Code, as a person to whom freight is to be delivered. Of course, this definition cannot apply in the instant case. A "consignee" is also defined as follows: "A person to whom goods are shipped for sale; a purchaser to whom goods have been sent. It is undoubtedly true that a consignee is often a purchaser; but it is not necessary that he should have any interest in the goods consigned to him. The consignee belongs to that class of agents called factors, title to the property remaining in the consignor, with power in the consignee to sell the property on account of the consignor." 12 C. J. 527.

[9] It has also been held that a "consignee" is a person to whom personal property of any kind is delivered for the purpose of sale. Commonwealth v. Harris, 168 Pa. 619, 32 A. 92; Powell v. Wallace, 44 Kan. 656, 25 P. 42; Romeo v. Martucci, 72 Conn. 504, 45 A. 1, 99, 47 L. R. A. 601, 77 Am. St. Rep. 327.

It would seem that the latter definition of the term "consignee" as it is used in subdivision 2 of section 813, Code of Civil Procedure, is the only one which could be applicable to the facts of this case. Here it must be held to mean the person to whom personal property is delivered for the purpose of sale. The statement of this definition necessarily excludes Ito from coming within its terms. The boat was not consigned to him for the purpose of sale. He was prohibited from selling it by the express terms of the contract under which he gained its possession.

We have therefore concluded that Ito was neither the owner, master, agent, nor consignee of the motorboat Astorian as the terms are used in section 813 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The case cannot come within the provisions of the section we are considering, as a lien must be supported by a purchase of the supplies by one coming within one of the four classes mentioned in the section. Respondent cannot complain of this conclusion. Its vice president, who was one of its directors, was fully advised of the terms of the contract or charter party under which Ito had possession of the boat. If respondent desired to protect itself by a lien on the boat, it should have done so by proper precautions taken prior to the sale of the goods and merchandise to Ito.

Appellants urge that a large quantity, if not all of the supplies furnished by respondent to Ito were not ship's stores, but were used by Ito to barter for lobsters caught in Mexican waters. While this is probably true as to a considerable portion of these supplies, some of them at least were consumed on the boat. The record does not disclose what quantity was used for barter and what portion was consumed as ship's stores. Ito paid a portion of his bill. As far as the record goes, this payment may have covered the value of the goods used by him in barter.

That portion of the judgment declaring and decreeing a lien upon the motorboat Astorian and ordering its sale in satisfaction of the money judgment rendered against Ito is reversed.

CO. v. WALLIN et al.

Civ. 4306.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.

Sept. 8, 1931.

1. Mortgages ⇨151(3).

Deed of trust is "lien or other incumbrance," within statute governing priority of mechanics' liens (Code Civ. Proc. § 1186).

Code of Civ. Proc. § 1186 provides the liens provided for are preferred to any lien, mortgage, or other incumbrance which may have attached subsequent to time when the building, improvement, or other structure was commenced, work done, or materials were commenced to be furnished.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Lien," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Mortgages ⇨151(3).

If trust deed is recorded before any work is done or materials are furnished, such deed is ordinarily prior to mechanic's lien (Code Civ. Proc. § 1186).

3. Mortgages ⇨151(3).

Where no general contract for construction of garage existed, materialman's lien did not attach until materials were delivered; hence trust deed recorded prior to that time was superior (Code Civ. Proc. § 1186, and § 1183 as amended by St. 1911, p. 1313).

Such trust deed was superior, notwithstanding prior to recordation of the deed of trust, others had already performed labor and furnished materials used in construction of building.

PRESTON, P. J.

This is an appeal by plaintiff American Material Service Company, a corporation, from a judgment allowing priority of a deed of trust of defendant John R. McCoy and Title Guarantee & Trust Company over the mechanic's lien of plaintiff. The facts are briefly these:

Defendants L. O. Wallin, Fred W. Klein, and Frances Klein owned a lot in the city of Los Angeles. During the early part of 1926 they commenced the erection of a brick garage thereon. There was no general contract for the erection of said garage. During the course of the construction of this garage, the owners purchased from plaintiff and appellant certain building materials, consisting principally of rough lumber to be used in the construction of said garage. After the work had begun on the garage, but before appellant had sold or delivered any material, said owners executed a deed of trust upon said real property in favor of defendant John R. McCoy to secure the payment of a promissory note in the sum of $15,750, naming the defendant Title Guarantee & Trust Company as trustee. Said deed of trust was also recorded in the office of the county recorder before appellant delivered any materials for said building. Failing to receive payment for said material, appellant filed a lien for the amount due and thereafter instituted this action for the foreclosure of such lien.

The court found that the building was commenced prior to the recordation of the deed of trust, but that no materials were furnished by appellant until after said deed of trust was recorded, and, therefore, the lien of said deed of trust on said real property was superior to the mechanic's lien of plaintiff and appellant, and rendered judgment accordingly.

The court found, however, that other persons, firms, and corporations had furnished materials and performed labor upon said garage building prior to March 13, 1926, the date of the recordation of the deed of trust, and, also, found that there was no general contract for the erection of said garage building.

Appellant contends that, under the court's findings, its lien would date back as of the date of the commencement of the work on said garage, and would, therefore, be prior and superior to the lien of said trust deed. Consequently, only one question is presented for determination, which is: When did appellant's lien attach? Or, to state the question another way: Did appellant's lien attach when the building was first commenced or when appellant first delivered any lumber or other material for the construction of said building?

Section 1186 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "The liens provided for in this chapter are preferred to any lien, mortgage, or other encumbrance which may have attached subsequent to the time when the building, improvement, or structure was commenced, work done, or materials were commenced to be furnished; also, to any lien, mortgage, or other encumbrance of which the lienholder had no notice, and which was unrecorded at the time the building, improvement, or structure was commenced, work done, or the materials were commenced to be furnished."

[1, 2] It has been settled by a long line of decisions in this state that a deed of trust is a lien or other incumbrance within the meaning of said section 1186. Fickling v. Jackman, 203 Cal. 657, 265 P. 810. The general rule regarding priority of deeds of trust and mortgages over mechanics' liens is stated as follows: If recorded before any work is done or materials are commenced to be furnished, a deed of trust or mortgage is in the ordinary course of things prior to mechanics' liens. Brush v. E. R. Bohan & Co., 102 Cal. App. 457, 283 P. 126; Smith v. Anglo-California Trust Co., 205 Cal. 496, 271 P. 898; S. F. Lumber Co. v. Yates, 54 Cal. App. 109, 204 P. 423; Fickling v. Jackman, supra; 25 Cal. Jur. 52.

In the case at bar, however, we have a different situation. Here the work on the building had commenced and others had already performed labor and furnished materials used in the construction of said building, when the deed of trust was executed and recorded, but appellant did not furnish any material until after the recordation of the deed of trust, and no written contract for the construction of the building is involved. The owner built the structure and dealt directly with the laborers and materialmen.

In the case of McClain v. Hutton, 131 Cal. 132, 61 P. 273, 63 P. 182, 622, the Supreme Court, in construing said section 1186, held that where the contract between the owner and contractor was invalid, by reason of the failure of the parties thereto to comply with section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, liens for labor performed and materials furnished, related back only to the time the work was done and the materials commenced to be furnished, and the court held that such liens were subsequent and inferior to the lien of the mortgage filed for record after the building had been commenced but prior to the time the work was done and the materials commenced to be furnished.

The court in that case further held that under this provision (section 1186, Code Civ. Proc.) the cases must be divided into two categories, distinguished by the existence or nonexistence of a valid contract. In the former case (where there is a valid contract) the priority of the liens is to be determined by the date of the commencement of the building; in the latter, by the time the work was done, or the materials commenced to be furnished.

In Simons Brick Co. v. Hetzel, 72 Cal. App. 1, 236 P. 357, 359, in discussing the holding in McClain v. Hutton, supra, said: "As we understand this decision, the court held that where there was a valid contract, liens thereunder related back to the commencement of the building, but where the contract was invalid the liens related back only to the respective dates when the work was performed and the materials were commenced to be furnished. The reason of the rule thus enunciated we think is apparent. Under section 1183, as it stood at the time McClain v. Hutton was decided, the failure to record the contract rendered it 'wholly void, and no recovery could be had thereon by either party thereto; and in such case, labor done and materials furnished by all persons * * * except the contractor, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof.' But, where the contract was duly filed for record, all liens against the building were based primarily upon the contract, and the labor and material covered by the liens were deemed to have been performed and furnished under said contract. The section therefore divided liens into two classes, those arising under a valid contract between the owner and the contractor, and those where the labor done and materials furnished were deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner. This latter class included all liens of subcontractors, materialmen, and laborers, when there was no valid contract of record, and each of these persons by section 1183 was given a lien by virtue of an implied contract between him and the owner. As far as his right to a lien was concerned, he occupied the same relative position to the owner as if the latter had not made any general contract whatever, but had personally and directly bought the materials and employed the labor used in the construction of the building. In such a case, each laborer and materialman would depend for his lien upon his individual agreement with the owner, and his right to a lien would only commence when he began labor upon, or commenced to furnish material for, the building."

It is true that since the decision in McClain v. Hutton, supra, and in 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 1313) section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure was amended, and as there amended, was still in force at the time this action accrued and also at the time the complaint was filed. In its amended form it differs materially in its requirements from what it did prior thereto. As amended, it contains no provision that for the failure to record the original contract between the owner and the contractor, said contract shall be wholly void, or void at all or invalid. Neither does it contain any provision that when the contract is not filed the labor done and materials furnished shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner, nor any similar provision. These omissions and changes, however, are not such as would, in our opinion, destroy or impair the reasoning in the cases of McClain v. Hutton, supra, and Simons Brick Co. v. Hetzel, supra, on the particular question involved in the case at bar.

The division of mechanics' liens into two classes is based on section 1186 of the Code of Civil Procedure and this section has not been amended since its enactment in 1872.

Appellant seems to rely upon the case of Sax v. Clark, 180 Cal. 287, 180 P. 821, as supporting its contention that its lien dates back to the commencement of work on the building. In that case, however, it does not appear whether there was a general contract or not and, therefore, it is of no assistance to us under the facts in the case at bar.

[3] From what we have said it follows that we are of the opinion that, as there was no general contract for the construction of the garage in question, appellant's lien did not attach until the materials were commenced to be delivered and said deed of trust, having been recorded prior to that time, is superior to the lien of appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MOULTON.
Cr. 218.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District,
California.
Sept. 11, 1931.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 24, 1931. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 8, 1931.

1. Embezzlement ⇨11(2).

Statute defining embezzlement and falsification of public accounts deals solely with protection and safe-keeping of public moneys (Pen. Code, § 424, subs. 1, 2).

Pen. Code, § 424, entitled "Embezzlement and falsification of public accounts," makes it an offense for any officer of state, county, city, town, or district of state, and every other person charged with the receipt, safe-keeping, transfer, or disbursement of public moneys, to appropriate same without authority of law or any portion thereof to his own use or to the use of another, or to loan same or any portion thereof, or to make any profit out of, or to use the same for any purpose not authorized by law.

2. Criminal law ⇨29.

Fact that defendant might have been prosecuted under another statute is no defense.

3. Embezzlement ⇨11(2).

County assessor's deposit of tax moneys for current fiscal year in county treasury as tax moneys collected for preceding fiscal year held offense under embezzlement statute (Pen. Code, § 424, subs. 1, 2).

Defendant was charged with having collected tax moneys in question for the fiscal year 1930-31, and depositing the same in the county treasury under the representation that the same were for taxes collected for the fiscal year 1929-30, the years for which defendant was delinquent in his payments. Defendant contended that offense did not come within the provisions of Pen. Code, § 424, subd. 2, making it embezzlement to use public moneys for any purpose not authorized by law, but constituted offense under section 425, relating to officer's neglecting to pay over public moneys.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Embezzle; Embezzlement," see Words and Phrases.]

4. Embezzlement ⇨44(1).

In prosecution against county assessor for embezzlement, failure of evidence to disclose making of tax assessment held immaterial (Pen. Code, § 424, subd. 2; Pol. Code, § 3756).

5. Embezzlement ⇨44(1).

In prosecution against county assessor for grand theft of tax moneys, evidence held to support conviction (Pen. Code, § 424, subd. 2).

6. Embezzlement ⇨11(2).

County assessor's deposit of current tax funds in county treasury to credit of taxes for preceding fiscal year, though not part of another general embezzlement, would constitute misappropriation of public moneys (Pen. Code, § 424, subd. 2).

7. Embezzlement ⇨11(2).

Fraudulent misappropriation by public official of any property coming under his control by virtue of his trust to any unlawful purpose constitutes embezzlement (Pen. Code, § 424).

8. Embezzlement § 11(2).

To constitute embezzlement by public official, prior embezzlement need not be shown if public official uses funds intrusted to him in any way not authorized by law (Pen. Code, § 424).

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; G. K. Scovel, Judge.

George W. Moulton was convicted of malfeasance in the use of public funds, and from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Edward J. Kelly, of San Diego, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John D. Richer, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas Whelan, Dist. Atty., of San Diego, for the People.

ALLISON, Justice pro tem.

The defendant, the county assessor of the county of San Diego, was convicted on two counts of an indictment charging him with malfeasance in the use of public funds. The first of said counts charges that the said defendant did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously use for purposes not authorized by law, public moneys in the amount of $21,599.69, which moneys were in his possession in his official capacity as county assessor of said county of San Diego. The second count upon which the defendant was convicted, being designated as count No. 4 in said indictment (counts 2 and 3 of said indictment having been dismissed), charges the defendant with the crime of grand theft of the sum of $2,974.22, which moneys were in his possession in his official capacity as county assessor. Appellant was sentenced to San Quentin for the term prescribed by law. This appeal is from the judgment of conviction and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

It appears from the record in this case that said defendant was, on and prior to the 21st day of April, 1930, delinquent in his payments to the county treasurer of San Diego county for tax moneys collected by him for taxes due and payable for the year 1929-30, in the sum of $21,599.69; that there came into his possession as such county assessor, the said sum of $21,599.69 of said tax moneys collected by him between the 1st day of March, 1930, and the 21st day of April, 1930, as taxes for the year 1930-31, and on or about the said 21st day of April, 1930, said defendant represented to the county auditor and county treasurer that said sum of $21,599.69 was the accumulation of tax moneys collected by him on and before the first Monday in March, 1929, for the year 1929-30, and at said time paid over and delivered said sum of money to the said county treasurer of San Diego county to be applied by said county treasurer on said delinquent sums from defendant to said treasurer aforesaid. Said county auditor and county treasurer, believing and relying upon said representations so received from said defendant, applied said sum of $21,599.69 to said delinquency. The fourth count of said information, being one of the counts upon which the defendant was convicted, charges the defendant with grand theft in the sum of $2,974.22. The indictment, which is in the language of the Code section defining the offense, was framed upon the authority of section 424 (subdivisions 1 and 2) of the Penal Code, which provides as follows:

"424. Public officers. Embezzlement and falsification of accounts. Each officer of this state, or of any county, city, town, or district of this state, and every other person charged with the receipt, safe-keeping, transfer, or disbursement of public moneys, who either:

"1. Without authority of law, appropriates the same, or any portion thereof, to his own use, or to the use of another; or,

"2. Loans the same or any portion thereof; makes any profit out of, or uses the same for any purpose not authorized by law," etc.

[1] Subdivisions 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 of said section deal with offenses other than the offense charged in the indictment. Section 424 of the Penal Code deals solely with the protection and safe-keeping of public moneys as defined by said section, and with the duties of public officers charged with its custody and control, and with no other kind of public property. People v. Dillon, 199 Cal. 1, 248 P. 230, 234.

[2, 3] It is urged by the defendant that the offense does not come within the provisions of subdivision 2 of said section 424, and he argues that his neglect or failure to pay over the moneys as required by said section 424 may constitute a violation of section 425 of the Penal Code, but not a violation of subdivision 2 of section 424. Section 425 of the Penal Code reads as follows: "425. Officers neglecting to pay over public moneys. Every officer charged with the receipt, safe-keeping, or disbursement of public moneys, who neglects or fails to keep and pay over the same in the manner prescribed by law, is guilty of felony."

In support of his contention he urges that because the money in question was paid to the county treasurer, who was duly authorized to receive the same, that it was used for a purpose authorized by law and not in violation of subdivision 2 of section 424. It is to be borne in mind that the defendant is charged with having collected the tax moneys in question for the fiscal year 1930-31 and deposited the same in the county treasury under the representation that the same were for taxes collected for the fiscal year 1929-30. He is not charged with neglecting to pay over the tax money received by him in 1929, but with making the improper and unlawful use of the 1930-31 tax money to cover his shortage of 1929 and 1930.

It is true that the embezzling of the tax moneys of 1929-30 was a violation of section 425 of the Penal Code and a criminal prosecution may have been had thereon. However, it cannot be contended that said section occupies the entire legislative field with respect to safe-keeping of public moneys and the duties of public officers with reference thereto. If this conviction is sustainable under section 424 it will not be rendered void by reason of the existence of section 425 of the Penal Code. See People v. Dillon, supra. It is no defense under one statute that the defendant might have been prosecuted under another. Bishop on New Criminal Procedure, § 612, subd. 4.

[4] The defendant insists that there is no evidence that an assessment of personal property was ever made; therefore no taxes became due, and in some manner this absence of proof of an assessment relieves the defendant of the charge against him. We are unable to follow the defendant to this conclusion. The moneys collected by the defendant as county assessor were taxes on personal property not secured by a lien on real estate. These collections were in fact made by him for the fiscal year 1930-31 after March 1, 1930. Section 3756 of the Political Code provides in part that the taxes on all personal property, unsecured by real estate, shall be due and payable immediately after the assessment of said personal property is made, but in any event the personal property tax on unsecured personal property is delinquent on the first Monday in December of each year at 6 o'clock p. m.

The defendant as county assessor is charged with the offense of using public moneys for purposes not authorized by law. The money was paid to him as such county assessor and was in his charge and keeping. Whether an assessment was actually made or not, is of little consequence so far as this charge is concerned. He accepted the money as a public official upon whom the law imposed the duty, among other things, of collecting and properly disbursing the moneys so collected. The question of the legality of the tax is in no wise involved in the matters before us.

[5] It is also contended that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the charge of grand theft as contained in count 4 of the indictment; that the evidence does not disclose a violation of subdivision 2, section 424 of the Penal Code. It appears that after the auditor checked all of the records of the 1929-30 personal property tax assessment rolls and the records of receipts issued against the amounts of money deposited with the treasurer by the defendant, there was on May 1, 1930, a shortage of $2,974.22, and that thereafter on the 5th day of May, 1930, the defendant, as such assessor, deposited the said sum of $2,974.22 with the treasurer to be credited on the 1929-30 account and that this amount was in fact collected on the 1930-31 personal property taxes. It seems that these facts were amply sustained by the records of the defendant's office.

[6] It is contended by the defendant that the deposit of funds in the county treasury could not in any sense be deemed a misappropriation unless such deposit was a part of another general embezzlement. A similar question was presented in the case of People v. Forman, 67 Cal. App. 693, 701, 228 P. 378, 380, in which the court, in disposing of the point, said: "Appellant was not charged with the embezzlement of the smaller amounts but with the misappropriation, on November 5, 1923, of the sum of $6,468.54, in lawful money of the United States. Therefore there is no merit in the point last made."

[7, 8] A crime of embezzlement is made out when it is shown that a public official fraudulently appropriates to any use or purpose not in the due course and lawful exercise of his trust, any property which he has in his possession or under his control by virtue of his trust, and it need not be shown that a prior embezzlement existed if the public official used the funds intrusted to him in any way other than as authorized by law. In People v. Rowland, 12 Cal. App. 6, 17, 106 P. 428, 432, the court said: "So, as stated, if in the case here, the money was either secreted within the meaning of the statute, or used to cover up some other shortage, or actually taken from the vaults of the bank and used in some transaction with which the bank had no connection, the crime is, in either event, proved."

In the case of People v. Dillon, supra, the court said:

"The safe-keeping of public moneys has, from the first, been safe-guarded and hedged in by legislation most strict and severe in its exactitudes. It has continuously been the policy of the law that the custodians of public moneys or funds should hold and keep them inviolate and use or disburse them only in strict compliance with the law. The public treasury or depository of public funds was created solely as an agency for the receipt and disbursement of public funds with reference to public business and not as a place of exchange for the transaction of private business in the sense that banks and other commercial institutions are created or chartered. * * *

"It is not for us to consider the wisdom of the statute. It cannot be said to be invalid on the ground that it is unreasonable or harsh. An officer accepts his office with a knowledge of his duties, and in the instant case there was little excuse for the defendant to have been misled into the error he committed. Certainly there was no provision of law or rule of moral right that could have justified him in making the uses of public moneys which the evidence shows he made. The wisdom of the Legislature in requiring custodians of public moneys to hold them inviolate is both a protection to the public and to the officer, as it tends to remove from him the temptations that beset those who have large sums of money in their possession free from immediate demands."

Other errors are assigned, but in our opinion they are without merit and considering the record as a whole we believe that there is no prejudicial error appearing therein warranting a judgment of reversal.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

1. Negligence  $\S$ 61(2).

Negligence of tunnel contractor in providing insecure dam and leaving conduit under stream open held "proximate cause" of death by flooding of employee of another tunnel contractor concurring with negligence of employer in leaving tunnel unprotected to cause disaster.

"Proximate cause" has been defined as act or omission immediately causing or failing to prevent injury; act or omission occurring or concurring with another, which, had it not happened, injury would not have been inflicted; dominant cause, not one which is incidental to that cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Proximate Cause," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Death  $\S$ 99(5).

$7,500 damages for death of 23 year old son awarded mother having life expectancy of 21½ years and receiving $300 yearly support from son held not excessive.

3. Appeal and error  $\S$ 932(1).

Where appellant failed to print evidence on question of damages, appellate court cannot presume against verdict that reasonable probability that plaintiff suffered pecuniary loss in amount of verdict was not shown.

4. Appeal and error  $\S$ 932(1).

Where appellant failed to print evidence on issue of damages for loss of son, appellate court may presume jury allowed full sum as anticipated pecuniary benefits, not for loss of society, comfort, or protection.

5. Death  $\S$ 64.

Jury in determining damages for loss of son is not bound by exact estimates of mortality tables or past income of son, but could consider expectancy that son's income and contributions to mother might have increased.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; H. V. Alvarado, Judge.

Action by Emma L. Herron against Smith Bros., Inc. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiff sued for damages for the death of her son, who was drowned while employed in the construction of a tunnel for the East Bay municipal utility district. The demurrer of the district was sustained, and the cause went to trial before a jury, which returned a verdict against the defendant, Smith Bros., Inc., for $7,500. This defendant has appealed under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

Working under a contract with the utility district, Smith Bros. was engaged in constructing a tunnel under the Contra Costa county hills as a part of the district's aqueduct system. This tunnel, known as the Lafayette tunnel, ran from the town of Lafayette in a westerly direction to the easterly bank of San Pablo creek. At the same time the firm of Grier & Mead was engaged under similar contract on the construction of another tunnel, which ran from the Claremont district in the city of Oakland in an easterly direction to a point a short distance west of the westerly bank of San Pablo creek. To connect the two tunnels for the general purposes of the water system, a concrete diversion or screening chamber was under construction by Smith Bros. under a separate contract. This chamber was located west of the westerly bank of San Pablo creek at an elevation of several feet below the bed of the creek, and was planned to connect with the Lafayette tunnel by a concrete tube which this defendant constructed across the creek and below the stream bed. About two weeks before the accident Grier & Mead drove a four-foot tunnel from the easterly end of the Claremont tunnel into the excavation made by Smith Bros. for the diversion chamber and used this four-foot tunnel to pump water from the seat of their operations into the diversion chamber until this practice was discontinued by order of the utility district.

In the construction of the diversion chamber and of the connecting tunnel under the stream bed the defendant broke through both of the natural banks of the stream to a level far below that of the stream bed. Protection was afforded those working in the Lafayette tunnel by the erection of a dam consisting of sacks filled with earth. On November 25, 1926, a heavy rainstorm caused a sudden flood of water to flow down San Pablo creek; the water quickly washed out the earth dam on the east bank, overflowed the excavation and works of the diversion chamber, and, escaping into the Claremont tunnel, drowned ten men employed upon that contract.

On this appeal but two points are raised, that the negligence of the appellant was not the proximate cause of the death, and that the damages are excessive. The argument on the question of proximate cause is predicated on the claim that Grier & Mead were trespassers who negligently constructed an opening between the Claremont tunnel and the diversion chamber and that their negligence was the direct and proximate cause of the injuries. The respondents rest their case upon the admitted negligence of the appellants in substituting an insecure and unstable dike or coffer dam for the natural bank of the stream, and in permitting the easterly portal of its conduit under the bed of the stream to remain open and exposed immediately below this insecure dam; upon the further showing that all these acts were done by appellant with full knowledge of the opening into the Claremont tunnel, of the probability of flood waters in the stream, of the incomplete condition of the diversion chamber, and of the uninterrupted passage for the flow of flood waters from the stream into the Claremont tunnel; and that these conditions were allowed to remain notwithstanding repeated warnings of the danger given to appellant.

Proximate cause has been defined as: "That act or omission which immediately causes or fails to prevent the injury; an act or omission occurring or concurring with another, which, had it not happened, the injury would not have been inflicted; * * * the dominant cause, not the one which is incidental to that cause, its mere instrument." 22 R. C. L., p. 111. This definition has been approved in a long line of decisions, but it would serve no purpose to cite them here. In Sawdey v. R. W. Rasmussen et al., 107 Cal. App. 467, 290 P. 684, 689, the District Court say: "The mere fact that one of several concurring causes may not have been reasonably anticipated is not enough to shield from liability him who sets in motion the other; for it is well settled that the negligence complained of need not be the sole cause of the injury. It is enough to show that it is a proximate concurring cause; that is, one that was so efficient in causation that, but for it, the injury would not have occurred." In Rauch v. Southern Cal. Gas Co., 96 Cal. App. 250, 255, 273 P. 1111, 1113, the District Court quoted with approval from Thompson's Commentaries on the Law of Negligence, vol. 8, p. 21, as follows: "One of the most valuable tests to apply to determine this question is to determine whether a responsible human agency has intervened sufficient of itself to stand as the cause." And again (page 20): "An intervening agency which merely concurs with the cause counted on as a proximate cause of the accident does not prevent the latter from becoming the proximate cause for the purposes of the action."

[1] Applying these principles to the case at hand, we cannot escape the conclusion that, conceding the negligence of Grier & Mead in leaving the adit to the Claremont tunnel unprotected, such negligence was not "sufficient of itself to stand as the cause" of the injuries, but the negligence of the appellant in the particulars stated was a "proximate concurring cause," and that these acts of negligence were so continuous in their nature that the concurrent wrongful act of Grier & Mead precipitating the disaster must be regarded as not independent, but as conjoining with the original act to create the disastrous result. Merrill v. L. A. G. & E. Co., 158 Cal. 499, 505, 111 P. 534, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134; Rauch v. So. Cal. Gas Co., 96 Cal. App. 250, 256, 273 P. 1111.

[2-5] On the issue of the amount of the verdict, the argument is that the verdict of $7,500 is excessive because the highest estimate of the yearly contributions of the deceased for the support of his mother was $300; that her life expectancy according to mortality tables was 20½ years; that, assuming that she should live for this full period, the total contributions would equal $6,180. Then it is said that, because of the roving character of the son's employment, there was no reasonable probability that the mother would suffer from the loss of his society, comfort, or protection. The mother was 49 years of age at the time of her son's death; the son was 23. He was able-bodied, thrifty, and sober, and had been engaged as a laborer in heavy construction jobs at daily wages from which he had contributed to his mother an average of $25 a month. Appellant cites Parsons v. Easton, 184 Cal. 764, 773, 195 P. 419, 422, holding that, because the evidence there failed to show "a reasonable probability" that the plaintiff suffered pecuniary loss through the deprivation of the "society, comfort, and protection" of the deceased, "no great sum could reasonably be given as damages" on that account. The case is not authority here for two reasons—the appellant has failed to print any of the evidence on the issue, and we cannot therefore presume against the verdict that such reasonable probability was not shown; for the same reason we cannot presume that any portion of the verdict covered loss of society, comfort, or protection, but we may fairly and reasonably presume in support of the verdict that the jury allowed the full sum of $7,500 as anticipated pecuniary benefits. If this were done, the verdict would not do violence to any rule of law to which we have been cited. The jury was not bound by the exact estimates of the mortality tables or by the estimates of past income of this 23 year old son. It could take into consideration the expectancy that, as the age of the son increased, he might accumulate a greater income and thus increase his contributions to the support of his mother. *Griffey v. CO. et al.

Civ. 4293.

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California.
Sept. 8, 1931.

1. New trial ⇨163(1).

Court could not modify formal order denying new trial, absent inadvertence or mistake (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

2. New trial ⇨163(2).

Absent appeal, order denying plaintiff's motion for new trial, after judgment for defendant, was conclusive.

3. Appeal and error ⇨931(7).

Where defendant's liability upon respondent superior theory was issue, upon judgment for defendant it must be assumed that issue was determined adversely to plaintiff.

4. New trial ⇨155.

Where plaintiff obtained judgment against two of three defendants, denial of plaintiff's motion for new trial against successful defendant was not premature because unsuccessful defendants had separate motion for new trial pending.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1173(1).

On defendant's appeal from order granting plaintiff and codefendants new trial, order, as regards codefendants, could stand, although reversed as to plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by P. A. Compton against the Northwest Engineering Company and others. From an order purporting to grant a new trial after previous order made denying plaintiff's motion for new trial, the named defendant appeals.

Reversed in part, with directions.

Bertrand J. Wellman, Rydalph & Mullen, and H. S. Clewett, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal from an order purporting to grant a new trial after a previous order had been duly made and entered denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The appeal is presented to this court upon a bill of exceptions. It is contended the court was without jurisdiction to change its original order denying a new trial.

The plaintiff lost a hand in operating a drag line excavating machine. In a suit for damages, the complaint alleged that the injury was sustained through the negligence of the defendant Hildebrand, who was engaged in demonstrating the machine as the agent of the appellant, Northwest Engineering Company, and of the codefendant Collins-Kay Machinery Company. The cause was tried with a jury. Separate verdicts were rendered. It was held that plaintiff was entitled to take nothing from the appellant, Northwest Engineering Company. The plaintiff was, however, awarded a verdict of $25,000 against the remaining defendants, Collins-Kay Machinery Company and Hildebrand. A judgment was entered accordingly on February 16, 1928. In due time the plaintiff served and filed upon the defendant Northwest Engineering Company a notice of intention to move for a new trial. This motion was argued and submitted on March 30th. Three days later the court made and entered an unqualified order that "plaintiff's motion for a new trial heretofore submitted is by the court denied."

Subsequent to the filing of plaintiff's motion for a new trial, the defendants Collins-Kay Machinery Company and Hildebrand, against whom the judgment for damages was entered, served and filed a separate notice of intention to move for a new trial. On April 10th this last-mentioned motion for a new trial was argued and submitted. The next day the court made and entered the following minute order: "Defendants' motion for a new trial heretofore submitted is now by the court granted as to all defendants, and (the) order of April 2, 1928, denying plaintiff's motion for new trial, having been prematurely entered is hereby vacated, and plaintiff's motion for new trial is hereby granted."

[1,2] The court certified that the bill of exceptions "is true and correct and contains record of all proceedings subsequent to the entry of judgment herein. * * *" From this bill of exceptions it appears that no motion to modify or set aside the first order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial was ever made pursuant to section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or at all. It also affirmatively appears that the original order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial was duly and regularly made and entered, and that it was not prematurely entered. The two motions for new trial were separate and distinct. The first one was instituted by the plaintiff. It was served upon the defendant Northwest Engineering Company, in whose favor a valid binding judgment had been previously rendered and entered. The motion for a new trial was duly argued and submitted. The court had jurisdiction to hear and determine this motion. On April 2d the court did formally make and enter an order denying this motion for a new trial. By the formal denial of this first motion for a new trial, the court exhausted its jurisdiction in that regard. It was thereafter powerless to modify or change this order denying a new trial against the Northwest Engineering Company, except for inadvertence or mistake in the entry thereof. 20 Cal. Jur. 204, § 134; Bloomquist v. Haley, 204 Cal. 258, 268 P. 364; People v. Martin, 199 Cal. 240, 248 P. 908; Robson v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 588, 154 P. 8; Vale v. Maryland Casualty Co., 101 Cal. App. 599, 281 P. 1058; Arnold v. Superior Court, 71 Cal. App. 298, 234 P. 912. It was not contended the motion was denied through inadvertence or mistake. No motion to modify or set aside this order was ever made upon this ground pursuant to section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or at all. The court merely recites in its last order that the first one was "prematurely entered." This statement of the court to the effect that the first order was prematurely made is without support in the record. In truth, the record which is presented by the bill of exceptions appears to affirmatively indicate that the order was duly and regularly made, and that it was not prematurely entered. In the absence of an appeal, that order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial was therefore final and conclusive.

[3,4] The only apparent theory upon which the plaintiff's motion for a new trial might have been granted was that the evidence may disclose the fact that the defendant Northwest Engineering Company was the employer and principal of the defendant Hildebrand, through whose negligence in demonstrating the machine the plaintiff was injured. This would be upon the theory of respondeat superior, in accordance with the allegations of the complaint. This was a direct issue in the case. A verdict was rendered and a judgment entered in favor of this defendant, Northwest Engineering Company. It must be assumed this issue of appellant's liability was determined adversely to the plaintiff. The interest and alleged liability of this appellant was separate and distinct from that of the other codefendants. A denial of plaintiff's motion for a new trial against this appellant did not necessarily have any bearing upon the liability of the other defendants against whom a judgment for damages was rendered. It may, therefore, not be said that the denial of plaintiff's motion for a new trial was premature merely because the defendants against whom a judgment for damages had been rendered also had pending a separate motion for new trial.

[5] The notice of appeal is from the order of court granting plaintiff's and defendants' motions for new trial, and the order setting aside the former order of April 2d which denied plaintiff's motion for a new trial. This final order from which this appeal was taken may be readily segregated so as to permit it to stand in so far as it grants defendants' motion for new trial. Corbett v. Corbett (Cal. App.) 298 P. 819. This appellant is not concerned with the judgment which was rendered against its codefendants. Neither of these defendants against whom the judgment was rendered has appealed from the order granting a new trial. The balance of the order from which the appeal was taken, to the effect that the former order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial is vacated, and plaintiff's motion for a new trial is granted, is in excess of the court's authority and void. This last-mentioned portion of the order is therefore ineffectual with respect to plaintiff's motion for new trial and should be eliminated from the order.

The order of April 11, 1928, is reversed to the extent that it purports to set aside the former order of April 2, 1928, and purports to grant a new trial as against this appellant. The trial court is directed to modify that order accordingly.
